McCullough brings a good deal of herself to her work. She grew up reading old-fashioned novels, she has said, up to forty a week, which plainly shows in her unadorned narrative style. She was surrounded in childhood by Irish Catholicism, with its emphasis on dutiful love, adherence to conventions, and inevitable punishment for deviance. These are all major themes in her work. Her family life in Australia, with a cold father, a horde of single uncles, and the lesser valuation of women in the society is represented most strongly in the semiautobiographical The Thorn Birds. Her family history also influences her characterization in other novels. Her medical training has provided her with fodder for many of her stories. She describes herself as a child as fat, ugly, and ambitious, as well as very smart. This view of herself may have contributed to her tendency to excel in the research of her novels and to work harder than anyone else.

THE THORN BIRDS

First published: 1977

Type of work: Novel

Three generations of the women in the Australian Outback survive hardship as the family rises to power.

The Thorn Birds is Colleen McCullough's second novel, and her most widely read work to date. Its publication propelled her to immediate literary stardom and ensured her status as a widely read author. It is also a showcase for the themes and literary styles that recur in her later works.

Meggie Cleary is the central figure in The Thorn Birds. The only daughter in a family of six sons, she is "the perfect female character, passive yet enormously strong." While she is still very young she and her family move to Drogheda, a massive plantation in the Outback owned by Meggie's aunt, Mary Carson. Natural disasters occur at every turn and are almost entirely unrelieved by human warmth, especially for a mere girl like Meggie. She is befriended, however, by a handsome and ambitious priest, Father Ralph de Bricassart.

With this beginning the course of events at Drogheda are set. Meggie grows up encompassed by Drogheda, which her aunt wills to the church rather than to the family. She feels a duty to it and to the land that is more compelling than a desire for happiness for herself. Ralph feels a duty to his own ambitions to become cardinal which are, for him, more compelling than his relationship with Meggie. Within the confines of Catholicism they both accept that love must be subordinated to his career as priest and to her responsibility to contribute to the survival of Drogheda. Characteristically for McCullough, the women of the novel have the strength to hold the social fabric together, as is their duty as women, while the men use their strength for personal advancement, either on the plantation or in ascent to a cardinalship, as is conventional for them.

Meggie's sporadic forays toward happiness invariably end in disaster. She marries a cane cutter who looks like Ralph only to find him cold. Her relationship with her daughter is never warm. A brief affair with Ralph gives her a son she loves but whom she eventually loses to the priesthood and an early death. Like the legendary thorn bird of the title, which spends its life seeking a thorn to impale itself on so it can sing one lovely song while dying, pleasure is bought at the price of devastating pain. The characters have the duty to realize and accept this. To feel sorry for oneself would be to avoid this obligation, to defy convention. Meggie's daughter, Justine, eventually abandons Drogheda to be an actress, but even this unconventional act is validated by a man, slipping her back into the dutiful female role after all.

AN INDECENT OBSESSION

First published: 1981

Type of work: Novel

At the close of World War II, a nurse in charge of a ward for mildly disturbed soldiers must deal with a new arrival.

In An Indecent Obsession McCullough has constructed an enclosed world, a microcosm in which a controlled population of characters interact with no relief expected from outside influences. This isolation causes emotions to run high and causes reactions to events to be more intense than they might be otherwise.

Honour Langtry is in charge of the “troppo” ward, a hospital barrack for soldiers who need a rest. It is located in part of an almost evacuated hospital camp on a remote island. She has only five patients and expects the situation to be stable over the few weeks remaining before everyone goes home. Even more than the typical McCullough heroine, she is obsessed by duty. She feels responsible to do as much as possible for her patients, although she is hampered by having no special psychological training. Her solution has been to form them into a supportive family unit with herself as the matriarch.

At this point Michael, a new patient, arrives.

Honour is immediately attracted to him, which upsets the balance in the ward as well as her own sense of her responsibilities. McCullough thus incorporates most of her standard themes—duty, family, forbidden love, and the influence of the environment upon people's lives. Although the story has a human villain, Luce, an arrogant, twisted man who enjoys torturing the others, it is the island and the ward, in which the characters' military responsibility compels them to remain trapped, that are the catalysts for the more catastrophic events of the book. McCullough describes the humidity, the mold, the insects, and their effects upon each character with a vividness which leaves little doubt as to their centrality to the story.

Honour and Michael attempt to place personal satisfaction above duty, with predictably dire results. Although they both subsequently devote themselves to selfless lives bounded purely by responsibility, their infraction marks them and they continue to pay for it. Only when Honour realizes that duty is “only another name for love” and surrenders to it without hoping for anything more, does she regain some measure of tranquillity.

This is one of McCullough's shortest novels, and it trespasses further into the language of romance than her other works. McCullough has also allowed these characters more insight into one another's thoughts and motivations than is perhaps believable. At the same time, the novel deals harshly with the characters, who are not allowed the slightest grain of personal happiness.

THE FIRST MAN IN ROME

First published: 1990

Type of work: Novel

Gaius Marius rises from relative obscurity to power in ancient Rome.

The First Man in Rome marked a stylistic departure for McCullough, as well as a new genre to explore. It is the first of a series of novels, something new for McCullough. Also new is that the primary characters are male. Finally, as a historical novel rather than a romance with a historical setting, it adheres to historical fact. Of necessity, a historical novelist knows the large events of a story before beginning to write. The historical novelist's only literary freedom lies in details such as personality and domestic life. Such details are McCullough's chief strength.

Gaius Marius is the primary character of The First Man in Rome. He is an aristocrat from the far provinces, a man of wealth but little social standing in a society that values ancestry highly. Through marriage to a daughter of the Caesar family and a brilliant military career, he obtains prestige and fame, becoming in time the first man in Rome. This is the accepted title for a man whose natural attributes allow him to outshine all others.

More than in any other work, except perhaps The Thorn Birds, McCullough uses setting as a major character in the novel. The aristocrats of her Rome devote themselves to their country. They are expected to be politicians and military generals, and they are reared with a sense of duty to value Rome above all. The women also are bounded by well-defined and rigid rules of duty to home and family. Their adherence to these rules allows the men to concentrate on politics and war.

The novel is dense with detail. Included in the book are several maps, a glossary, a pronunciation guide for Latin names and phrases, and a list of characters. In the narrative, the buildings, streets, clothes, and attitudes are depicted with minute accuracy. While this makes for slow reading, the narrative constructs a fully rounded, embracing picture of Rome that allows the reader to sense just how the state could so encompass the lives of its inhabitants. It also allows McCullough to reconstruct the ancient world for a modern reader.

As a result of the limits of historical accuracy, the characters in this book are not subjected to the same extremes of fortune that the characters in McCullough's other novels are. Disasters do occur; battles are won or lost; a lucky thought promotes a person to fame and an unlucky chance causes death. The causes, however, are inherent in the individuals, or are likely chances. Working within a story that has already been lived allows McCullough to concentrate fully on her characters and reduces the number of coincidences moving the plot along.

SUMMARY

Colleen McCullough's works contain meticulously researched worlds that envelop the reader in detail. Her characters are ordinary people who possess a recognizable humanity. They are compelled by old-fashioned concepts of duty and adherence to convention to the exclusion of personal happiness.

Konny Thompson

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Tim, 1974
The Thorn Birds, 1977
An Indecent Obsession, 1981
A Creed for the Third Millennium, 1985
The Ladies of Missalonghi, 1987
The Song of Troy, 1998
Morgan's Run, 2000
The Touch, 2003
Angel Puss, 2004 (also as Angel, 2005)
On, Off, 2006

LONG FICTION (MASTERS OF ROME SERIES):

The First Man in Rome, 1990
The Grass Crown, 1991
Fortune's Favorite, 1993
Caesar's Women, 1996

Caesar: Let the Dice Fly, 1997

The October Horse, 2002

Antony and Cleopatra, 2007

NONFICTION:

Cooking with Colleen McCullough and Jean Easthope, 1982

Roden Cutler, V.C.: The Biography, 1998

About the Author

Bridgwood, Christine. "Family Romances: The Contemporary Popular Family Saga." In The Progress of Romance: The Politics of Popular Fiction, edited by Jean Radford. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1986.

Brookner, Anita. "Continental Drift." The Times Literary Supplement, no. 3941 (October 7, 1977).

Dam, Julie K. L., and John Hannah. "Thorny Bird." People Weekly 54, no. 22 (November 27, 2000): 213.

DeMarr, Mary Jean. Colleen McCullough: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996.

Greenberg, Joanne. "Love and Duty." The New York Times Book Review 86 (October 25, 1981): 14, 54.

Hall, Melissa Mia. "A Very American Whodunit." Publishers Weekly 253, no. 16 (April 17, 2006): 162.

Morris, Gwen. "An Australian Ingredient in American Soap: The Thorn Birds by Colleen McCullough." Journal of Popular Culture 24, no. 4 (Spring, 1991).

Parasuram, Laxmi. "The Thorn Birds: An Australian Odyssey." Journal of Australian Literature 1 (June, 1990): 101-110.

Steinberg, Sybil. "Colleen McCullough: The Indefatigable Australian Author Has Embarked on a Five-Volume Series Set in Ancient Rome." Publishers Weekly 237, no. 37 (September 14, 1990): 109-110.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Colleen McCullough resembles many famous storytellers in her reliance on coincidences. Are readers today more or less able to accept coincidences in narrative than were readers in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries?
- To what extent do McCullough's characters' inclinations to follow hunches mirror her own lifestyle?
- Compare McCullough's The Thorn Birds with its cinematic version. Allowing for the differences owing to different media, has the movie accurately reflected the novel?
- As "the first man in Rome," Gaius Marius was important in political and military life. Which aspects of his life would have led McCullough to choose him rather than a republican or imperial figure as "first man"?
- To what extent is Honour Langtry an admirable nurse? Are her failures the result of irresponsibility or an imprudent obsession with responsibility?
- Examine McCullough's concept of happiness as revealed in her fiction.

HUGH MACDIARMID

Born: Langholm, Scotland

August 11, 1892

Died: Edinburgh, Scotland

September 9, 1978

Scotland's greatest modern poet, MacDiarmid created a language—synthetic Scots—which revitalized a cultural and linguistic heritage.

BIOGRAPHY

Hugh MacDiarmid (muhk-DUR-muhd) was born Christopher Murray Grieve in the border town of Langholm, Scotland, eight miles from England, on August 11, 1892. His father was a postal worker and a strong trade unionist, while his mother supplemented her wages as a domestic servant with work in the town library, where Grieve became so familiar with the stacks that he “could find any book . . . in the dark.” Adept at the subjects he liked, indifferent to those that did not hold his interest, Grieve agreed to pursue a course in teacher training in Edinburgh in 1908 to mollify his parents, who were horrified by his declaration that he was going to be a poet.

In Scotland's capital, Grieve became involved in nationalist politics, joined the socialist Fabian Society as well as the Independent Labor Party, and became editor of the literary magazine at the Broughton Junior Student Center. Although he was a genial, often gregarious companion, Grieve also had a disputatious tendency that resulted in a lifelong pattern of quarrels with organizations that employed him. He left school after a misunderstanding involving a prank gone out of control in 1910 and found work with the Edinburgh Evening Dispatch as a reporter, a vocation he relied on during frequent periods of economic stress. He was dismissed after a clash with the editor, worked briefly for the Monmouthshire Labor News before being fired after challenging the editorial committee on grounds of hypocrisy, and returned to Langholm in 1912, launching a characteristically ambitious program of production typical of the periods in his life when his enormous energy enabled him to work simultaneously on a variety of literary and political endeavors.

Living near Aberdeen, he wrote for three local newspapers, began to write lyric poetry, started a series of essays on Scottish nationalism, and experimented with mildly erotic short fiction in the mode of D. H. Lawrence, whose stories he had read in the English Review. Initially declining to become involved in “England's war” with Germany, he enlisted when a close friend was killed in battle. He was posted to Greece in 1916 and wrote war poetry there in the style of Rupert Brooke as well as barracks songs similar to Rudyard Kipling's. On medical leave with a recurrence of a malarial infection, he married Margaret Skinner in 1918 and then returned to Scotland in 1919 to launch a review of Scots cultural activities called Northern Numbers. He accepted the editorship of the prestigious Montrose Review in 1921, and his involvement with nationally controversial questions of Scots home rule and Scottish cultural identity led him to create the pseudonym of Hugh MacDiarmid, a vehicle for the expression of his intense nationalist convictions in poetic language. Although he had been writing in English, his decision to reverse his previous position of avoiding the Scots vernacular enabled him to begin the composition of his landmark long poem, A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle (1926). He began to employ a language called synthetic Scots, which was a revivification of the tradition of greatness (exemplified in the writing of Robert Dunbar) and a modernist experiment in the mode of T. S. Eliot and Ezra Pound.

He published a book of prose sketches, entitled Annals of the Five Senses, under the name C. M.

Grieve in 1923. The first publication signed by MacDiarmid (actually M'Diarmid) was a collection of lyrics, Sangschaw (song festival) in 1925. The writer Edwin Muir described the book as a synthesis of the riches of all the Scottish dialects. At that time, MacDiarmid attacked what he considered spurious examples of a weakened, sentimental version of Scottish culture and was preparing the first drafts of A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle. Following its appearance, he began work on his next major project, To Circumjack Cencrastus: Or, The Curly Snake (1930). He continued his political activities by founding the Scottish Center of PEN, campaigning as a member of the Scottish Home Rule Association, and supporting candidates who shared his nationalist opinions.

With his wife and two children, MacDiarmid moved in 1929 to London to edit VOX, a journal devoted to the radio arts, and then to Liverpool to write publicity for the City Council when VOX folded. He agreed to a divorce after his wife had an affair with a wealthy mine owner and was stunned by the decree that prohibited him from seeing his children. Valda Trevlyn, whom he met in 1930, gave him encouragement, and he plunged ahead with his usual vigor. Following the publication of To Circumjack Cencrastus, he produced four other books of poetry in the early 1930's, wrote constantly on Scots cultural issues, joined the British Communist Party in 1934, and married Valda that same year. MacDiarmid moved with his new wife and child to the Shetland Island of Whalsay, an isolated community of fishermen, in 1933 and worked on so many separate commissions during the next two years that he was hospitalized with an onset of nervous exhaustion. Upon recovering, he began his last really ambitious poem, the Cornish Heroic Song for Valda Trevlyn, which was never completed in its original form but which provided the stem of many of his later published poems.

In spite of his age and previous service, MacDiarmid was called up in 1942 for industrial service. His irritation with many aspects of the social and political world was channeled into the first volume of his autobiography, Lucky Poet (1943), which mingled childhood recollection with opinion, literary theory, and attacks on many adversaries. By this time, he was sufficiently famous for an edition of his selected poems, Speaking for Scotland (1946), to be published in the United States. He also continued to lead a vigorous existence, combining pub talk, public pronouncements, political and poetic debates, and frequent contributions to newspapers, journals, and anthologies. His connoisseur's consumption of single malt Scotch whiskey—a life-long practice—had no apparent adverse effects on his health but led to occasional incidents that contributed to his growing legend as a wild man. The honors he received (a pension of £150 per year from the government in 1950; an honorary doctor of laws degree from Edinburgh University in 1957) did not diminish his instinct for controversy. He rejoined the British Communist Party in 1957, twenty-two years after his expulsion, demonstrated for nuclear disarmament, argued with Norman Mailer, Mary McCarthy, and others at the Edinburgh Festival of 1962, and challenged the election of Sir Alec Douglas-Home (“a zombie, personifying the obsolescent traditions of an aristocrat”) as prime minister. During the 1960's and 1970's, his life was brightened by a reunion with his children and the publication of his poetry in continuously revised editions, as well as the opportunity to meet writers he admired. By the time of his death in 1978, at the age of eighty-six, he had become a national celebrity, whose “essential vitality” and “disarmingly courteous manner” made him a welcome companion, but one who never curtailed his knife-edge wit when confronting what he considered slights to his artistic or cultural integrity. In Scotland, his reputation at the end of the twentieth century remained as much a subject of debate as it did in the 1920's when he first emerged into national consciousness. His poetry has continued to find an audience throughout the world.

ANALYSIS

One thing that inspired Christopher Grieve's imaginative conception of himself as Hugh MacDiarmid was the publication of James Joyce's masterpiece Ulysses in 1922. MacDiarmid had the same kind of epic ambition as Joyce. Fascinated by the scandal concerning the publication of Ulysses, excited by Joyce's extraordinary linguistic invention, and encouraged by the efforts of a man he saw as a fellow Celt at war with the British literary establishment, as well as his countrymen's narrowness, MacDiarmid was struck by the thought that he could use the Scots language in a similarly inventive fashion. Even when he was writing as Christopher Grieve, MacDiarmid was moved by a very strong nationalist sentiment, deeply frustrated that poetry in Scotland in the early days of the twentieth century was either expected to be a replica of standard English forms or a bad imitation of Robert Burns. Grieve saw the great Scots poets of earlier times—figures such as Robert Henryson, William Dunbar, and Gavin Douglas—as a foundation for a renaissance. The Middle Scots language they used could function as a base for a creative transformation that would combine the traditional strengths of the older culture with those of highly original modernism.

Grieve's choice of the name Hugh MacDiarmid was a rejection of a dominant English culture, which he regarded as an adjunct to imperialism and an assertion of cultural value, since Hugh means divine wisdom. MacDiarmid also tried to include in his work an amalgam of sometimes contradictory philosophical positions and social strategies. Brought up as a Christian, MacDiarmid often used biblical allusions, frequently referred to God or Christ in his poetry, and saw the act of poetic composition as akin to a holy mission. On the other hand, he disdained any theological dogma, practically worshipped Fyodor Dostoevski, and asserted that he purposefully "got rid of that name" that means Christ-bearer. His intellectual idols were Friedrich Nietzsche, whose elitist doctrines supported MacDiarmid's sense of his own superior mental capability and Vladimir Lenin, whom he addressed almost as a confidant in three poems called "Hymns to Lenin." His version of Marxism, however, was so eccentric that he was expelled from the British Communist Party for incipient nationalism. He was expelled in turn from the National Party of Scotland for Communism. The Nietzschean arrogance of some of his social declarations was balanced by his egalitarian appreciation for the "rugged faces" of "auld border breeds." His portrait of his home ground, "Kinsfolk," was one of his most heartfelt works and a tribute to the legacy of the ordinary people he respected and wrote about often.

MacDiarmid put these elements into the linguistic mix he fashioned from the Scots words he studied in etymological dictionaries and from those he still heard spoken around him. The synthetic Scots language was of his own devising; even most native Scottish readers could only grasp it with the help of a glossary. MacDiarmid used this language in poems that for all their modernist influences were still built on familiar structures like the ballad quatrain. MacDiarmid, for all of his intellectual power, sought a place in the Gaelic oral tradition. He was frustrated that the academic approach to English literature stressed the page as a source of study; he maintained that it was "the association with music and words that I was concerned with, particularly in early lyrics." His first poetry to exemplify his singular style was published in the book Sangschaw, which included the groundbreaking poem "The Watergaw" (an indistinct rainbow), which MacDiarmid initially presented as the work of a friend of Christopher Grieve in a column for the Dunfermline Press in 1922. MacDiarmid's sophisticated, intricate rhythmic linkage gave the twelve-line lyric a density consistent with the modernist contention that innovative form can be a revelation of content.

At the time that his early lyrics were published, MacDiarmid was at work on what is considered his masterpiece, one of the exemplary works of the modernist movement. A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle was conceived as a Scots equivalent of T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land (1922). Best understood as a poetic sequence, A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle is a meditation in the form of a dramatic monologue. It represents the flow of consciousness of a man fallen drunk into a ditch on the way home from a tavern. It utilizes symbolist technique (thistle equals Scotland; intoxication equals artistic inspiration), but it rejects the limits of formal structure as dictated by current literary convention and seeks new patterns of coherence. The fact that the poem sold poorly did not prevent MacDiarmid from writing To Circumjack Cencrastus, an even longer, more uneven sequence in which he charts and celebrates Gaelic culture.

Along with his massive, inclusive efforts reproducing the map of his culture, MacDiarmid also often concentrated his attention in very tightly crafted lyric poems such as "On a Raised Beach," "In the Slums of Glasgow," "The Glass of Pure Water," and "Diamond Body." He demonstrates his linguistic proficiency in "Water Music," a delightful echo of Joyce's "Anna Livia Plurabelle" chapter in Finnegans Wake (1939). "Water Music" compares the rivers near his home in Langholm to Joyce's Liffey. MacDiarmid succeeded in his ultimate goal of drawing serious attention to Scotland's literary and cultural life. He has not, however, been given the close, appreciative scrutiny that his work warrants. The effort required to read or understand his poetry is not that great. It is not any harder than grappling with the myriad references in Pound's Cantos (1928-1940), and it is similarly rewarding. As MacDiarmid's contemporaries among the modernist masters continue to occupy a major position in twentieth century literature, MacDiarmid's writing remains in a curious kind of limbo, its presence inescapable, its outlines not entirely clear.

A DRUNK MAN LOOKS AT THE THISTLE

First published: 1926

Type of work: Poem

Through a night of reflection, a man intoxicated by the awesome possibilities of life and art confronts his personal demons and undergoes a spiritual transformation.

In a letter to his publisher in 1926, MacDiarmid described A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle as a "long poem . . . divided into several sections having within the sections a great variety of manners and measures of verse." The various forms MacDiarmid employed were designed to demonstrate the poet's intellectual alliance with the most advanced currents of thought of his time. The basic stanza of the poem, the abcb of the classic Scots folk ballad, roots the poem in a cultural context that the poet wished to elevate to international significance. The drunk man who is the narrative consciousness of the poem is somewhat ironically labeled the "village drunk." He is a representative of the poet's ambitions and a Scots Everyman. His spiritual quest to become something like "A greater Christ, a greater Burns" is treated with considerable humor as the narrative action—patterned after Burns's "Tam O'Shanter"—shifts abruptly to follow the fleeting moods, emotions, and ideas of the poet's imagination. The poem is about visionary experience.

Joycean influence on the poem includes a final section in which a woman named Jean gives the poet—as Molly Bloom in Ulysses gives her husband Leopold—the promise of love. MacDiarmid also incorporates elements from Dante (a man in a dark wood), from the French surrealist poet Paul Valéry, from a number of Russian writers, and especially from T. S. Eliot, whose The Waste Land is quoted in the poem and who is directly addressed. The thistle that is the object of the poet's attention is a traditional symbol for Scotland, and the poet sees it as both a "wretched weed" (a version of himself) and an emblem of Scottish strength—"The stars like thistle's roses floo'er." An important aspect of this flowering is the power MacDiarmid invests in the Scots language, the vernacular that he has taken from the past. MacDiarmid concluded that since English society was exhausted, its formal language was bereft of redemptive possibility. He could follow Pound's dictum to "make it new" only by exploring the energy latent in fallow linguistic fields.

MacDiarmid needed every resource he could find to sustain a poem that took a year to write, has 2,685 lines, and ranged from the intensely personal to the epic and cosmic. Its collage of texts, mixture of modes, and erratic symbology is held together by the force of the poet's convictions. It has a compelling mental presence that assumes a distinct personality through the masterful manipulation of a language foreign to almost all of its readers. In the poem, he declares a faith in his land, his culture, and ultimately his art, which he believes is strong enough to accomplish the most difficult and necessary of human tasks—a reconciliation with the trials of existence.

"WATER MUSIC"

First published: 1932 (collected in Scots Unbound, and Other Poems, 1932)

Type of work: Poem

The poet celebrates the "liquid features of the Langholm landscape," the home ground of his youth.

This poem appears in Scots Unbound, and Other Poems (1932). MacDiarmid's admiration for James Joyce is apparent in much of his work and is most explicitly expressed in the poem "Water Music," which is written as a tribute to Joyce's dazzling language in the "Anna Livia Plurabelle" section of Finnegans Wake. Just as Joyce evokes the river Liffey, MacDiarmid captures the spirit of the rivers near his boyhood home in Langholm by creating a rhythmic structure that duplicates the sound of the rushing waters and the surrounding landscape. Beginning with a direct address to Joyce, MacDiarmid then builds, in closely rhyming quatrains, an effect like that of water cascading over rugged ground. The rhythms are compelling, but MacDiarmid's most engaging technique in the poem is his employment of many old Scots words. Some have no direct English cognates. The impression the poem gives—either on the page or spoken—is akin to the syllabic experimentation of E. E. Cummings, in which sheer sound enchants even as meaning is elusive or unobtainable.

MacDiarmid, however, does not sacrifice meaning for an engaging aural performance. The Scots words have been chosen for both sound and sense. With the assistance of a glossary, the reader may fully appreciate MacDiarmid's evocative description of the landscape of the border country.

Appreciation of the poem and of much of MacDiarmid's best work depends on knowledge of his synthetic Scots. When described in his language, the rivers, streams, and rills begin to assume a distinct personality. "They mimp and primp, or bick and birr," MacDiarmid writes.

The poet becomes inspired or reflective in response to the scenery, until in conclusion he asserts, "And weel I ken the air's wild rush," proclaiming his knowledge of the forces of the natural world and stressing his recognition of its importance. This is a poem of origins, in which the Scots land itself is offered as a source of strength and vitality, and the language that MacDiarmid uses has also been closely examined for an insight into the primal energy of words themselves. MacDiarmid's deep love for Scotland and his love of language are in close harmony in "Water Music."

"ON A RAISED BEACH"

First published: 1934 (collected in Stony Limits, and Other Poems, 1934)

Type of work: Poem

The poet meditates on the harsh but strangely appealing landscape of the outer Shetland island of Whalsay.

This poem appears in Stony Limits, and Other Poems (1934). To convey the treeless, windswept, almost uninhabited world of the Shetland Islands where he lived during the mid-1930's, MacDiarmid attempted to craft another dialect, using technical vocabulary. Employing modern scientific terminology, MacDiarmid begins "On a Raised Beach" with a catalog of geologic terms:

All is lithogenesis—or lochia,
Carpelite fruit of the forbidden tree,
Stones blacker than any in the Caaba,
Cream-coloured caen-stone, chatoyant pieces,
Celadon and corbeau, bistre and beige,
Glaucous, hoar, enfouledered, cyathiform,
Making mere faculae of the sun and moon . . .

The geological allusions are mingled with references to religious phenomena (the Caaba is a shrine holding a sacred black stone). The poet joins his feelings of isolation with an exceptionally close scrutiny of the terrain in order to avoid spiritual desolation. MacDiarmid felt he was in a kind of exile, but he thought if he could enliven the bare and forbidding terrain with a creative appreciation of its beauty, then he could thereby demonstrate the redemptive power of art.

After establishing the setting, MacDiarmid turns toward an extended philosophical consideration of the stones on the beach. In long lines and measured cadences, MacDiarmid develops a mood of meditative reflection, raising some of the most fundamental questions of human existence. While insisting on the literal qualities of the stones, the poem aims toward transcendence. The stones stand for permanence ("There are plenty of ruined buildings in the world but no ruined stones"); MacDiarmid recognizes that a refocusing of attention is required to establish a connection with higher realms. Acknowledging his somewhat intemperate nature—"Hot blood is of no use in dealing with eternity"—MacDiarmid creates a serious context for inquiry, his long lines echoing biblical verse.

The poem is more than four hundred lines in length, and while MacDiarmid was accustomed to working in long forms, he knew that the intense mood he was developing could not be sustained until the conclusion. Consequently, he balances philosophical propositions with images of landscape. The language of science helps him reach an "abode of supreme serenity" in which the largest questions, if not answered, have at least been posed.

SUMMARY

Hugh MacDiarmid's combination of Scots nationalism, Marxism, modernism, and Christian mysticism has long fascinated and confounded his readers. His extraordinary capabilities with language have earned him admirers and made his work much less accessible than that of other writers of similar ability. Writing long poems in synthetic Scots, which resembles but does not correspond precisely to standard English, MacDiarmid succeeded in his ambition to be a national poet of international importance. He would not have been displeased with the controversies that continue about his life and art.

Leon Lewis

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

- A Moment in Eternity*, 1922
Annals of the Five Senses, 1923 (as C. M. Grieve; prose sketches)
Sangschaw, 1925 (as Hugh M'Diarmid)
Penny Wheep, 1926
A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle, 1926
To Circumjack Cencrastus: Or, The Curly Snake, 1930
First Hymn to Lenin, and Other Poems, 1931
Scots Unbound, and Other Poems, 1932
Stony Limits, and Other Poems, 1934
Selected Poems, 1934
Second Hymn to Lenin, and Other Poems, 1935
Selected Poems, 1944
Speaking for Scotland, 1946
A Kist of Whistles, 1947
In Memoriam James Joyce: From a Vision of World Language, 1955
Three Hymns to Lenin, 1957
The Battle Continues, 1957
Collected Poems of Hugh MacDiarmid, 1962
A Lap of Honour, 1967
A Clyack-Sheaf, 1969
More Collected Poems, 1970
The Hugh MacDiarmid Anthology: Poems in Scots and English, 1972
Complete Poems, 1920-1976, 1978 (2 volumes)
The Revolutionary Art of the Future: Rediscovered Poems, 2004 (John Manson, Dorian Grieve, and Alan Riach, editors)

NONFICTION:

- Contemporary Scottish Studies*, 1926
The Present Condition of Scottish Music, 1927

The Lucky Bag, 1927
Albyn: Or, Scotland and the Future, 1927
At the Sign of the Thistle: A Collection of Essays, 1934
Scottish Scene: Or, The Intelligent Man's Guide to Albyn, 1934 (with Lewis Grassic Gibbon)
Scottish Eccentrics, 1936
The Islands of Scotland, 1939
Lucky Poet, 1943 (autobiography)
Cunningham Graham: A Centenary Study, 1952
Burns Today and Tomorrow, 1959
David Hume: Scotland's Greatest Son, 1961
The Kind of Poetry I Want, 1961
The Company I've Kept, 1966
Scotland, 1968: Selected Essays of Hugh MacDiarmid, 1969 (Duncan Glen, editor)
The Letters of Hugh MacDiarmid, 1984 (Alan Bold, editor)
New Selected Letters, 2002 (Dorian Grieve et al., editors)

EDITED TEXTS:

Northern Numbers, Being Representative Selections from Certain Living Scottish Poets, 1920-1922 (3 volumes)
Robert Burns, 1759-1796, 1926
The Golden Treasury of Scottish Poetry, 1940
Robert Burns: Poems, 1949
Selected Poems of William Dunbar, 1955
Robert Burns: Love Songs, 1962
Henryson, 1973

MISCELLANEOUS:

Annals of the Five Senses, 1923 (as C. M. Grieve)

About the Author

Baglow, John. Hugh MacDiarmid: The Poetry of Self. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1987.
 Bold, Alan. MacDiarmid: Christopher Murray Grieve, a Critical Biography. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1988.
 Buthlay, Kenneth. Hugh MacDiarmid. Edinburgh: Scottish Academic Press, 1982.
 Glen, Duncan, and Hugh MacDiarmid. The MacDiarmids: A Conversation—Hugh MacDiarmid and Duncan Glen. Preston, Lancashire, England: Akros, 1970.
 Herbert, W. N. To Circumjack MacDiarmid: The Poetry and Prose of Hugh MacDiarmid. Oxford, England: Clarendon Press, 1992.
 Lyall, Scott. Hugh MacDiarmid's Poetry and Politics of Place: Imagining a Scottish Republic. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 2006.
 O'Connor, Laura. Haunted English: The Celtic Fringe, the British Empire, and De-Anglicization. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2006.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What personal qualities and intellectual proclivities have most likely undermined Hugh MacDiarmid's attempt at fostering a Scottish literary Renaissance?
- Given MacDiarmid's conviction that bad imitations of Robert Burns ruined Scottish poetry, was he wise to write as many dialect poems as he did?
- Analyze the comic elements in MacDiarmid's A Drunk Man Looks at the Thistle.
- Examine the range of symbolic potentialities in MacDiarmid's thistle.
- Characterize the Scottish environment as MacDiarmid presents it in "Water Music."
- Which is the greater challenge to the reader: MacDiarmid's reconstructed Scottish dialect in his earlier poems or the weight of knowledge he brought to his later English poems?

© Miriam Berkley

IAN MCEWAN

Born: Aldershot, England
June 21, 1948

With his novels and short stories, McEwan has established himself as a leading British author who has moved away from the writing which earned him the nickname of “Mr. Macabre” to fiction of penetrating insight and compassion for human limitations.

BIOGRAPHY

Ian McEwan (muhk-YEW-uhn) was born on June 21, 1948, in Aldershot, England, where his mother, Rose Moore, a widow with two children, married his father, David McEwan, a Scotsman who had joined the British army in the 1930's and rose to the rank of sergeant major, a social move upward as well as a military promotion. McEwan attended a government-supported boys' boarding school and completed a degree in English and French at the University of Sussex before beginning an M.A. degree in English at the University of East Anglia. He was the student of the English novelist Malcolm Bradbury, whose specialty was American writers. McEwan has said that Bradbury's encouragement to read the works of novelists such as Norman Mailer, Philip Roth, and Vladimir Nabokov had a large impact on his own early writing, including some of the stories that appeared in his two collections, First Love, Last Rites (1975) and In Between the Sheets (1978). In 1978, McEwan published his first novel, The Cement Garden.

In the 1980's, McEwan also became interested in writing plays for the stage, television, and screen. His dramatic works include The Imitation Game: Three Plays for Television (1981); Or Shall We Die? (pr., pb. 1983), an oratorio with music by Michael Berkeley (1983); a screenplay, The Ploughman's Lunch (1983); and another screenplay, The Innocent (1995), a film adaptation of his 1990 novel. His novel writing continued with the bizarre narrative The Comfort of Strangers (1981), in which a couple befriend another couple in a city like Venice, Italy, and one husband murders the other. Another novel, The Child in Time (1987), is a transition to his later writing: There is a bizarre event, but it occurs two years before the story begins and the focus is on the psychological devastation that it produces.

McEwan's fiction has been respectfully received by book reviewers, despite their occasional disapproval of his subject matter or approach. His collection First Love, Last Rites won the Somerset Maugham Award for a notable first book, and he received the Whitbread Novel of the Year Award in 1987 for The Child in Time. Among his other honors were being named a fellow of the Royal Society of Literature in 1984 and receiving an honorary doctorate from his alma mater, the University of Sussex, in 1989. His novels, beginning with The Comfort of Strangers, have often appeared on the short list of nominees for the Man Booker Prize, which he received for Amsterdam (1998). His novels The Cement Garden, The Comfort of Strangers, The Innocent, Enduring Love (1997), and Atonement (2002) have been adapted for film.

McEwan married Penny Allen in 1982; after fifteen years and two sons, the marriage ended in divorce. In 1997, he married Annalena McAfee.

ANALYSIS

Much of McEwan's early career was shaped by the stories he wrote while a student of the British novelist Malcolm Bradbury. McEwan's interest in the grotesque and perverse encouraged reviewers and critics to dub him “Mr. Macabre.” In “Solid Geometry,” for example, a man keeps a pickled penis in a jar on his desk, and in “Homemade,” an adolescent loses his virginity with his ten-year-old sister. The publisher Secker and Warburg encouraged him to expand “Homemade” into a novel, and there are similarities between the story and McEwan’s first novel, The Cement Garden, a macabre tale of children who bury their widowed mother’s corpse in the cellar. In his later work, McEwan’s attraction to the macabre gave way to a deeper psychological exploration of his characters, yet some of the earlier interest in the bizarre persists. In Amsterdam, for example, the two main characters murder each other in the name of euthanasia.

The critical consensus is that The Child in Time was McEwan’s breakthrough novel. Because the setting is a few years into the future, it might be classified as dystopian fiction. The abduction of his three-year-old daughter has turned Stephen Lewis, a writer of children’s books, into a zombie. Stephen serves on a subcommittee of an ultraconservative government bent on imposing its notion of child care. It is a meaningless position, obtained through his friend Charles Darke, who wrote the subcommittee’s report before it met. Darke is regressing to the age of ten with the approval of his physicist wife, Thelma. As a result of a reconciliation, Stephen’s wife, Julie, becomes pregnant and he delivers the baby, compounding the themes of innocence and time.

The Innocent, set in the Cold War Germany of 1955, has elements of the thriller and the macabre, such as the cutting up of a corpse by an engineer who is in Berlin doing American and British intelligence work. Black Dogs (1992) is told by Jeremy, a politically motivated man, who became estranged from his wife after she underwent a religious conversion, associated with black dogs. Both novels mark McEwan’s increasing interest in history.

Enduring Love is typical of a narrative structure to which McEwan has been increasingly attracted: the story of how lives are altered by a single event. In Enduring Love, the narrative is set in motion when Joe, a science writer, is about to propose marriage to Clarissa on a picnic; impulsively, he joins several men attempting to hold down a hot air balloon with a boy in its basket that the wind is blowing away. Joe and the others struggle in vain to hold the basket down, and one by one let go, except for a physician, who holds on too long and falls to his death. Jed, one of the failed rescuers, begins a long and futile campaign to persuade Joe that he is in love with Jed, a campaign that almost destroys Joe’s relationship with Clarissa and leads Joe to shoot Jed after Jed attacks Clarissa with a knife. The novel’s action is bizarre but engrossing in its psychological implications, and it excels in demonstrating how a brief event can have a huge impact on one’s future.

McEwan’s readers noted an increasing philosophical and psychological depth in the novels written after Enduring Love. He is preoccupied with innocence in a violent world, especially the recognition that the innocent have no special protection from destruction. These novels, such as Atonement, reveal how dangerous the innocent can be. McEwan has also become preoccupied with time, both as a theme and as an element in narrative technique. The latter is apparent in the severely restricted time spans of his novels. Each section of Atonement, for example, takes place in fewer than twelve hours, as does the main section of On Chesil Beach (2007); Saturday (2005) takes place on one day, Saturday, February 15, 2003. Such time compression enhances dramatic intensity but also focuses on the “moment,” often a brief experience that changes a character’s life.

AMSTERDAM

First published: 1998

Type of work: Novel

After composer Clive Linley and newspaper editor Vernon Halliday agree to perform euthanasia if a fatal disease makes it impossible for either to ease his own passing, the two have a falling out and end up killing each other.

Despite mixed reviews—The Washington Post thought it a “minor work,” while the Christian Science Monitor called it “a deadly little masterpiece”—Amsterdam won the prestigious 1998 Man Booker Prize for the best British Commonwealth or Irish novel of 1998.

At the funeral of their former lover, Molly Lane, Clive Linley, a composer, and Vernon Halliday, a London newspaper editor, are so frightened by the horror of suffering a slow death from a fatal disease with no one to assist their suicide that they agree to be each other's Dr. Death, if needed. Aware of Molly's infidelity with Vernon (and Clive), her husband, George, offers Vernon photographs of Adrian Garmony, an ultraconservative foreign secretary with ambitions of becoming prime minister. George assumes Molly took photographs of Garmony in women's clothes and expects Vernon to embarrass Garmony by printing the photographs to boost circulation. If there is a backlash against Vernon for exposing Garmony, George will be avenged on both.

Struggling to complete a "Millennial Symphony" he expects to cap his career, as the Ninth Symphony capped Ludwig von Beethoven's, Clive goes to the Lake District. There, he encounters a couple having what he initially thinks is a rural assignation but eventually recognizes as an attempted rape. When he refuses to intervene because he is about to grasp the musical theme to complete his great symphony, guilt causes Clive to lose it anyway, even though he deludes himself into believing that he has grasped it. Later, his symphony is panned as an embarrassing imitation of Beethoven's Ninth.

After the photographs of Garmony are published, Garmony's wife lies to the press about her husband's cross-dressing, claiming that she knew about it and loved him enough to let him enjoy himself. She attacks Vernon for having the "mentality of a blackmailer and the moral stature of a flea." As Clive is embarrassed that his last symphony is panned, Vernon is ridiculed for his smear campaign. To make matters worse, Clive sends Vernon a postcard applauding Mrs. Garmony's attack, and Vernon returns the favor by reporting Clive as a material witness in the Lake District rape.

After the former friends arrange each other's "mercy killing" in Amsterdam, the narrative returns to a conversation between Molly's husband, George, and Garmony, who bears George no ill will, since he has become an object of public sympathy. George reveals himself as the master plotter behind the publication of the cross-dressing photographs, complimenting Garmony on surviving a scandal that would have forced lesser men to hang themselves. Internally, George compliments himself; he missed Garmony, but paid back Vernon, and Clive, whom he appears not to have targeted. The perverted comedy of "getting even" and "getting away with murder" may take an even sicker turn if George kept Molly alive, not because he could not let her go but because her wanted to make her pay for her infidelity.

ATONEMENT

First published: 2002

Type of work: Novel

On the day Robbie Turner falls in love with Cecilia Tallis, he is falsely accused of rape and sent to prison, where his sentence is commuted after he volunteers to fight in World War II.

For many, Atonement is McEwan's best novel. The reviews were positive, with some grumbling about the ending. Atonement contains three parts—the first set in 1935, the second two in 1940—followed by an epilogue occurring in 1999.

Part 1 opens in the country home of the Tallis family. It includes the "Old Man," as his children call their father, absent in London, perhaps preparing for war or evading the wife with headaches; his son, Leon, twenty-three; daughter Cecilia, twenty-two; and daughter Briony, thirteen. The family almost includes the cleaning lady's son, Robbie Turner, because the "Old Man" virtually adopted him after Robbie's father ran off when Robbie was six. Mr. Tallis paid Robbie's way at Cambridge and may send him to medical school. Like Cecilia, Robbie is an English major, and he finished his degree with a "first," or "A," compared to her "third." The Tallises are presently hosting Mrs. Tallis's niece, Lola, fifteen, and twin nephews, whose mother ran away with another man. Leon has invited his friend, Paul Marshall, heir to a chocolate factory, to visit. When Cecilia strips to her underwear to retrieve the missing piece of a Meissen vase from the garden fountain, Robbie suddenly falls in love with her.

In the letter he writes to declare his love, Robbie makes a disastrous Freudian slip by referring to Cecilia's genitalia with a word he had just read in D. H. Lawrence's notorious novel, Lady Chatterley's Lover (1928). To compound his tragic error, he enlists Briony as the letter carrier; she reads the letter and later witnesses Cecilia and Robbie in the library, making love so passionately that she misinterprets it as rape. Searching for the missing twins that night, Briony encounters Lola and a rapist, whom she misidentifies as the insatiable Robbie. Robbie is tried and condemned to a long prison sentence.

Part 2 jolts the narrative forward to World War II, when Robbie, now a soldier, is part of the British retreat to Dunkirk. Amid incredibly realistic war-time reportage—remarkable because, like Stephen Crane, author of The Red Badge of Courage (1895), McEwan never was a soldier—the narrative focuses solely on Robbie’s consciousness and his memories of Cecilia. These memories keep him alive, especially those of love-making in the library, interrupted by Briony’s intrusion. The scene of passionate sexual initiation has been praised by the American novelist John Updike and the English critic Terry Eagleton as the most beautifully erotic scene since Lawrence.

In part 3, Cecilia works as a nurse in London, living with a recuperating Robbie. Briony is also a nurse in London, and she is now willing to testify that Robbie was not a rapist. After Briony visits Cecilia and Robbie, she attends the wedding of Cousin Lola and Paul Marshall, where it is revealed that Marshall was the man who raped Lola. Most readers are unprepared for the next jolt, as part 3 ends with the words, “BT, London, 1999.”

The “BT” is Briony Tallis, a successful novelist, who is seventy-seven years old in 1999. She, not some unidentified third-person narrator, has been telling this story.

The epilogue takes place in a few hours as Briony prepares for a birthday party at Tallis House, now a hotel, where the dinner guests are to assemble in the library. After Briony introduces several unimportant relatives, she reveals the novel’s major epiphany: The ending to “her” novel in part 3 was pure fiction. Robbie actually died of blood poisoning in Dunkirk, and Cecilia died in a London bombing three months after Lola and Paul Marshall’s wedding. After many drafts of the novel, this is the version she will publish once the Marshalls have died, the only version with a happy ending, which she thinks is the best form of atonement for her false accusation that Robbie was the rapist. Soon, all the “real” people will be dead, but Robbie and Cecilia will live out the ages in Briony’s novel, reunited in the end.

SATURDAY

First published: 2005

Type of work: Novel

After neurosurgeon Henry Perowne collides into Baxter’s car, Baxter, seeking revenge, breaks into Perowne’s home, threatening the family with violence.

Saturday takes place on a single day—Saturday, February 15, 2003. Before dawn, Henry Perowne, a prominent neurosurgeon, watches a plane crashing toward London, possibly a terrorist attack. The plane foreshadows how Perowne’s day of playing squash with a colleague, shopping for a family dinner, and visiting his widowed mother will be interrupted by an automobile collision with Baxter, who is driving with two other young thugs. Perowne escapes being beaten to death by quickly diagnosing Baxter as having Huntington’s disease and offering help.

Later, Baxter and his buddy, Nigel, invade the Perowne home, where the family has gathered to celebrate the publication of daughter Daisy’s first volume of poems and to reconcile Daisy with her maternal grandfather, also a poet. Baxter forces Daisy to strip naked and read one of her poems, while he holds a knife at her attorney mother’s throat. When Daisy complies, the plot offers an epiphany by revealing that Daisy is pregnant. The stakes are now raised because violence to her body could precipitate a miscarriage and the destruction of a genuinely innocent life. Instead of desecrating one of her own poems, Daisy recites Matthew Arnold’s “Dover Beach.” Luckily, Baxter is even less familiar with poetry than Daisy’s father and seems moved by the sentimental, Victorian poem.

Baxter makes good on threats of violence by breaking the jaw of Daisy's grandfather. Sensing the need to do something, Perowne lures Baxter upstairs to his study, where he tells him he has information about Baxter's medical condition. After Perowne and his son's effort to subdue Baxter leads to the invader's tumbling down the stairs and Nigel flees, Perowne reveals himself as a dedicated professional by performing emergency surgery on Baxter before this Saturday ends. The semblance of domestic tranquillity is restored. However, like other families who have experienced burglaries or other home invasions, the Perownes are unlikely to recover their earlier sense that their space is inviolable.

ON CHESIL BEACH

First published: 2007

Type of work: Novel

In the summer of 1962, Edward Mayhew and Florence Ponting spend their disastrous wedding night in a seaside hotel and separate the next morning, never to see each other again.

Chesil Beach, where Edward and Florence spend the first (and last) night of their marriage, is on the English Channel. The beach is distinctive for its "shingle," or pebbles washed up along its eighteen miles, graded by the sea with larger ones to the east. Locals claim they can identify where a pebble was found by its size.

When the novel appeared, McEwan indicated he had a few Chesil pebbles on his mantle and immediately gained notoriety as a "pebble snatcher" in the London tabloids, facing a $4,000 fine. American filmmakers in England to produce a short promotional film for the novel generously offered to film the safe return of the pebbles. The media attention did nothing to hurt the fame of the novel, soon becoming the bookmakers' favorite to win the Man Booker Prize for 2007. (The prize, however, was awarded to The Gathering by Anne Enright.)

On Chesil Beach begins with the lines, "They were young, educated, and both virgins on this, their wedding night, and they lived in a time when a conversation about sexual difficulties was plainly impossible. But it is never easy." Readers unaware of McEwan's other fiction might well expect a brief and racy read, harking back to D. H. Lawrence's Lady Chatterley's Lover. Indeed, it is no coincidence that the present time of On Chesil Beach is 1962, three years after the unexpurgated version of Lady Chatterley's Lover was judged legal to sell in the United States and two years after the United Kingdom followed suit. "Annus Mirabilis," a poem by the English poet Philip Larkin, has been much quoted by reviewers because the "remarkable year" he celebrates is 1963, the beginning of the Sexual Revolution. The poem opens: "Sexual intercourse began/ In nineteen sixty-three . . . / Between the end of the Chatterley ban/ And the Beatles' first LP."

The novel's present comprises no more than twelve hours in which Edward and Florence eat a heavy, unappealing dinner; attempt unsuccessfully to consummate their marriage; argue on the beach, where he follows her after the failed attempt at sexual intercourse; and then separate. Interspersed with passages of the present, in which the narrator switches back and forth from the consciousness of first one and then the other newlywed, are flashbacks to the past year, in which the couple met, fell in love, and married. Both are bright, well-educated young people with promising futures. Florence is a gifted violinist who aspires to lead her string quartet into fame and fortune. Edward completed his studies with a "first," or "A," in history and aspires to write short biographies of semifamous people. They are very much in love.

Still, there are intimations that their marriage is a misalliance, especially in the United Kingdom, where social class is important. Florence's family is upper middle class: her father is a prosperous businessman, her mother, a professor of philosophy at Oxford. Edward's father is a beleaguered elementary school principal, who must manage the household because a freak accident has left his wife brain-damaged.

The misalliance is not only social but sexual. At twenty-three, Edward is a virgin because he has found "easy" girls unappealing. Like Florence, he has grown up in a culture of sexual repression, in large part because of the unavailability of reliable means of contraception and the stigma of unwanted pregnancies or hasty marriages. In 1962, the birth control pill is still only a rumor. For Edward and Florence, sex is simply not a topic for discussion. Edward anticipates marriage as the venue for licit sexual intimacy and waits impatiently for his “due” as an attentive but not aggressive suitor. He practices “self-pleasuring” daily, but its gratification is laced with guilt and the sense of having to resort to a poor substitute for intimacy. Because he is a virgin, he has anxiety about his performance when it is finally legitimized, and he prepares for the wedding night by abstaining from solitary pleasures for a week.

Florence has refused to confront her repugnance toward physicality. Her sole source of information is a marriage manual, which only makes matters worse with terms like “glans” and “penetrate,” the latter suggesting she is like a drawing room that Edward will “enter.” Even the presence of Edward’s tongue in her mouth can threaten nausea. Several reviewers have directed attention to a brief memory of Florence: As a girl of twelve or thirteen, she shares the cabin on a ship crossing the Channel with her father. There is no evidence of unfatherly attention, merely the sounds of his removing his clothes for bed, but the smell of the sea from the honeymoon site on the Channel may recall the incident.

Much as the disaster of intimacy is difficult to represent without veering into off-color humor, the novel leads readers through the painful episode with admirable restraint. Florence steels herself to “perform,” but she has only to touch Edward’s genitals for him to ejaculate over much of her body. His embarrassment is followed by her disgusted and frantic efforts to wipe away what he had been scrupulously saving for her before she runs out onto the beach. The narrator offers an admirably evenhanded representation of the newlyweds, making it possible for both female and male readers to understand the characters and to feel the pain of two people who love each other. Love seems insufficient, however, to overcome their inexperience. Anger and recrimination replace the understanding of a more experienced couple, who might laugh at the mess they have gotten themselves into and agree to give themselves a second chance the next morning.

The shortness of the novel—even the author refers to it as a “novella”—and the limited space of the honeymoon suite make for an intensity and claustrophobia readers may long to escape. Even more, readers are likely to read faster in the hope that Florence will return after she leaves Edward, or that Edward will run after her to save their relationship. Florence herself offers the astounding proposal of an “open marriage,” a decade before the term became current; Edward can love her as his wife and have sexual relations with other women. In his inexperience, however, Edward is insulted by this immodest proposal, and the future of their marriage evaporates.

In the few pages remaining, the novel goes from low gear to overdrive with an epilogue moving the characters into the twenty-first century. Florence achieves artistic success but never marries again because she still loves Edward, while he “drops out” and moves from one relationship to another, accomplishing little.

On Chesil Beach may be painful, even for readers in the new millennium, in which many believe that they are light years away from poor Florence and Edward. McEwan confronts the downside of the privacy most people require for sexual intimacy, which is the isolation and ignorance of the success and failure of others’ lovemaking. It has been suggested that the aged Edward may be writing this novel to explore a moment of personal failure that stunted his fulfillment. The notion may not be so far-fetched, given the ending of Atonement.

SUMMARY

The novels Ian McEwan has published since 1997 demonstrate his increasing mastery of narrative technique and his ongoing interest in themes of time, innocence, love, and “the moment” in which someone’s future may be determined. Love, especially its sexual expressions, is central to his outlook and represented as extremely fragile, whether in the disastrous wedding night of Florence and Edward or the separation of Robbie and Cecilia. Love becomes central for McEwan because he understands lovers’ physical and psychological vulnerability, which requires that they have compassion for and protect each other.

Earl G. Ingersoll

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

The Cement Garden, 1978
The Comfort of Strangers, 1981
The Child in Time, 1987
The Innocent, 1990
Black Dogs, 1992
Enduring Love, 1997
Amsterdam, 1998
Atonement, 2002
Saturday, 2005
On Chesil Beach, 2007

SHORT FICTION:

First Love, Last Rites, 1975
In Between the Sheets, 1978

DRAMA:

Or Shall We Die?, pr., pb. 1983 (oratorio; music by Michael Berkeley)

SCREENPLAYS:

The Ploughman's Lunch, 1983
Soursweet, 1989 (adaptation of Timothy Mo's novel Sour Sweet)
The Good Son, 1993 (adaptation of Joseph Ruben's novel)
The Innocent, 1995 (adaptation of his novel)

TELEPLAYS:

Jack Flea's Birthday Celebration, 1976
The Imitation Game, 1980
The Imitation Game: Three Plays for Television, 1981 (also known as The Imitation Game, and Other Plays, 1981)
The Last Day of Summer, 1983 (adaptation of his short story)

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

Rose Blanche, 1985 (rewritten from translation of original by Roberto Innocenti)
The Daydreamer, 1994

About the Author

Finney, Brian. "Briony's Stand Against Oblivion: The Making of Fiction in Ian McEwan's Atonement." Journal of Modern Literature 27, no. 3 (2004): 68-82.
Ingersoll, Earl G. "City of Endings: Ian McEwan's Amsterdam." In Waiting for the End: Gender and Ending in the Contemporary Novel. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2007.
_____. "Will the Real Author Please Stand Up? Ian McEwan's Atonement." In Waiting for the End: Gender and Ending in the Contemporary Novel. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2007.
Malcolm, David. Understanding Ian McEwan. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2002.
Moseley, Merritt, ed. British Novelists Since 1960: Second Series. Vol. 194 in Dictionary of Literary Biography. Detroit: Thomson Gale, 1998.
Slay, Jack, Jr. Ian McEwan. New York: Twayne, 1996.
Walkowitz, Rebecca L. "Ian McEwan." In A Companion to the British and Irish Novel, 1945-2000, edited by Brian W. Shaffer. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2005.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How is time both a technical and thematic concern in Ian McEwan's Atonement and On Chesil Beach?
- How do Enduring Love, Amsterdam, and Saturday demonstrate that the "moment" can have long-range consequences?
- What are Atonement and Saturday saying about the irruption of violence into our lives?
- In what ways are Atonement and On Chesil Beach exploring the implications of innocence?
- How are Atonement, Saturday, and On Chesil Beach dependent upon historical contexts?
- What is the role of sexuality in Amsterdam, Atonement, and On Chesil Beach?

JOAQUIM MARIA MACHADO DE ASSIS

Born: Rio de Janeiro, Brazil

June 21, 1839

Died: Rio de Janeiro, Brazil

September 29, 1908

Through numerous genres, especially novels and short stories, Machado de Assis developed an exceptional style and technique that offered precise, penetrating, psychological analysis of the ambiguous motives and ironic consequences of the human pursuits of love, desire, and material satisfactions.

BIOGRAPHY

Joaquim Maria Machado de Assis (muh-SHAH-dew dee ah-SEES) was born in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, on June 21, 1839. Growing up in very limited circumstances, he nonetheless became his country's greatest writer. His father, Francisco José de Assis, was a mulatto who made a living painting houses and doing odd jobs; his mother, Maria Leopoldina Machado de Assis, was of Portuguese descent. They lived in a favela (slum), and his mother died while he was still a boy. His father remarried, and his stepmother made sure that "Machadinho" (little Machado) went to elementary school, the only formal education he had. The boy had a fragile build, stuttered, and was subject to epileptic fits. Nonetheless, he was resolute in pursuit of knowledge and culture. He learned French from the kindly owner of a bakery. He had access to a library run by a Portuguese cultural organization and read voraciously in literature and philosophy.

In his late teens he obtained his first salaried employment as a typographical assistant in the national government printing office. A noted novelist of the time recognized his precocious talent and befriended him. The aspiring young writer entered into a literary circle that met in a bookstore, which was also a publishing house. Some of the most prominent writers of the time regularly gathered there. In his late teens, Machado de Assis was already writing plays, fiction, literary criticism, and newspaper articles and translating works of French into Portuguese. Enamored of the theater, he obtained a position as a government censor of plays, allowing him open access to all drama productions.

Rising in the bureaucracy, he was appointed assistant editor of the Diário Oficial, the government legislative gazette. In 1869, he married a white, Portuguese woman, Carolina de Novaes. Her family opposed this interracial marriage; nonetheless, their relationship, which he considered the greatest enrichment of his life, lasted until her death in 1904.

As Machado de Assis rose in the civil service of the ministerial bureaucracy, his income and free time became more secure. Machado de Assis witnessed and participated in some of the most gripping events of Brazilian history: the war with Paraguay from 1864 to 1870, the abolition of slavery in 1888, the overthrow of the Empire of Brazil in 1889, and the subsequent establishment of the Brazilian republic. Both the imperial and republican governments honored him for his public service and cultural distinction. In 1897, he was one of the principal founders of the Brazilian Academy of Letters, modeled on the French academy, and was elected, for life, as its first president. The headquarters of the academy are named after him, the Casa de Machado de Assis (Machado de Assis house).

Chronic health problems and a heavy workload forced him to rest in a mountain retreat from late 1878 to early 1879. This interlude proved quite transforming, not only for his health but also for his literary development. The period after 1880 is considered the late or mature phase of Machado de Assis, marking a notable development in his mastery of the novel and short story, transforming him into Brazil's greatest writer and one of the most notable in world literature. His most noted fiction now appeared, such as the short story "Missa do galo" (1894; "Midnight Mass," 1963) and the novel Dom Casmurro (1899; English translation, 1953), stunning for their concise perception and sophistication.

The culminating crisis of his life occurred in 1904, when his wife, Carolina, died. The tenderness of his affection for her was expressed in a sonnet published two years later and reprinted in the dedicatory of his last novel in 1908. That novel, Memorial de Ayres (1908; Counselor Ayres' Memorial, 1972), seems a summary autobiography. Its theme deals with how one acquires literary craftsmanship and achieves a loving, selfless life. Shortly after it appeared, Machado died, aged sixty-nine, from complications of intestinal infections and mouth cancer.

ANALYSIS

Machado de Assis was a skilled and prolific writer in various genres: the novel, short story, poetry, the essay, and literary criticism. His productive career lasted for nearly half a century, in which he published not only numerous books but also voluminous material for newspapers and magazines. Due to his precarious health, he traveled little beyond his native city, Rio de Janeiro, the capital of the Empire of Brazil until 1889 and of the Brazilian republic after that date. The universe he so penetratingly and wryly perceived, therefore, was essentially that of a tropical, metropolitan port city during the latter part of the nineteenth and early part of the twentieth centuries. His work reflected the emerging world of a Brazilian urban bourgeois. His perspective advanced from Romantic to realistic, yet it always held a measure of exceptional incisiveness through its ironic humor and penetrating assessment of human foibles.

His novels are divided into two phases, an earlier Romantic one and a later realistic one. His first novel, Resurreição (1872; resurrection), recounts the love affair of a wealthy, young man, fractured by jealousy, for a beautiful widow. For the rest of the decade, Machado produced works with a similar theme: the contradictions and dilemmas of love affairs among bourgeois youth. After a prolonged illness at the end of the decade, the Romantic writer elaborated his tendency to write in a more psychologically realistic style. Still writing of romance, he focused on the causes, character, and evolution of an individual's emotions. The first novel in this new vein appeared in 1881, Memórias póstumas de Brás Cubas (The Posthumous Memoirs of Brás Cubas, 1951; better known as Epitaph of a Small Winner, 1952), in which a man of little distinction offers a benighted accounting of his life. The work demonstrates Machado's growing skills in narrative dynamic and penetrating character analysis. There followed Quincas Borba in 1891 (Philosopher or Dog?, 1954; also as The Heritage of Quincas Borba, 1954) and Dom Casmurro in 1899 (English translation, 1953). Returning to the theme of jealousy, as in Resurreição of twenty years earlier, this time Machado analyzes the sentiment in terms of how validly a character assesses such a sentiment and how conclusively a reader can trust the evidence of such a character. All the works are replete with themes of irony, self-absorption, dissembling, and callousness. A repeated lesson is that self-love and shallow self-absorption defeat the needs for intimacy, accomplishment, self-knowledge, and even sanity.

Machado de Assis wrote numerous short stories, most of which have not been translated into English. Many of the best, however, have been. They are notable for their subdued insight and penetrating irony, usually revealed not so much by the action of the characters but by their dialogue and interior thoughts. One of the most famous is "Midnight Mass." A provincial adolescent has arrived from the country, living in the family home of an attractive older, married woman. He is waiting on Christmas eve in the parlor with her before going with a friend to midnight mass. The peaceful, settled domestic atmosphere contrasts with a tense, repressed sensuality the boy feels and which, enigmatically, may be reciprocated by the woman. Parlor gentility trembles on a chasm of frustrated intimacy. "O alienista" ("The Psychiatrist") exposes a medical scientist's confident perverseness in trying to determine who is or is not sane. "O enfermeiro" ("The Companion") demonstrates how a supposedly conscientious care giver rids himself of an inconvenient elderly invalid. Machado disabuses readers of any benign illusions regarding human character.

Although devoted to the theater, Machado was productive but often not effective as a playwright. As a poet he also was not as distinguished. Among his most moving and sensitive poems is a sonnet, "A Carolina” (“To Carolina”), that he wrote to his wife after her death. A nonfiction genre in which he excelled was the crônica (chronicle), a Brazilian literary format that consisted of short essays appearing in newspapers or magazines. They reflected and commented on routine daily activities or the passing events of the time. It is through them that much of his sociopolitical views are known. The concise format ideally suited his incisive, subdued observation.

As an author and civil servant, Machado de Assis was a man of great probity and dedication. Although he admitted that he was a pessimist, nonetheless his work proved he was not a nihilist or negativist. Despite the gripping way in which he portrayed human selfishness and ignorance, he believed that people could save themselves from their failures through a literature imbued with penetrating and vivid insight. Indeed, his own definition of pessimism was that it was idealism, since pessimists expressed dismay at human actions and thereby expected more from human effort.

Writing in Portuguese, the obscure language of a distant underdeveloped country, and rising in life despite grave socioeconomic and personal disadvantages, Machado de Assis has come increasingly to be recognized for his singular role in the forefront of the literary craft. He has entered the pantheon of world-renowned authors. Like Gustave Flaubert, he possessed an acutely refined diction; like Guy de Maupassant, a commanding sense of setting and atmosphere; like Henry James, a nuanced, and possibly suppler, analysis of human character; and like James Joyce, an innovative prose technique and integrated composite of style and content that solidified thematic impact. Unlike Joyce, however, he was never obscure. Uniquely, he was a master of enigma, ambiguity, and irony.

EPITAPH OF A SMALL WINNER

First published: Memórias póstumas de Brás Cubas, 1881 (English translation, 1952; also translated as The Posthumous Memoirs of Brás Cubas, 1951)

Type of work: Novel

From the grave, a narrator candidly recounts the events of his life, yet reveals to the reader that in reality he does not understand what has motivated his character or weighed the balance of his life.

Epitaph of a Small Winner was the first novel in the later, more mature phase of the work of Machado de Assis. A bleak irony envelops the work. Characteristic of this sentiment, Brás Cubas dedicates these posthumous memoirs to the first worm that has gnawed into his casket. Through first-person narrative, Brás attempts to evaluate his life. Initially he recalls a money-making scheme in which he was absorbed toward the end of his life, inventing a device to protect against depression. He then recalls his final illness and visits from a woman, Virgília, with whom he had a shallow, self-absorbed, adulterous affair.

The narrator proceeds to recall the most significant events of his life from his birth in 1805 to his death in 1869. He reveals a selfish, shallow, hypocritical person. Able to expose his defects, he ignores analyzing how his character was formed. The reader acquires an increasingly interactive role with Brás Cubas, both as a witness to the candid boldness of his testimony and as a judge or evaluator of his ultimately naive and self-serving assessment. Although he speaks candidly, such frankness does not mean he has done so critically; he may know his character, but what insight of it does he have?

Spoiled by his father, Brás Cubas develops as a mean and mischievous child. One of his self-satisfied uncles introduces him to his first lover, Marcela. Though he is in love with her, she is interested only in the financial advantages of their relationship. To end the affair, his father sends him to study in Portugal. Wasting his years there, Brás returns to Brazil on the death of his mother, an event he recounts with no emotion. For reasons of political advantage and family distinction, his father wants him now to marry Virgília. Brás is attracted, however, to another woman and rejects the match. Virgília thereafter marries another but then has an affair with Brás, reflecting the corrosive self-love that absorbs everyone's action. His father dies, an event that once again the son relates with no emotion.

A woman with whom Brás wants to marry and raise a family dies. He establishes an ineffectual political career but never reaches his goal of becoming a cabinet minister. He never completes his antidepressant invention. Nevertheless, he concludes that his life has been that of a "small winner": He has not passed on the problems of human life to any offspring. The reader, as involved now in the work as the narrator and author, concludes quite the opposite: What Brás Cubas considers the insight and small victory of his life, neither loving nor having offspring, is actually its defeat.

PHILOSOPHER OR DOG?

First published: Quincas Borba, 1891 (English translation, 1954; also translated as The Heritage of Quincas Borba, 1954)

Type of work: Novel

A decent man inherits a fortune, along with a materialist philosophy, and these isolate him from his roots, corrode his life, and leave him insane.

The questions readers ponder as Philosopher or Dog? unfolds concern the nature of winning and losing, the value of what is won in relation to how victory has been achieved, and the efforts of human ambition as either idealism or madness. Rubião is a modest, former schoolteacher from the provincial interior of Brazil who unexpectedly becomes heir to the wealth of Quincas Borba, an unbalanced philosopher who preaches the value of egotism and survival of the fittest. Along with the fortune, Rubião acquires responsibility for the dog of the deceased, also named Quincas Borba.

A third-person narrator balances Rubião's recounting of the characters' actions and dialogue, so a reader can evaluate appearance versus reality and intentions against actions. Rubião decides he no longer wishes to reside in his provincial hometown, going to live in Rio de Janeiro, seat of the imperial court. On his journey there, he meets Palha, a colleague who is indebted to him, and his alluring wife, Sofia. As Palha hears of the fortune Rubião has inherited, he and his wife resolve to capitalize on it to their benefit. Enamored of Sofia, sending her expensive gifts, and secretly imagining adultery with her, Rubião is taken in by the pair. Palha encourages the attraction. Sofia nurtures her vanity.

Another predator is Camacho, a shiftless politician, who sees how easily he can manipulate the naïve Rubião, who has just rescued a boy from an accident. Rubião thinks his action commonplace; nonetheless, Camacho plays up its heroics, publicizing it and inflating his victim's vulnerable ego. Rubião, a simple person, had led a settled provincial life. Now his life has become unbalanced, torn by people seeking advantages from him and divided by guilt over his wealth and sinful thoughts. Attempting to steady himself, he exaggerates his importance, falling finally under the delusion of considering himself emperor of the French.

Those who used him now ignore his plight. Even the child he rescued taunts him in a street gang. Nonetheless, in the midst of this inhumanity, a young woman who only distantly knows Rubião shows understanding and sympathy both for him and his dog. The dog responds naturally to the affection. Rubião is committed to an asylum, but he escapes, trying to return to his old home and the settled life he had enjoyed. Quincas Borba, the dog, faithfully follows him.

Rubião, however, does not recover. Along with wealth, he absorbed the spirit of the philosophy of Quincas Borba the man: egotism and self-love. When Rubião observes in conclusion that to the victor go the spoils, the reader is struck with an insight that escapes the commentator. What do winners gain from avarice and materialism that ends in madness, that cannot recognize the simple balm of affection and generosity a kind stranger or dog may offer?

DOM CASMURRO

First published: 1899 (English translation, 1953)

Type of work: Novel

Prey to a corrosive jealousy, ruining himself and his family, a man recounts the events of his life and marriage in a manner that allows a reader progressively to penetrate the illusion under which he has lived.

Initially Dom Casmurro seems to be about jealousy, a husband's suspicions about the fidelity of his wife. Ultimately, however, it is about the certainty one can have of how one person perceives another. The involving theme of the work is not only about whether the husband can trust the wife but also whether the reader can trust the husband as a narrator. The novel traces the corrosive consequences of gnawing jealousy, a person losing what he has due to suspicion of losing it. The ultimate certainty of the work is that rampant fear of loss causes loss.

The novel unfolds as Bento Santiago recalls his life and marriage. The narrative reveals him to be a withdrawn, diffident individual who has gained a nickname of mild mockery, "Dom Casmurro," meaning "Lord Keeps-to-Himself." Intended for the priesthood by his mother, Bento is sent to a seminary. He immediately wishes to escape, having fallen in love with Capitú, his young neighbor and first sweetheart. He confides his passion to a new school colleague, Escobar, whom he admires for his force and masculinity. Both eventually leave the seminary. Bento marries Capitú, and Escobar marries Sancha.

In an encounter with Sancha, Bento realizes he has an adulterous attraction to her. Escobar suddenly dies, and at his funeral Bento notes the attention with which Capitú contemplates their dead friend. Bento now becomes riveted by the suspicion that his wife had been unfaithful with Escobar.

In looking at his son, Ezekiel, a boy with a tendency to imitate adults, Bento now notices what seems a striking resemblance to Escobar.

Attending a production of Othello, Bento does not see the misguided jealousy of the Moor and is the more convinced of Capitú's guilt. As the fury of his jealousy mounts, he accuses Capitú of infidelity and tells Ezekiel that he is not his legitimate offspring. Ordering them away, they both die separated abroad. The years advance and other members of Bento's family and entourage pass away, isolating him.

Progressively the reader grasps the corrosive dilemma in which Bento has cornered himself. He must rage on against Capitú, proving that her infidelity caused the ruin of his life. He dare not confront the possibility that he wronged her, such error causing not only his own ruin but also that of his family. Such a tortuous state has resulted from his self-absorption and insecurity.

The critical acclaim that Dom Casmurro has received can be attributed to the extraordinary manner by which Machado engaged the reader as witness and judge of the central character's thoughts and actions. The reader actively accompanies the denouement of the narrative, must be attentive to gestures and diction, and must be alert to perspectives and thematic developments. It is the range and force of techniques that engage the reader in the dynamic of the unfolding tale that comprise the singular accomplishment of Machado's literary craftsmanship.

SUMMARY

The sustaining theme in the work of Joaquim Maria Machado de Assis is the nature of love and the destabilizing consequences of egotism. While initially treating this theme within the context of Romantic comedy and bourgeois society, progressively he wrote more within the context of a psychological realism with universal applications. While dismayed by human failures that he exposed with sardonic humor, he believed nonetheless that individuals were capable of better and that literature could prove an effective vehicle in conveying such transformation. In this respect, therefore, he was a consummate craftsman, productive in all forms of literature but masterfully distinguished in fiction.

Edward A. Riedinger

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Resurreição, 1872

A mão e a luva, 1874 (The Hand and the Glove, 1970)

Helena, 1876 (English translation, 1984)

Iaiá Garcia, 1878 (English translation as Yayá Garcia, 1977)

Memórias póstumas de Brás Cubas, 1881 (The Posthumous Memoirs of Brás Cubas, 1951; better known as Epitaph of a Small Winner, 1952)

Quincas Borba, 1891 (Philosopher or Dog?, 1954; also as The Heritage of Quincas Borba, 1954)

Dom Casmurro, 1899 (English translation, 1953)

Esau e Jacob, 1904 (Esau and Jacob, 1965)

Memorial de Ayres, 1908 (Counselor Ayres' Memorial, 1972)

SHORT FICTION:

Contos fluminenses, 1870

Histórias da meia-noite, 1873

Papéis avulsos, 1882

Histórias sem data, 1884

Várias histórias, 1896

Histórias românticas, 1937

The Psychiatrist, and Other Stories, 1963

What Went on at the Baroness', 1963

The Devil's Church, and Other Stories, 1977

POETRY:

Crisálidas, 1864

Falenas, 1870

Americanas, 1875

Poesias completas, 1901

DRAMA:

Desencantos, pb. 1861

Quase ministro, pb. 1864

Os deuses de casaca, pb. 1866

Tu só, tu, puro amor, pb. 1880

Teatro, pb. 1910

NONFICTION:

Páginas recolhidas (contos, ensaios, crônicas), 1899

Relíquias de Casa Velha (contos, crônicas, comédias), 1906

A semana, 1910

Crítica, 1910

Crítica por Machado de Assis, 1924

Crítica literária, 1937

Crítica teatral, 1937

Correspondência, 1938

MISCELLANEOUS:

Outras relíquias, 1908

Obra completa, 1959

About the Author

Dixon, Paul B. Retired Dreams: "Dom Casmurro," Myth and Modernity. West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue University Press, 1989.

Fitz, Earl E. Machado de Assis. Boston: Twayne, 1989.

Graham, Richard. Machado de Assis: Reflections on a Brazilian Master Writer. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1999.

Lisboa, Maria Manuel. Machado de Assis and Feminism: Re-Reading the Heart of the Companion. Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 1996.

Maia Neto, José Raimundo. Machado de Assis, the Brazilian Pyrrhonian. West Lafayette, Ind.: Purdue University Press, 1994.

Nunes, Maria Luisa. The Craft of an Absolute Winner: Characterization and Narratology in the Novels of Machado de Assis. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1983.

Schwarz, Roberto. A Master on the Periphery of Capitalism: Machado de Assis. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 2001.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Although written mostly in the latter part of the nineteenth century, the work of Joaquim Maria Machado de Assis only began to appear in English in the latter part of the twentieth century. What factors do you think effected this delay?
- Machado de Assis evolves from a Romantic writer given to droll humor to a realist of penetrating psychological analysis. What is meant by Romanticism and realism and what evidence of them appears in his work?
- What might have motivated the development of Machado de Assis from Romanticism to psychological realism? What other authors can you cite who show similar changes of outlook or orientation over the course of their careers?
- Some authors are identified with certain locations and times, such as Mark Twain and the frontier Mississippi River, or Charles Dickens and Victorian London. Machado de Assis is invariably identified with late nineteenth and turn-of-the-century Rio de Janeiro. What were the socioeconomic, political, and cultural conditions and changes occurring in Rio and Brazil then that are reflected in the work of Machado de Assis?
- Racial intermixture is a dominant characteristic of Brazilian social history. How are racial tolerance, prejudice, or indifference reflected in the life and work of Machado de Assis?

Library of Congress

NICCOLÒ MACHIAVELLI

Born: Florence, Italy
May 3, 1469

Died: Florence, Italy
June 21, 1527

Machiavelli has achieved literary fame, particularly for The Prince, which stresses political realism and pragmatism as opposed to the idealism found in works of ancient philosophers. Machiavelli also produced plays and other works which were influential in the development of Italian literature.

BIOGRAPHY

Niccolò Machiavelli (mah-kee-uh-VEH-lee) was born into a venerable Florentine family whose members had held political office in the past, but his parents were not wealthy. His father, Bernardo di Niccolò di Buoninsegna, was a lawyer and a lover of books. He died in May, 1500. Some surviving letters and other documents indicate a close relationship between Machiavelli and his father. His mother was Bartolomea de' Nelli, who had an interest in poetry and likely introduced it to her son. She died in October 11, 1496. Machiavelli had two sisters and one brother.

The Florence of Machiavelli's lifetime was economically successful, and the leading family in that city was the Medici family, who had gained wealth and power from banking. Maurizio Viroli, a biographer of Machiavelli, calls them the "true lords of the city." The Medicis had power in Florence during most of the fifteenth century. Lorenzo de' Medici, known as Lorenzo the Magnificent, died in 1492. Piero de' Medici fled Florence in 1494, when King Charles VIII of France was ready to attack the city. A great council was formed to govern the city once the Medicis were exiled. Friar Girolamo Savonarola was very prominent in Florence from 1494 to 1498, and he influenced many political leaders, but he was executed for heresy in 1498.

Savonarola's death presented an opportunity for great political change in Florence.

There is little known about Machiavelli's early life, but it appears that he had an education grounded in classical literature. There is some evidence that suggests he worked in business from 1487 to 1495; there is also some evidence that suggests he was secretary for an office holder in the Second Chancery between 1495 and 1498, but not all scholars believe that he served in political life during this period.

On May 28, 1498, just after Savonarola's death, Florence's Council of Eighty nominated Machiavelli as secretary of the Second Chancery, a position responsible for foreign affairs and the administration of territories outside of the central city. He was later named secretary of the Ten of Liberty and Peace, a position with executive authority. He was formally approved on June 28. In his political role he attempted to settle many disputes with other powers in the region, both within and outside of Italy.

During his time in office he undertook many diplomatic missions and met with many other political figures, such as Cesare Borgia, Louis XII of France, Ferdinand II of Aragon, and Pope Julius II. It was during this time that he observed many military and political strategies and identified those that were successful and those that were not. He managed to find time for some writing during this period, including work on an ambitious lengthy poem, Decennale primo (1504; First Decennial, 1965), which describes the political struggles in Florence from 1494 to 1504. Between 1503 and 1506, he also had responsibility for obtaining the resources needed for defending Florence. In 1501, he married Marietta di Ludovico Corsini, and in the course of their long marriage they had six children.

Machiavelli's fortunes changed when the Medici family regained power in Florence in 1512, and he was driven from political office. He spent the remainder of his life in exile, separated from the political machinations of Florence. Others who had been exiled from Florence later reentered politics, but not Machiavelli. He lived only seven miles outside of Florence, but in reality he was very far from power.

It is during this time in political exile that he wrote all of his prominent works. He began work on what became Il principe (wr. 1513, pb. 1532; The Prince, 1640) immediately after his exile. He devoted significant time to studying and writing about the works of Livy, the ancient Roman historian, resulting in Discorsi sopra la prima deca di Tito Livio (wr. 1513, pb. 1531; Discourses on the First Ten Books of Titus Livius, 1636). This work is generally considered to be an exposition of the principles of republican rule. Between 1518 and 1520, he wrote Dell' arte della guerra (1521; The Art of War, 1560), in which he combined his knowledge of contemporary military operations with examples of ancient strategy and tactics. He also wrote plays, including La mandragola (pb. c. 1519, pr. 1520; The Mandrake, 1911) and La clizia (pr. 1525, pb. 1532; Casina; Clizia, 1961), as well as poetry and a novel. He completed a lengthy work, Istorie fiorentine (1525; The Florentine History, 1595), which was commissioned by Cardinal Giulio de' Medici, who went on to become Pope Clement VII. The commissioning of this work suggests that Machiavelli had rehabilitated his relationship with Medicis to a degree.

Machiavelli died in Florence on June 21, 1527, at the age of fifty-eight. While some of his works were published during his lifetime, his publications did not earn him literary renown while he was alive. However, after his death his literary reputation was established with the wide circulation of both The Prince and Discourses on the First Ten Books of Titus Livius.

ANALYSIS

In a letter to Francesco Vettori dated December 10, 1513, Machiavelli describes his days in exile as time spent overseeing his estate and talking with local peasants. He indicates that he takes time for reading great Italian poets, such as Dante or Petrarch. His evenings are dedicated to study, however. He says that "when evening comes, I return home and go into my study." In that place he enters "the antique courts of the ancients where, being welcomed by them, I taste the food that alone is mine." He describes himself as being in conversation with the ancients and that he has "written down what [he has] gained from their conversation." The work he has written down eventually became The Prince.

One important aspect of The Prince is Machiavelli's use of particular words. He uses the Italian word virtu not in a traditional sense of virtue but primarily as a synonym for "exercise of power." Machiavelli also uses the Italian words lo stato to mean "Where one has dominion." In this sense, lo stato is similar to the modern term "political state."

In The Prince and the play The Mandrake, Machiavelli presents a world in which individuals can gain what they desire through guile and power. In The Prince, he describes the means by which princes can gain and maintain power. Most significantly, political leaders should prepare for war at all times in order to ward off foreign threats and to unite the people. Political leaders must not practice traditional morality because that would likely undermine their political positions.

The Mandrake, while not about political power per se, portrays a protagonist with a great desire who uses guile to obtain what he wants and does so with immunity. This character overturns traditional morality through his actions.

THE PRINCE

First published: Il principe, 1532 (English translation, 1640)

Type of work: Political treatise

In this classic political treatise, Machiavelli advises how princes should acquire and maintain political power and analyzes the operations of Italian Renaissance principalities.

Machiavelli wrote The Prince within two years after he was driven from office. A surviving letter indicates that the first title for it was “On Principalities.” The work was not published until 1532.

The first eleven chapters of The Prince examine types of principalities, or principates, with examples from both ancient and contemporary history, and strategies for governing these principates. These are not lengthy chapters; some of them are only a few paragraphs long.

Machiavelli asserts that hereditary principates can only be conquered when one who wishes to conquer lives in that principate or establishes a colony there. In the second chapter, Machiavelli speaks of adding territory to an existing principality, advising that one must do so with force and “extinguish the line of the prince” in that territory; by doing so, a conqueror will prevent a counterinsurgency. He cites the Romans as best exemplifying this strategy of conquest. Machiavelli does not criticize the desire to acquire new territories through conquest; instead, he calls it a “very natural and ordinary desire.”

Machiavelli particularly praises Alexander the Great and those leaders who followed him for their success in governing the territories they conquered. He makes a distinction between governing subjects who had previously been ruled despotically and subjects who had some practice of self-government. Those who had previously been ruled with absolute power will be harder to take over, but once they have been conquered, they will be easy to govern. Those who have been used to some degree of self-government will be harder to govern; a conqueror must “ruin” such a city, because if he “does not destroy it, he waits to be destroyed by it.”

In chapter 6, Machiavelli provides a list of great conquerors, who did so by their virtue, including Cyrus the Great of Persia, Romulus of Rome, Theseus of Greece, and Moses of Israel. Machiavelli presents them as gaining a political territory through their own skill and cunning; they win not because of divine assistance, but because they are armed. Here Machiavelli tells his readers that “all armed prophets conquer and unarmed ones are ruined.” In chapter 8, Machiavelli praises King Agathocles of Sicily, who is said to have “virtue,” even though he attained a position of rule through treachery and violence.

Machiavelli criticizes rulers who are the opposite of great conquerors. One who inherits a position of political authority will often lose that political power; the same is true for one who gains power through others’ military assistance. These rulers may gain power easily, but this authority is also lost easily.

Chapter 11 focuses on “ecclesiastical principates,” Machiavelli’s term for the authority exercised by the Catholic Church. Machiavelli treats the Church as a temporal power, like all other political orders. He says the Church has “subjects which they do not govern.”

Chapters 12 through 14 discuss how a political leader should deal with enemies. Enemies must be treated with military power; nothing else is effective. If a political leader has a strong military, there will be no need to concern oneself with laws. Machiavelli makes the distinction between the different types of arms (or military forces) available to a leader. Some arms are the prince’s own, some are mercenary, and some belong to others. Mercenary arms are the worst because “those arms are disunited, ambitious, without discipline, unfaithful; valorous among friends, cowardly among enemies.” When one uses mercenary arms, one depends upon the strength of others.

Using the arms of another political leader can also be harmful. Machiavelli cites Cesare Borgia, who briefly used mercenary and auxiliary arms but then stopped using them and depended on his own arms. Machiavelli also cites examples of ancient political leaders, including King David in the Old Testament, who depended on their own power. In chapter 14, the central chapter of the work, Machiavelli emphatically states that “a prince, then, ought to have no other object . . . nor take anything else for his art, but war,” and that “he ought . . . never to lift his thoughts from the exercise of war.”

Chapters 15 through 23 examine how a prince should treat his subjects. Machiavelli states that it might be useful for a prince to have the appearance of some traditional virtues, but it is not necessarily useful to truly exemplify those virtues. For example, Machiavelli asserts that it might be useful to have a reputation for generosity, but it certainly is not necessary to have that reputation. Being truly generous might lead one to deplete one’s resources. However, one can be generous with the things one takes from others. He cites Cyrus, Julius Caesar, and Alexander the Great as military leaders who rewarded citizens with possessions taken from others.

This section includes the famous passage in which Machiavelli states that if the prince must choose between being loved and being feared, the prince should choose to be feared. Importantly, the prince should be feared in such a way that he will avoid being hated. According to Machiavelli, “being feared and not hated can go very well together.” One cannot depend on being loved, but Machiavelli believes subjects will be loyal to their leaders. Machiavelli also suggests the use of “pious cruelty,” a term for the use of religion to gain political support. He cautions political leaders about those who are close to them; a leader needs a few people close to him who will speak the truth to him, but flatterers should be avoided.

Machiavelli treats fortune in chapters 24 and 25. He does not sympathize with political leaders who lose power because of fortune. Instead, he maintains that leaders should be prepared for what might happen and should seek to overcome the results of fortune through impetuous action. In another famous line from The Prince, he states that, “it is better to be impetuous than cautious, for fortune is a woman, and if one wishes to keep her down, it is necessary to beat her and knock her down.”

The final chapter is different than the other chapters in the book. It is a patriotic appeal to Italians to expel foreign armies from the region.

THE MANDRAKE

First produced: La mandragola, 1520, first published, c. 1519 (English translation, 1911)

Type of work: Play

This play presents several individuals who are able to forgo traditional morality in order to obtain the objects of their desires.

Machiavelli wrote several plays, including The Mandrake, which biographer Maurizio Rivoli called Machiavelli’s “finest theatrical piece.” The play begins with a song that succinctly presents the theme of the play: “Let us follow our desires . . . because whoever deprives himself of pleasure . . . doesn’t know the tricks of the world.” The prologue then presents the outline of the play and introduces the characters. The play consists of five acts, and the action takes place within a single day.

The Mandrake tells the story of Callimaco, who had lived in Paris but is now in Florence. He has learned of a woman there, Lucrezia, who is of extraordinary beauty. Callimaco desires to be with this woman, but he must devise a ruse in order to do so because she is married to a Florentine judge and has a reputation for her moral purity. Callimaco conspires with Ligurio to trick Master Nicia, Lucrezia’s husband.

Callimaco poses as a doctor who tells the childless Nicia that he can administer a potion made of mandrake root that will enable Lucrezia to become pregnant. However, the first man who has sexual relations with Lucrezia after she has taken the potion will die. Callimaco then convinces Nicia to bribe a local friar, Frate Timoteo, so the friar will convince Lucrezia to take the potion and sleep with a stranger because the greater good of having a child will be gained.

Lucrezia agrees to the plan, and in the evening Callimaco, who is in disguise, is brought to see her. Callimaco and Lucrezia spend the night together. In the morning, he reveals himself to Lucrezia, and she accepts Callimaco as her lover. Callimaco is then invited to be a part of the household.

All the characters engage in some form of deception in order to obtain something they desire. Nicia wants a son, Callimaco wants sexual pleasure, and Frate Timoteo wants financial reward. In the end, Nicia, who appears to be a respected citizen, is the most deceived and has enabled the adulterous partner of his wife.

SUMMARY

Niccolò Machiavelli was a major figure in the development of political theory. His treatise, The Prince, broke from the ideas of Plato and Aristotle, who believed that the purpose of politics was to encourage virtue, and instead advocated that in politics, the ends justified the means. In his other works, he made important contributions to historical accounts of Italy and to Italian Renaissance drama.

Michael L. Coulter

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

NONFICTION:

Descrizione del modo tenuto dal Duca Valentino nello ammazzare Vitellozzo Vitelli, Oliverotto da Fermo, il Signor Pagolo e il Duca di Gravina Orsini, wr. 1503

Discorso dell'ordinare lo stato di Firenze alle armi, 1507 (Discourse on Florentine Military Preparation, 1965)

Rapporto delle cose della Magna, wr. 1508

Ritratto di cose di Francia, wr. 1512-1513

Discorsi sopra la prima deca di Tito Livio, wr. 1513, pb. 1531 (Discourses on the First Ten Books of Titus Livius, 1636)

Il principe, wr. 1513, pb. 1532 (The Prince, 1640)

Discorso delle cose fiorentine dopo la morte di Lorenzo, 1520 (Discourse on the State of Florence After the Death of Lorenzo, 1965)

Discursus florentinarum rerum post mortem iunioris Laurentii Medices, wr. 1520

La vita di Castruccio Castracani, 1520 (The Life of Castruccio Castracani, 1675)

Dell'arte della guerra, 1521 (The Art of War, 1560)

Discorso: O, Dialogo intorno alla nostra lingua, 1525 (Discourse: Or, Dialogue About Our Language, 1961)

Istorie fiorentine, 1525 (The Florentine History, 1595)

DRAMA:

Andria, pb. c. 1517 (based on Terence's play; English translation, 1969)

La mandragola, pb. c. 1519, pr. 1520 (The Mandrake, 1911)

La clizia, pr. 1525, pb. 1532 (based on Plautus's play; Casina; Clizia, 1961)

POETRY:

Decennale primo, 1504 (First Decennial, 1965)

Decennale secondo, 1509 (Second Decennial, 1965)

Serenata, 1513-1514 (Serenade, 1965)

L'asino d'oro, 1517, 1549 (The Golden Ass, 1965)

Canti carnascialeschi, 1523-1524 (Carnival Songs, 1965)

Lust and Liberty: The Poems of Machiavelli, 1963

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How do the first eleven chapters of The Prince demonstrate Niccolò Machiavelli's concern for realism over idealism?
- What, according to Machiavelli, should be the political leader's view of war and the preparation for war?
- In chapters 15 through 23 of The Prince, Machiavelli speaks of several commonly recognized virtues. According to this account, when, if ever, should one be concerned with traditional codes of behavior?
- What is Machiavelli's view of fortune?
- In what way is The Mandrake a play about exercising power?
- How is Callimaco in The Mandrake a Machiavellian character?

LONG FICTION:

Novella de Belfagor Arcidiavolo, 1516 (The Novella of Belfagor Archdevil, 1671)

About the Author

Hale, J. R. Machiavelli and Renaissance Italy. London: Macmillan, 1960.

Ruffo-Fiore, Silvia. Niccolò Machiavelli. Boston: Twayne, 1982.

Strauss, Leo. "Niccolò Machiavelli." In History of Political Philosophy, edited by Leo Strauss and Joseph Cropsey. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1972.

_____. Thoughts on Machiavelli. 3d ed. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984.

Sullivan, Vickie B. The Comedy and Tragedy of Machiavelli: Essays on the Literary Works. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2000.

Tarcov, Nathan. "Machiavelli and the Foundations of Modernity: A Reading of Chapter 3 of The Prince." In Educating the Prince, edited by Mark Blitz and William Kristol. Oxford, England: Rowman & Littlefield, 2000.

Viroli, Maurizio. Niccolò's Smile: A Biography of Machiavelli. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2000.

HUGH MACLENNAN

Born: Glace Bay, Nova Scotia, Canada
March 20, 1907

Died: Montreal, Quebec, Canada
November 7, 1990

Recognized as Canada's outstanding man of letters of the mid-twentieth century, MacLennan expressed the Canadian national character in internationally respected novels and essays.

BIOGRAPHY

John Hugh MacLennan, the only son of dour Calvinist surgeon Samuel MacLennan and his vivacious, artistic wife, Katherine MacQuarrie MacLennan, was born in the mining town of Glace Bay on Cape Breton Island, Nova Scotia, Canada, on March 20, 1907. Though three generations of MacLennans had lived on Cape Breton, the doctor thought of himself as Scottish. Like the Scots in the homeland, he had aspirations of improvement through education. Consequently, in 1912 and 1913 he decided to take specialist training abroad, his family joining him in the summer, and at the beginning of World War I he moved to Halifax, where both he and Hugh would have more opportunities. There Hugh witnessed his father's departure to war and his return as an invalid. The boy also witnessed in 1917 the carnage wrought by the explosion of a TNT-laden ship in Halifax Harbor.

In accordance with his father's aspirations—indeed, demands—MacLennan studied the classics, in 1928 took an honors B.A. from Dalhousie University, played championship tennis, won a Rhodes Scholarship to Oxford, and took a B.A. from Oriel in 1932. While in Oxford, he also traveled considerably in Britain and the Continent, observing firsthand the economic and political conditions that led to World War II. He also wrote poetry. Unable to find a publisher for it, a failure that he blamed on the Depression, MacLennan turned to fiction with Ernest Hemingway as his model.

Unable to find a job in 1932 because of the Depression and colonialism—the two classics positions available at Canadian universities went to Englishmen with no better qualifications than his—MacLennan followed his father's insistent advice and accepted a fellowship for a Ph.D. at Princeton University. In 1935, Princeton awarded him the degree for a study, based on papyri, of the decline and fall of Oxyrhynchus, a Greek city in Egypt, in the third century. Princeton published the thesis.

Yet MacLennan was unable to find a publisher for the novel that he had written by 1935 and could not get a teaching position at a Canadian university. He thus became a schoolmaster at Lower Canada College, a private high school, in order to be able to marry and support Dorothy Duncan, an American whom he had met on the ship from England in 1932. Despite the demands of his teaching, MacLennan continued to write. When no publisher would take his second novel, MacLennan took the advice of his wife, also a writer, to create a Canadian consciousness, realistic Canadian characters, and the Canadian scene in literature.

The next book, Barometer Rising (1941), centered on the Halifax Explosion of 1917. Published in 1941, it was a popular and critical success. Deemed “a first novel of unusual quality” and “a landmark in Canadian writing,” the novel fixed MacLennan in the category of “literary nationalist.” The success of Barometer Rising contributed to his obtaining a Guggenheim Fellowship to work on a second novel about the French and English duality. That novel, Two Solitudes (1945), merited the Governor-General's Award.

Although sales of his books never made him rich, the success of Two Solitudes enabled MacLennan to resign from Lower Canada College and to secure a summer home in North Hatley, Quebec. His next two books, the novel The Precipice (1948) and Cross-Country (1949), won Governor-General's awards, but Canadian critics panned The Precipice because its Canadian-American theme diluted MacLennan as a "distinctly Canadian novelist," and it did not sell well in Canada. During the early 1950's, then, to augment his finances, MacLennan accepted commissions for many magazine articles, and in 1951, the year that Each Man's Son was published, he took a part-time professorship in English at McGill University to get medical insurance for his wife, who had had a rheumatic heart from childhood. MacLennan found teaching congenial, he received even more recognition in the 1950's, and he published essays widely. Dorothy, however, died in 1957. The powerful novel of 1959, The Watch That Ends the Night, is the story of a woman with a weak heart but enormous spirit.

The Watch That Ends the Night was a great financial and critical success, and MacLennan in 1959 married a lovely old friend, Frances Walker. He published the essay collections Seven Rivers of Canada (1961, revised as Rivers of Canada, 1974) and Scotchman's Return, and Other Essays (1960). An influential teacher, he was made a full professor at McGill in 1968, the year after the publication of Return of the Sphinx (1967), a novel, as the name might imply, about the cycles of history and generational conflict, demonstrated in the inflammatory French separatist movement in Quebec.

Although he continued to teach, to write essays, and to work on his last novel, the 1970's were not golden years for MacLennan. Two Solitudes became a disastrous 1978 film. Separatist terrorism developed as, in Return of the Sphinx, he had said it would, and he, a symbol of English Canada, became a target for terrorist attack. Then scholars began a reassessment of his work. "It is time," said one, "to remove MacLennan from the pantheon"; "this is the man who prepared the way for everyone else, but, you know, Moses never entered the promised land," said another.

Nevertheless, in his seventies MacLennan completed Voices in Time (1980), a foreboding survey of the twentieth century and its future. In 1984, he looked to his roots in On Being a Maritime Writer. In the 1980's, scholars began a more balanced appraisal of the previous decade's reassessment of his literary worth. Despite continuing personal misfortunes and his concern for the turbulence of the times, MacLennan wrote shortly before his death in Montreal on November 7, 1990, "I have really enjoyed my existence." Maclean's, the Canadian news-magazine, concluded that "he was a fine man and a great writer, and we were lucky to have lived in a time and place that had him for its town crier."

ANALYSIS

After a publisher had rejected one of MacLennan's first novels, suggesting that it needed a stronger sense of locale, the publisher became an external force that directed the young writer's focus to the Canadian scene. When, in 1960, the great American editor and critic Edmund Wilson found in MacLennan's essays "a Canadian way of looking at things which had little in common with either the 'American' or the British colonial one and which has achieved a self-confident detachment in regard to the rest of the world," he set his seal on the reputation of MacLennan as a Canadian nationalist. Although it is true that his seven published novels are set in Canadian culture and that his heroes, like the author himself, come home again, it is also true that MacLennan's world travels and his studies of classics and history in universities of three nations, as well as his Canadian heritage, have informed his thinking and his novels.

In his doctoral research in 1935, for instance, MacLennan found that the private enterprise responsible for Rome's greatness "was also responsible for the reduction of democratic communities to quasi-feudal serfdom." As early as Two Solitudes, MacLennan warned against the dangers of uncontrolled capitalism. In his next novel, The Precipice, the same message appears as a denial of the value of the American Dream. Later, in 1960, MacLennan identified another element of the cycle of history. From a book by Gordon Rattray Taylor, MacLennan adapted the Freudian notion that "the extreme father-identifier, the 'patrist' is compelled by hidden psychological needs to crave authority," whereas the mother-identifier, the matrist, "hates conflict . . . is bored by power . . . tends toward democracy" and "softens by corruption any authoritarian institutions he has inherited." In history, matrist and patrist political systems alternate. Disturbed by the permissiveness of the 1960's and 1970's, MacLennan foresees in Voices in Time democratic freedom declining into chaos and ushering in a new authoritarianism as antidote.

All of MacLennan's novels treat the conflicts of father and son, not only because MacLennan spent years coming to terms with his own stern father, but also because MacLennan knows his Freud and his Sophocles. Scholar Alec Lucas points out numerous Oedipus motifs in the novels: "heroes with physical defects," "separation from the father; the search for a father during which . . . [the son] discovers himself," "kindly foster-parents, and sexual attraction to a member of one's own family or a maternal female." In MacLennan's first three novels, Barometer Rising, Two Solitudes, and The Precipice, the rebellious sons never come to terms with their fathers or their fathers' sexuality. In Each Man's Son, however, the middle-aged son gives up the ghost of his father, and in The Watch That Ends the Night, MacLennan turns Dr. Jerome Martell, a parallel to his own father, into a Christ figure. By 1980, MacLennan himself has turned into a father, critical of the permissive younger generation; but his author figure, childless John Wellfleet in Voices in Time, becomes the kindly teaching father to the children of the future.

MacLennan scholar T. D. MacLulich says that MacLennan's historical study leaves him uncertain as to whether society's course is determined by forces beyond human control. The play of human will against externally determined destiny is also the subject of Sophocles' great Oedipus tragedies, which MacLennan loved. The thinker who grew up with a Calvinist father and who came to manhood during the Great Depression might well be inclined to see the external as determiner. Yet critics who fault MacLennan for the use of external determiners are unwise. Such events as the Halifax Harbor explosion in Barometer Rising, which frees Neil Macrae from a disgrace (also externally caused by a false accuser), are actual determiners in real life; and it is his reaction to the suffering caused by the explosion that frees Neil from the desire for revenge. Yet the lesson of tragedy and of life is that the noble individual must struggle against determinism or, unable to prevail, accept fate with dignity and self-control. MacLennan and his heroes do one or the other; they are never craven.

The great myth of the struggle of life—of will against determinism—is that of Odysseus. That myth recurs in all the novels. Like Odysseus, Neil Macrae in Barometer Rising comes home unknown to Halifax from World War I, wounded and disgraced, to reclaim his identity and his place in society, to take vengeance on his enemy, and to restore his house. Neil and his faithful Penny and their son are reunited in seasoned happiness like that of Odysseus, Penelope, and Telemachus. In Each Man's Son, structured like the Odyssey (c. 725 B.C.E.; English translation, 1614) with counterpointed scenes at home and in the world, Archie MacNeil, a boxer, lacks Odysseus's cunning to survive the exploitation of prizefighting, and his wife, Mollie, lacks the strength to resist her suitor. On his return, Archie kills Mollie and her lover and dies, but "Telemachus" (the son) survives to live with Dr. Ainslie, a Calvinist mentor at last grown wise. In The Watch That Ends the Night, Dr. Jerome Martell, like Odysseus an "oddly pure sensualist so many experimenting women had desired," returns from war and wandering to bring Catherine, his dying former wife, and her husband, George, to terms with their past, to enable them to affirm her remaining life and accept her death. This affirmation of life and death is a major theme of the Odyssey. Scholar George Woodcock calls the Odyssey "the product of a people in the process of becoming aware of itself . . . [appropriate] to illuminate" the rise of a "Canadian national consciousness." It is also a myth of communication with the world. MacLennan's novels and his Canada are part of the world.

TWO SOLITUDES

First published: 1945

Type of work: Novel

The lives of three generations of two Canadian families are bound up in the conflict between French Canadian and Anglais ideas and aims for Canada.

A Galsworthian family saga, which of course includes intergenerational conflicts, bildungsroman, and love stories, Two Solitudes presents the bipartite consciousness for "European" Canada and urges reconciliation through reciprocal understanding: "Love consists in this," says the epigraph from the German poet Rainer Maria Rilke, "that two solitudes protect, and touch, and greet each other." In the account of the older generation from 1917 to 1921, Athanase Tallard, member of Parliament and seigneur of the agricultural community of St. Marc, represents the French tradition, Catholic, communal, “bound in sacred trust to the soil”—although he is critical of the Church, advocates scientific education, and has taken as his second wife a sensuous Irish Catholic girl. Typical Anglais are represented by the self-made capitalist Huntley McQueen, and by Janet Methuen, who has married into an old moneyed English family of Montreal, one with manners but very little noblesse oblige. Janet’s father, John Yardley, a retired sea captain who buys a farm in St. Marc, is the sort who should help bring about conciliation. Honorable, humane, exuberant, attuned to nature, Captain Yardley earns acceptance in the community. The parish priest, Father Beaubien, who opposes Yardley and Athanase, embodies the Church’s antiassimilationist policy. In the interest of controlled progress, Athanase collaborates with McQueen to set up industry in St. Marc. When he loses his place in his own community and can no longer be useful to McQueen, the tycoon bankrupts him. Yet it is Marius, the son of Athanase and his ascetic, sanctimonious first wife—Marius, “sexually puritanical, politically ambitious, a tool in the hands of the Church and the fledgling separatist movement,” ultimately a failure—who destroys his father in the French Catholic community.

Paul Tallard, the son of Athanase and his Irish second wife, Kathleen, is the focus of the episodic account of the next generation. Educated in French and English, humanely and scientifically, living as little lord of the country manor and then in urban poverty in Montreal, studying at university and then traveling the world for five years (1934 to 1939), Paul would seem ideal for developing the unified Canadian consciousness in the world, and so he is. In Athens, the cradle of his civilization, he thinks that “in spite of all the things he had done and the places he had seen, he [is] essentially unchanged: a Canadian, half French and half English, still trying to be himself and stand on his own feet.” In 1939, Paul goes home to write—for Paul is an incipient writer—about “naturally vital people” in Canadian society, and to marry Heather Methuen. The daughter of Janet Methuen and granddaughter of Captain Yardley, Heather has denied the mercenary values of her mother and has sought breadth and independence by studying art in the United States. Like Paul, she is faithful to Canada. Like her grandfather, she is full of joy. Though theirs is a romance of individuals, their marriage points the way toward national reconciliation.

The novel ends with declaration of war against Germany. Paul will volunteer, his first act as a unified Canadian being the defense of the civilization of which both the French and the English are a part. Among the French and English Canadians, MacLennan concludes, “there woke . . . the felt knowledge that together they had fought and survived. . . . The country took the first . . . steps toward becoming herself,” alone but in touch with a world of nations.

VOICES IN TIME

First published: 1980

Type of work: Novel

In the twenty-first century, an aged survivor of political and physical cataclysm tries to recover and record historical knowledge as a help to the renewal of civilization.

Voices in Time is at once a futuristic and a historical novel. When André Gervais, one of a new generation stirring in the 2030’s, born after “the Great Fear,” “the Destructions,” and the establishment of the repressive, simplistic Third Bureaucracy, discovers buried records of a Wellfleet family in Metro (once Montreal), John Wellfleet, a seventy-five-year-old “inoperative” in the new society, organizes his family’s experiences into a model of what went wrong in the twentieth century. Since John tries to recount the stories of his family members in their own voices, his resulting book is structured as a montage written in a variety of styles.

Central to the novel is the elegant voice of Conrad Dehmel, John’s stepfather. The son of a German naval officer bound utterly to pride, discipline, and duty and a gentle, war-loathing mother, Conrad develops liberal values. Studying history in England in the 1930's, he falls in love with Hannah Erlich, a German Jew. Both return to Germany right before World War II. As part of a plan to save Hannah and her psychologist father from extermination, Conrad joins the Gestapo, but the plan fails; Hannah and his own family die under the Nazis, their fates determined by Adolf Hitler's horrible misuse of power. Tortured terribly, Conrad survives and emigrates.

The second major voice—one of late twentieth century vulgarity—is that of John's older cousin, Timothy Wellfleet. Like Conrad, he is the son of a military man, a man who, however, never disciplined his son; Timothy becomes a representative member of late twentieth century society. First an advertising agent, he later becomes a radical-chic television interviewer, the kind of "media" newsman who belittles his guests from established society and makes himself the star of the show. When Timothy sympathetically features terrorist separatists whose kidnapping and murder trigger the government crackdowns of Canada's October Crisis (1970), his producer, a Jew who is also his mistress, accuses him of encouraging terrorism. She leaves him and his program.

Timothy and Conrad's stories come together when Conrad, a respected history professor who feels duty bound to warn North Americans that the young generation's loss of confidence in civilization makes conditions right for an upsurge of fascism, appears on Timothy's program. Using garbled information from a Marxist-terrorist source, Timothy accuses Conrad of his Gestapo connections and of responsibility for Hannah's death. A Holocaust survivor, having mistakenly identified him from television as a Nazi torturer, kills Conrad, then, seeing his mistake, kills himself. Undisciplined Timothy's banal misuse of banal power has wrought horrible results.

In the book that he edits, John Wellfleet and his voices suggest a pattern of history: After Germany's defeat in World War I and its suffering in the Depression, Hitler appealed to the Germans' need for an authority figure, a superego to approve their doing anything to recover their pride. In late twentieth century North America, undisciplined young people and their permissive elders also were demoralized; they felt the need for authority and discipline that they could not give themselves. According to MacLennan's apocalyptic story, an authoritarian regime (the Second Bureaucracy) did follow a time of license and terrorism (the Great Fear), but its strength was not real: Its uncontrolled war computers caused the Destructions. In the Third Bureaucracy, there is hope in the cycle of history: André Gervais, his colleagues, and his children may restore civilization; John Wellfleet's history book may guide them. MacLennan may have hoped that the warning of his novel might forestall the destruction that he prophesies.

SUMMARY

Critics of Hugh MacLennan's novels deplore his conservative techniques: his didacticism, his allegorizing the stories of individuals, his heavy use of local color, his oversimplified and moralistic characterization, his describing rather than evoking, his use of external circumstance, his basically chronological narration, his prudish and clichéd accounts of sex. Defenders counter that his "reconstructive reporting" of historical events is superb and commend his development of counterpoint, memory, and montage narration. Future assessments will probably praise his capturing, as he said, "the conflict . . . between the human spirit of Everyman and Everyman's human condition"—Everyman, of course, wearing twentieth century Canadian garb.

Pat Ingle Gillis

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Barometer Rising, 1941
Two Solitudes, 1945
The Precipice, 1948
Each Man's Son, 1951
The Watch That Ends the Night, 1959
Return of the Sphinx, 1967
Voices in Time, 1980

NONFICTION:

Oxyrhynchus: An Economic and Social Study, 1935, 1968
Cross-Country, 1949
Thirty and Three, 1954
Scotchman's Return, and Other Essays, 1960
Seven Rivers of Canada, 1961 (revised as Rivers of Canada, 1974)
The Colour of Canada, 1967
The Other Side of Hugh MacLennan: Selected Essays Old and New, 1978 (Elspeth Cameron, editor)
On Being a Maritime Writer, 1984
Dear Marian, Dear Hugh: The MacLennan-Engel Correspondence, 1995 (Christl Verduyn, editor)

EDITED TEXT:

McGill: The Story of a University, 1960

MISCELLANEOUS:

Hugh MacLennan's Best, 1991 (Douglas M. Gibson, editor)

About the Author

Cameron, Elspeth. Hugh MacLennan: A Writer's Life. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1981.
Forkey, Neil S. "Thinking Like a River: The Making of Hugh MacLennan's Environmental Consciousness." Journal of Canadian Studies 41, no. 2 (Spring, 2007): 42-64.
Jones, Joseph, and Johanna Jones. Canadian Fiction. Boston: Twayne, 1981.
MacLulich, T. D. Hugh MacLennan. Boston: Twayne, 1983.
Mandel, Eli. The Family Romance. Winnipeg, Man.: Turnstone Press, 1986.
New, William H. A History of Canadian Literature. New York: New Amsterdam, 1989.
Pell, Barbara Helen. Faith and Fiction: A Theological Critique of the Narrative Strategies of Hugh MacLennan and Morley Callaghan. Waterloo, Ont.: Published for the Canadian Corporation for Studies in Religion by Wilfrid Laurier University Press, 1998.
Woodcock, George. "A Nation's Odyssey." In Odysseus Ever Returning. Toronto: McClelland & Stewart, 1970.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Is the determinism of Hugh MacLennan based more on Greek tragedy, Calvinism, Freudianism, or some combination?
- How well does MacLennan reconcile French and English Canada?
- Assess MacLennan's "Canadian way of looking at things."
- Was MacLennan's view of the future determined chiefly by the time and circumstances of his early life?
- Explain and exemplify MacLennan's montage narration.

LOUIS MACNEICE

Born: Belfast, Ireland (now in Northern Ireland)

September 12, 1907

Died: London, Great Britain

September 3, 1963

One of a number of poets who turned poetry toward social concerns in the 1930's, MacNeice later skillfully wrote long poems, brief lyrics, and radio dramas.

BIOGRAPHY

Louis MacNeice (muhk-NEES) was born in Belfast, Ireland (now in Northern Ireland), on September 12, 1907. His father was a pastor in the Church of Ireland; his mother had been born in Connemara in the west country. When he was still a very young child, his father received a parish in Carrickfergus, at that time a small town in the countryside outside of Belfast. He had an older sister and a younger brother who was afflicted with Down syndrome. In 1914, his mother died of tuberculosis after a lengthy illness, and the young Louis was devastated. This experience seems to have made him perpetually reserved and shy and rendered him vulnerable to the fear of loss.

MacNeice's father, despite his church affiliation, supported home rule, a position which made his life among his fellow Protestants rather uncomfortable and went a long way toward isolating the MacNeice family from their neighbors. His political sympathies did not make him friends in Catholic Ireland, either. In order to remove Louis from the tensions of Irish life, his father sent him to school in England, first to Sherborne, and then to Marlborough College. All his life, MacNeice was troubled by his mixed Irish and British cultural inheritance.

Despite his father's calling, MacNeice's faith seems not to have been strong, and his education at the English schools seems to have confirmed in him a lifelong skepticism that scarcely ever showed signs of thawing. At Marlborough, he knew Anthony Blunt and the later poet laureate, John Betjeman. While there, his interests in literature were ignited, and with his schoolmates he plunged eagerly into the works of T. S. Eliot, Ezra Pound, and William Butler Yeats. He was also introduced to Marxism, but although he found many of its arguments compelling, he was always skeptical about it.

MacNeice went on to Merton College, Oxford in 1925, and although his father was a Christian, who later was made bishop of Down, he lost his faith completely there. Just before graduation he married Giovanna Marie Therese Babette Ezra. He graduated with firsts (honors) in "greats" (classics and philosophy) and "mods" (history and literature).

After graduation, he and his new wife moved to Birmingham, where he lectured in the classics. While there he became more and more interested in the life of the common man and shook off, as he put it, the values of an exaggerated sense of beauty. As a result, in the thirties he resolved to write a poetry that avoided the esoteric interests of Eliot and Pound and instead concentrated on reaching the ordinary educated man.

His son Daniel was born in May, 1934. He divorced his wife on November 2, 1936, after which he lived a bachelor father's life for some years. He was then appointed lecturer in Greek at Bedford College of the University of London, where his 1936 translation of Aeschylus's Agamemnon (458 B.C.E.) was performed. In 1937, he traveled to Iceland with W. H. Auden, a trip which later produced the book of poems Letters from Iceland (1937) written jointly with Auden. During the publication process, he met and became friends with the poets Cecil Day Lewis, Stephen Spender, and Dylan Thomas. His next publishing venture was the long poem Autumn Journal (1939), a chronicle of the poet's feelings and thoughts on many public subjects, including the continuing Spanish Civil War and life in general in England in 1938.

In 1939, MacNeice traveled to the United States, where he taught at Pennsylvania State University and at Cornell University. In 1941, he was hired by the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) as a scriptwriter, a job he kept through the war and on into 1954. He developed his skill at writing radio drama. His father resigned his bishopric and died shortly after in 1942; MacNeice then met and married singer Hedli Anderson, who remained with him until his death. In 1943, the marriage produced a daughter. Between this time and his death in 1963, MacNeice continued to publish books of poems, radio plays, and translations, most notably his 1951 translation of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's Faust (pb. 1808, 1833, pr. 1829, 1854) for radio production. His last significant public act was the delivery of the Clark Lectures, in Cambridge in the spring of 1963. The lectures were printed posthumously as Varieties of Parable (1965). He died on September 3, 1963, while supervising the production of his last radio play, Persons from Porlock (pb. 1969). He was nine days short of his fifty-sixth birthday.

ANALYSIS

Louis MacNeice is probably best known for his friendship and poetic collaborations with Auden, Spender, and Day Lewis. These poets reacted against the so-called elitist and metaphysical themes of Eliot and Pound and instead supported, in different degrees and in different ways, the socialist and Marxist movements of that time.

MacNeice's poetry lacks the hard brilliance of Eliot at his best and tends toward a conversational tone and looser rhythms, sometimes showing the influence of the jazz rhythms popular at the time. Some criticize his longer poems for being perhaps too commonplace, too journalistic. For example, the long poem Autumn Journal is often simply a diary in verse. MacNeice, however, felt that his personal feelings and opinions were valid material for poetry. Perhaps this conviction is part of his contribution to the thematic range of modern poetry.

On the other hand, MacNeice is not a carbon copy of any of the other poets of his day. He was never as enthusiastic about Marxism as Spender and Auden, and his poetry is less formal than that of Day Lewis. He called his own book on poetry a plea for impure poetry. He believed that too strong an emphasis on form makes poetry irrelevant to life, but that poetry with too strong an influence on content ceases to be poetry. The poet is neither a pure entertainer nor a propagandist. He or she should be, instead, a conscience for the community.

MacNeice, as a poet, lives up to such standards. He gathered his subject matter from the concerns of common men and women, and his images came from what people see about them. Often he wrote of the Irish peasants, though he admits to idealizing them. He tended to contrast the "real" life of work and family with the "artificial" life of the intellectual. In walking this tightrope between subject and form, he tried to find the form within the subject.

Unlike Auden and Spender, he did not quite trust Marxist solutions to the problems of the 1930's. He believed that comradeship was a socialist substitute for romance and that in extremes it led to an idealization of homosexuality.

MacNeice's poetry up to 1942 tended to revolve around a dream, if not an ideal, of a satisfactory society. Being a classical scholar, he seems to have had the Greek city-state as a model: In the Greek city-state the poet is seen as the person who, by his reflective ability and imaginative insight, acts as the guide for humane community policy. The poet, then, must write about politics and human relations but not neglect topics that befit a higher civilization: beauty, love, entertainment, and the life of the intellect.

After 1945, his poetry became more formal and less conversational. He performed dazzling formal maneuvers with rhythm, alliteration, rhyme, and the cross-relationships of imagery. In addition to his usual interests in politics and love, his subject matter began to deal with death and religion. It is almost as if he had become less a commentator and more a seer and prophet, though he would never have used such names to describe himself. He still wrote, after 1945, long poems of social commentary. In 1954, he published Autumn Sequel: A Rhetorical Poem in XXVI Cantos, a sequel to Autumn Journal. The later collection is about the same length as the previous one and deals with many of the same topics. The latter poem, however, is written in a rather strict terza rima, whereas the former uses a rather loose approximation of the form.

MacNeice, unlike many writers of serious literature, was long involved in a new kind of writing, the radio script. The advent of television in the early 1950's almost totally doomed this form of writing. MacNeice quickly became a master of this form after being hired by the BBC in 1941. He understood that a play without a stage or any visual elements had to use the conventions of radio drama to communicate to a listener. He knew that every visual image had to exist in the words and that any dialogue had to immediately identify the characters. His first complete effort was a rousing success. His most celebrated radio play is probably The Dark Tower (pb. 1947), based broadly on the Robert Browning poem. In the introduction to this drama, MacNeice defended the parable play as a viable form, maintaining that pure realism was almost finished, and that even works with a realistic surface like Franz Kafka's Der Prozess (1925; The Trial, 1937), or Thomas Mann's Der Zauberberg (1924; The Magic Mountain, 1927), were valued for their symbolic core rather than for their realism.

All in all, MacNeice fares better when one reads large amounts of his work; the quality of his verse is more or less constant. His short poems are neatly and cleverly structured. His long poems, with the exception of a few early ones, are engrossing and rhythmical. In all his work he followed what he himself preached to other poets: Be neither an elitist, sitting in the corner weaving aesthetic fancies, nor a propagandist, selling to one's readers a pre-fabricated dogma.

"THE SUNLIGHT ON THE GARDEN"

First published: 1937 (collected in Poems, 1937)

Type of work: Poem

The poem says that nothing can save the beauty of a moment.

"The Sunlight on the Garden," published in the collection Poems, is one of MacNeice's earlier works and is probably the most anthologized of all his short poems. It is a four stanza poem, each stanza having six lines rhyming abcba. All the lines are loose three-beat lines except line 5, which has two beats.

The poem begins with an almost commonplace statement about the inability to keep any moment; the habit of time is to run on, taking with it each moment of joy. The sixth line makes the statement that "we cannot beg for pardon." The logical connection, perhaps, being that time's passage prevents one from atoning for one's sins as well as from cherishing one's happy moments.

The second stanza lists freedom itself as one of those moments and foretells its end, with a pun on the word "lances." The poet adds to the list of disappearing things, birds, sonnets, and dances. Stanza three brings war to mind. The joy of using the sky for flying will also end. Having defied the church bells' moral imperative, now there will be sirens to deal with, and the airplanes will come, bringing bombs, fire, and death. The stanza ends with an allusion to the final words of Marc Antony in William Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra (pr. c. 1606-1607, pb. 1623), "We are dying, Egypt." As Antony represented the Roman world, so the poet represents the British empire, which is also dying.

The last stanza reverses the rhyming pattern of the first; line 1 of stanza 1 ends in "pardon," and line 5 ends in "garden." In the last stanza the reverse is true. Since the rhyming words are reversed, perhaps the meaning and feelings of the poem are also reversed. The poet begins the last stanza not expecting pardon. He accepts the passage of time and refuses to wish for something he cannot have. The word "hardened" which in stanza 1 modified "sunlight," in effect freezing it in place, here modifies "heart" with paradoxical results: accepting this "hardening of heart," refusing to ask for "pardon," brings on gladness. The moment in the garden gone, the poet says that he can be thankful to an unspecified "you." Not for sunlight, but for having "sat under Thunder and rain with you." Finally, the poem ends on an affirmative note with the poet grateful for the sunlight on the garden.

The underlying suggestion is that by using his formal skills, the poet is capable of reversing, in his own way, the passing of time by preserving time in a formal structure. It also suggests that the poet's skill can reverse the doom hurrying toward everyone.

“THE BRITISH MUSEUM READING ROOM”

First published: 1939 (collected in Poems, 1925-1940, 1940)

Type of work: Poem

The poet muses on the strange people who occupy the reading room of the British Museum library.

This poem is made up of three seven-line stanzas with a loosely organized metrical pattern and a rhyme scheme in which only lines 3 and 7 rhyme. Lines 3 and 7 are shorter than the other lines, which vary rhythmically from five to six beats, while the short lines are three or four beats long.

Stanza 1 opens with the image of the domed reading room compared to a beehive with its busy occupants moving up and down the aisles, which contain “the cells of knowledge.” The readers, however, are described as “stooping” over their work and “haunted” by their desire for knowledge.

The conceit continues in line 3, calling knowledge honey and wax; the phrase “the accumulation of years” gives a slightly negative connotation: Why are these bees hoarding all this knowledge? Is the accumulating wax like wax in the ears, which impairs one’s hearing?

Lines 4 through 7 give the reasons for these people’s being here: some to make money, some because they like learning, and some to escape an unidentified “demon” “drumming . . . in their ears.” Is the only use for knowledge for some people to escape a life that is otherwise unbearable?

Stanza 2 further describes the denizens of the place. They are all strange. The poet calls them cranks, hacks, poverty-stricken scholars, all in some way outcasts from the social order. “In pince-nez, period hats or romantic beards,” they are all out of fashion. In line 10, he describes their work as a hobby (therefore unimportant) or a doom (an obsession). The stanza concludes with other negatives. They are too alive or too asleep; they are like bats “in a world of inverted values.” This last is a fine ambiguous phrase. Is it the values of the reading room that are inverted or do they appear upside-down because the larger world is the world of inverted values?

Stanza 3 takes the reader outside, where the pigeons are doing what pigeons do: court, walk about “puffing their ruffs,” and sunbathe. The last four lines are obscure, but they seem to take the reader into the museum itself, where the sculptures and artifacts are kept. There is, it seems, an ancient terror under the totem poles. Out from under these poles and “between the enormous fluted Ionic columns” of the Greek temples comes something alien: “The guttural sorrow of the refugees.”

The intellectual life has become a refuge from living. Living is the puffing, the courting, and the sunbathing of the common English pigeon, and, by extension, of the common person. Is learning itself open only to the exiles from life? Are the only people who become intellectuals those for whom everyday life is intolerable? Such are the questions generated by the poem.

“THE TRUISMS”

First published: 1960 (collected in British Poetry Since 1945, 1970)

Type of work: Poem

The poem is a parable concerning a young man who ignores his father’s good advice and later finds it valuable.

This is a late poem that shows some of MacNeice’s efforts to turn toward the more universal topics of religion and death. It is a three-stanza poem with five lines in each stanza. The lines are all approximately four-beat lines and are rhymed loosely.

The poem is a parable, telling the story of the departure and return of an unnamed youth. It opens with the young man receiving, as a gift from his father, a “box of truisms,” that is, “words to live by,” the kind of advice fathers have always given their sons. The box is shaped like a coffin, so the young man considers the words dead and of no use to him. He leaves the box on the mantelpiece. The young man suspects that the truisms are children's toys that he has outgrown. What is more, his father has died and is also in a box, "skulking."

In stanza 2 the young man leaves home, leaving the gift box behind. He travels into the world of experience where he "met love, met war,/ Sordor, disappointment, defeat, betrayal." All of this leads to "disbeliefs." Apparently the man loses his faith in his youthful ideals. It is through "disbeliefs" that he "arrived at a house" that "he could not remember seeing before." The strange negative in that line indicates that the negative experiences have led him back to his childhood.

Stanza 3 reveals what he finds there. When he walks inside, he discovers that through his disbelief he has arrived "where he had come from," his childhood world. Curiously enough, something there tells him how to behave. He has perhaps relearned something of his youthful instructions. Two events confirm this fact: The truisms come out of the box and perch familiarly on his shoulder, and a tall tree has sprouted from his father's grave, revealing that his father is still a source of life.

The box is the central conceit of the poem and is a source of an amazing diversity in unity. The box is a gift box, an heirloom passing from father to son, and a coffin. It holds dead ideas and is identical to the father who is in a box in the ground. Like Pandora's box, all the son's troubles "come out," leaving only hope. It is the disbeliefs of line 9 that cause the wandering son to return to where the box, with its immense treasures, lies.

SUMMARY

Louis MacNeice was born one generation after Eliot and Pound, and his early poetry reacts against these figures by being less concerned with aesthetics and more with social problems. He wrote both long and short poems with considerable technical skill. After World War II, he concentrated on radio plays, but he also wrote some of the most finely etched poetry of the twentieth century. He never ceased believing that poetry was a gift for the community and that the job of the poet was to be the community's conscience.

Robert W. Peckham

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

- Blind Fireworks*, 1929
- Poems*, 1935
- Poems*, 1937
- The Earth Compels*, 1938
- Autumn Journal*, 1939
- Poems, 1925-1940*, 1940
- The Last Ditch*, 1940
- Selected Poems*, 1940
- Plant and Phantom*, 1941
- Springboard: Poems, 1941-1944*, 1944
- Holes in the Sky: Poems, 1944-1947*, 1948
- Collected Poems, 1925-1948*, 1949
- Ten Burnt Offerings*, 1952
- Autumn Sequel: A Rhetorical Poem in XXVI Cantos*, 1954
- The Other Wing*, 1954
- Visitations*, 1957
- Eighty-five Poems*, 1959
- Solstices*, 1961

The Burning Perch, 1963
The Collected Poems of Louis MacNeice, 1966 (E. R. Dodds, editor)

DRAMA:

Out of the Picture, pr., pb. 1937
Station Bell, pr. 1937
One for the Grave, pr. 1966, pb. 1968
Selected Plays of Louis MacNeice, pb. 1993

RADIO PLAYS:

Christopher Columbus, 1944
The Dark Tower, and Other Radio Scripts by Louis MacNeice, 1947
The Mad Islands and The Administrator, 1964
Persons from Porlock, and Other Plays for Radio, 1969

LONG FICTION:

Roundabout Way, 1932 (as Louis Malone)

NONFICTION:

Letters from Iceland, 1937 (with W. H. Auden)
Modern Poetry: A Personal Essay, 1938
Zoo, 1938
I Crossed the Minch, 1938
The Poetry of W. B. Yeats, 1941
Astrology, 1964
Varieties of Parable, 1965
The Strings Are False, 1965

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

The Penny That Rolled Away, 1954

TRANSLATIONS:

The Agamemnon of Aeschylus, 1936
Goethe's Faust, Parts I and II, 1951 (with E. L. Stahl)

About the Author

Brown, Terence. Louis MacNeice: Skeptical Vision. New York: Barnes & Noble Books, 1975.
 Brown, Terence, and Alec Reid, eds. Time Was Away: The World of Louis MacNeice. Dublin: Dolmen Press, 1974.
 Devine, Kathleen, and Alan J. Peacock, eds. Louis MacNeice and His Influence. Gerrards Cross, Buckinghamshire, England: C. Smythe, 1998.
 Kiberd, Declan. Irish Classics. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 2001.
 McDonald, Peter. "Louis MacNeice: Irony and Responsibility." In The Cambridge Companion to Contemporary Irish Poetry, edited by Matthew Campbell. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
 _____. Louis MacNeice: The Poet in His Contexts. Oxford English Monographs. Oxford, England: Clarendon Press, 1991.
 McKinnon, William T. Apollo's Blended Dream: A Study of the Poetry of Louis MacNeice. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.
 Marsack, Robyn. The Cave of Making: The Poetry of Louis MacNeice. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.
 Moore, Donald B. The Poetry of Louis MacNeice. Leicester, England: Leicester University Press, 1972.
 Smith, Stan. Irish Poetry and the Construction of Modern Identity: Ireland Between Fantasy and History. Dublin: Irish Academic Press, 2005.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What was the basis of Louis MacNeice's concern about his "mixed Irish and British cultural inheritance"?
- How relatively socialist was MacNeice with respect to his literary friends?
- What has been lost in the virtual end of radio drama as practiced by MacNeice?
- How does the form of "The Sunlight on the Garden" support its thesis?
- Does MacNeice supply or suggest positive answers to the questions raised by "The British Museum Reading Room."
- Assess MacNeice's success as his "community's conscience."

© The Nobel Foundation

NAGUIB MAHFOUZ

Born: Cairo, Egypt
December 11, 1911

Died: Cairo, Egypt
August 30, 2006

Mahfouz's skillfully crafted novels offer a large cast of urban Muslims who are challenged to respond to social and political transformations in Egypt.

BIOGRAPHY

No authoritative biography has been written about Naguib Mahfouz (MAHK-fewz). Egyptian culture respects privacy. The celebrated writer, though accessible, assumed an impersonal role. After accepting the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1988, Mahfouz offered only glimpses of his experiences.

Mahfouz was born on December 11, 1911, in Gamaliya, a middle-class quarter of Cairo. His grandparents were merchants; his father was a government clerk. When he was six years old, his father became business manager for a copper merchant, and the family moved to a fashionable suburb of Cairo.

The youngest of seven children (four girls and three boys), who was born ten years after the next-youngest child, he developed a close relationship with his mother. He lived with her until his marriage in 1954. She cultivated his love for history and literature, teaching him folk songs and stories and taking him to museums and the pyramids. She also instilled in him an appreciation for music; he studied at the Institute of Arabic Music, where he learned to play the qanun, a stringed instrument.

As a teenager, he played soccer, went to the cinema, and explored the streets and cafés in old Cairo neighborhoods. There he gleaned materials for stories, which he began writing at age seventeen. In secondary school, he liked philosophy, English, and French. An avid reader of English fiction, he would rework detective novels, substituting Egyptian characters and situations. While a university student, he translated books to improve his English and was able to publish his Arabic translation of an English study on ancient Egypt.

In 1930, he enrolled in the undergraduate program in philosophy at Cairo University. After receiving his bachelor's degree in 1934, he enrolled in a master's program in philosophy. Meanwhile, he published essays in the monthly al-Marifa on diverse philosophers, including two who have influenced his thinking: Henri-Louis Bergson and William James. Mahfouz planned to write but did not complete a thesis on aesthetics about the concept of beauty in Islamic philosophy. Instead, he took a job at the university and at night pursued a literary vocation. He wrote for at least two hours a day and studied the works of both Arab and Western masters.

Mahfouz worked in the offices of the university administrators until 1939, when he embarked on a long career as a civil servant in several agencies. He worked for the Ministry of Endowment Estates and later served in the loan department of charitable foundations. In 1955, he was transferred to the Ministry of Information, where he performed such tasks as writing film scripts (many based on his own stories) and managing book publication. Promoted to director of the cinema organization, he supervised film production. He retired from government service in 1972.

Unlike some writers in Egypt, Mahfouz did not suffer during the regimes of either Gamal Abdel Nasser or Anwar el-Sadat. Mahfouz did not, however, entirely avoid politics. In 1972, Mahfouz and a group of intellectuals petitioned the Egyptian government to cease its conflicts with Israel. His pro-Western, secular, liberal views infuriated Islam's militant fundamentalists, who censured his fiction as blasphemous and attempted to assassinate him.

Mahfouz and his wife, Atyat, were the parents of two daughters, Fatma and Om-Kalthoum. While his wife maintained traditional customs, both daughters were graduated from the American University in Cairo. After his retirement, Mahfouz followed a daily routine that included breakfast at the Aly Baba café, composing narratives, and preparing a weekly column for the newspaper Al-Ahram. His literary credentials confirmed, the master presided regularly at coffee hours and dinners with disciples who wished to converse with him.

In 1957, Mahfouz received the National Prize for Letters for his major work, Al-Thulāthiya (1956-1957; Cairo trilogy). In 1972, President Sadat offered him the Collar of the Republic, Egypt's highest honor. In 1988, he won the Nobel Prize in Literature. For personal reasons (dislike of travel and physical ailments—diabetes, poor vision, hearing loss), he sent his daughters to Stockholm to accept the prize in the name of Arabic literature. He allocated one-fourth of the prize money to each family member and donated his share to a fund for people with maladies of the kidneys or heart.

In July, 2006, Mahfouz fell and injured his head. He died at the age of ninety-four in a Cairo hospital on August 30, 2006. The following day, he received a state funeral with full military honors in Cairo.

ANALYSIS

In his novels and short stories, Mahfouz interwove autobiographical and historical facts, the background ranging from rebellions opposing the Hyksos occupation of 1500 B.C.E. to conflicts with Israel in the twentieth century. His works reflected developments in the aesthetic, philosophic, and political thinking in Cairo.

Mahfouz identified his Egyptian masters. One, Taha Husayn, academic and novelist, advocated the primacy of reason over tradition. His adherents campaigned for and were successful in obtaining changes in social structures, creating opportunities in education and employment for men and women. Likewise, Mustafa al-Manfaluti's sketches of daily life instigated social reform. Third, Salama Mousa fostered Mahfouz's acceptance of scientific socialism, with the works of Charles Darwin and Karl Marx shaping his form of literary realism. Lastly, in seeking stylistic accomplishment in Arabic literature, Mahfouz turned to the prose narratives of the Koran and The Thousand and One Nights.

When he abandoned his coursework in philosophy, Mahfouz pursued a self-study program for reading masterpieces of world literature. The Nobel laureate's works reveal the strong influence of Western writers, especially that of Leo Tolstoy, Fyodor Dostoevski, Gustave Flaubert, Émile Zola, Marcel Proust, James Joyce, Henry James, and William Faulkner.

In the late 1930's, Mahfouz wrote three historical novels in the romantic style, using Sir Walter Scott's works as models. Fascinated by such archeological discoveries as the tomb of Tutankhamen, he set the action in ancient Egypt, criticizing covertly the Egyptian government of his time. Two of the novels describe despotic pharaohs, who reflect the behavior of King Farouk I. The third describes the Egyptians' triumphant insurrection against the Hyksos rulers, paralleling endeavors in his own times to oust the British occupiers.

Having sanctioned the conventions of literary realism and naturalism, Mahfouz focuses on people from the lower-class quarters of contemporary Cairo. He highlights Muslim religious practices and social customs. Mahfouz's dynamic and unforgettable characters are products of their neighborhood.

In addition to offering veiled criticism of his era, Mahfouz used stylistic techniques in his early period that inform his later works as well. For example, he uses dualistic oppositions, such as old/new, good/evil, light/dark, and chaos/order.

At the opening of Zuqāq al-Midaqq (1947; Midaq Alley, 1966), an old bard arrives at the café to intone his tales. The men ignore him and listen, instead, to the new radio. He is the first of the numerous people in Mahfouz's fiction who are displaced, rejected, fired, or jilted because of social and political changes. The modern is more interesting than the old; people forgo tradition and disregard ancestors. Good luck and money or material possessions, rather than religious or ethical values, guarantee moral standing.

While Mahfouz did not espouse Zola's theories of the novel as scientific experiment, the Frenchman's twenty-volume saga on the Rougon-Macquart family informs Mahfouz's masterpiece, the Cairo trilogy, a milestone in the history of the Arabic novel for which he gained honors in Egypt and abroad. Like most of his later works, the trilogy was serialized in the newspaper Al-Ahram and then published in book form. Each of the three books of the trilogy takes its title from the name of a street in the quarter of the al-Husayn mosque. The characters live within a rich context of time, place, and heredity. Cultural, intellectual, and political events provide motivations for their actions.

Mahfouz paints with epic grandeur the dilemmas and aspirations of three generations of the family of Ahmad Abd al Jawad, from 1917 to 1944. The first volume, Bayn al-qaṣrayn (1956; Palace Walk, 1990), focuses on the patriarch's interactions with his wives, mistresses, children, and business associates. The second, Qaṣr al-shawq (1957; Palace of Desire, 1991), takes place between 1924 and 1927. Named for the street where a character lives, it focuses on the rebellious sons and especially on the emotional and intellectual struggles of Kamal, a university student. The third, Al-Sukkariya (1957; Sugar Street, 1992), which takes place from 1935 to 1944, offers a stage for the political roles played by the sons of the patriarch's two daughters.

Following the revolution of July 23, 1952, Mahfouz endorsed a Sufi-oriented, democratic view of life. In 1959, he serialized Awlād Ḥarātīnā (book, 1967; Children of Gebelawi, 1981, also known as Children of the Alley, 1996). An allegorical novel advancing a negative view of religions not providing solutions to the problems of existence, it caused much controversy among fundamentalists, who had it banned in Egypt. Mahfouz returned to this topic. In his short stories especially, he examines the estrangement and the loneliness of humanity without God.

In the 1960's, Mahfouz published six novels and two collections of short stories. Most of these works tell about the crisis of intellectuals, who are suffering from disillusionment and despair caused by civil strife, wars with Israel, and other forms of cruelty. Written in an impressionistic style (a few details evoke environment and situations), the novels indict the Egyptian government for failing to assist leaders of the revolutions. These books include Al-Liṣṣ wa-al-kilāb (1961; The Thief and the Dogs, 1984), Al-Summān wa-al-kharīf (1962; Autumn Quail, 1985), Al-Ṭarīq (1964; The Search, 1987), Al-Shaḥḥādh (1965; The Beggar, 1986), Mirāmār (1967; Miramar, 1978), and Tharthara fawq al-Nīl (1966; Adrift on the Nile, 1993). The Nobel committee praised the structure of Adrift on the Nile, in which members of Cairo's intelligentsia assemble on a houseboat on the Nile and, in drug-induced stupor, ridicule bureaucracy and Nasser's regime.

Mahfouz adapts psychoanalytical methods to disclose the inner lives of his alienated characters, who seek self-justification. Mahfouz uses the stream-of-consciousness technique. A character's ruminations unveil his inner world. Mahfouz also subscribes to Proust's use of interior monologue, which discloses a character's associative reactions to a sensory stimulus.

The works produced during the 1970's and the 1980's also reflect on political issues. They also deal with quests; characters search for the father, for honor, or for political identity. Malḥamat al-ḥarāfīsh (1977; The Harafish, 1994) is an epic of the common people who are oppressed by poverty, but who also suffer from vices (pride, dishonesty, lust, greed) that are sources of cruelty and obstacles to greatness.

Mahfouz experimented with conventions of narration. For example, he used surrealistic techniques. In many stories, he used the narrative techniques of the Arabic tradition to which he is heir. These stories have a loose, episodic structure and rely on accumulation of details to produce a roundness of vision. For the most part, however, Mahfouz's works are tightly constructed and offer a cohesively unified worldview. The beginning announces the principal themes that are woven throughout the text, and the end reiterates them.

Most Egyptians embraced Mahfouz's works, either in printed form or in the films based on his stories. Mahfouz created filmscripts, as well as plays, out of many of his prose works, and some of his narratives reflect his experiences as a screenwriter. Cinematic techniques are evident in Afrāh al-qubbah (1981; Wedding Song, 1984). His theatrical experiences also inform this work, which is presented in dialogue form.

PALACE WALK

First published: Bayn al-qasrayn, 1956
(English translation, 1990)

Type of work: Novel

Egyptians prefer this volume of the trilogy, which is about a Cairo family, their social customs, cultural values, and political concerns.

Family conflicts parallel political turmoil in Palace Walk, which covers the period between November 10, 1917 and April 8, 1919. Great Britain opposed, at that time, Egypt's request for independence. The novel focuses on the patriarch, Al-Sayyid (the master) Ahmad Abd al-Jawad, a middle-aged merchant. In his comfortable home at Bayna al-qasrayn, the martinet imposes strict standards of behavior on his family, upholding traditional values, which are undergoing change. Al-Sayyid's personality, however, has other facets. In his house, he forbids music, considered unreligious, but he is an expert on music. His new mistress is a singer. One son, Yasin, learns of Al-Sayyid's philandering and is shocked to witness his father's gaiety and singing. At the end of the novel, Al-Sayyid is shocked to learn that another son, Kamal, has inherited his fine voice.

Al-Sayyid married his wife, Amina, daughter of a sheikh, when she was thirteen. He trained her to submit to his rule, for he had failed to do so with his first wife, Yasin's free-spirited mother. Grateful to be Al-Sayyid's only wife, Amina considers welcoming him home at midnight her duty. She nevertheless resents his spending evenings out and suspects that he lives a different life with his friends.

Mahfouz, examining the rights of women, begins the novel from Amina's point of view. Her tasks—caring for five children and running the household with the help of a maid and two daughters—are dull, but she finds solace in passages from the Koran, which are woven throughout the novel.

Sequestered, she watches the male members of the family leave the house from behind the latticed balcony, which conceals the women from public view. For diversion, she tends to her rooftop garden and looks at the neighborhood and its minarets. She has left home twice in the past twenty-five years, veiled and accompanied by her husband, to visit her mother.

The major event in the novel involves Amina's leaving the house. When her husband is away on business, she and her youngest son, Kamal, go to al-Husayn mosque. On their return, she is hit by an automobile, a symbol of scientific progress. Al-Sayyid, calm until her recovery, banishes her to her mother's house. The sons visit her in secret. Her husband invites her back because of social obligations, arranging marriages for their daughters.

Palace Walk ends with jubilation in Cairo but sorrow for Al-Sayyid's family. The nationalists victorious, Fahmy asks his father to forgive him for having defied his orders not to participate in the revolt. Fahmy then leaves to celebrate Sa'd Zaghlul's return from exile. The British open fire on the demonstration, and Fahmy is killed. Students inform Al-Sayyid, who must go to face his wife's grief as well as another challenge to his authority. Unlike his return in chapter 1, in which he receives respect, he is not expected at the coffee hour. He is disoriented when he hears Kamal's song, and he realizes that the family disobeys his codes of behavior in his absence. Throughout the novel, the ingenuous, modern child, Kamal, who is the chief protagonist of the second novel of Al-Thulathiya, serves as a foil for the duplicitous father.

THE THIEF AND THE DOGS

First published: Al-Liṣṣ wa-al-kilāb, 1961
(English translation, 1984)

Type of work: Novel

Mahfouz offers a psychological study of an idealistic revolutionary who refuses to adapt to change and must be judged a rebel and a thief.

Following Western conventions, time in The Thief and the Dogs is marked by the rising and setting sun. The novel begins on the morning Said Mahran is released from prison, after a four-year sentence for robbery, and it ends with his death approximately seventeen days later. This framework points to Mahfouz's source, the case of Ahmad Amin Sulayman, a criminal who tried to kill his adulterous wife and her paramour. The police killed Sulayman on April 1, 1960.

In the exposition, Said walks from prison to his old home in Cairo, and, en route, he offers his self-justification in an internal monologue. Once home, he plans to demand two things: his books and Sana, his six-year-old daughter. He also plans to take revenge on Ilish Sidra, an associate who turned Said in and who then, after Said's incarceration, secured everything that Said had—home, money, and his wife, Nabawiyya. While his neighbors greet him respectfully, the police, who are providing Ilish with protection, are hostile. Unfortunately, Sana has ruined his books, and she is startled when her father talks to her. Her look of rejection saddens Said.

Said visits Ali al-Junaydi, his late father's religious counselor. The Sufi sheikh offers him food, advice, and sanctuary. Said accepts the hospitality and spends his first night of freedom at the sheikh's house. Within the next three weeks, he returns there twice, after criminal deeds. The sheikh's lessons in ethics enable the reader to judge Said's acts. On Said's last visit, a gathering of men chant verses. Mahfouz records a poem on the passage of time and the vanity of human pursuits, which suggests analogies to Said's situation.

Wishing to be a journalist, Said goes to Rauf Ilwan, his mentor in both socialist ideologies and crime. Now living in a neighborhood that they used to burglarize, the editor hands Said cash but refuses to give the thief a job. Such treachery is unpardonable; Said must fight this dog as well.

Two people who live on the fringes of the city and of society help him to effectuate his plans. Nur, a prostitute, offers him shelter, food, and companionship while he is hiding from the police. Tarzan, café owner and pariah, gets him a gun. According to Said, fate and scoundrels foil his schemes. Rauf catches him breaking into his house. Said's bullet misses its target and fells Rauf's porter. Said kills an innocent man instead of Ilish, who has relocated. The police trap Said in the cemetery, where their dogs "hound him down." In a final review of his ideals, he recalls Sana's rejecting gaze. He renounces rebellion and succumbs beside a tomb. Said's final reflections might be considered an allusion to the disillusionment of Egyptian intellectuals whose revolution, in July, 1952, failed.

RESPECTED SIR

First published: Ḥaḍrat al-muḥtaram, 1975
(English translation, 1986)

Type of work: Novel

The protagonist's mission to obtain the promotions that define his sense of respectability requires sacrificing his other interests to his career.

The first novel written in the ironic mode in Arabic literature, Respected Sir demonstrates how an individual's character and family background may determine his or her achievements. The first chapter introduces the protagonist, Othman Bayyumi, as well as the key topics. Othman is among a group of new employees who are taken to meet the director general in his office. The only words that the director utters announce changes in the educational system, a major concern in the novel. He says that students currently receive diplomas, rather than primary and secondary certificates, so he is surprised to see that Othman has a certificate. Hired for the lowest position because of his lack of education, Othman is overwhelmed by this experience. He describes the office in flowery religious diction. Othman's reverence for an ordinary office highlights the novel's irony and warns the reader to keep an intellectual distance from Othman, who yearns to become director general.

Othman's father wanted him to work rather than go to school. He considered his son educated once Othman knew prayers and passages from the Koran. The father, however, followed his sheikh's advice and sent Othman to school. The best student in the neighborhood, Othman could not complete secondary school because both parents died, and he had to work. Three siblings, who link this novel to previous works, also died. One brother was killed in a demonstration, another died in prison, and his sister died of typhoid fever.

In painting the bureaucrat's climb to the top and the politics of government hierarchy, Mahfouz draws on his experiences as a civil servant. Details from the author's career are found in Othman's tasks (preparing translations, writing a newspaper column), his interests (studying English and French), and his temperament.

Mahfouz is not sympathetic, however, toward Othman, even if they have things in common. Othman is an excellent worker and is promoted with the shifting of positions. The self-made man loses all sense of measure and fails to understand that stress may kill him before he reaches the top. In his ambition and pride, Othman eschews ethical principles.

As part of his goal to become director general, Othman's desire to marry becomes an all-consuming pursuit. With the possibility of having a powerful position, he cannot marry his childhood sweetheart. He needs someone who can help further his career. Matchmakers, however, cannot find anyone from a good family who can marry him, because of his humble background. He treats a potential mate, a schoolmistress, with great cruelty. He fails to understand that his raping her, rather than bad luck or the unjust social order, causes her downfall. He marries Qadriyya, a prostitute, because prostitution is to be abolished, and he wishes to make her a respectable woman. In middle age, he longs for children, so he marries a young civil servant with a bachelor's degree in history. This woman, Radiya, is also an opportunist. When convalescing from a heart attack, he learns that she married him because of his prestigious job. He is stunned and loses his will to live, even though he has just been promoted to director general.

SUMMARY

Naguib Mahfouz was a masterful storyteller. He used his literature to comment on social injustices and current events. His fiction projected a human dimension to history by showing how government decisions affect the people. In depicting alienated people confronted with existential problems, the Nobel laureate transcended the boundaries of his country and expressed issues of universal concern.

Irene E. Gnarra

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- ‘Abath al-Aqdār*, 1939 (Khufu's Wisdom, 2003)
Rādūbīs, 1943 (Rhadopis of Nubia, 2003)
Kifāh Tibā, 1944 (Thebes at War, 2003)
Khān al-Khalīlī, 1945
Zuqāq al-Midaqq, 1947 (Midaq Alley, 1966, revised 1975)
Bidāya wa-nihāya, 1949 (The Beginning and the End, 1951)
Al-Thulāthiyya, 1956-1957 (collective title for Bayn al-qaṣrayn, 1956 [Palace Walk, 1990]; Qaṣr al-shawq, 1957 [Palace of Desire, 1991]; and Al-Sukkariyya, 1957 [Sugar Street, 1992])
Awlād Hāratinā, 1959 (serial), 1967 (book; Children of Gebelawi, 1981; also known as Children of the Alley, 1996)
Al-Liṣṣ wa-al-kilāb, 1961 (The Thief and the Dogs, 1984)
Al-Summān wa-al-kharīf, 1962 (Autumn Quail, 1985)
Al-Ṭarīq, 1964 (The Search, 1987)
Al-Shaḥḥādh, 1965 (The Beggar, 1986)
Tharthara fawq al-Nīl, 1966 (Adrift on the Nile, 1993)
Mirāmār, 1967 (Miramar, 1978)
Al-Marāya, 1972 (Mirrors, 1977)
Al-Karnak, 1974 (Karnak, 1979; Karnak Café, 2007)
Ḥikāyāt Hāratinā, 1975 (The Fountain and the Tomb, 1988)
Ḥaḍrat al-muḥtaram, 1975 (Respected Sir, 1986)
Malḥamat al-ḥarāfīsh, 1977 (The Harafish, 1994)

Naguib Mahfouz

Afrāh al-qubbah, 1981 (Wedding Song, 1984)
Layālī alf Laylah, 1982 (Arabian Nights and Days, 1995)
Rihlat Ibn Fattumah, 1983 (The Journey of Ibn Fattouma, 1992)
Al-ā'ish fi al-ḥaqīqah, 1985 (Akhenaten: Dweller in Truth, 2000)
Yawm Qutila al-Za'īm, 1985 (The Day the Leader Was Killed, 1989)

SHORT FICTION:

Hams al-junūn, 1939
Dunyā Allāh, 1963 (partial translation as God's World, 1973)
Bayt sayyi' al-sum'a, 1965
Taḥta al-mizalla, 1967
Khammārat al-qitt al-aswad, 1968 (The Tavern of the Black Cat, 1976)
Hikaya bila bidaya wala nihaya, 1971
Al-Jarima, 1973
God's World, 1973
Al-ḥubb fawqa ḥaḍ abat al-haram, 1979
Al-Shaytan Ya'iz, 1979
Ra'aytu fīmā yarā al-nā'im, 1982
Al-Tanẓīm al-sirri, 1984
Al-Fajr al-kādhīb, 1989
The Time and the Place, and Other Stories, 1991
Voices from the Other World, 2003
The Seventh Heaven: Stories of the Supernatural, 2005
The Dreams, 2005

DRAMA:

One Act Plays, pb. 1989

NONFICTION:

Asda' al-sirah al-dhatyah, 1995 (Echoes of an Autobiography, 1997)
Naguib Mahfouz at Sidi Gaber: Reflections of a Nobel Laureate, 1994-2001, 2001

TRANSLATION:

Miṣr al-Qadimah, 1931 (of James Baikie's Ancient Egypt)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Taḥta al-mizalla, 1967

About the Author

Allen, Roger. The Arabic Novel: An Historical and Critical Introduction. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 1982.

Dickey, Christopher. "At the Ali Baba Café." Vanity Fair 52 (November, 1989): 235-244, 258.

El-Enany, Rasheed. "The Dichotomy of Islam and Modernity in the Fiction of Naguib Mahfouz." In The Postcolonial Crescent: Islam's Impact on Contemporary Literature, edited by John C. Hawley. New York: Peter Lang, 1998.

Fouad, Ajami. "The Humanist in the Alleys." The New Republic 235, no. 13 (September 25, 2006): 31-37.

Gordon, Haim. Naguib Mahfouz's Egypt: Existential Themes in His Writings. Contributions to the Study of World Literature 38. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1990.

Kessler, Brad. "Laureate in the Land of the Pharaohs." The New York Times Magazine 139 (June 3, 1990): 39, 60-62, 68-70, 80.

- Mikhail, Mona N. "A Compromise of the Road to Happiness: Love in Naguib Mahfouz's Repertoire." In Seen and Heard: A Century of Arab Women in Literature and Culture. Northampton, Mass.: Olive Branch Press, 2004.
- _____. Studies in the Short Fiction of Mahfouz and Idris. New York: New York University Press, 1992.
- Milson, Menahem. Naguib Mahfouz: The Novelist-Philosopher of Cairo. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998.
- Peled, Mattityahu. Religion, My Own: The Literary Works of Najib Mahfuz. New Brunswick, N.J.: Transaction Books, 1983.
- Somekh, Sasson. The Changing Rhythm: A Study of Nagib Mahfuz's Novels. Leiden, the Netherlands: E. J. Brill, 1973.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- The reputation of Naguib Mahfouz in Egypt is puzzling. Was he a trimmer (someone who expediently changed his opinions)? What principles governed his social conscience?
- What do Mahfouz's literary techniques suggest about his literary training and influences?
- How does Amina's situation in Palace Walk parallel Egypt's in its dependence on Great Britain?
- What psychological perspective does Mahfouz employ in The Thief and the Dogs?
- How does Mahfouz use his knowledge of civil service in his novels?

STÉPHANE MALLARMÉ

Born: Paris, France
March 18, 1842

Died: Valvins, France
September 9, 1898

Mallarmé drew on imagery employed in traditional forms by the Romantic poets to create a new, complex poetic expression moving toward free verse. His use of images that take on detailed meanings from their contexts established the genre of Symbolism as central to modern poetry.

BIOGRAPHY

Stéphane Mallarmé (ma-lahr-MAY) was born on March 18, 1842, in Paris at 12 rue Laferrière. He was the son of Numa-Florence-Joseph Mallarmé, a government administrator, and his wife, the former Elizabeth-Félicie Desmoulins. His mother died when the poet was only five years old, and Stéphane was then raised by his grandmother. He later attended the Lycée de Sens, where he began to write his first poetry.

In 1861, when the second edition of Charles Baudelaire's Les Fleurs du mal (Flowers of Evil, 1931) was published, Mallarmé came under this literary influence that would inspire much of his early composition. The following year, he also discovered the poetry of Edgar Allan Poe and published his own first poetry and prose in the small periodical Le Papillon. In 1862, Mallarmé was attracted to a young German girl, Maria Gerhard, with whom he traveled to London. When Mallarmé returned to France, he was certified to teach English in secondary schools, an employment which he pursued and which supported his poetic activity through much of his life.

On August 10, 1863, Mallarmé married Maria Gerhard. They moved to Tournon, in the Ardèche region of France, where Mallarmé began teaching English. They moved again, to Avignon in 1867 and then back to Paris in 1871. Finally, in 1875 they settled on the rue de Rome, where over the years

Mallarmé would entertain many of the leading writers of Paris. From 1880 on, he was at home there every Tuesday for literary conversations. It is quite unfortunate that detailed records of these discussions were not made, as they undoubtedly explored many issues central to the evolution of modern poetry.

Mallarmé's daughter, Geneviève, was born on November 19, 1864, and a son, Anatole, followed on October 25, 1871. Mallarmé would be deeply upset by Anatole's death just before his eighth birthday on October, 6, 1879.

Mallarmé maintained extensive friendships and correspondences with other authors and artists of his time. Having begun under the influences of Baudelaire and Poe, he was soon linked to the poets Théodore de Banville, Catulle Mendès, Auguste, comte de Villiers de l'Isle-Adam, and others. Perhaps Mallarmé could not refuse his role as a teacher. Even when he personally found difficulties in expressing himself in poetry, he remained extremely supportive of a whole generation of younger writers.

Poetry underwent a significant change in the nineteenth century. A form of expression that had been personal and emotional during the Romantic period became increasingly philosophical and concerned with the expression of abstract ideas. Mallarmé was at the center of this transformation, and his intellectual biography is increasingly dominated by his attempt to write what he called his "Great Work." Frustrated at the attempt to put transcendent ideas into words, Mallarmé went through periods when he experienced a depressing inability to write. Images of blankness and sterility haunted him as he contemplated the emptiness of the untouched, white page.

In contrast to such deeply intellectual preoccupations, however, Mallarmé was capable of considerable productivity in varied styles calculated to appeal to popular tastes. In 1874 and 1875, for example, he published a fashion magazine, La Dernière Mode, for which he wrote a good portion of the copy under a variety of pen names. These essays, intended to advise women on everyday matters, such as fashion, their children, and their homes, are perhaps as far from philosophical abstractions as writing could be. Mallarmé not only dealt with such subjects, but he projected a variety of personas to go with the various identities he assumed in order to represent women of varying social stations.

Such was the dualism of Mallarmé's life. On the one hand, he was the provident family man settled in his teaching position and dealing easily with the practicalities of life. On the other, he lived in his own intellectual world. The dissolute life of Paris that claimed many of his contemporaries had no appeal to him. He sought a different sort of intoxication in imagined departures toward his poetic vision.

Even though Mallarmé found understanding in his circle of literary friends, none of them seemed to share his complete vision of poetry. In "Prose (pour des esseintes)" (1884), a poem he addressed to the fictional hero of the novel À rebours (1884; Against the Grain, 1922), written by his friend Joris-Karl Huysmans, Mallarmé invoked a character who had retreated from human society. Mallarmé never retreated physically, but he knew that his poetry was a world apart. At his death, at Valvins, France, on September 9, 1898, he left many manuscripts, including notes on what was to have been his Great Work. His instructions to his family, however, were that they should burn it all. He must have felt that no literary executor could carry out the work he had undertaken.

The sad paradox remains that, in a sense, much of the literature in the following century evolved from Mallarmé's work. Younger poets studied what work remained and followed what they perceived to be Mallarmé's intentions.

ANALYSIS

As a central figure in Parisian literary circles for much of his life, Stéphane Mallarmé was influenced by and in turn influenced other poets. During his lifetime, poetry was evolving from the regular forms and clearly expressed emotions of Romantic verse to the fluid and often more obscure forms that would produce modern free verse and the prose poem.

The major influence on Mallarmé's early poetry was the poetry of Charles Baudelaire. The first edition of Baudelaire's collection Les Fleurs du mal (1857; Flowers of Evil, 1931) was withdrawn from circulation in 1857 because censors ruled that six of its poems were obscene. When the second, censored but greatly expanded edition appeared in 1861, Mallarmé was among the numerous poets in both France and England who were deeply impressed by Baudelaire's use of imagery.

During 1841 and 1842, Baudelaire sailed around Africa to Mauritius. While Baudelaire had originally resisted making this trip, the memories of tropical landscapes he retained from it later seemed to represent an earthly paradise contrasted with the cold and foggy climate of Paris. Contrasting groups of positive and negative images in Flowers of Evil reinforce the meaning of each image because of its role in the larger context.

Mallarmé took from Baudelaire both the pattern of repeating images to build up nuances of their meanings, and, especially in his early poetry, a good number of the images themselves. "Brise marine" (1866; "Sea Breeze") uses generalized ocean imagery to evoke a departure from Mallarmé's everyday life. He says he would like to flee to a place where birds are drunken as they fly over unknown seas. The birds draw on an image Baudelaire used repeatedly for the attempt to transcend the limits of the earth. The birds' flight represents both a rising toward heaven and the poet's flight of poetic inspiration. Drunkenness for Baudelaire also meant much more than intoxication. It could be any kind of intense engagement and often involved a kind of escapism.

The scene from which Mallarmé departs also involves concepts from Baudelaire. In the second part of "Sea Breeze," Mallarmé suffers from feelings of "ennui"—a word that means much more than boredom and which Baudelaire had identified with a monster that caused human suffering.

Mallarmé's suffering here involves images of domesticity, including his garden, his wife, and his daughter. However, another image intrudes that had not appeared in Baudelaire's work, the empty whiteness of the page. This image, entirely Mallarmé's own, represents his fear of being unable to write, to soil the white page. This fear might lead him to flee, even if his departure at the end of the poem is associated with the disaster of a shipwreck.

The ideas and expression of "Sea Breeze" are easy to understand compared with those of "Hérodiade" (1869), a poem Mallarmé began early but rewrote often, publishing only a part of it during his lifetime. The poem draws on the biblical story of Salome as told in the gospels of Matthew and Mark. In the biblical story, however, the primary action is that of Herodias, the wife of King Herod. Here the entire poem concerns her daughter's dance and the subsequent beheading of John the Baptist. The narration is not clearly spelled out but conveyed in three scenes using the dramatic voices of the dancer (here renamed Hérodiade), her nurse, and John the Baptist.

The first scene, a long monologue by the nurse, suggests through an elaborate series of nature images the drama about to unfold. The second, a dialogue between Hérodiade and her nurse as Hérodiade prepares to dance, uses many abstractions, including images of gardens, light, and feminine beauty to suggest the dual suffering of Hérodiade, who does not want to dance, and of John the Baptist, who will die. The third scene, a brief lyric ostensibly uttered by John's head as it falls from his body, conveys the tension of the moment but ends with a hint of salvation.

The new style developed in this poem relies on images to evoke emotions and on shifting sun and shadow to represent the passage of time without ever stating exactly what is going on. In such a composition, it helps to have a biblical story as background. Mallarmé can elaborate on it while relying on the readers' prior knowledge to furnish the exposition. In later poems, Mallarmé would require his readers to work out the meanings from relationships among images often used in unconventional ways and with no background story.

The sonnet "Le Vierge, le vivace et le bel aujourd'hui" (1885; "The virgin, vivacious and beautiful today . . ."), a poem with no separate title but which is referred to by its first line, incorporates all of this difficulty, along with another trait of Mallarmé's writing described as his broken syntax. For example, "today," a word often used as an adverb, is used here as a noun since it is modified by an adjective. With such substitutions, plus frequent rearrangement of normal word order, Mallarmé made his poems even more mysterious.

This sonnet continues the theme of the white page haunting Mallarmé with poetic sterility. Here a complete white-on-white image develops of a swan trapped in the ice of a frozen lake because he had failed to migrate in time to a warmer climate. The day cited in the first line is actually the rising sun of a new day that the swan hopes will melt the lake and set him free. Readers know that this hope will not be realized, however, and that the swan will remain frozen in the ice, just as the poet must continue to struggle with his inability to write.

Failure to write would not have been so bad if Mallarmé had not had a dream of a Great Work through which he desired to make a definitive poetic statement. Such a vast enterprise was doomed to fail, but one text survives that has been regarded as Mallarmé's closest attempt to write the Great Work. Un Coup de dés jamais n'abolira le hasard, 1897 (A Dice-Throw, 1958; also as Dice Thrown Never Will Annul Chance, 1965) says that throwing dice in a game of chance, an act clearly representing poetic creation, will never abolish fate. That is to say that writing one poem or casting one number can never be definitive because fate may substitute other poems or other numbers.

To write A Dice-Throw, Mallarmé moved to an even more advanced style. He scattered words and phrases in four different typefaces across ten sets of double pages composed of a verse and following recto. Seemingly random groupings of words coalesce into constellations of meaning that, at the end of the poem, point to a fixed point, an idea that transcends the text, just as the stars of the Big Dipper can locate the North Star that lies beyond it. Such innovative manipulation of text was central to the development not only of the fluid forms of much modern poetry but also to the reader-response theories of criticism that hold the reader responsible for finding meaning in an initially confusing text.

THE AFTERNOON OF A FAUN

First published: L'Après-midi d'un faune, 1876 (English translation, 1956)

Type of work: Poem

A faun awakens from what may have been a dream.

Among Stéphane Mallarmé's poems, The Afternoon of a Faun has become especially well known, probably because of the 1894 musical composition by Claude Debussy that it inspired. In interpreting the text, the reader might wish for the immediacy of music that, unlike the poem, need not be translated into a specific meaning.

The poem represents an extended monologue by a faun who awakes from a nap on a warm summer afternoon and reacts to the sight of two beautiful nymphs. Because a faun, a mythic creature traditionally portrayed as half man and half goat, is associated with strong sexual desires, the faun desires the nymphs in their traditional form as beautiful maidens. A problem occurs, however, when he is not sure whether or not they exist. They may have crossed the field just as he woke up, or they may have been creatures of his dream.

Just as the faun must sort through his perceptions to determine whether he really saw the nymphs, the reader must sort through Mallarmé's multiple images to understand what is happening. From the opening line, when the faun refers to "these nymphs," one wonders what the reference means since there has been no previous context. Then nature images, roses for the nymphs and night for the faun's doubt, build up the more detailed vision.

At the end of the poem, the faun has not regained his sight of the nymphs and thus bids them farewell. Other images referring to the faun himself, ripe fruit suggestive of his sensuality and his own heavy body succumbing again to sleep, replace the former images of female beauty. The evolution of the faun's thought is conveyed by the symbolic values of the images.

LES POÉSIES DE STÉPHANE MALLARMÉ

First published: 1887 (English translation collected in An Anthology of French Poetry from Nerval to Valéry in English Translation with French Originals, 1958)

Type of work: Poetry

This collected volume of his poetry includes Mallarmé's best-known works.

In Les Poésies de Stéphane Mallarmé, Mallarmé combined examples of his various poetic styles and documented his own intense relationship with the creative process. Throughout the collection, the poems' moments of renewed optimism collide with emblems of failure.

Early poems composed in the 1860's typify the period when Mallarmé was under the influence of Baudelaire. "Le Sonneur" ("The Bell Ringer") uses both the sonnet form and contrast of high and low objects that had appeared often in Flowers of Evil. Here the octave of the sonnet describes the situation of a child who has been sent to ring a church bell to announce the Angelus. The call to prayer rings forth in the morning air, but the child himself, inside the church, can hear it only faintly.

In the sestet, Mallarmé likens himself to the bell ringer in that he can not hear the poetry he longs to create. Unable to sound out his ideal, he desires night, emblematic of death, and considers suicide. While this sonnet expresses Mallarmé's continuing desire, the use of imagery in which the bell ringer and night are explicitly paired with the poet and death marks this as an early composition.

A similar theme and even more Baudelairian images appear in "L'Azur" ("The Azure"). Mallarmé sees the powerless poet traversing a sterile desert, mocked by an azure sky that is described in terms of flowers. Flowers, emblematic of both life in nature and poetic productivity, remain in an inaccessible, heavenly realm. By the end of the poem, however, Mallarmé incorporates a musical element that goes beyond the visually paired images. The sky itself reasserts its presence like a ringing bell that haunts the poet.

As Mallarmé's style matured he incorporated more varied and less defined allusions in his verse. Another sonnet, "Le Tombeau d'Edgar Poe" ("The Tomb of Edgar Poe"), commemorates the American poet in a style that requires the reader to interpret its meaning. When Mallarmé writes that eternity has made the poet even more himself, readers must interpret "eternity" as meaning death and be aware that Edgar Allan Poe's poetry was characterized by themes involving death.

Poe also represents the superiority and the isolation of the artist. The public appears with the classical image of the hydra, a serpent with multiple heads that may represent a crowd. The public does not understand the poet, who gives a new, superior meaning to common language.

Mallarmé seeks above all to honor poetry and the poet. In the sestet, he states that he would commemorate Poe with a monument made of the stone of a meteorite, a thing fallen to earth from heaven and thus representative of the link the poet establishes between this life and a transcendent vision.

DIVAGATIONS

First published: 1897 (English translation, 2007)

Type of work: Essays

This essay collection presents many of Mallarmé's ideas about literature.

The title of Mallarmé's Divagations might be translated as "ramblings" and serves to unite a varied series of prose pieces presenting both literary history and criticism. In bringing together a number of pieces, some of which were previously published elsewhere, Mallarmé sought to recognize the foremost poets and artists of his time.

The first to be recognized is appropriately Baudelaire. In "Autrefois, en marge d' un Baudelaire" ("Formerly, on the Margin of a Baudelaire"), Mallarmé recognized the intense poetic inspiration and use of nature imagery that had influenced his own early work. After this a series of essays, "Quelques médaillons et portraits en pied" ("A Few Medallions and Full-Length Portraits") describes the lives and work of poets and artists Mallarmé admired. The first is his good friend Auguste, comte de Villiers de l'Isle-Adam, followed by Paul Verlaine and Arthur Rimbaud. The list continues to include English-language poets Alfred, Lord Tennyson and Poe and concludes with the painters John McNeill Whistler, Édouard Manet, and Berthe Morisot.

After this literary and artistic section, Mallarmé turns to the theater with an essay on Richard Wagner. Mallarmé especially admired Wagner for combining the arts of music and theater. Next, a series of essays, "Crayonné au théâtre" ("Jottings at the Theater"), analyzes the nature of this public form of literary expression with special attention to William Shakespeare's Hamlet, Prince of Denmark (pr. 1600-1601, pb. 1603), various forms of dance, and pantomime.

Mallarmé tried constantly to define literature. In "Jottings at the Theater," he recognized differences of national styles in contrasting Wagner's work to French poetry. Still, Mallarmé sought a new absolute form of expression yet to be achieved. In "Crise de vers" ("Crisis of Verses"), he outlined the changes occurring in French poetry as new writers moved on from the influence of Victor Hugo. Next, "Quant au livre" ("As for the Book") explores the public role of literature and "Offices" ("Holy Rites") the religious nature of literature. Finally, "Grands Faits divers" ("Great News Items") gathers various influences from Mallarmé's life that had been important to his writing.

SUMMARY

Stéphane Mallarmé occupies a pivotal place in modern literature. After the Romantic movement had freed poetry from earlier traditional forms, it provided Mallarmé both with an important set of nature images and with a literary atmosphere that encouraged him to use images more innovatively. The resulting poetry explores both the free forms and the linking of subjective narratives to philosophical absolutes that would inform poetry for subsequent generations.

Dorothy M. Betz

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

L'Après-midi d'un faune, 1876 (The Afternoon of a Faun, 1956)

Les Poésies de Stéphane Mallarmé, 1887

Un Coup de dés jamais n'abolira le hasard, 1897 (A Dice-Throw, 1958; also as Dice Thrown Never Will Annul Chance, 1965)

Igitur, 1925 (English translation, 1974)

Poems by Mallarmé, 1936

Herodias, 1940

Selected Poems, 1957

Les Noces d'Hérodiade, 1959

Pour un "Tombeau d'Anatole," 1961 (A Tomb for Anatole, 1983)

Poésies, 1970 (The Poems, 1977)

Collected Poems, 1994

NONFICTION:

Petite Philologie à l'usage des classes et du monde: Les Mots anglais, 1878

Les Dieux antiques, 1880

Divagations, 1897 (Divagations: The Author's 1897 Arrangement; Together with "Autobiography" and "Music and Letters," 2007)

Correspondance, 1959-1984 (10 volumes)

Documents Mallarmé, 1968-1971 (3 volumes)

Mallarmé in Prose, 2001

Divagations: The Author's 1897 Arrangement; Together with "Autobiography" and "Music and Letters," 2007

TRANSLATION:

Les Poèmes d'Edgar Poe, 1888 (of Edgar Allan Poe)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Album de vers et de prose, 1887

Pages, 1891

Vers et prose, 1893

Œuvres complètes de Stéphane Mallarmé, 1945

Selected Prose Poems, Essays, and Letters, 1956

Mallarmé, 1965

Selected Poetry and Prose, 1982

About the Author

Cohn, Robert Greer. Mallarmé's "Divagations": A Guide and Commentary. New York: Peter Lang, 1990.

Fowlie, Wallace. Mallarmé. Chicago: University of Chicago Press/Phoenix Books, 1962.

Kinloch, David, and Gordon Millan, eds. Situating Mallarmé. French Studies of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries 10. Oxford, England: Peter Lang, 2000.

Lloyd, Rosemary. Mallarmé: "Poésies." Critical Guides to French Texts 42. London: Grant and Cutler, 1984.

_____. Mallarmé: The Poet and His Circle. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1999.

Michaud, Guy. Mallarmé. Translated by Marie Collins. New York: New York University Press, 1965.

Pearson, Roger. Unfolding Mallarmé: The Development of a Poetic Art. Oxford, England: Clarendon Press, 1996.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Stéphane Mallarmé believed that artists are detached from the rest of society. What effect does his view have on his writing?
- How does Mallarmé attach varied meanings to images? Is this rooted in shared human perceptions?
- How important is rhyme? What defines a work as a poem if Mallarmé does not use rhyme?
- If Mallarmé's text is confusing, to what extent are we justified in reading ideas into it?
- Mallarmé sought to write a "Great Work." Is it possible for a poem to express a single view that everyone will share?

OSIP MANDELSTAM

Born: Warsaw, Poland, Russia (now in Poland)

January 15, 1891

Died: Vtoraya Rechka, near Vladivostok, Soviet Union (now in Russia)

Probably December 27, 1938

Mandelstam, one of modern Russia's best poets, won respect both at home and abroad for his uncommon poetic skills.

BIOGRAPHY

Osip Emilievich Mandelstam (muhn-dyihl-SHTAHM) was born on January 15, 1891, in Warsaw, Poland (then part of the Russian empire), to a Jewish family from the province of Kurland. His father, Emil Veniaminovich Mandelstam, had been intended to be a rabbi but became a leather merchant instead. He was a highly literate merchant, reading German poets and William Shakespeare in German. His mother, Flora Osipovna Verblovskaya, was a native of Vilno (now Vilnius, Lithuania). The family was not very religious and this attitude was transferred to the young Mandelstam. The family moved to St. Petersburg when Mandelstam was very young; he would consider it his native city. He ran away to Berlin at the age of fourteen, where he studied Friedrich Schiller and the eighteenth century philosophers. After moving on to Paris, he became acquainted with the literature of the French Symbolists. His early sojourn abroad led to his vacillation between the Jewish atmosphere at home—"the Judaic chaos," as he called it—and the West European culture embodied by Charles Baudelaire and Paul Verlaine, by Catholic universalism, and by "the aristocracy of the spirit" of the Middle Ages. In addition, he fell under the influence of kindred Russian thinkers, such as Pyotr Chaadayev.

Mandelstam began to write poetry in 1908, and he published his first poems in 1910. He was immediately acclaimed for his unquestionable talent and the innovative spirit of his poetry. He soon joined a literary group called the Acmeists and quickly became one of their leaders. As a member of that group, he published his first book of poems,

Kamen (1913; Stone, 1981). When the Russian Revolution of 1917 broke out, Mandelstam was ambivalent, having been an apolitical person all his life. He gave the impression of accepting and rejecting it and in the process was arrested by both sides. He changed his domicile several times and finally settled in Petrograd (formerly St. Petersburg). His second book of poems, Tristia (1922; English translation, 1973), was published there. During the period of New Economic Policy (1921-1928), he was very active writing poetry, prose, and literary essays, while at the same time translating French, German, and English works. In his autobiography, Shum vremeni (1925; The Noise of Time, 1965), he captures the spirit of Jewish life in prerevolutionary Russia in a witty and sensitive style. Another prose work, Yegipetskaya marka (1928; The Egyptian Stamp, 1965), deals essentially with similar material. A book of critical essays, O poezii (1928; About Poetry, 1977), as well as the essay Razgovor o Dante (1967; Conversation About Dante, 1965), reveals Mandelstam as a sensitive and somewhat unorthodox literary critic. His prose is available in Sobranie sochinenii (1955, 1964-1971, 1981; Collected Works, 1967-1969).

After 1928, only a few poems and prose pieces appeared in periodicals. His last published work, Puteshestviye v Armeniyu (1933; Journey to Armenia, 1973), records his impressions of a trip to Armenia, where he tried to escape from his political detractors in Moscow. The reason for this dearth of publication after 1928 was that Mandelstam had already become a marked man. He was an anachronism in the changed atmosphere of postrevolutionary Russia and he increasingly expressed dissatisfaction with the Communist regime. To no one's surprise, he was arrested in 1934 for having written a derisive epigram about Joseph Stalin. With the help of some fellow writers, notably Boris Pasternak, he was released after he had attempted suicide, only to be confined in the central Russian city of Voronezh. He was allowed to return to Moscow after three years. In May, 1938, he was arrested again and this time he was sent to a concentration camp in Siberia. Exhausted physically and mentally, on the verge of insanity, beaten by his fellow inmates in the camp, suffering from a persecution complex suggesting that he was about to be poisoned, and scavenging his food from garbage dumps, he died a pitiful death at Vtoraya Rechka, near Vladivostok, probably on December 27, 1938. His death was unknown to the outside world until many years later.

Much about Mandelstam's difficult years in the last decade of his life is known primarily because of his wife Nadezhda Yakovlevna, who in two volumes of her memoirs recorded his heroic struggle to survive against a monstrous adversary and who also preserved most of his unpublished poetry.

ANALYSIS

When Mandelstam first appeared as a poet, he was a shy young man in awe of the great achievements of the Russian poets who had gone before him. There were the poets of the nineteenth century and those of the brief but glorious reign of the Symbolists in the last decade of the nineteenth century and the first decade of the twentieth. He did not succumb to the lure of Symbolism, however; instead he chose to join the Acmeists, a small but talented group of poets attracted to the notions of clarity of expression (as a reaction to the Hermeticism of the Symbolists) and of high craftsmanship. He quickly became one of the leaders of that group. At the same time, Mandelstam crafted his own ideas regarding poetry in his prose works and criticism. Deeply rooted in the Russian poetic tradition and magnificently versed in classical literature (hence his love for a mythical Mediterranean culture), he nevertheless developed his own poetic idiom and become one of the leading poets of all Russian literature.

Mandelstam was proud of his Jewish background, but it was not easy for Jews to establish their cultural identity in Russia. When he discovered the world of antiquity during his sojourns in Germany and France, he adopted it as part of his cultural inheritance, at the same time trying to reconcile it with the Jewish and Russian traditions of his youth. It is no surprise that his poems are suffused with Greek and Roman poetry, history, and mythology and with Christian culture. Later, when his concern with the perennial themes of beauty, death, love, and nature were obliged to give way to the political demands of the Soviet period, Mandelstam was forced to camouflage these abiding themes.

Mandelstam's early poetry is characterized by brevity of form, clarity of image and rhythm, and a certain coldness and solemnity in the treatment of themes. Although he maintained these characteristics throughout his career, as he matured his poetic acumen grew in the thematic sphere and his technical abilities expanded. References to both antiquity and the present—Homer, Ovid, the Hagia Sophia in Istanbul, Notre Dame, the churches of Moscow, the building of St. Petersburg, the music of Johann Sebastian Bach, and the works of Jean Racine and Charles Dickens, to give only a few examples—attest to his intellectual development. He used these examples not only to show cosmopolitan spirit but also to identify them with his innermost concerns and dilemmas, especially in the Soviet period.

The change of political system in Russia after the revolution was to have profound consequences not only in Mandelstam's poetry but also in his life. It is futile to conjecture what his further development would have been like had it not been for the revolution and his untimely death. The constant struggle for survival, as dramatically described in his wife's memoirs, and the constant atmosphere of fear and uncertainty led to a mood of sadness and forlornness in him. They also led to the poet's increasing withdrawal from the outside world into an inner realm to which he clung despite all the dangers and hopelessness. In one untitled poem he complains of the "wolf-century" that has set upon the people and is threatening their existence. He also defiantly says that he is not a "wolf in his blood" and that he cannot do as a wolf does. At the same time he wistfully—and with uncanny premonition—wishes to be transported to Siberia where it is peaceful and beautiful and where the silver foxes roam. The poem in a clear indication that he had become disgusted with his age and had lost his sense of purpose although not his inner self. Mandelstam's disillusionment with his age is especially evident in the poems he wrote while in exile in Voronezh.

Despite persecution and at times a denial of his existence on the part of the authorities, Mandelstam's works have survived. A long-delayed edition of his poems was published in Leningrad in 1973, long before the fall of the regime that hounded him to death. Since the fall of the Soviet Union, he is regularly published in Russia and discussed as an important writer. His metaphor of a horseshoe in "Nashedshii podkovu" ("The Horseshoe Finder") that was found after many years, polished with wool until it shone, and placed lovingly over a door, has found in the resurgence of Mandelstam's works a prophetic confirmation.

"THE AGE"

First published: "Vek," 1922 (collected in Complete Poetry of Osip Emilievich Mandelstam, 1973)

Type of work: Poem

The poem carries on an argument with its time, expressing pessimism at the beginning of a new age.

There are four stanzas of eight-syllable lines in "The Age." In line 1, the poet addresses his age directly and immediately equates it with a beast ("My age, my beast"); this central metaphor sets the tone for the entire poem. He is puzzled about his age and wonders who can fathom its true nature. He sees that the present world is being built of blood; it is gushing from the throat of the earthly things, so that only a parasite is trembling, in expectation of good things. The mood of the first stanza is bleak.

That mood continues in stanza 2. The poet maintains that every creature must carry its backbone and that every wave plays with this invisible spine. He calls the present age an infant and equates it with the tender cartilage of a baby. Life is being sacrificed. To what, the poet does not say, although at the beginning of stanza 3 he speaks of captivity. If one is to liberate himself from this captivity, one must "tie the knotty elbows/ Of days together with a flute." The flute represents poetry.

This is the force that can bring about liberation. The poet again refers to the nature of the age as one of melancholy: an adder in the grass becomes its "golden measure."

In the final stanza, the poet rejoices briefly at a possible salvation that would come when the buds would swell again and the green shoots would spurt, but he quickly reminds the reader that the backbone of the age is broken. He ruefully calls his age both beautiful and pitiful, cruel and weak, looking at the past with a senseless smile, like a beast that, once supple, looks at the tracks of its own paws. The poem ends on a resigned note, seemingly without a solution to the dilemma postulated at the beginning and explored in the middle of the poem.

"The Age" is the testimony of the poet's own encounters with the beast of the new age. Mandelstam believed in the high mission of art, and particularly of poetry, as represented by the flute. Amid the horrors of destruction and the rejection of everything that was not the accepted dogma, he still hoped that art could save humanity. The beast that was once "beautiful" and "supple"—a reference to the unfulfilled promises of the revolution—can now only look at the tracks of its own paws. "The cranium of life has been sacrificed" once again—this time with frightening finality.

"THE HORSESHOE FINDER"

First published: "Nashedshii podkova," 1923 (collected in Complete Poetry of Osip Emilievich Mandelstam, 1973)

Type of work: Poem

With an emphasis on history and art, the poet muses on the passing of an era and on the capacity of art to survive through the ages.

"The Horseshoe Finder" opens with a chorus-like description of a pine forest with numerous tall trees. The chorus looks at the forest, wondering how many ships could be built from these trees and how the ships would fare in storms. The seafarer, "in his thirst for space" and eagerness to go to sea, is also trying to figure out how a ship can be built, comparing the raggedness of the sea to the firmness of the earth.

The point of view of the chorus is maintained in stanza 2. The chorus empathizes with the planks and boards of the ship built long ago, not by the peaceful carpenter of Bethlehem but by another one, the father of wanderings and friend of seafarers, presumably Odysseus. The chorus envisages, now in retrospect, that the boards were once tall trees standing on a mountain ridge. After the introduction, the poet is ready to “tell the story,” but he is uncertain where to begin. The scene shifts to a more modern time, in which everything “cracks and rocks” and the ships are replaced by two-wheeled vehicles breaking themselves to pieces at a racetrack.

In stanza 3, the poet hails the maker of a song, not an anonymous maker but the one who put his name to his or her songs, thus assuring its long life and gaining the laurels reserved for heroes of antiquity. Stanza 5 presents the poet’s musing about the transformation of the air into water, of water into crystal, and finally of crystal into earth, tracing the process throughout history. Unexpectedly, after being concerned with the course of history and the passage of time, in stanza 6 the poet makes a statement that divides the poem in half: “The fragile reckoning of the years of our age is nearing its end.” Expressing gratitude for all that has transpired in the past, the poet, switching to the first person, complains of confusion. The poet has lost count; what was a glorious era now rings hollow. Even though the sound is still ringing, the stallion lies in the dust, unable to run anymore.

At the end, the poet is resigned to fate. The poet has nothing more to say, even though his lips still keep the shape of the last word. Yet not everything is hopeless. Someone finds a horseshoe of the stallion long gone, polishes it, and puts it over the door. Even though time and the era have cut the poet like a coin, so that “there’s not even enough of me left for me,” the final prognosis is that there will still be horseshoes and coins to be found by later generations. Thus, the metaphor of the horseshoe stands for the glory that has been lost and the value that has been recovered, making this poem, in the last analysis, one of Mandelstam’s more optimistic ones.

“TRISTIA”

First published: 1919 (collected in Complete Poetry of Osip Emilievich Mandelstam, 1973)

Type of work: Poem

In this poem of parting, Mandelstam, through his knowledge of classical antiquity, foreshadows his personal experiences of separation from his loved ones.

“Tristia,” the title poem of a book published in 1922, reflects the mood of a person leaving his home, city, and possibly, country. The four-stanza poem opens with Mandelstam’s statement that he has learned the “science of parting.” The parting is accompanied by the weeping of women after a long night’s vigil, by the rooster’s crow, and by red eyes gazing into the distance. The women’s lament mingles with the Muses’ song. Many of these details closely follow Ovid’s elegy of the same title.

In stanza 2, the parting is still accompanied by sorrow, uncertainty, and fear. The departing poet watches, like Ovid, the fire burning in the acropolis as he passes by. In the middle of the stanza, however, the poet shifts his vision somewhat and speaks of the dawn of some new light, in accordance with the rooster’s crowing, which normally heralds a new day. This clashes with the poet’s, and Ovid’s, mood of sadness at the beginning of the poem. The poet himself questions this change, using the image of an ox chewing lazily in his stall and of a rooster flapping his wings loudly on the city wall—the former expressing indifference or stoicism, and the latter the dawn of a new, vigorous day.

In stanza 3, the departing one is preoccupied with fresh memories of home, of peaceful and happy activities such as spinning at the loom, for example. He recalls a barefoot Delia—from classical mythology and from Alexander Pushkin—who flies toward him and descends upon him like swans’ down. This leads the poet to muse about the fleeting nature of joy and laughter. Life passes in anticipation and rediscovery. What has been before, will be repeated. The only real joy is to be found in the act of recognition.

The final stanza tells of a resigned poet, who leaves worry about the future to women. Men are born to fight battles, while women die telling fortunes. The poem ends on a upbeat note, in contrast to the melancholy and sorrow at the outset.

"Tristia" gives expression to Mandelstam's melancholy mixed with stoicism, to his hope mixed with despair, and to his tacit understanding of what life is about. It is one of his most representative poems. At the time he wrote this poem, Mandelstam was subjected to numerous dangers and had several close calls. The possibility of involuntary parting from his family must have occurred to him often. His excellent knowledge of classical literature enabled him to give perfect artistic expression to such thoughts and sentiments. The formal aspects of the poem, typical of Mandelstam, are striking images and metaphors, a mixture of lyrical and reflective passages, sporadic departures from the main train of thought, frequent interjections from the poet, and a unique rhythm. These features make "Tristia" a perfect example of his craft.

SUMMARY

"I have studied the science of saying good-bye/ in bareheaded laments at night," Osip Mandelstam states in one of his poems. These lines serve as a summation of his fate as a poet. The harsh realities in the last decades of his life resulted in frequent partings and unfulfilled plans and promises. That he was able to accomplish what he did is a testimonial to his enormous creative power. He left behind a body of sensitive, beautifully crafted poetry and perceptive, highly cerebral prose works, all of which are now greatly admired in his homeland and abroad.

Vasa D. Mihailovich

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

- Kamen*, 1913 (enlarged 1916, 1923; Stone, 1981)
Tristia, 1922 (English translation, 1973)
Stikhotvoreniya, 1928 (Poems, 1973)
Complete Poetry of Osip Emilievich Mandelstam, 1973
Voronezhskiye tetradi, 1980
The Voronezh Notebooks: Poems, 1935-1937, 1996

SHORT FICTION:

- Yegipetskaya marka*, 1928 (The Egyptian Stamp, 1965)

NONFICTION:

- O prirode slova*, 1922 (About the Nature of the Word, 1977)
Feodosiya, 1925 (autobiography; Theodosia, 1965)
Shum vremeni, 1925 (autobiography; The Noise of Time, 1965)
O poezii, 1928 (About Poetry, 1977)
Chetvertaia proza, wr. 1930 or 1931, pb. 1966 (Fourth Prose, 1970)
Puteshestviye v Armeniyu, 1933 (travel sketch; Journey to Armenia, 1973)
Razgovor o Dante, 1967 (Conversation About Dante, 1965)
Selected Essays, 1977
Slovo i kul'tura: Stat'i, 1987

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

Dva tramvaya, 1925

Primus, 1925

Shary, 1926

Kukhnya, 1926

MISCELLANEOUS:

Sobranie sochinenii, 1955, 1964-1971, 1981 (Collected Works, 1967-1969)

The Complete Critical Prose and Letters, 1979

About the Author

Baines, Jennifer. Mandelstam: The Later Poetry. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1976.

Brown, Clarence. Mandelstam. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1973.

_____. "The Prose of Mandelstam." In The Prose of Osip Mandelstam. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1965.

Broyde, Steven. Osip Mandelstam and His Age: A Commentary on the Themes of War and Revolution in the Poetry, 1913-1923. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1975.

Eskin, Michael. Ethics and Dialogue: In the Works of Levinas, Bakhtin, Mandelstam, and Celan. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.

Glazov-Corrigan, Elena. Mandel'shtam's Poetics: A Challenge to Post Modernism. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2000.

Mandelstam, Nadezhda. Hope Against Hope: A Memoir. Translated by Max Hayward. New York: Atheneum, 1970.

O'Brien, Kevin. Saying Yes to Lightning: Threat and the Provisional Image in Post-Romantic Poetry. New York: P. Lang, 2002.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What were the literary principles of the Acmeists, whom Osip Mandelstam joined early in his career?
- Which of Mandelstam's initiatives seems the most courageous?
- Examine the theme of war in Mandelstam's poetry.
- Discuss Mandelstam's difficulties in being true both to Russia and his Jewish heritage.
- Mandelstam believed that art could save humanity. To what extent might his poetry be called salvational?
- Contrast the attitudes of the departing poet and the women left at home in Mandelstam's "Tristia."

© The Nobel Foundation

THOMAS MANN

Born: Lübeck, Germany

June 6, 1875

Died: Zurich, Switzerland

August 12, 1955

Mann is generally regarded as the finest German prose writer of the twentieth century and the greatest German literary figure since Johann Wolfgang von Goethe.

BIOGRAPHY

Thomas Mann (mahn) was born in Lübeck, Germany, on June 6, 1875. He was the son of Johann Heinrich Mann, a wealthy businessman, and Julia da Silva-Bruhns, of Brazilian origin; the Mann family was very much like that described in the author's novel Buddenbrooks: Verfall einer Familie (1901; English translation, 1924). Thomas was not the only person in his family with literary talent. His older brother, Heinrich, was an important novelist in his own right, and for a time his works were better known than those of Thomas. Mann's father died in 1891, and the family's fortune declined rapidly afterward. Mann attended the University of Munich and was briefly an insurance agent before settling down into his career as a full-time author.

Mann's first publication was a collection of short stories, Der kleine Herr Friedemann (1898), and it met with general critical acclaim. Three years later, the novel Buddenbrooks firmly established Mann as an important author with an international reputation.

In 1905, Mann married Katja Pringsheim, the daughter of a wealthy Jewish banking family. Because of this marriage and the large sales of his books, Mann became independently wealthy. Together, Thomas and Katja Mann had six children. One of their children, Klaus, became an important author in his own right and is best known for his novel Mephisto (1936), which details events concerning his sister's unhappy marriage to the famous actor and Nazi collaborator Gustav Gründgens.

The 1920's were particularly fruitful years for Mann. In 1924, he published his novel Der Zauberberg (1924; The Magic Mountain, 1927), and five years later he received the Nobel Prize in Literature. The Mann family lived in Munich until 1933, when the Nazis came to power. Abhorring the policies of the new regime, Mann became an outspoken proponent of liberal democracy. He was publicly denounced by the new government, and by a large number of creative artists who were sympathetic to the Nazi regime, after the publication of his essay "Leiden und Grösse Richard Wagners" ("Sufferings and Greatness of Richard Wagner"). Fearing for the safety of his family, Mann immigrated first to Switzerland and then to the United States. During his years of exile, Mann continued to write prolifically. In 1944, he became a citizen of the United States, and during World War II he made radio broadcasts to Germany imploring German citizens to resist the Nazi government.

Mann wrote some of his greatest works in exile, including the tetralogy Joseph und seine Brüder (1933-1943; Joseph and His Brothers, 1948) and his masterpiece, Doktor Faustus: Das Leben des deutschen Tonsetzers Adrian Leverkühn, erzählt von einem Freunde (1947; Doctor Faustus: The Life of the German Composer Adrian Leverkühn as Told by a Friend, 1948). In 1952, he returned to Europe and settled in Switzerland. Mann died in Zurich, Switzerland, on August 12, 1955.

Mann's works have been the subject of literally thousands of scholarly articles and monographs. His novels and stories have been adapted for television, film, stage, and opera. His reputation and popularity remain supreme over those of all other German writers of the twentieth century. In his own way, Mann has come to dominate and symbolize his era as Johann Wolfgang von Goethe dominated the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries.

ANALYSIS

In a creative life as prolific and varied as Mann's, it is very difficult to enumerate one or several overall themes that permeate his literary output. One general theme is the search for spiritual meaning in one's life, which is necessarily concerned with banal details of business, family relations, and everyday activities. The dichotomy between spirit (Geist) and life (Leben) in Mann's work has an authentic ring inasmuch as Mann himself was both a member of the upper bourgeoisie and a creative artist of the highest caliber. This concern with the spiritual dimension of life led Mann to investigate the philosophical and religious thought not only of German civilization but also of the Greek, ancient Hebrew, and Oriental cultures. In his novella Der Tod in Venedig (1912; Death in Venice, 1925), Mann examined the influence of the Apollonian-Dionysian dichotomy of ancient Greece and the effect it had upon the story's protagonist, Gustav von Aschenbach. In the tetralogy of novels Joseph and his Brothers, the biblical story of Joseph and his return from the pit into which he was cast by his brothers is utilized as a metaphor for human redemption. In the novella Die vertauschten Köpfe: Eine indische Legende (1940; The Transposed Heads: A Legend of India, 1941), the Eastern concept of reincarnation and its consequences are examined in great detail.

For Mann, the internal psychological life of a character was generally at odds with the external events and situations in which the character was found. The conflict between the real life of a character and his or her ideal psychological yearnings (in German this is termed Zerrissenheit) motivated much of Mann's writing. In Buddenbrooks, for example, the mundane, bourgeois existence and its attendant business and civic duties of Thomas Buddenbrooks, the scion of a wealthy Lübeck family of merchants, are at odds with Thomas's spiritual yearnings and repressed artistic proclivities; they eventually manifest themselves in Thomas's wife (who is a brilliant violinist) and their child Hanno, who suffers a tragic death from typhoid fever at an early age.

Also of great significance in Mann's works is the idea of decadence, the feeling that past standards are being obviated in the present. This idea occurs on personal, artistic, and cultural levels. For Mann the spiritual and/or physical decadence of an individual is often analogous to the decline of individual artistic creativity or a general decadence of the culture at large. A common device utilized by Mann is to allow physical disease to symbolize spiritual degradation. This depiction is seen to greatest effect in the novel Doctor Faustus, in which the syphilis suffered by the protagonist, composer Adrian Leverkühn, serves as the symbol of his spiritual and creative decline, which in turn serves as the symbol of the decline of German civilization into the barbarities of the Nazi regime.

Mann's prose style is lofty and elegiac, a beautiful embodiment of the finest prose attainable in high German. He is given to philosophical discourse, oftentimes of a very complicated nature, which displays the tremendous influence of the German philosophers Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel and Friedrich Nietzsche. Yet simultaneously present in Mann's prose is a pervasive ironic quality, at times verging on the comic. When close scrutiny is given to the statements made by Mann's most serious characters, it is often revealed that they are contradicting themselves or coming to illogical conclusions.

Mann was also a master of descriptive detail of both the physical settings of his novels and the psychological states of his characters. He was an astute observer of human nature and manners and, in this regard, he compares most favorably with the American novelist Henry James. Mann was a man of great culture and learning, as evidenced by the range and depth of subject matter presented in his works. A common theme in his novels is the role of music in German culture, particularly the music of the German opera composer Richard Wagner.

Mann's novels are permeated by direct and paraphrased quotations from other literary works, philosophical and historical treatises, the popular press, and other sources. His novels assume on the part of their readership a general understanding of the history of Western civilization and its cultural monuments. In this regard, Mann, who carried the traditions of the nineteenth century novel into the twentieth century, was very much a modernist writer. In his own way, the myriad references to external events and sources found in his novels follow a general pattern established by such modernist literary figures as James Joyce, Ezra Pound, and T. S. Eliot. Mann's technique of putting all of these external references and literary symbols into a unified structure is referred to most commonly as the montage, a term that is derived from the montage techniques of the visual arts and the editing techniques of cinema. The montage technique is probably seen to greatest effect in Doctor Faustus. Another technique used by Mann is the leitmotif, the use of a continually recurring phrase, image, symbol, or idea throughout a literary work. The idea of the leitmotif was taken by Mann from the musical works of Wagner, whose lengthy operas were unified by the use of short, recurring melodies.

THE MAGIC MOUNTAIN

First published: Der Zauberberg, 1924
(English translation, 1927)

Type of work: Novel

On the eve of World War I, a young man visits a relative at a tuberculosis sanatorium, stays there for seven years before recovering his physical and spiritual health, and then leaves to fight in the war.

The Magic Mountain is essentially a bildungsroman, the story of the education and spiritual development of a single character. The individual in this case is Hans Castorp, a young engineer who, before assuming his position in a shipbuilding firm, decides to go to a sanatorium to visit his cousin Joachim, a soldier who is recovering from tuberculosis. At the sanatorium, a spot is detected on one of Castorp's lungs, and he decides to stay for a few weeks to take some treatments. Weeks stretch into months, and Castorp remains at the sanatorium long after Joachim has gone. In fact, Castorp stays for a total of seven years. The disease that is really afflicting Castorp, however, is a spiritual malaise. Castorp encounters a wide range of characters at the sanatorium, each of whom has an effect on him. Shortly before the end of his stay, Castorp finds himself hallucinating while hiking after a severe snowstorm. This hallucination serves as a catalyst for Castorp's decision to reenter the world, which he does by volunteering for military service in World War I. The impression is left with the reader that Castorp's reintegration into the world is ambivalent at best.

The Magic Mountain shows to great effect Mann's use of physical disease as a metaphor for spiritual malaise. At its very worst, Castorp's tuberculosis is a mild case. His decision to stay at the sanatorium is, in reality, a flight from the duties and mundanities of the world. The existence that Castorp leads at the sanatorium is one of contemplation, not unlike the existence of a monk at a monastery. Castorp's struggle is entirely of an internal nature. He is well-to-do and lives in a world of comfortable, if remote, luxury.

The internal struggle in Castorp's mind is exemplified in the dialectical relationship between Herr Settembrini and Herr Naphta, the two most intellectual patients at the sanatorium. Herr Settembrini represents reason, while Naphta symbolizes the will-to-power of the suprarational philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche. Naphta's eventual suicide, like the hallucination in the snowstorm, is a vivid jolt to the comfortable existence to which Castorp has become accustomed.

Another image that motivates the novel is the idea of a physical ascent (the action of Castorp ascending to the sanatorium on top of a mountain), symbolizing the attainment of wisdom or spiritual awareness. That Castorp's struggle to ascend the mountain of self-realization has been an internal struggle, rather than a battle with external forces, is best exemplified by Mann in the final page of the novel, likening Castorp's time at the sanatorium to a dream. As in all dreams, no one interpretation may be universally valid, and, therefore, the destiny of Hans Castorp, as he descends from the mountain to return to full participation in the world, is left open to debate.

The Magic Mountain also exemplifies the author's preoccupation with music. In this regard, the novel serves as an important link between his earlier short stories that deal with or refer to music and his later masterwork Doctor Faustus. In The Magic Mountain, however, musical performances have a redemptive quality. Toward the end of Castorp's stay at the sanatorium, a new Victrola has been added to the amenities of the establishment, and Castorp avails himself of this new device on an almost daily basis. In one memorable section of chapter 7 titled "Fullness of Harmony," Castorp listens to five musical selections: the last two scenes from Giuseppe Verdi's Aïda, Claude Debussy's Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun), the second act of Georges Bizet's Carmen, Franz Schubert's "Lindenbaum," and Valentine's aria from Charles Gounod's Faust. These five musical selections have obvious metaphorical value in the novel. Death by suffocation in Aïda has a certain morbid appropriateness in a novel whose main characters are suffering from tuberculosis. The dreamlike quality of Debussy's Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun approximates the dreamlike existence of Castorp and his fellow patients, who must of necessity emphasize their mental, rather than physical, existence. Carmen represents the dangers of passion, dangers that constantly threaten the sanatorium's inhabitants. The Schubert song (from the composer's song cycle Winterreise (winter journey) evokes the memory of Castorp's own "winter's journey" and its resulting hallucinations. Valentine's aria represents the acceptance of duty and death and is, in many ways, a foreboding of death.

These five musical selections, therefore, operate collectively as a summation of the novel's main thematic ideas. Yet the selection from Gounod's Faust functions not only as part of a recapitulation but also as a foretelling of future events. Valentine's dedication to duty, even in the face of death, is a metaphor for the premature departure from the sanatorium by Castorp's soldier-cousin Joachim. Likewise, Valentine's aria presages Castorp's departure from the sanatorium and his joining the military at the outbreak of World War I. Valentine's aria is also played on the Victrola later during the séance, in which the spirit of the now-dead "Joachim" appears. This episode demonstrates the perfection of Mann's literary technique. The leit-motif, montage, and frequent use of extended metaphors combine in such a way as to bring about an unprecedented complexity of meaning to the novel.

DOCTOR FAUSTUS

First published: Doktor Faustus, 1947
(English translation, 1948)

Type of work: Novel

A German avant-garde composer, whose personal life parallels the events of German society up to the end of World War II, creates influential musical compositions, contracts syphilis, and eventually dies of the disease.

Doctor Faustus is arguably one of the most significant novels of the twentieth century in any language. Acclaimed as a masterpiece at the time of its original publication, Doctor Faustus has been the subject of hundreds of scholarly articles and books.

The story centers on the life and career of Adrian Leverkühn, a preternaturally gifted man who is born into the Germany of the Second Reich in the generation following the Franco-Prussian War (1870-1871). The novel follows Leverkühn's life and career until his death in 1943. Leverkühn is born into a provincial middle-class farming family. His parents are conventional, but his father does harbor some eccentric scientific interests. During his childhood, Leverkühn becomes lifelong best friends with Serenus Zeitblom, who serves as the novel's putative narrator. Originally attracted to both mathematics and music, Leverkühn goes to college to study theology, a course of study that he eventually abandons in favor of music. Leverkühn's prowess as a composer advances rapidly, but it is not until after he contracts syphilis from a prostitute (his only sexual experience) that his music becomes totally original and groundbreaking. As the syphilis proceeds to destroy Leverkühn's physical and mental states, his creativity as a composer increases. After having achieved the first fruits of international success, Leverkühn suffers a complete nervous and mental breakdown and spends the last ten years of his life as an invalid.

The most significant aspect of the novel is the author's use of the Faust legend, the age-old story of a man who sells his soul to the Devil in exchange for wealth, power, and sexual prowess. Although the only situation in the novel overtly similar to the traditional Faust story is the imaginary dialogue between Leverkühn and the Devil, which occurs in chapter 25, the Faust legend is a very powerful presence in Mann's novel. Central to the Faust legend is the contract, the quid pro quo, between the Devil and Faust. The Faustian contract for Leverkühn involves his contracting syphilis from a prostitute. At the price of the loss of his physical and mental health, the syphilis unleashes untold powers of creativity within Leverkühn. The syphilis from which he suffers is, in turn, a symbol of the "disease" of extreme nationalism and ethnic chauvinism that eventually led the Germans to embrace Adolf Hitler and the Nazis. In both cases—Leverkühn's contraction of syphilis and the coming to power of Hitler—Mann makes it clear that the parties involved have entered into their "agreements" by their own volition, just as the original Dr. Faust entered into his demoniac pact of his own free will. Significantly, Leverkühn's final composition of his creative career is a cantata titled "The Lamentations of Dr. Faustus."

As in The Magic Mountain, Mann uses physical disease as a symbol for spiritual and cultural decline. In the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, syphilis was an incurable disease with a mortality rate approaching one hundred percent. Its symptoms could be mitigated and temporarily halted, but the disease was inevitable in its effects until the discovery of penicillin. Therefore, the selection of syphilis as a symptom of spiritual and cultural decline was significant because the disease was irreversible. Mann uses syphilis symbolically to suggest the inevitability of the decline of German civilization.

Mann uses Leverkühn's life to parallel events occurring simultaneously in German politics and society. Leverkühn's lifetime roughly approximates that of Hitler, the implication of which is that the same historical forces that brought the Nazis to the fore had a similar effect on Leverkühn's art. Leverkühn's final physical and mental collapse occurs in 1933, the year in which the Nazis came to power in Germany. Leverkühn dies in 1943, a year in which the war in Europe turned decidedly against the Axis Powers, leading to their eventual defeat.

The selection of a composer as the symbol of Germany's moral and cultural decline is significant in that music is generally regarded as the most German of the arts. One composer, Richard Wagner, held a particular fascination for both Mann and Hitler. Wagner's operas based on Teutonic myths were a great enthusiasm of Hitler's, as were Wagner's anti-Semitic racial views, as expressed in the composer's book-length diatribe, Das Judentum in der Musik (1869; Jewry in music). Mann had an ambivalent attitude toward Wagner; he greatly admired the composer's music but was repelled by the man himself. It was Mann's essay "The Sufferings and Greatness of Richard Wagner" that led to Mann's public denunciation and eventual exile to America. In a real sense, then, music and politics were intricately related in the nightmare of events occurring in Nazi Germany.

Adrian Leverkühn's daimon, the catalyst whose function it is to see that the protagonist's fate is fulfilled, appears in many guises, but perhaps never more significantly than in the being of Wendell Kretzschmar, the American expatriate music master and Leverkühn's only real teacher of composition. Kretzschmar's significance as a daimon extends not only to Leverkühn's choice of a career as a composer—it is Kretzschmar who ultimately supplies Leverkühn with the justification to abandon theological studies and return to music—but also to the course that Leverkühn's musical career will follow.

Leverkühn's years of theological study at the University of Halle cause him to be influenced by several versions of his daimon. Professor Kolonat Nonnenmacher instructs Leverkühn in Pythagorean philosophy and reinforces Leverkühn's long-held fascination with an ordered cosmos, particularly one susceptible to mathematical reduction. Nonnenmacher's lectures also deal with Aristotelian philosophy and stress the philosopher's views on the inherent drive to the fulfillment of organic forms—in other words, the urge toward the unfolding of destiny. These lectures have a profound impact on Leverkühn, who comes to the realization that his personal destiny is not necessarily of his own making.

Leverkühn's daimon finds a different and more subtle version in the form of Ehrenfried Kumpf, Mann's caricature of Martin Luther. Kumpf's theology rejects humanism and reason and embraces a rather lusty appreciation of life, including its sensual pleasures, of which music is but one facet. Although Kumpf is a minor figure in the novel, his influence is long-lasting on Leverkühn, who adopts the former's archaic German phraseology and syntax and who eventually abandons the rationality and "coldness" of theology for the "warmth" of music.

Of all Leverkühn's professors at Halle, none leaves a more permanent impression and is more overtly a manifestation of Leverkühn's daimon than Eberhard Schleppfuss, the mysterious theologian whose very difficult lectures combine the tenets of Christianity with a blatant Manichaeism. Schleppfuss views evil as a necessary concomitant to good and posits a sinister interpretation of the nature of creativity.

Leverkühn's involvement with music is made permanent, however, only after the liaison with the prostitute Esmeralda, which, interestingly enough, occurs after Leverkühn has witnessed the Austrian premiere of Richard Strauss's opera Salome (based on Oscar Wilde's visionary Decadent drama). This liaison is a curious phenomenon in that neither lust nor intellectual curiosity appears to be its root cause. In many ways, Leverkühn is as irresistibly drawn to the prostitute Esmeralda as the symbolic butterfly hetaera esmeralda of chapter 2 is susceptible to visual or olfactory stimuli. There is a certain inevitability in both cases in which moral laws and the individual will are transcended by reflex actions firmly based in the instinctive domain. Additionally, Leverkühn's brief sexual encounter permits the appearance in rapid succession of two other manifestations of his daimon, namely Dr. Erasmi and Dr. Zimbalist, both of whom are thwarted from treating Leverkühn's syphilis in its incipient stage.

Leverkühn's fall is akin to the fall of Adam; both are terrible yet necessary for the evolution of the human condition. One can no more imagine a Christian view of history without Adam's transgression than a continuation of musical evolution beyond Wagner without the imposition of a seminal figure such as Leverkühn. The connection between Leverkühn and Adam is further strengthened by the fact that one of Leverkühn's first mature works is a setting of William Blake's poem "A Poison Tree," with its references to the poisoned fruit and the serpent who despoils an altar. In the end, however, as Mann always makes clear in his writings, untempered creativity ultimately consumes its creator. All knowledge, all fruits of artistic genius carry with them a terrible price in the imaginary world of Mann's fiction.

TONIO KRÖGER

First published: 1903 (English translation, 1914)

Type of work: Novella

A young German author experiences and comes to terms with the difference between his artistic temperament and the healthy, yet sterile, bourgeois society.

Tonio Kröger is one of Mann's best stories and was the author's favorite work, understandable inasmuch as many of the details of the story are autobiographical in nature. The protagonist is the scion of a very respectable upper-middle-class family. The father is a north German patrician, while the mother, Consuelo, is of southern European origin. This dichotomy is apparent not only in the unusual combination of names of the protagonist but also in the inability of Tonio to resolve the conflict between his artistic nature and the expectations of bourgeois society.

The quintessence of the bourgeois world is symbolized by Hans Hansen, Tonio's best friend, and Ingeborg Holm, the object of Tonio's unrequited love. Hans excels at everything that is expected of the son of a respectable family—school, sports, social activities—while Tonio's accomplishments, other than those pertaining to his artistic ambitions, are lackluster and indifferent.

Tonio's father dies, his mother marries an Italian musician, and Tonio leaves his northern German hometown to live in the south. While he is in southern Europe, his health declines, but his artistry increases. His first publications meet with critical and popular acclaim, and for the first time in his life he experiences the success that had so eluded him in the past.

Some time later, Tonio is living in Munich and runs into his friend, the painter Lisaveta Ivanovna. After a lengthy and heated discussion, Lisaveta declares Tonio to be a failed bourgeois. At the end of the summer, Tonio decides to take a vacation in north Germany and Denmark, in essence retracing his bourgeois youth. He arrives at his resort in Denmark and has a pleasant, uneventful stay, until one day near the end of his sojourn. Hans and Ingeborg appear at the resort to attend a dance. The couple do not recognize Tonio, but he recognizes them. While he is watching the couple dancing, Tonio reminisces about the dancing lessons that the three of them took when they were little. His confidence and spirit restored, Tonio writes to Lisaveta and says that in the future his writing will be concerned with his love of the ordinary, uncomplicated lives of his north German compatriots, who were really the inspiration for his art in the first place.

Once again, one sees the stress that Mann places on the idea of a dichotomy existing between the “healthy” bourgeois world and the “diseased” world of the artist. This dichotomy also has a geographical dimension for Mann: Northern Europe is “healthy,” safely bourgeois, and stable; southern Europe, however, is mysterious and “diseased,” but it is also the source of artistic creativity.

One important literary device utilized by Mann in Tonio Kröger is the leitmotif. For example, whenever Tonio’s mother is mentioned, she is described with the same phrase: “who played the piano and the mandolin so enchantingly.” Tonio Kröger is an extremely important work in Mann’s literary output in that he developed many of the techniques and themes that he would perfect in his later major novels.

DEATH IN VENICE

First published: Der Tod in Venedig, 1912
(English translation, 1925)

Type of work: Novella

A famous writer suffers from an emotional crisis while on vacation in Venice, becomes infatuated with a young boy, and dies of cholera.

Death in Venice is one of the greatest novellas of the twentieth century and has been adapted for film (1971, directed by Luchino Visconti) and opera (1973, with music by Benjamin Britten and libretto by Myfanwy Piper). In this story, Mann further develops many of the ideas that he had so successfully explored in Tonio Kröger.

The story is centered on Gustav von Aschenbach, a famous writer who has come to Venice for a vacation. Aschenbach is suffering from fatigue and world-weariness, the result of intense literary efforts and an incipient emotional crisis. When Aschenbach arrives at his hotel in Venice, he notices a Polish family that is also on vacation, in particular, a young boy named Tadzio. Aschenbach’s serenity is disrupted by his emotional response to the boy’s youthful beauty and athletic grace. Wherever Aschenbach goes, he manages to run into Tadzio and his family. He begins to think of the boy as a character from Greek mythology. Rather than admit his ambivalent feelings toward Tadzio, Aschenbach makes plans to leave Venice, partly because the city is beginning to suffer from a deadly cholera epidemic that is being covered up by civil authorities worried about the loss of tourist revenues. When Aschenbach arrives at the railway station to leave, he discovers that his luggage has been sent ahead to the wrong destination. Aschenbach goes back to his hotel and once again follows Tadzio and his family around various Venetian locations. Disquieting dreams plague Aschenbach, who imagines that Tadzio is a participant in Dionysian revels. One day, after most of the guests have departed the hotel, Aschenbach goes to the beach, where he sees Tadzio and his family. Feeling weaker and weaker, Aschenbach dies of cholera.

Death in Venice brings to the fore the major themes that were to dominate Mann’s later writings, particularly the tension involved in the mind’s struggle between self-control and reckless, emotional irrationality. Aschenbach is the paradigm of the objective thinker, a man whose mental processes are under such fine control that he appears to be lacking any true emotion or sentiment.

tality. The floodgates of emotion are released in Aschenbach only after he views Tadzio. Yet Aschenbach's turmoil is entirely internal in nature; Tadzio is the catalyst by which the strings of mental self-control within Aschenbach's mind are released. Aschenbach, in fact, never speaks to Tadzio, and it is suggested that Tadzio and his family are completely unaware of Aschenbach's presence.

The internal emotional struggle Aschenbach is undergoing is represented by Mann in classical terms. Mann uses the ancient Greek gods Apollo (god of reason, knowledge, and the arts) and Dionysus (god of sensuality, drunkenness, and boundless creativity) to represent the dichotomy between reason and irrationality. The Apollonian side of Aschenbach is present during his waking hours, when he can use his finely developed powers of self-control to subdue his attraction for Tadzio; while he is asleep, however, the Dionysian aspect of Aschenbach's psyche is released, and his imagination runs rampant with emotional speculation about Tadzio.

Another classical aspect of the story is the seeming inevitability of its outcome, an end that is rooted in the protagonist's destiny, much like the role that destiny and fate played in the classical dramas of ancient Greece. Wherever Aschenbach goes, he runs into Tadzio; when Aschenbach tries to leave Venice, his luggage is accidentally shipped to the wrong destination. It is unclear whether Aschenbach is being controlled by forces beyond his control or whether he is subconsciously creating these "accidents" so as to prevent his leaving Tadzio. In the end, however, the side of Aschenbach's psyche that served him so well in his career as a successful author (Apollonian self-control, health, northern geographical location, and bourgeois normality) succumbs to the mysterious inner workings of the id (Dionysian abandon, disease, southern geographical location, repressed homosexuality).

SUMMARY

Thomas Mann's prose works exemplify the problems faced by humankind in the twentieth century: the loss of community, the decline of personal and cultural standards, and the reaction of the individual to both totalitarian governments and conventional society. Although Mann's prose style stemmed from the traditions of the nineteenth century, it embraced the innovations of the modernists. His works also display the influence of the other arts, in particular, music, which served not only as a source of thematic material but also as a repository of formal procedures, such as the leit-motif. Mann's works are extraordinarily complex and densely filled with metaphors and other types of allusions; however, they remain popular and accessible to readers at large.

William E. Grim

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- Buddenbrooks: Verfall einer Familie*, 1901 (English translation, 1924)
Tristan, 1903 (novella; English translation, 1925)
Tonio Kröger, 1903 (novella; English translation, 1914)
Königliche Hoheit, 1909 (Royal Highness, 1916)
Der Tod in Venedig, 1912 (novella; Death in Venice, 1925)
Herr und Hund, 1919 (novella; Bashan and I, 1923; also known as A Man and His Dog, 1930)
Der Zauberberg, 1924 (The Magic Mountain, 1927)
Unordnung und frühes Leid, 1926 (novella; Disorder and Early Sorrow, 1929)
Mario und der Zauberer, 1930 (novella; Mario and the Magician, 1930)
Joseph und seine Brüder, 1933-1943 (Joseph and His Brothers, 1934-1944; 1948); includes Die Geschichten Jaakobs, 1933 (Joseph and His Brothers, 1934; also as The Tales of Jacob, 1934); Der junge Joseph, 1934 (The Young Joseph, 1935); Joseph in Ägypten, 1936 (Joseph in Egypt, 1938); and Joseph, der Ernährer, 1943 (Joseph the Provider, 1944)
Lotte in Weimar, 1939 (The Beloved Returns, 1940)

Die vertauschten Köpfe: Eine indische Legende, 1940
(novella; The Transposed Heads: A Legend of India, 1941)

Doktor Faustus: Das Leben des deutschen Tonsetzers Adrian Leverkühn, erzählt von einem Freunde, 1947
(Doctor Faustus: The Life of the German Composer Adrian Leverkühn as Told by a Friend, 1948)

Der Erwählte, 1951 (The Holy Sinner, 1951)

Die Betrogene, 1953 (novella; The Black Swan, 1954)

Bekenntnisse des Hochstaplers Felix Krull: Der Memoiren erster Teil, 1954 (Confessions of Felix Krull, Confidence Man: The Early Years, 1955)

SHORT FICTION:

Der kleine Herr Friedemann, 1898

Tristan, 1903

Das Wunderkind, 1914

Erzählung, 1922

Children and Fools, 1928

Stories of Three Decades, 1936

Ausgewählte Erzählungen, 1945

Death in Venice, and Seven Other Stories, 1954

Stories of a Lifetime, 1961

Collected Stories, 2001

POETRY:

“Gesang vom Kindchen,” 1919

DRAMA:

Fiorenza, pb. 1906

NONFICTION:

“Friedrich und die grosse Koalition,” 1915 (“Frederick and the Great Coalition,” 1929)

Betrachtungen eines Unpolitischen, 1918 (Reflections of a Nonpolitical Man, 1983)

Rede und Antwort, 1922

Bemühungen, 1925

Lebensabriss, 1930 (A Sketch of My Life, 1960)

Die Forderung des Tages, 1930

Three Essays, 1932

Past Masters and Other Papers, 1933

Leiden und Grösse der Meister, 1935

Freud, Goethe, Wagner, 1937

Vom künftigen Sieg der Demokratie, 1938 (The Coming of Victory of Democracy, 1938)

Dieser Friede, 1938 (This Peace, 1938)

Achtung, Europa!, 1938

Order of the Day: Political Essays and Speeches of Two Decades, 1942

Deutsche Hörer!, 1942 (Listen, Germany!, 1943)

Adel des Geistes: Sechzehn Versuche zum Problem der Humanität, 1945 (Essays of Three Decades, 1947)

Neue Studien, 1948

Die Entstehung des “Doktor Faustus”: Roman eines Romans, 1949 (The Story of a Novel: The Genesis of “Doctor Faustus,” 1961)

Altes und Neues: Kleine Prosa aus fünf Jahrzehnten, 1953

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Consider the relationship between physical and spiritual health in the fiction of Thomas Mann.
- What problems did Mann face in his admiration for Richard Wagner, who in certain ways also appealed to the Nazis?
- Contrast northern and southern German culture as seen in Mann’s works.
- Does today’s greater knowledge about homosexuality enhance the modern reader’s appreciation of Death in Venice?
- Examine the concept of German patriotism in Mann’s fiction.
- How does a literary leitmotif differ from a musical one?
- What were Mann’s chief literary successes while living in the United States?

Versuch über Schiller, 1955
Nachlese: Prosa, 1951-1955, 1956
Last Essays, 1958
Briefe, 1961-1965 (3 volumes; partial translation Letters of Thomas Mann, 1889-1955, 1970)
Wagner und unsere Zeit, 1963 (Pro and Contra Wagner, 1985)
Addresses Delivered at the Library of Congress, 1963
Reden und Aufsätze, 1965 (2 volumes)
Essays, 1977-1978 (3 volumes)
Tagebücher, 1977-1986 (6 volumes; partial translation Diaries 1918-1939, 1982)
Goethes Laufbahn als Schriftsteller: Zwölf Essays und Reden zu Goethe, 1982
Frage und Antwort: Interviews mit Thomas Mann 1909-1955, 1983
Thomas Mann's "Goethe and Tolstoy": Notes and Sources, 1984

MISCELLANEOUS:

Gesammelte Werke, 1956 (12 volumes; includes critical writings in volumes 10-11)
Gesammelte Werke, 1960-1974 (13 volumes; includes critical writings in volumes 9-11)
Werkausgabe, 1980-1986 (20 volumes; includes 3 volumes of critical writings)

About the Author

Bergsten, Gunilla. Thomas Mann's "Doctor Faustus": The Sources and Structure of the Novel. Translated by Krishna Winston. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1969.
Bloom, Harold, ed. Thomas Mann. New York: Chelsea House, 1986.
Carnegy, Patrick. Faust as Musician: A Study of Thomas Mann's Novel "Doctor Faustus." London: Chatto & Windus, 1973.
Clark, Mark W. "The Insider as Outsider: Thomas Mann." In Beyond Catastrophe: German Intellectuals and Cultural Renewal After World War II, 1945-1955. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books, 2006.
Ezergailis, Inta M., comp. Critical Essays on Thomas Mann. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1988.
Hatfield, Henry. Thomas Mann. Rev. ed. New York: New Directions, 1962.
Hollingdale, R. J. Thomas Mann: A Critical Study. Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press, 1971.
Lehnert, Herbert, and Eva Wessell, eds. A Companion to the Works of Thomas Mann. Rochester, N.Y.: Camden House, 2004.
Mundt, Hannelore. Understanding Thomas Mann. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2004.
Reed, T. J. Thomas Mann: The Uses of Tradition. Oxford, England: Clarendon Press, 1974.
Shookman, Ellis. Thomas Mann's "Death in Venice": A Novella and Its Critics. Rochester, N.Y.: Camden House, 2003.
Wolf, Ernest M. Magnum Opus: Studies in the Narrative Fiction of Thomas Mann. New York: Peter Lang, 1989.

Hulton Archive/Getty Images

KATHERINE MANSFIELD

Born: Wellington, New Zealand

October 14, 1888

Died: Fontainebleau, France

January 9, 1923

Mansfield broke conventions and chiefly used precise images and pointed dialogue to reveal her characters' shifting emotional states.

BIOGRAPHY

Katherine Mansfield was born Kathleen Mansfield Beauchamp in Wellington, New Zealand, on October 14, 1888. During her life she used many names: her family called her “Kass,” and she took “Katherine Mansfield” as her name in 1910. Her father, Harold Beauchamp, was a businessman who rose to become chairman of the Bank of New Zealand. He was knighted in 1923.

In 1903, the Beauchamps sailed for London, where Kass enrolled at Queen’s College, a school for young women. She remained at Queen’s until 1906, reading authors such as the Irish novelist and playwright Oscar Wilde and the Norwegian dramatist Henrik Ibsen. She played the cello and published several stories in the college magazine. After her parents insisted that she come back to Wellington in 1906, she published her first stories in a newspaper. In 1908, when she was nineteen, she left New Zealand for London, never to return.

Her next decade was characterized by personal problems and artistic growth. She was sexually attracted both to women and to men. At Queen’s College, she met Ida Baker, who would become her friend and lifelong companion. After she returned to London, she fell in love with a violinist named Garnet Trowell, whom she had met in New Zealand. Then on March 2, 1909, she abruptly married a man she hardly knew, George C. Bowden, and just as abruptly left him. At her mother’s insistence, she traveled to Germany, where she suffered a miscarriage. The Bowdens were not divorced until April, 1918.

In Germany she met the Polish translator Floryan Sobieniowski. In the opinion of her biographer Claire Tomalin, it was his fault that she became infected with venereal disease. Mansfield would suffer from many medical problems for the rest of her short life: rheumatic symptoms, pleurisy, and eventually tuberculosis. Most of them probably were the result of this infection. Back in London, Mansfield met the editor and literary critic John Middleton Murry. They were married on May 3, 1918. Their relationship was stormy, but it endured until her death. After Mansfield died, Murry edited her stories, letters, and journals. Meanwhile, World War I had begun. Her brother, a soldier with the British army, was killed in France. His death and her own worsening health may have strongly influenced her stories.

Mansfield and Murry knew many famous writers and artists, particularly those who gathered at Garsington, the country estate of the famous hostess Lady Ottoline Morrell. There Mansfield met the biographer Lytton Strachey, the novelist Aldous Huxley, the economist John Maynard Keynes, and the American poet T. S. Eliot. She and the novelist and feminist Virginia Woolf had an off-and-on friendship and professional association. Mansfield had a serious relationship with the mathematician, pacifist, and philosopher Bertrand Russell. The Murrys’ closest friendship was with novelist D. H.

Lawrence and his wife, Frieda; the character Gudrun in Lawrence's Women in Love (1920) is said to be based on Mansfield. Both Woolf and Lawrence were influenced in their writings by Mansfield; both made negative remarks about her before her death.

When she was in Germany, she read stories by the Russian author Anton Chekhov. His influence has been seen in some of the bitter stories with German settings she collected in her first book, In a German Pension (1911). For the next seven years, Mansfield experimented with many styles and published stories in journals such as New Age, Rhythm, and The Blue Review. Her first truly great story, "Prelude," was published as a booklet in July, 1918, by Virginia and Leonard Woolf's Hogarth Press.

Mansfield's health continued to deteriorate. From the time she learned she had tuberculosis, in 1917, she spent most of each year outside England. Accompanied by Murry or Baker, she traveled to France, Switzerland, and Italy, trying to fight off her disease. In 1922, her search led her to a rest home near Paris. She seems to have been moderately happy there until her death on January 9, 1923, in Fontainebleau, France.

During her last five years, Mansfield wrote most of the stories for which she is best remembered. They were usually published in journals such as Athenaeum, Arts and Letters, London Mercury, and Sphere. Many were then compiled in Bliss, and Other Stories (1920) and The Garden Party, and Other Stories (1922). She also wrote poems, literary criticism, fragments of plays, and the beginning of a novel.

ANALYSIS

Mansfield once described in a letter two of the things that compelled her to write. One is the "joy" she felt when, in "some perfectly blissful way," she is "at peace." At that time, she said, "something delicate and lovely seems to open before my eyes, like a flower without thought of a frost." Everywhere in her work she communicates the exhilarating delicacy of the world's beauty: "A heavy dew had fallen. The grass was blue. Big drops hung on the bushes and just did not fall."

Her second motive is almost the opposite: "Not hate or destruction . . . but an extremely deep sense of hopelessness, of everything doomed to disaster, almost willfully, stupidly." She summed up this second motive as "a cry against corruption . . . in the widest sense of the word." Her story "Je ne parle pas Français" is such a cry. The central character is an amiable young Frenchman who seems to be a sympathetic friend to a young Englishman and his intended bride. The friend, however, reveals himself as a depraved, heartless hustler. More frightening is the central character of "The Fly." He is a businessman who grieves when he thinks about his son who was killed in World War I. He appears to be an unpleasant man when he treats an old employee badly, but readers do not understand the full horror of the story until he sadistically tortures and kills a fly that has landed in his ink pot.

Not all of the hopelessness expressed in Mansfield's stories is so rooted in corruption. Mansfield continually shows the yearnings, complexities, and misunderstandings of love; men and women spar at cross-purposes. Sometimes they fail to love because they are timid. Sometimes one person rejects another because he or she simply has more important goals to pursue. Sometimes the rejected person is sick or old. In one story, appropriately titled "Psychology," two artists, a male and a female, are so painfully conscious of the ebb and flow of their relationship that it eventually fails. Finally, in some stories, individual yearnings are complicated by sexual confusions with homoerotic overtones.

Society, according to Mansfield, is corrupt and destructive. She is brilliant when she renders the vapid conversation of fashionable, artistic figures. They prattle on about the latest fashions or recite silly poems, while ignoring the drama of real feelings that is going on around them and destroying the lives of people better than they. She is equally brilliant in portraying the banalities of more common people. Even when her characters mean well, many of them cannot say anything that makes a difference.

Not all corruption involves blame. Mansfield's work expresses the idea that life itself seems corrupt when one realizes how many people are failures. Failure is most vividly apparent in the life of a lonely person, often a woman, playing a guitar with no one to hear, looking out a hotel window, writing a letter, noticing the happiness of lovers or reflecting on what has gone wrong with her own relationships. Often in Mansfield's stories, the reader senses the ultimate in corruption: the ceaseless erosions of time and forgetfulness. The natural world itself is not always consoling. Its beauty is sometimes frightening and ominous. Its power, especially the power of the sea, can be indifferent.

Mansfield's style is economical; she has edited her prose so that there is seldom an unnecessary or insignificant word. Yet although she is noted for her precise descriptions, her exact meanings are not always easily understood. Her tone is complex; she mixes witty satire with shattering emotional reversals. Moreover, because she uses dialogue and indirect speech extensively and does not often seem to speak directly in her own voice, the reader is not always sure what to believe.

The action of her stories does not surge powerfully forward. People talk and think; they do not ride horses or shoot rifles. Their lives do not move toward climaxes that reveal something definite. Often her stories are designed, by means of quick changes in time and by surprise turns, to lead the reader to epiphanies, unexpected moments of illumination. It is vital for readers to understand that Mansfield does not conceal a hidden "message" in her stories. If a story appears to point in many directions, not all of which are logically consistent, that is the way Mansfield feels the whole truth is most honestly communicated. In this she resembles Chekhov.

Mansfield's descriptive passages repay careful attention, for they are always significant. Her descriptions are always more than a mere record of what New Zealand or England was like. For example, in the short story "At the Bay" a young girl visits an empty house and finds, among other things, only "a lump of gritty yellow soap in one corner of the kitchen window sill." That is not a very pretty picture. It suggests that the girl is unhappy to leave her home because it has been reduced to such ugly things. Mansfield has provided details that a girl would notice and that suggest what the girl is feeling. In this technique, she is among the innovators of her day. During the years she was writing, new poets such as T. S. Eliot tried to provide not statements about emotions but concrete details that would evoke a desired emotional response in the reader—a literary device called an objective correlative. Similarly, Mansfield does not usually state what her characters feel. She presents details that will make the reader feel what they feel.

Sometimes, however, at very important moments, Mansfield's details become even more suggestive or symbolic. The sea is used to suggest the power of time. A girl's party hat in a room with a corpse suggests frivolity. Often, Mansfield builds trees into symbols. Both the pear tree in "Bliss" and the aloe tree in "Prelude" must be considered both as natural details and as symbols. What they symbolize is not simply an arbitrary idea, such as hope or death. Each tree is different, and what it symbolizes can be understood only as each story is read.

As noted above, Mansfield's finest stories are also characterized by epiphanies. That term, popularized by the Irish novelist James Joyce, refers to a sudden revelation triggered by an ordinary experience. In Mansfield's stories, epiphanies happen to characters, but readers can also experience epiphanies when they are led to an unexpected moment, as when they realize that a silent, wretched little girl has remembered not how a snobbish woman has hurt her, but that she has seen a marvelous tiny lamp in a doll's house.

"MISS BRILL"

First published: 1920 (collected in The Garden Party, and Other Stories, 1922)

Type of work: Short story

The happiness of a middle-aged woman sitting in a park is shattered by a young couple's unfeeling remarks.

"Miss Brill" brings to life one of Mansfield's many lonely women, and the reader lives through this story in the main character's mind without the author's making any obvious comment. As the story opens, it is a Sunday afternoon in the autumn; a chill is in the air. In her room, Miss Brill, a lonely English teacher, prepares to go as usual to the Public Gardens in what appears to be a French city. She happily unpacks the fur she will wear for the first time this season, a piece that includes the head of a small animal, perhaps a fox. Miss Brill strikes the reader as imaginative, for she pretends she hears what the dead animal is thinking after being in storage for many months. She then feels a tinge of sadness. In her introductory paragraph, Mansfield's details evoke the fragility of Miss Brill's happiness.

At the Gardens, Miss Brill listens to the band play and watches the people. It is her idea of bliss.

Though she yearns to talk to them, she must be content to listen. An old couple disappoints her, for they are silent; last week she heard a memorable conversation about eyeglasses—memorable to her, but trivial to the reader. Then Miss Brill takes her first step away from the superficiality of the afternoon. She reflects that most of the people she sees at the Gardens are old and strange. She hopes for their happiness.

In a surprise ending typical of the author, Mansfield then includes two very short paragraphs. The first points beyond the gardens to the sky and sea, as if to suggest that there is a wider world than what the reader has experienced so far. The second brings the reader back to the banality of the park, as it reproduces the sound of the band.

Miss Brill's experience deepens. She does not simply listen; she imagines what the people she sees are saying. Mansfield employs dramatic irony when she hints that the woman who Miss Brill thinks is innocently chatting is actually a prostitute. Then Miss Brill stumbles on a kind of truth: They are all acting in a play. She (Miss Brill) is in the play too, with a role that she plays every week. Miss Brill has turned her understanding of how drama underlies public events into a consolation for her state. Even so, she knows all people are not happy. She has a vision of them all singing together.

Mansfield has artfully brought the reader to sympathize with Miss Brill as her love flows out to all she sees. Then comes a shock. A young couple, rich and in love, sit down on the end of her bench. They wonder aloud why she is sitting there, wonder who would possibly want her company, and compare her prized fur to a fried fish.

The reader has lived through the story within Miss Brill's mind. Now Mansfield backs away and asks the reader to imagine what this shock is like. Miss Brill silently goes back to her lonely room. She says nothing. When she puts her prized fur piece away in its box, she imagines she hears a cry. Her imagination has projected her own sorrow. The dead, unfashionable fox has become a symbol to her of her own life, and a symbol to the reader as well.

"Miss Brill" is a typical Mansfield story in that it has little action. It dwells in the mind of a lonely person, as she deepens her understanding and receives a shock. The reader is drawn into sympathy with the brave, sad, central character.

"BLISS"

First published: 1920 (collected in Bliss, and Other Stories, 1920)

Type of work: Short story

After Bertha, a young wife, thinks that she has found a loving friend at a party, she discovers that her friend is being intimate with her (Bertha's) husband.

"Bliss" begins with Bertha, a young wealthy woman married to Harry Young, in a state of bliss. As usual, Mansfield can evoke the wonders of being alive. The spring afternoon is brilliant, the fruit has arrived for her to arrange, her lovely baby seems happy with her nanny, some sophisticated friends are coming to dinner, and her house looks beautiful. Bertha sees herself in the mirror, and she thinks that something wonderful is about to happen.

Things are not quite so nice as they seem. Once again, the details tell the story. The nanny bosses Bertha around. Bertha herself is a bit childish. Harry will be late; when he does arrive, he makes an abrasive remark. One guest, Miss Fulton, is mysterious, as are some cats prowling around in the garden. A tree, however, bodes well, a tree described with Mansfield's customary evocativeness. Bertha sees "the lovely pear tree with its wide open blossoms as a symbol of her own life."

The guests arrive, and Mansfield shows her ability to satirize the social world of poets and painters. One guest wears a dress that shows a procession of monkeys; married couples call each other by silly names; a languid homosexual playwright has had a bad experience with his taxi driver. Harry, Bertha's down-to-earth husband, forms a contrast, as does the cool Miss Fulton, who arrives dressed all in silver.

Up until now, the story's action has seemed haphazard, and the reader has been given few clues as to what may happen. Then Mansfield delivers her surprise, a series of events that may have shocked her original readers. Bertha touches Miss Fulton's arm and feels a "fire of bliss"; a look passes between them. Through the inane dinner conversation, Bertha wonders at her experience. She waits for "a sign" from Miss Fulton with little idea of what such a sign would mean.

Its meaning soon becomes more clear. Miss Fulton seems to give a sign, and they go to the garden and gaze at the pear tree that Bertha views as a symbol of her openness and vulnerability. What exactly does it suggest now? No matter what, to Bertha the women achieve a perfect, wordless understanding. Again Mansfield is ambiguous. What have they understood? Something feminine? Something about desire? Has Miss Fulton really participated in this experience, or is Bertha imagining their communion, their epiphany?

Mansfield has more surprises. As the guests prepare to leave, Bertha's feelings take a new twist: "For the first time in her life Bertha Young desired her husband." Not many writers can dramatize so effectively how a young women's homoerotic feelings could so quickly shift to heterosexual ones. Then Bertha's bliss is shattered. She glimpses Miss Fulton and her husband intimately whispering together, arranging for a rendezvous. Bertha is left alone, wondering what will become of her life. Mansfield does not ask the reader to draw a conclusion. Is he or she to understand that Bertha is trapped in an evil world? That her happy, childish life is over? Or that she is a free adult at last?

"AT THE BAY"

First published: 1922 (collected in The Garden Party, and Other Stories, 1922)

Type of work: Short story

Many members of a family live through a day in which they face the realities of sex, love, indifference, failure, and death.

Mansfield set two longer short stories in her native New Zealand: "Prelude" and "At the Bay." In both, she drew extensively upon details of her own extended family and employed an unusual structure peculiarly her own.

"At the Bay" is composed of thirteen short episodes in which a number of lives intertwine. Readers are set down in an unidentified place among unidentified characters. Soon it becomes clear that the story takes place in a settlement of families living in separate houses at the side of a bay. What is known of Mansfield's life makes readers assume that this is Wellington Bay in New Zealand, but they must guess at the characters' relationships. That the reader must work to discover these things is part of the story, a result of Mansfield's narrative technique. Most of the characters are relatives of Kezia, who most resembles a young Katherine Mansfield. They are Kezia, a young girl, about seven years old; Stanley Burnell, her father; Linda Burnell, her mother; Isabel, her older sister; Lottie, her younger sister; her baby brother; aunt Beryl, Linda's sister; Uncle Jonathan Trout, and Pip and Rags, his sons; Mrs. Fairfield, Kezia's grandmother, Linda and Beryl's mother; Alice, a servant; Mrs. Stubbs, Alice's friend; and Mr. and Mrs. Harry Kember.

Each episode is separate. They are not usually joined by obvious transitions, but the reader gradually senses that "At the Bay" has a kind of unity. The same characters appear and unexpectedly reappear. The story lasts for a complete day, from early morning until late at night. Most important, the characters live in a web of delicate interrelationships, some of which satisfy, some of which do not. The life of almost every character shows a variation on a central theme: To live is to yearn for something more and only occasionally to be calm and happy. Characters yearn most strongly for what is seldom possible. Each must face moments in which his or her hopes are thwarted.

The first and last episodes frame the story with descriptions of nature. Both provide descriptions of the bay, the sea and the waves, and the plants and the buildings on the shoreline. The first episode sets the scene as a peaceful but vibrant place that waits for what the day will bring. At the beginning, the only moving beings are some sheep, a sheep dog, and a shepherd. They enter and leave. In the very brief last episode, no living thing appears. The concluding episode is more obviously symbolic.

The day opens with Stanley Burnell jumping into the bay for an invigorating swim. He is the most masculine force in the story, a competitive man who proudly thinks that he is the first in the water. Stanley finds, however, that another man, Jonathan Trout, has beaten him to it. Trout is as good a swimmer as Stanley, more imaginative and less impatient. No wonder Stanley is irritated and leaves. Trout muses on the encounter: Poor Stanley makes work out of pleasure, he thinks. The episode ends with a suggestion that Trout is in poor health.

Mansfield begins her story with its only adult males, each of whom is severely limited.

Mansfield is at her best in evoking many different lives at the same time. Episode three depicts the Burnell household while Stanley gets ready to leave for work. Stanley is the center of attention. He questions, accuses, blusters, and irritably orders everybody about. The man of the house is leaving for work, and everyone must know it. Just as he leaves, he notes that his sister-in-law Beryl, though attentive, has her mind elsewhere.

The reader has suspected all along that Beryl has some private secret. The other women have their secrets as well: The child Kezia has her own way of eating porridge, Isabel is consciously full of virtue, Mrs. Fairfield privately responds to the beauty of the sun's illuminations, Linda's mind is miles away, and Alice is critical of men in general. Beryl believes that the women have a kind of communion after Stanley is gone—the wonderful day will be theirs. Her mother and sister do not seem to share this feeling so ecstatically.

Succeeding episodes show the various strands of the story belonging to the children, the servant Alice, Mrs. Fairfield, Beryl, and Linda. By constructing her narrative in parallel stories, Mansfield insists on the separateness of the individual minds and on the problems they have in communicating. By having characters cross from strand to strand and by showing parallels in their lives, Mansfield implies that people's lives have many things in common.

The following exchange, involving children, illustrates the beginning of power struggles based on gender. As usual on a fine morning, the Burnell girls go to the beach, where they play with their male cousins, the Trouts. Later, they regroup for a childish card game. The girls bicker; the whole group is dominated by Pip, the oldest Trout boy. In another scene, sexual tensions are the point of Alice's visit to Mrs. Stubbs, a storekeeper, who frightens Alice by saying that she prefers being without a man. A third exchange describes how Kezia confronts death when she spends her siesta with her grandmother. Mrs. Fairfield has the wisdom of age; though her heart still aches for her dead son, she is resigned to the fact that he is dead. When Mrs.

Fairfield tells the girl of this, Kezia rebels. Kezia will not die, and she demands a promise that her grandmother will not die either.

Linda is Mansfield's most enigmatic figure. She strikes everyone as listless, vague, and detached. She seems to be past yearning, much as her mother was. The reader often lives in her private thoughts, though she touches the lives of three males. With Jonathan, her brother-in-law, she listens sympathetically though distantly to his complaints about his weakness and his fate. Her attitude toward Stanley is more complex. She remembers transferring her affections from her adored father to Stanley—loyal, loving, tongue-tied, uncomplicated, sincere Stanley. She loves him but resents having to support his ego as one would that of a big child. Her listlessness appears to be the result of her children. She dreads having more and does not love the ones she has. Then, in a moment in the middle of the story, she looks down at her baby boy. For a moment, she may love him. The moment is over, and she is alone again.

Beryl is younger than Linda, in years and in experience. (Perhaps the sisters and their mother show three stages in women's lives.) The young Beryl is secretive with Stanley, impatient with Kezia at breakfast, and vibrant with hope in the morning. Her crisis begins when she meets the ominous Mrs. Harry Kember at the beach. Mrs. Kember is married to an extremely handsome man ten years her junior. She is rich. Her body is long and narrow. She smokes and plays bridge. She talks like a man. When Beryl disrobes before putting on her bathing suit, Mrs. Harry Kember teases her about her beauty. Beryl is startled and feels "poisoned," but she is fascinated as well.

That night when everyone else is asleep, the aroused Beryl imagines a perfect lover. As she blissfully fantasizes, she hears a noise outside her window. It is Harry Kember himself. Although she is persuaded to come outside, she is terrified and revolted when she sees the smile on his face, a kind of smile she has never seen before. When she breaks from his embrace, he is puzzled and angry. Beryl, like Linda, and before that her mother, finds that sexual love is not what she had imagined.

“THE GARDEN PARTY”

First published: 1922 (collected in The Garden Party, and Other Stories, 1922)

Type of work: Short story

Laura enjoys a garden party, even though a man next door has died. She then visits his grieving widow, sees his corpse, and is greatly moved.

“The Garden Party” may be Mansfield’s most famous story. It is exceptional and typical at the same time. Laura, a vibrant young woman, is the central character. The story also depicts a worldly older woman (Laura’s mother), a sophisticated social gathering (the party itself), some moderately dense males, and a disturbing event to which they all react differently. The action of the story, more conventionally straightforward than that of “At the Bay,” is also typical of Mansfield. It leads both Laura and the reader to an epiphany—an enigmatic moment of revelation that, in this story, is comic and overwhelming at the same time.

Unlike “At the Bay,” where Mansfield took readers into many minds, readers live through this story in only one. Laura appears to be about sixteen, a young woman on the edge of adulthood. Not only do readers hear her talk, they listen in on her thoughts. She is a bit afraid of the men who put up the tent for the party but enjoys hearing their good-natured banter. Readers sense her joy at being alive when she reacts ecstatically to the spots of light the sun makes on an inkpot. Mansfield brings the reader close to Laura in another typical way. Even the opening description of the day and the flowers seems to be in a character’s mind, not the storyteller’s. To many readers, that mind soon becomes Laura’s.

The opening scenes all suggest a wealthy, normal, and happy family. Laura appears to supervise the tent, but is not allowed to decide where it should be placed. Her sisters strike sophisticated poses; one sings a gruesome song and flashes a big smile. Laura’s mother protests that she will leave the arrangements to her children but organizes the party anyway, providing expensive flowers, a band, and dainty sandwiches. As usual, Mansfield suggests moments of happiness with telling details and evocative descriptions.

Then comes the news that turns Laura’s day around: A man has been killed in an accident, a man who lived in a lower-class cottage almost next to their home. Laura’s instinctive reaction is that the party must be stopped, since the man’s family might hear the band playing. Her sisters and her mother argue with her. She does not change her mind until she sees herself in a mirror—a lovely girl with a spectacular black hat trimmed with gold daisies—and until her brother Laurie compliments her. The party goes ahead, a typically exciting, shallow Mansfield party. Guests compliment Laura, especially on her hat. When the party is over, her mother tries to make amends by filling a basket with party leftovers and sending Laura with it to the dead man’s cottage.

The journey at dusk is frightening. Laura walks into a different world, a lower-class world of grieving, ill-dressed, unsophisticated people. At the dead man’s house, she gives the widow her basket. She is led against her wishes to the bedroom where the corpse has been laid out. Laura, however, is not horrified, but sees the corpse as merely sleeping. She sees death as something calm and even beautiful, something far removed from her silly afternoon. “Forgive my hat,” she says. She has had an epiphany. Her reply is woefully inadequate, but the reader has been shown a character’s moment of understanding and growth. The reader has had an epiphany as well, though it is not the same as Laura’s.

The story ends ambiguously. Laura heads home and meets her brother. She tries to say something but cannot find the words. She thinks he understands, but whether he does is left unclear. As usual, Mansfield does not push her case too far.

SUMMARY

In her short stories, Katherine Mansfield exemplifies innovative literary techniques that have influenced many later short-story writers. Her stories do not depend upon showing a chain of actions or upon explanations by the author. Rather, they dramatize webs of personal thoughts and interrelationships and evoke these relationships in descriptive, suggestive, and even symbolic details. Her stories often lead the reader to moments of revelation. Her themes are those of her time and were also taken up by later writers: joy in beauty, yearnings for happiness (particularly by women), disappointment, callousness, and cruelty.

George Soule

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

SHORT FICTION:

In a German Pension, 1911

Bliss, and Other Stories, 1920

The Garden Party, and Other Stories, 1922

The Doves' Nest, and Other Stories, 1923

Something Childish, and Other Stories, 1924 (also known as The Little Girl, and Other Stories, 1924)

POETRY:

Poems, 1923 (J. M. Murry, editor)

NONFICTION:

Novels and Novelists, 1930 (J. M. Murry, editor)

The Collected Letters of Katherine Mansfield, 1984-1996 (4 volumes)

The Katherine Mansfield Notebooks, 1997 (2 volumes)

About the Author

Alpers, Antony. The Life of Katherine Mansfield. New York: Viking Press, 1980.

Bennett, Andrew. Katherine Mansfield. Tavistock, Devon, England: Northcote House, 2004.

Hankin, C. A. Katherine Mansfield and Her Confessional Stories. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1983.

Hanson, Clare, and Andrew Gurr. Katherine Mansfield. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1981.

Jensen, Margaret M. The Open Book: Creative Mistreadings in the Works of Selected Modern Writers. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.

Kobler, J. F. Katherine Mansfield: A Study of the Short Fiction. Boston: Twayne, 1990.

Mansfield, Katherine. The Stories of Katherine Mansfield. Edited by Anthony Alpers. Auckland, New Zealand: Oxford University Press, 1984.

Nathan, Rhoda B. Katherine Mansfield. New York: Continuum, 1988.

New, William H. Reading Mansfield and Metaphors of Form. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 1999.

Smith, Angela. Katherine Mansfield: A Literary Life. New York: Palgrave, 2000.

Tomalin, Claire. Katherine Mansfield: A Secret Life. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1987.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Exemplify Katherine Mansfield's use of objective correlative.
- Contrast the use of epiphanies by Mansfield and James Joyce.
- Why does Bertha in "Bliss" suddenly desire her husband?
- What principle or principles govern the structure of Mansfield's episodes in "At the Bay"?
- What does Laura come to understand in "The Garden Party": the lower class, death, her own values, other matters, a combination of things?
- To what extent do the concerns of Mansfield's young women characters resemble those of Virginia Woolf?

CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE

Born: Canterbury, England

February 6, 1564

Died: Deptford, England

May 30, 1593

An Elizabethan playwright and poet, Marlowe was a pioneer in creating English tragedy and dramatic blank verse.

BIOGRAPHY

Christopher Marlowe was born in Canterbury, England, on February 6, 1564, the eldest son of a shoemaker. He was baptized exactly two months before William Shakespeare was baptized at Stratford—a significant detail, as Marlowe exercised an enormous influence on Shakespeare and is generally believed to be the rival poet of Shakespeare's sonnets.

As a pupil at the King's School, Canterbury, Marlowe was elected a "Queen's scholar." He entered Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in 1580 and was again awarded a scholarship. In 1584, he earned his B.A. degree and entered into graduate study of divinity in preparation for taking holy orders. Just before Marlowe was to receive his M.A., the university proposed to withhold the degree. The decision was based on rumors that, after spending time at the seminary for exiled English Catholics in Reims, France, Marlowe meant to take Catholic holy orders. The seminary was a hotbed of Catholic insurrection against Elizabeth I's Protestant rule. Marlowe was awarded his M.A. only after the exceptional intervention of the Privy Council, which dealt with matters of national security. Records imply that Marlowe may have gone to Reims as an intelligence agent in the employ of Elizabeth's secretary of state, Sir Francis Walsingham.

Marlowe left Cambridge for London in 1587 without taking holy orders. Literature, not divinity, preoccupied him. Among works believed to date from his Cambridge years are Elegies (1595-1600), a translation of Ovid's Amores (c. 20 B.C.E.); Pharsalia (1600), a translation of Lucan's Bellum civile (first century C.E.); a play, Dido, Queen of Carthage (pr.

c. 1586-1587, pb. 1594); and Tamburlaine the Great, Part I (pr. c. 1587, pb. 1590). Some scholars add to this list his epic poem Hero and Leander, though it was not published until after his death, in 1598.

Marlowe's rise to fame as a playwright was rapid. The opening performance of Tamburlaine the Great, Part I was enthusiastically received. With its ruthless conquering hero and vivid pageantry, the play tapped the popular mood of feverish excitement at the prospect of war with Spain, and Marlowe quickly followed up with Tamburlaine the Great, Part II (pr. 1587, pb. 1590). Few plays were more imitated, satirized, and joked about in print than the Tamburlaine plays.

Doctor Faustus was produced around 1588, and the first quarto edition appeared in 1604. This play gripped the imagination of the public and was frequently performed into the Jacobean Age. The Jew of Malta (pr. c. 1589; pb. 1633) was also a theatrical success. Around 1592, Marlowe offered a new play, Edward II (pr. c. 1592, pb. 1594), to the Earl of Pembroke's players. All of his other plays were performed by the Lord Admiral's men. A minor play, The Massacre at Paris (pb. 1594?), was produced in 1593.

Marlowe's personal life did not run as smoothly as his career. His impetuous and rebellious character frequently led him into trouble. In 1589, he was arrested and briefly imprisoned, then pardoned, as a result of his involvement in a fight in which a man died. Less than three years later, a constable sought the protection of the law against Marlowe.

In 1593, his heterodox opinions brought him into serious danger with the authorities. He was sharing living quarters with dramatist Thomas Kyd when Privy Council agents searched Kyd's papers and discovered a treatise containing "vile heretical conceits denying the deity of Jesus Christ our Saviour." Under torture, Kyd disclaimed the paper, saying it was Marlowe's. Kyd was not alone in charging Marlowe with free thinking. More evidence came from Richard Baines, one of Walsingham's former intelligence agents. Baines testified to Marlowe's "damnable Judgment of Religion, and scorn of God's word." According to Baines, Marlowe doubted the historical truth of the Bible and held that "the first beginning of Religioun was only to keep men in awe." Baines added that "almost into every company he cometh he persuades men to atheism, willing them not to be afraid of bugbears and hobgoblins."

Marlowe's works reinforced charges of religious skepticism, containing as they did attacks on all major religions. In 1588, the year after the first performances of the Tamburlaine plays, Marlowe's Cambridge senior, Robert Greene, accused the playwright of "daring God out of heaven with that atheist Tamburlaine." To complicate the issue, on the evidence of Doctor Faustus, Marlowe was well versed in the lore of witchcraft; Shakespeare suggests in Sonnet 86 that he dabbled in it.

Privy Council suspicions against Marlowe were fueled by the company that he kept. Among his friends were Sir Walter Raleigh, famous for his so-called School of Atheism, and astronomer Thomas Harriot, labeled an atheist. (Both might more accurately be described as deists.) Marlowe was arrested on May 20, 1593. He was instructed to report daily to the Privy Council while they deliberated, yet he was never to face the consequences of his nonconformism. On May 30, Marlowe spent the day at an inn in Deptford, England, with companions of his friend Sir Thomas Walsingham. At the end of the day, a dispute about the bill arose between Marlowe and Ingram Frizer, Walsingham's business agent, who had, it seemed, invited him. Marlowe, in a fit of anger, drew Frizer's dagger and cut him over the head. Frizer retrieved his dagger and stabbed Marlowe above his right eye. Marlowe died instantly. Frizer was later pardoned as having acted in self-defense.

ANALYSIS

Marlowe is often called the father of English tragedy because Tamburlaine the Great was the first tragedy to combine a grand concept, a strong central character capable of carrying the action of the play, and suitably heightened verse style. The extent of the revolution in drama that Marlowe initiated cannot be understood without considering his contribution to English verse. The poetry of Tamburlaine the Great was a kind never before heard on the English stage, with passages of exultant magnificence and lyrical sweetness. Its power was attributable largely to Marlowe's discovery of true blank verse style. Previous dramatists had experimented with an unrhymed decasyllabic line with five iambic feet (each foot having a weak stress followed by a strong one). Consider as an example these lines from an earlier play, Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville's Gorbuduc (pr. 1561, pb. 1565; also published as The Tragedy of Ferrex and Porrex): "Your lasting age shall be their longer stay,/ For cares of kings, that rule as you have ruled." Each line has five pairs of two syllables, each pair consisting of a weak stress followed by a strong one (the iambic foot); the strong stresses are uniform in weight; and this iambic rhythm is never varied. The result is tiresomely repetitive.

Marlowe had a sufficiently sensitive ear to perceive that though the norm of blank verse should be this regular iambic rhythm, and though the audience's awareness of that norm should not be lost, few lines should conform to that pattern. The strong stresses per line should be fewer than five; the line should be broken into four, three, even two groups of sounds, separated by a minuscule pause; moreover, different kinds of feet other than the iamb should be introduced. In applying these discoveries, Marlowe exploited the flexibility and expressiveness of blank verse and cleared the way for other poets such as Shakespeare, John Milton, and William Wordsworth. Compare the Gorbuduc lines with the following passage from Doctor Faustus: "Was this the face that launch'd a thousand ships?/ And burnt the topless towers of Ilium?/ Sweet Helen, make me immortal with a kiss." The first line is regular, with five iambic feet and five stresses. The second is regular in rhythm but has only four strong stresses, and the line falls into three sound groups. The third, however, diverges completely from the regular meter, beginning with a foot of two strong stresses and having a foot of two weak and one strong stresses ("me immor-") in the middle. Such changes in the basic rhythm emphasize emotionally charged words and phrases, increasing the expressive power and enlivening the listener's attention.

Marlowe was an innovator also in his choice of themes. Religious skepticism recurs throughout the plays. Tamburlaine the Great challenged both Christian and Moslem faiths; The Jew of Malta confounded Christianity and Judaism alike. Marlowe's questioning of humanity's place in the universe reached its height in Doctor Faustus, an agonized cry of defiance against an orthodoxy represented as chaining humankind's unquenchable thirst for knowledge. One cannot, however, assume that Marlowe was atheistical in the modern sense of materialistic. If there is anything of Marlowe in the solemn speech given to Orcanes in Part II, act 2 of Tamburlaine the Great, one may infer that the dramatist accepted the existence of a nondenominational supreme intelligence.

At the core of Marlowe's heterodoxy was his fascination with humanity's aspirant spirit and illimitable mind—a theme that did not fit easily into contemporary Christian thought. Marlowe's heroes are self-made, fired by a sense of their own power and greatness, in strong contrast to Shakespeare's, with their orthodox assumption of the privileges and honor due to noble birth.

Marlowe's treatment of this theme became more complex over the years. Faustus shares with the earlier hero Tamburlaine aspirations for worldly power at any cost. Both plays display the immense power of the individual to unleash massive forces for good or ill. Yet Faustus's odyssey, unlike Tamburlaine's, is intellectual rather than physical, internal rather than external. Whereas Tamburlaine the Great was a play of action and show, Doctor Faustus is a play of ideas—hence, perhaps, its more enduring fascination. Tamburlaine's approach to life is never seriously challenged, whereas the obstacles placed in Faustus's path form the premise of the play.

Marlowe's other major plays contain views as controversial as those in Doctor Faustus, for different reasons. The action of Edward II, remarkable for the time, revolves around a homosexual relationship between Edward II and his favorite minion, Gaveston. Marlowe, who according to Baines said that "all they that loue not Tobacco & Boies were fooles," often treated the subject of homosexuality sympathetically. The Jew of Malta also adopts an unorthodox standpoint, this time in public matters: The play is a cynical commentary on the corruption and greed of social and political life, after the theories of Italian political philosopher Niccolò Machiavelli.

TAMBURLAINE THE GREAT

First produced: Part I, c. 1587 (first published, 1590); Part II, 1587 (first published, 1590)

Type of work: Plays

In Part I, the Scythian shepherd Tamburlaine conquers many Eastern countries, becomes king of Persia, and marries the soldan of Egypt's daughter Zenocrate; in Part II, Tamburlaine continues his conquests, Zenocrate dies, and Tamburlaine slays his cowardly son and finally dies.

When Tamburlaine the Great burst upon the Elizabethan stage in 1587, it took audiences by storm. The most popular tragedy of the time had been Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy (pr. c. 1585-1589, pb. 1594?), which featured a strong dramatic sense but unmemorable verse. Tamburlaine the Great, in contrast, was written in poetry of the scope and magnificence that moved Shakespeare to write of "the proud full sail of [Marlowe's] great verse" (Sonnet 86).

Vital to the play's success was the figure of Tamburlaine. The prologue introduces him in lines that were to become famous: "Threatening the world with high astounding terms,/ And scourging kingdoms with his conquering sword." Tamburlaine's power comes from his limitless self-concept, not from his birth, which was that of a humble shepherd. In Marlowe's world, a person's worth is measured by his or her actions. Thus Tamburlaine declares, "I am a lord, for so my deeds shall prove—/ And yet a shepherd by my parentage." His thoughts, he says, are coequal with the clouds, and his aspiration is immortality such as the gods enjoy. Indeed, he claims to gain his authority to terrorize the world from Jove himself, whose scourge he is.

As for the traditional enemies of the aspirant—Death and Fortune—the plays contain frequent references to Tamburlaine's mastery over them, as in the passage in Part I, act 1, where he claims that he has bound the Fates in iron chains and turns Fortune's wheel with his own hand. He appears to have assumed the role of Fate in condemning the virgins of Damascus to death for their failure to surrender before he symbolically decked his tents in black: His Customs, he says, are "as peremptory/As wrathful planets, death, or destiny."

Such assertions are hubristic in the extreme and, in a Christian context, would merit a downfall such as Faustus's. Tamburlaine, however, moves freely in a non-Christian setting. His death, when it comes, occurs through illness. He is never punished for his past exploits; rather, he is lionized by all save his enemies. "Nature," he says, ". . . doth teach us all to have aspiring minds"; our souls are ever "climbing after knowledge infinite." Compare this blithe celebration of the illimitable mind with the Chorus's fearful and bitter epilogue to Doctor Faustus lamenting the tragic fate of inquiring minds who are tempted to explore forbidden knowledge.

Christianity makes a brief appearance in Part II in the unsympathetic character of Sigismund, a Christian king. Sigismund makes a treaty with the Muslim king Orcanes only to be persuaded to break it on the grounds that oaths made with heathens are not binding. When Orcanes defeats the treacherous force of Sigismund, he wonders whether his victory was attributable to his invocation of Christ's wrath on the enemy or to Mahomet's favor. The skeptical Gazellus pointedly suggests that the cause lies in neither prophet, but in the fortunes of war. Marlowe's casual dismissal of Christ and Mahomet as a couple of rival prophets is indicative of his skeptical attitude toward all religions and their claims to a monopoly on truth.

The taste of the theatergoing public has changed since the Elizabethan Age, and modern audiences may view the bloody acts of ruthless tyrants with less enthusiasm. The negative sides of Tamburlaine's character—his cruelty, vengefulness, and extraordinary amount of machismo—may put him in danger of losing the audience's sympathy altogether. Scenes that spring to mind are, in part I, his slaughter of the virgins of Damascus after the town's surrender and his inhuman treatment of Bajazeth. Part II depicts his self-indulgent act of burning the town where Zenocrate dies; his deliberately cutting his arm to show his sons that a wound is nothing, and his insistence that they wash their hands in the blood; his slaying of his son for cowardice; and his harnessing of the captured kings in his chariot.

Yet evidence exists that the Elizabethan response to Tamburlaine's overweening arrogance was not without a certain tongue-in-cheek humor. Tamburlaine's words to the harnessed kings as they draw his chariot onstage—"Holla, ye pamper'd jades of Asia!"—apparently brought the Elizabethan house down, since the line was the subject of jokes and was imitated and satirized in the works of different authors for years to come.

Tamburlaine the Great's appeal has diminished also because of its lack of inner dramatic conflict. Even its external conflicts—the battles—lack any threat to Tamburlaine's invincible status. The play's appeal to the modern mind more often lies in its grand images and breathtaking poetry. Take, as an example, Tamburlaine's glorious hymn to his own boundless spirit in act 4 of Part II. Delivered just before he stabs his son, it exemplifies the vast cosmic images that sustain the heightened effect of the plays. Lines memorable for their loveliness abound. Some examples are Callapine's description of the Grecian virgins, "As fair as was Pygmalion's ivory girl,/ Or lovely Io metamorphosed," and Tamburlaine's speech to the dying Zenocrate punctuated by its lyrical refrain. The part of Tamburlaine's soliloquy in act 5 of Part I dealing with poetry's attempts to capture the essence of beauty has attained the status of a set piece.

DOCTOR FAUSTUS

First produced: c. 1588 (first published, 1604)

Type of work: Play

A brilliant scholar sells his soul to the Devil in return for forbidden knowledge and worldly power.

Marlowe's play Doctor Faustus is generally considered his greatest. The play shares certain elements with its ancestor, the medieval morality play: the opposing admonishments of good and bad angels; the characters of Lucifer and Mephostophilis; and the appearance of the Seven Deadly Sins. Yet it breaks with tradition in two important respects: in the sympathy evoked for the straying hero, and in the questions raised against the cosmic order of conventional Christian doctrine.

Faustus pursues his grand aspirations in what Marlowe portrays as a repressive climate of Christian orthodoxy, which, in designating certain knowledge as forbidden, blocks fulfillment of his desires and effectively becomes his antagonist. The play opens with Faustus in his study. He has plumbed the depths of all disciplines and found them unfulfilling. He will settle for no less than a dominion that "Stretcheth as far as doth the mind of man"—a world of physical beauty, sensual delight, and power over life and objects. He decides his best hope is necromancy, an art forbidden by Christian doctrine.

Thus, the scene is set for Faustus's tragic decline. Planted in the text, even from the beginning, are warnings of the terrible fate awaiting Faustus. A master of dramatic irony, Marlowe has these warnings go unheeded by his hero while they build an uneasy tension in the audience's awareness. An example is Faustus's remark on his own great powers in conjuring up Mephostophilis. Only a few lines later, it is revealed that Mephostophilis has come more out of his own and Lucifer's self-interest than in deference to Faustus's wishes. Similarly, when Mephostophilis tells Faustus that Lucifer was thrown from Heaven for aspiring pride and insolence, the audience recognizes that Faustus exhibits the same faults and may meet the same fate. There is ambivalence, too, in Faustus's repeated exhortation to himself to be resolute in his damnable course of action. The word, used more often in connection with Christian virtue, gains an ironic weight, rendering Doctor Faustus a negative version of John Bunyan's The Pilgrim's Progress (1678, 1684).

Counterbalanced against this carefully crafted tragic inevitability is the hope that Faustus will repent and save himself. Marlowe keeps the conflict in Faustus's soul active until the end. In the moving soliloquies, Faustus's initial confidence in his pact with Lucifer alternates with regret and determination to turn back to God. Despair however, prevails. In his second soliloquy, Faustus is turned back from repentance by his sense of God's indifference to him and his own indifference to God: Faustus serves only his own appetite. In one profoundly moving scene, Faustus announces, "I do repent" only to have Mephostophilis threaten him with having his flesh torn into pieces for disobedience to Lucifer. Faustus effects a hasty turnabout of meaning in an ironic echo of his previous phrase: "I do repent I e'er offended him."

Yet just as God failed Faustus in his aspirations, so does Lucifer. Disillusionment follows rapidly on his pact. Faustus asks for a wife; but marriage is a sacrament, so Mephostophilis cannot provide one. When Faustus questions him about astronomy, Mephostophilis tells him nothing the scholar Wagner could not have told him. Although the Chorus reveals that Faustus attains fame for his learning, his achievements are superficial and empty in comparison with his grandiose intentions at the outset. He humiliates the pope (a typically Marlovian scenario), avenges some petty wrongs done to him by Benvolio by attaching antlers to his head, and entertains the duke and duchess of Vanholt with insubstantial illusions. At the play's start, no area of knowledge is large enough for Faustus's overweening sense of self; toward the end, fear and despair have so diminished him that he wants only dissolution and oblivion: "O soul, be chang'd into little water drops,/ And fall into the ocean, ne'er be found."

In spite of the intellectual nature of the play's premise, it contains scenes of a striking visual immediacy. The first entrance of Mephostophilis, too ugly for Faustus's taste, and the appearance of Helen of Troy are examples. Often, scenes of horror are not directly represented on stage but chillingly evoked in words. Faustus's blood congeals as he attempts to sign his soul away to the Devil; a Latin inscription meaning “Fly, O man!” appears on his arm. That the audience is told this by Faustus rather than seeing it for itself lets it experience the terror through his awareness. Similarly, a chill of fear is produced by Faustus’s words to the Scholars: “Ay, pray for me, pray for me; and, what noise soever ye hear, come not unto me, for nothing can rescue me.” The image is as powerful in its understatement as the explicit horror of the final scene, where devils drag Faustus off to Hell.

Marlowe’s verse reached its full emotional power in Doctor Faustus. Faustus’s soliloquy beginning “Ah, Faustus,/ Now hast thou but one bare hour to live” is an example of the emotional intensity of which Marlowe was capable. Faustus’s request that the spheres of Heaven cease their motion to give him time to repent is heartrending because of its very impossibility. Desperation is conveyed in the rapid and diminishing series of time extensions that he demands. His violent reversals of mood—from calling on God to anguish at being dragged downward by devils, from the vision of Christ’s blood streaming in the firmament to the pain of Lucifer’s tortures—move the audience with him from despair to hope. His spiritual agony is summarized in the evocative and poignant line, “O lente lente currite noctis equi” (“Slowly run, O horses of night”).

The traditional morality play affirmed Christian virtue and faith and condemned the vices of those who strayed from the path. Doctor Faustus offers no such comfortable framework. It does not offer a reassuring affirmation of Christian faith or a straightforward condemnation of Faustus. Instead, it presents a disturbing challenge to the cosmic order as defined by Christian orthodoxy. Listeners are invited “Only to wonder at unlawful things,/ whose deepness doth entice such forward wits/ To practise more than heavenly power permits.”

The question with which the play ends is whether the tragedy of Faustus is individual, the tragedy of one man’s fall from grace, or universal, the tragedy of Everyman in a system of belief that offers no place or path for the growth of the illimitable human spirit.

HERO AND LEANDER

First published: 1598

Type of work: Poem

Leander falls in love with Hero, who lives on the opposite side of the Hellespont, and tries to seduce her.

Marlowe left Hero and Leander unfinished at his death. It was completed by dramatist George Chapman in very different style and published by him the following year. (This analysis deals only with the part of the poem that Marlowe wrote, the first two sestiams.)

Hero and Leander is the most famous example of a favorite Elizabethan genre, the brief epic. It circulated in manuscript for some years before publication. During this time, it was certainly read by William Shakespeare, whose poem of the same genre Venus and Adonis (1593) was influenced by it, and whose plays contain strong echoes of its lines. The brief epic was a poem on an erotic and mythological subject, often drawn from Ovid’s Metamorphoses (c. 8 C.E.). Hero and Leander is Ovidian in character, though the story actually comes from a later version of the myth by Musaeus. Most adaptors of Ovidian subjects indulged in a high degree of moralizing, a factor dispensed with by Marlowe.

Hero and Leander is an exuberantly sensuous poem enlivened by an irrepressible comic spirit. Having fallen in love with the beautiful Hero, Leander wastes no time in attempting to bed her. He uses the commonplace arguments of Renaissance naturalism: Since virginity has no material reality and is imperceptible to the senses, it is nothing—and therefore nothing to preserve or anything of which to be proud. Such specious logic is meant to be enjoyed as flights of wit and audacity, and would only be taken at face value by someone of Hero’s naïveté. Leander’s devious sophistry is pointed out in lines whose rhymes anticipate Lord Byron’s Don Juan (1819-1824, 1826): “At last, like to a bold sharp sophister,/ With cheerful hope he thus accosted her.” Also enlisted into the argument is a theme shared by Shakespeare’s Venus and Adonis and his sonnets, the sterility and waste of youth and beauty’s keeping its gifts to itself in the virginal state.

In spite of Leander’s sophistication in the art of persuasion, in the art of love he is an innocent. In a passage of comic understatement, he toys with Hero “as a brother with his sister,” “Supposing nothing else was to be done”—“yet he suspected/ Some amorous rites or other were neglected.” Hero is able to deflect Leander’s inept advances and greets the morning still intact. Leander returns home, and the narrator’s ironic comment on his encounter with his father sustains the comic detachment: “His secret flame apparently was seen,/ Leander’s father knew where he had been.” Mock-heroic images also contribute to the poem’s comic tone, as in the passage in sestiad 2 likening Leander’s attempt to touch the reluctant Hero’s breast—exaggeratedly described as a globe “By which love sails to regions full of bliss”—to a siege. She “did as a soldier stout/ Defend the fort, and keep the foeman out.”

Another comic episode shows Leander, determined to see his love, swimming the Hellespont to reach her home. He is nearly frustrated in his aim by the sea god Neptune’s taking a fancy to him. Neptune mistakes Leander for Jove’s page Gany-mede and, in a scene of intense homoeroticism as funny as it is sensuous, tries to seduce the unwitting young man. Leander, at cross-purposes with Neptune, protests that he is no woman. The worldly-wise Neptune smiles at his innocence. It is not the first homoerotic element in the poem: Leander’s feminine beauty is described in unusually intimate detail, from the point of view of the male narrator and of other male admirers.

The imagery of the poem creates a world of intoxicating sensuality. Leander’s beauty exceeds that of Narcissus, who fell in love with his own reflection in a pool. Hero worships Venus at a temple sumptuously described; about her neck, she wears chains of pebble-stones that shine like diamonds.

“THE PASSIONATE SHEPHERD TO HIS LOVE”

First published: 1599 (collected in The Passionate Pilgrim, 1599)

Type of work: Poem

This work is one of the best-known Elizabethan lyrics and was endlessly imitated, parodied, and answered well into the seventeenth century.

“The Passionate Shepherd to His Love,” comprising six stanzas of four lines each, is an intellectual’s vision of pastoral life, in a tradition going back to the Roman poets Theocritus and Vergil. Its undoubted emotional power hinges on its yearning evocation of an idyll that never was and can never be. The wistful invitation of the poet to his love to live with him in this impossibly perfect place evokes the pathos of unfulfilled desire and longing.

The work is rich with images chosen to delight the senses. There is the visual feast of the pastoral landscape and of the belt with coral clasps and amber studs, the soft touch of the gown made from wool pulled from lambs, the sounds of the birds singing melodious madrigals and of the shepherds’ songs, the smell of the beds of roses and of the thousand fragrant posies.

The regular rhyme scheme, of two pairs of rhyming couplets per stanza, the smooth iambic rhythm, and the use of alliteration add to the songlike quality of the poem, and indeed, an adapted version of one of its stanzas appears as a song in Shakespeare’s The Merry Wives of Windsor (pr. 1597, revised, c. 1600-1601, pb. 1602).

SUMMARY

Christopher Marlowe was a brilliant innovator and an intellectual nonconformist, with much to tell and much to question about power, desire, sensuality, greed, and suffering. His poetic images, vast in scale and cosmic in conception, as well as his larger-than-life characters of grand aspirations and prodigious sensual appetites, inspired critic Harry Levin to dub Marlowe “the overreacher.” No better word could be chosen to characterize the magnificence, the vehemence, and the violent egotism that give his genius such an intensely personal stamp.

Claire Robinson

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

DRAMA:

- Dido, Queen of Carthage*, pr. c. 1586-1587, pb. 1594
(with Thomas Nashe)
Tamburlaine the Great, Part I, pr. c. 1587, pb. 1590
(commonly known as Tamburlaine)
Tamburlaine the Great, Part II, pr. 1587, pb. 1590
Doctor Faustus, pr. c. 1588, pb. 1604
The Jew of Malta, pr. c. 1589, pb. 1633
Edward II, pr. c. 1592, pb. 1594
The Massacre at Paris, pr. 1593, pb. 1594(?)
Complete Plays, pb. 1963

POETRY:

- Hero and Leander*, 1598 (completed by George Chapman)
"The Passionate Shepherd to His Love," 1599 (in The Passionate Pilgrim)

TRANSLATIONS:

- Elegies*, 1595-1600 (of Ovid's Amores)
Pharsalia, 1600 (of Lucan's Bellum civile)

MISCELLANEOUS:

- The Works of Christopher Marlowe*, 1910, 1962 (C. F. Tucker Brooke, editor)
The Works and Life of Christopher Marlowe, 1930-1933, 1966 (R. H. Case, editor)
The Complete Works of Christopher Marlowe, 1973 (Fredson Bowers, editor)

About the Author

- Bevington, David M. From Mankind to Marlowe: Growth of Structure in the Popular Drama of Tudor England. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1962.
Empson, William. Faustus and the Censor: The English Faust-Book and Marlowe's "Dr. Faustus." New York: Basil Blackwell, 1987.
Farnham, Willard, ed. Twentieth Century Interpretations of Doctor Faustus. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1969.
Honan, Park. Christopher Marlowe: Poet and Spy. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005.
Hotson, J. Leslie. The Death of Christopher Marlowe. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1925.
Leech, Clifford, ed. Marlowe: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1964.
Levin, Harry. The Overreacher. London: Faber & Faber, 1952.
Luney, Ruth. Marlowe and the Popular Tradition: Innovation in the English Drama Before 1595. New York: Palgrave, 2002.
Morris, Brian, ed. Christopher Marlowe. London: Ernest Benn, 1968.
Oz, Avraham, ed. Marlowe. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.
Pinciss, Gerald. Christopher Marlowe. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1975.
Riggs, David. The World of Christopher Marlowe. London: Faber, 2004.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Identify the characters in Christopher Marlowe's plays who might be called "overreachers."
- Analyze metrically a group of Marlowe's lines that you find effective and determine the nature of the variations.
- How might Marlowe's subject in his early play Dido, Queen of Carthage have influenced William Shakespeare's choice of dramatic subjects?
- To what extent was Doctor Faustus a rejection of "the cosmic order of conventional Christian doctrine"?
- What makes Dr. Faustus's goal more shocking than those of Tamburlaine and the Jew of Malta?
- What qualities in "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love" made it irresistible to the other poets who composed "replies" to it?

Library of Congress

ANDREW MARVELL

Born: Winestead-in-Holderness, Yorkshire, England
March 31, 1621

Died: London, England
August 18, 1678

Marvell's work, which embodies the best qualities of Metaphysical poetry, is marked by a distinctive ability to present and resolve seemingly irreconcilable opposites, a trait that allows him to examine complex situations and issues with great depth and sensitivity.

BIOGRAPHY

Andrew Marvell was born in Winestead-in-Holderness, Yorkshire, England, on March 31, 1621. His father, Andrew Marvell, was a local vicar, and in 1624 the family moved to Hull, where Marvell's father had been appointed lecturer at Holy Trinity Church. Marvell was educated at Hull Grammar School, and in 1633 he left Hull for Trinity College, Cambridge. At Cambridge, Marvell read widely; his studies included the works of Roman poets such as Horace and Juvenal, which would influence Marvell's own later poems. In 1637, his first verses, in Latin and Greek, were published. During this year, he also experienced a brief conversion to Roman Catholicism and ran away from Cambridge to London. His father, however, found him and forced him to return to the university. He received his B.A. and left Cambridge after his father's death in 1641. For the next several years, Marvell traveled extensively, visiting Holland, France, Italy, and Spain. In Rome, he visited the English Catholic priest and poetaster, Richard Flecknoe, who was to become the subject of satirical poems by both Marvell and, later, John Dryden. Although few details are known about Marvell's life during the 1640's, it appears that his lengthy travels abroad kept him from taking any direct part in the bloody and divisive English Civil War.

In 1650, Marvell took a position as tutor to Mary

Fairfax, the young daughter of Lord Thomas Fairfax, a Parliamentary general who resigned from military service in June of that year. Marvell lived for two years with the Fairfax family in their home, Nun Appleton House, in Yorkshire. It was during this time that Marvell is thought to have written much of his finest lyric poetry, including a lengthy poem celebrating the virtues of the Fairfax home and its master. John Milton, a friend and mentor, recommended Marvell for an appointment as Latin secretary to the Council of State, but the post was not awarded to Marvell until four years later. In the meantime, Marvell was appointed tutor to William Dutton, who would later become a ward of Oliver Cromwell, the English soldier and statesman. During Cromwell's years as lord protector, Marvell wrote poems in praise of Cromwell and his government, including "An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland" (commonly known as "An Horatian Ode") and The First Anniversary of the Government Under His Highness the Lord Protector (1655). Despite Marvell's admiration for Cromwell, both as a man and as a political force, and his enjoyment of Cromwell's favor, Marvell was not a fanatical partisan or a Puritan zealot, and he seems to have weathered the Restoration of the monarchy without difficulty. Marvell was instrumental in protecting Milton, who had been a vocal anti-Royalist, from retribution under the restored monarchy.

Marvell was elected to Parliament as a representative for Hull in 1659. He remained a member of Parliament for the rest of his life, a span of nearly twenty years. During his tenure in Parliament, he continued to travel widely, accompanying the earl of Carlisle on a tour of Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, returning to England in 1665. Though Marvell is little remembered today as a politician, he was in his day an active and conscientious supporter of his constituents' interests, as his numerous letters to the mayor and aldermen of Hull show. After the Restoration, Marvell was sometimes outspoken in his criticism of Charles II's government, and in 1667 he wrote "Last Instructions to a Painter," a poem satirizing various politicians and political affairs of the day, particularly the conduct of the 1667 naval campaign against the Dutch. He also gained some notoriety as a political pamphleteer, most notably for his two-part The Rehearsal Transpros'd (1672-1673), a clarion call for religious tolerance in the face of a campaign for religious conformity being waged by Samuel Parker, a Church of England divine. In the early 1670's, it was feared that Charles II was conspiring with the Catholic Louis XIV of France to curtail the religious and political freedom of his subjects; in reaction, Marvell, operating under an assumed name, took part in a clandestine, pro-Protestant campaign designed to influence English foreign policy and compel Charles and the English forces to conclude hostilities with the Dutch. When Marvell died on August 18, 1678, in London as a result of a physician's mistreatment of a fever, it was rumored that he was the victim of a political murder.

During Marvell's life, few of his poems were published, and he was known in his day primarily for his pamphlets and a few verse and prose satires. In 1681, three years after his death, a collection that included many of his lyrical pastoral poems was published from papers brought forward by his housekeeper, Mary Palmer, who claimed to be his wife. Although these poems enjoyed some popularity at their publication, Marvell remained relatively unknown as a poet until his "rediscovery" by later writers such as Charles Lamb and Alfred, Lord Tennyson, in the nineteenth century and T. S. Eliot in the twentieth.

ANALYSIS

Marvell is a poet attracted by complexity and paradox, and he is reluctant to oversimplify the themes and experiences that he explores in his poems, be they pastoral lyrics or overtly political works. His best poems frequently display an ambiguity and irony that is not a mere stylistic device but rather a reflection of Marvell's penchant for seeing many sides of an ostensibly simple situation. In addition, Marvell was artistically influenced by other Metaphysical poets such as John Donne, who avoided hackneyed poetic conventions and used clever, convoluted logic and incongruous imagery to bring fresh perspectives to bear on traditional poetic subjects such as love and death.

The term "Metaphysical poet" is not one with which Marvell would have been familiar. Although it was first used by Dryden in criticizing Donne for his use of farfetched, extravagant metaphors and abstract logic in poems dealing with emotional subjects, it gained a nonpejorative status and wider currency as a result of Eliot's seminal 1921 essay "The Metaphysical Poets." Eliot's essay praises the Metaphysical poets (including Marvell) for their harmonious uniting of reason and emotion. Some qualities of Metaphysical poetry that Marvell shares are a logical and analytical strain in dealing with emotional subjects; the use of extended, incongruous metaphors, or "conceits," that link dissimilar images; a fondness for puns and paradox; and, occasionally, a deliberate roughness or unevenness of meter designed to add vigor to the lines.

"The Definition of Love" illustrates some of these qualities. In it, Marvell explores the paradox of an unrequited love that by its very impossibility achieves perfection. Marvell inverts traditional poetic images, referring to "Magnanimous Despair" and "feeble Hope." Like Donne, who compared his love to a compass, Marvell employs mapmaking imagery to describe the separation from his lover. He and his beloved are like "the distant Poles," around whom the entire world turns. He speaks of love in terms of oblique angles and infinite parallel lines that can never meet, and he invokes the oxymoronic image of a planisphere (literally a flat sphere, a term used to describe two-dimensional representation of the globe) to illustrate the impossibility of their union. He "defines" his love by these images of impossibility.

Many of Marvell's earlier poems deal with the subject of retirement or withdrawal from public life to a life of private contemplation. Indeed, many critics divide Marvell's work into two bodies: his early poems in praise of the contemplative life and his later poems that address more explicitly political subjects and advocate engagement in public, political life. Many of his poems praising retirement employ imagery of gardens and green woods, a trait that has led to his being called "the green poet" or "the garden poet" for his pastoral works.

"The Garden" exemplifies this type of poem. In it, Marvell wavers between whimsy and melancholy as he describes the joys of solitude in a lush, green garden. The garden is the home of "Fair Quiet" and "Innocence," far from the "busy companies of men." Paradoxically, the lack of human company results in a higher form of civilization: "Society is all but rude,/ To this delicious solitude." In arguing that solitude in the garden is superior to love, he inverts romantic images from classical mythology, claiming that Apollo was rewarded, rather than thwarted, when Daphne, his romantic quarry, was metamorphosed into a tree; likewise, he suggests that Pan pursued Syrinx "Not as a nymph, but for a reed." In typical fashion, however, Marvell subtly qualifies the paradisiacal scene, suggesting that the garden may not be as perfect as the speaker describes. The speaker stumbles over fruits and vines and says "Ensnared with flowers, I fall on grass," recalling Adam's fall in Eden. As the speaker withdraws further and further into inward contemplation in the garden, his thoughts destructively begin "Annihilating all that's made/ To a green thought in a green shade." Marvell moves this vaguely unhealthy solipsism into hubris as the self-absorbed speaker criticizes the Divine plan, saying "Two paradises 'twere in one/ To live in paradise alone." As in many of Marvell's poems, the meaning rests on the reader's interpretation of the tone. Despite the subtly qualifying negative imagery, the garden is portrayed throughout as beautiful and peaceful. Marvell appears neither to embrace wholeheartedly nor to reject entirely retirement in the garden, and his equivocal lyrics seem to suggest an ideal of balance between total withdrawal and engagement in society.

Marvell explores the issue of pastoral retirement versus engagement in worldly affairs in other poems such as "The Nymph Complaining for the Death of her Fawn," which offers the garden as a fragile refuge from violent society, "The Emigrants in the Bermudas," which posits the necessity of escape from corrupt society in order to achieve spiritual perfection, and the several "Mower" poems, which depict meadows and gardens as wholesome retreats from unhappy social relations. The subject receives its fullest treatment in the lengthy "Upon Appleton House." As in "The Garden," the positive values of retirement are expounded through garden imagery. In this work, however, Marvell is more openly ambivalent about the virtues of retirement. The poem celebrates the character, home, and family of his employer, Lord Fairfax. Fairfax embodies all the positive qualities that Marvell sees as springing from a life of retirement and contemplation. Marvell suggests, however, that Fairfax has a responsibility to bestow the benefits of his virtue on society by taking active part in the politics of the day. Unlike "The Garden," "Upon Appleton House" does not ignore the political and social exigencies of the day; Fairfax cannot live in a kind of horticultural vacuum. Instead, Fairfax must cultivate and cherish the values nurtured in retirement but use them in the service of society. That is achieved metaphorically through the marriage of Fairfax's daughter Mary, as she takes the values of Appleton House out into the wider world.

"Upon Appleton House" can be considered a bridge to Marvell's later poems advocating active engagement in society and politics. Marvell recognized that the extraordinary times in which he lived required individuals of integrity and ability to take an active role in the conduct of the state. As Marvell himself became increasingly involved in public life, his work was likewise concerned more and more with political topics. Among his politicized writings are several poems praising Cromwell, satires such as "Last Instructions to a Painter," which severely criticized English policies and politicians, and a number of political pamphlets.

“TO HIS COY MISTRESS”

First published: 1681 (collected in Miscellaneous Poems, 1681)

Type of work: Poem

The swift passage of time and its attendant decay is a compelling reason to enjoy life's pleasures in the present, but it may also be as strong an argument for religiously motivated abstinence.

“To His Coy Mistress” is a witty exploration of the traditional carpe diem theme, and it can be read on several levels. On the surface, it functions extremely effectively as a lover’s argument in favor of pursuing pleasure. The speaker begins by assuring his lady that, “Had we but world enough, and time,” he would be well content to love her at a slow pace, devoting thousands of years to adoring each part of her. Time in this stanza is an agent of growth, as the speaker assures his beloved, “My vegetable love should grow/ Vaster than empires, and more slow.” The initial stanza moves at a leisurely metrical pace as the speaker uses extravagant and playful images to persuade the lady of his devotion and his wish that he could love her with the slow thoroughness that she deserves.

In the second stanza, the speaker shifts to images of swiftly passing time to impress upon his love that they in fact do not have the leisure to love at this slow rate. “At my back I always hear/ Time’s winged chariot hurrying near,” he says. Now time is destructive, and the meter moves rapidly. The speaker resorts to images of decay that are at once whimsical and frightening as he attempts to convince the beloved of the need to consummate their love in the present. Though images of death and decay are not unusual in carpe diem lyrics, Marvell’s images are particularly graphic and alarming: “in thy marble vault . . . / worms shall try/ That long-preserved virginity:/ And your quaint honour turn to dust.” The speaker employs dark humor as he ironically comments, “The grave’s a fine and private place,/ But none, I think, do there embrace.”

The third stanza exhorts the beloved to action. While they are still young, able, and desirable, he urges, they should “sport” while they may, and “Rather at once our time devour,/ Than languish in his slow-chapped power.” By seizing the initiative and enthusiastically embracing life and pleasure, they can win a victory over destructive Time: “Thus, though we cannot make our sun/ Stand still, yet we will make him run.”

As always, though, Marvell is aware of an equally compelling counterpoint to his argument, and he chooses ambiguous imagery to communicate it subtly. In the first stanza, Marvell uses explicitly religious terminology to describe the enormous length of time that he would like to devote to the wooing of his lady: “I would/ Love you ten years before the flood:/ And you should, if you please, refuse/ Till the conversion of Jews” (it was a traditional belief that the Jews would convert to Christianity at the end of the world). Marvell thus evokes a specifically divine or eternal time frame, with overtones of judgment (the Flood was divine punishment for the human race’s corruption) and salvation.

Similarly, the following stanzas are studded with religious references. Marvell conjures up an image of the “Deserts of vast eternity” that lie before the lovers, an image that may spur his beloved to action in this life but may just as well remind her of her eternal afterlife. He argues that time will turn her honor to “dust” and his lust to “ashes,” suggesting the terminology of the Christian burial service. He refers to the way (in reality or perhaps merely in his hopes) that her “willing soul transpires/ At every pore with instant fires.” Conjoining images of souls and fires cannot help but suggest hellfire and eternal damnation.

The final stanza, in which he urges action, presents a problematic vision of love. He compares himself and his lover to sportive animals, specifically “amorous birds of prey,” an odd image to use in attempting to win his lady. The love that he describes seems rough and violent: He suggests that they “devour” their time and says, “Let us . . . / Tear our pleasures with rough strife/ Thorough the iron grates of life” (“thorough” here means “through”). The lines have a rather strange and unromantic ring and qualify the speaker’s ostensibly enthusiastic description of love. Love as described in this stanza is not conventionally sweet and sentimental but rather vaguely dangerous and threatening; beneath the surface, Marvell seems to be issuing a warning as much as an exhortation.

More than a love poem, “To His Coy Mistress” is a meditation on time and death. Marvell dramatizes the questions: What are the implications of physicality and mortality? In using time most wisely, should one focus on this life or the afterlife? Marvell avoids a simple, conventional answer, and the poem works well as an argument for either view.

“AN HORATIAN ODE”

First published: 1681 (collected in Miscellaneous Poems, 1681)

Type of work: Poem

Cromwell, the hero and prime mover of the English Civil War, which led to the overthrow of King Charles I, is celebrated as a valorous man of action, but Marvell warns that his exercise of power must be tempered with prudence and restraint.

Like “To His Coy Mistress,” “An Horatian Ode” operates on several levels. On the surface, it is a conventional celebratory ode about a military and political hero, praising his exploits and virtues. One can infer from Marvell’s other laudatory poems about Oliver Cromwell that the poet genuinely admired the lord protector; the tone of the poem is not openly ironic. Woven into the praise, however, or hidden behind it, are subtle signs indicating an equivocal attitude toward Cromwell and his achievements.

Cromwell is depicted as a larger-than-life figure, a conqueror who is almost as much a force of nature as a man; Marvell compares him to “three-forked lightning” and calls him a “greater spirit.” He is likened to a scourge of God, sweeping away corruption. “’Tis madness to resist or blame/ The force of angry heaven’s flame.” He is a conqueror on a par with “Caesar” and “Hannibal.” Yet intermingled with this praise for Cromwell is a sense of regret at the destruction of ancient institutions. The effect of Cromwell’s revolution has been “to ruin the great work of time,” in other words, society and government as it had been. Marvell calls Cromwell an instrument of fate and power rather than one of righteousness when he says “Though justice against fate complain,/ And plead the ancient rights in vain:/ . . . those do hold or break/ As men are strong or weak.”

Of course, the greatest institution that Cromwell succeeded in destroying was the monarchy. Marvell treats the scene of King Charles I’s execution with great sensitivity and sympathy. The king is likened to an “actor” playing his final scene on a stagelike scaffold, while all around “the armed bands/ Did clap their bloody hands.” Marvell praises the dignity and courage of the king: “He nothing common did or mean/ Upon that memorable scene . . . / Nor called the gods with vulgar spite/ To vindicate his helpless right.” In describing the king’s execution, Marvell seems more concerned with the human drama than with the political circumstances surrounding the event; the king is not a tyrant or an enemy, but an admirably brave prisoner.

Beyond this open ambivalence are more indirect qualifications to the praise of Cromwell. The whole poem is rife with puns and double meanings, from the opening lines describing Cromwell’s supporters as “forward” (either “eager” or “presumptuous”—or both) to the sly description of Cromwell’s progress from farmer to conqueror and statesman. Before his emergence as a public figure, Marvell says, Cromwell labored in his “private gardens . . . / As if his highest plot/ To plant the bergamot.” The pun on “plot” is apparent, but the choice of “bergamot” is interesting. A bergamot is a fruit tree whose etymological name means “prince’s pear”; the reference is perhaps a swipe at Cromwell’s aspirations to rule.

A kind of resolution, or at least an acknowledgment, of the tensions established by his equivocal praise is achieved toward the end of the poem when Marvell openly expresses his concerns about Cromwell’s rule. Though he praises Cromwell for being responsive to the wishes of the people, having “his sword and spoils ungirt,/ To lay them at the public’s skirt,” he offers an explicit warning, both to Cromwell and to the people, about the exercise of absolute power and the possible necessity of further bloodshed to uphold it: “The same arts that did gain/ A power, must it maintain.”

SUMMARY

Andrew Marvell's poetry offers a clear, distinctive reflection of both the events and the issues of his time and of his own unique and penetrating mind. With wit and intelligence, he offers novel perspectives on poetical commonplaces from love to virtue (both individual and social) to death. By treating the conventional in a highly unconventional way, Marvell is able to reveal an astonishing complexity to his subjects, what T. S. Eliot calls "a recognition, implicit in the expression of every experience, of other kinds of experience which are possible." Marvell's conclusions are never forced or obvious; he subtly manipulates language and tone to hint at rather than clearly delineate his views and invites the reader to draw his own conclusions.

Marvell's work incorporates the best features not only of Metaphysical poetry but of all poetry: His depiction of individual consciousness is worthy of the Romantic poets, and his vivid treatment of public events and themes is equally adept and incisive. His harmonious blending of reason and passion as he treats the inner world and the outer world with equal ease assures him of a lasting and prominent place in the literary canon.

Catherine Swanson

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

The First Anniversary of the Government Under His Highness the Lord Protector, 1655

Miscellaneous Poems, 1681

Complete Poetry, 1968

NONFICTION:

The Rehearsal Transpros'd, 1672

The Rehearsal Transpros'd: The Second Part, 1673 (for modern editions of the two preceding entries, see The Rehearsal Transpros'd and The Rehearsal Transpros'd: The Second Part, 1971; D. I. B. Smith, editor)

Mr. Smirke: Or, The Divine in Mode, 1676

An Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government in England, 1677

Remarks upon a Late Disingenuous Discourse, 1678

The Prose Works of Andrew Marvell, 2003 (Martin Dzelzainis and Annabel Patterson, editors)

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Poems and Letters of Andrew Marvell, 1927, 1952, 1971 (H. Margoliouth, editor)

About the Author

Berthoff, Anne E. The Resolved Soul: A Study of Marvell's Major Poems. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1970.

Colie, Rosalie L. "My Ecchoing Song": Marvell's Poetry of Criticism. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1970.

Craze, Michael. The Life and Lyrics of Andrew Marvell. London: Macmillan, 1979.

Donno, Elizabeth Story. Andrew Marvell: The Critical Heritage. Boston: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1978.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How does Andrew Marvell's favorite poetic scheme of rhymed tetrameter couplets enforce the complexity of his themes?
- Are Marvell's images as "dissimilar" as T. S. Eliot asserts in his essay "The Metaphysical Poets"?
- What is the significance of mowing in Marvell's poems?
- Consider the denotations and connotations of the adjective in "To His Coy Mistress."
- Is "To His Coy Mistress" really addressed to a coy mistress?
- Should Marvell's poetry be associated less with the other Metaphysical poets and more with that of the seventeenth century Cavalier poets?

- Hunt, John Dixon. Andrew Marvell: His Life and Writings. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1978.
- Lord, George de Forest, ed. Andrew Marvell: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1968.
- Murray, Nicholas. World Enough and Time: The Life of Andrew Marvell. London: Little Brown, 1999.
- Patterson, Annabel. "Andrew Marvell and the Revolution." In The Cambridge Companion to Writing of the English Revolution, edited by N. H. Keeble. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Rees, Christine. The Judgment of Marvell. New York: Pinter, 1989.
- Von Maltzahn, Nicholas. "Andrew Marvell and the Prehistory of Whiggism." In "Cultures of Whiggism": New Essays on English Literature and Culture in the Long Eighteenth Century, edited by David Womersley, assisted with Paddy Bullard and Abigail Williams. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2005.
- _____. An Andrew Marvell Chronology. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2005.

MATSUO BASHŌ

Born: Ueno, Iga Province, Japan
1644

Died: Ōsaka, Japan
October 12, 1694

Although Bashō did not originate the haiku, he is credited with perfecting forms earlier made popular by such masters as Matsunaga Teitoku and Nishiyama Sōin.

BIOGRAPHY

Matsuo Bashō (maht-suh-oh bah-shoh), poet, essayist, critic, and writer of travel journals, was born Matsuo Kinsaku in Ueno, in the Iga Province in the western part of Honshu, the largest of the Japanese islands, in 1644. His father, Matsuo Yozaemon, is thought to have been a low-ranking samurai, and Bashō entered the service of Tōdō Yoshitada with the idea of following in that tradition. His master enjoyed writing haikai, or linked verse; thus, Bashō became interested in this form of poetry and began to write poems under the name of Sōbō. The earliest of his surviving verses, largely humorous and with clever wordplay, date from 1662. In 1666, his master died unexpectedly, and Bashō resigned his service, abandoning his hope of becoming a samurai, and began to travel. He continued to write haikai and published a collection of poems in 1672.

Also in 1672, Bashō moved to Edo (now Tokyo), where he gradually developed a literary reputation. Most of the early poems are of little literary value but are historically important. He acquired a large number of students, and this enabled Bashō to publish a collection of poems by twenty of these students.

Before the end of 1692, Bashō moved into a small hut in the Fukugawa district of Edo and began calling himself Bashō (“banana hut”) because of the association that people made between the poet and the banana trees planted near his hut. He studied Zen Buddhism for a time; some believe that Bashō, although now comfortable and fairly well known, was not spiritually at peace with himself during this period of his life. His poems changed in both style and form, suggesting that he wished to break down convention and add variety to his work.

In the fall of 1684, Bashō began the first of four famous journeys. While he continued to write haiku, these travels also provided the opportunity to write travel journals, a type of writing well known in Japan. The first trip extended from Edo westward to Ueno, his hometown area; he then moved on to Nagoya, Nara, Ōgaki, and Kyōto before returning to Edo the following summer. This journey resulted in the production of five volumes of linked verse by a team of poets, as well as the travel journal Nozarashi kikō (1687; The Records of a Weather-Exposed Skeleton, 1966). The journal, though uneven in quality, has a serious theme: the search for freedom from self-doubt. This journey seems to have been helpful in finding that freedom.

The next journey, of about ten months, retraced his first one only until he arrived in Ueno; there he continued to Suma and Akashi, on the Inland Sea, and then on to Sarashina in the Japan Alps. In addition to haiku inspired by the trip, Bashō wrote two more poetic diaries, Oi no kobumi (1709; The Records of a Travel-Worn Satchel, 1966), which covers the journey as far as Akashi, and Sarashina kikō (1704; A Visit to Sarashina Village, 1966), which describes his travels through the mountains to Sarashina. The first volume sounds almost didactic, as if he were teaching a lesson.

Having had a successful second journey, Bashō headed north on his next venture. This trip was a long period of 156 days and about fifteen hundred miles of travel through some of Japan’s less developed areas. He left in the late spring of 1689, traveling through a number of cities that he had not visited before, and concluded his journey at Ōgaki. This journey was also a significant one in his literary career. He composed some of his best poetry, developed the principle of sabi, a nonemotional kind of loneliness associated with beauty, and produced one of the greatest of the Japanese poetic diaries, Oku no hosomichi (1694; The Narrow Road to the Deep North, 1933).

Following this northern trip, Bashō spent about two years in the Kyōto area, where he produced some of his most mature work before returning to Edo in the winter of 1691. He had some heavy responsibilities during this period and became quite depressed. In 1694, however, he set out again on a westward journey during the summer, but while he was in Ōsaka, he developed a serious stomach condition, from which he died on October 12, 1694.

ANALYSIS

The works of Bashō represent a high point in the history of Japanese poetics. He is chiefly known as a writer of the haiku, a tiny poem that, unless irregular, contains seventeen syllables in three lines of five, seven, and five syllables each. Actually, in Bashō's lifetime, the term haiku had not yet come into use. Haiku comes from the blending of haikai, or linked verse, and hokku, the starting verse of a haikai. Over time, the hai of haikai was combined with the -ku of hokku to form haiku. Thus, the opening verse of a group of linked verses came to stand independently as a poem.

In addition to his mastery of the haiku and of travel diaries, Bashō was also an excellent teacher of verse writing. His poetic ideas were never recorded as a poetic theory, and some of them are very difficult to comprehend. Some of the most important of these ideas were those of the poetic spirit, sabi, shiori, slenderness, inspiration, fragrance, reverberation, reflection, plainness, and highness. Actually, the concept of the poetic spirit is central, and the rest could almost be considered various aspects of the poetic spirit. This poetic spirit can be categorized into a style that has both qualities transcending time and place and a quality that is rooted in the taste of the times.

Bashō's poetic spirit is the source of all art and goes back to the source of the universe. It is something of a return to a beautiful nature whose creation and appreciation differentiate the civilized and the uncivilized. The two major aspects of Bashō's poetic spirit are a high spiritual attainment, on one hand, and a mundane enjoyment of pleasure in the modern world, on the other. The goal of enlightenment is at the center of spiritual attainment, while enjoyment of the world includes such ideas as plainness and lightness.

Some of the values that contribute to attaining enlightenment include sabi, shiori, and slenderness. Sabi connotes a kind of objective, nonemotional loneliness, not grief or sorrow, which are emotional traits. Bashō's kind of loneliness is enjoyable and is associated with impersonal nature, not human life. It has been said that Bashō found sabi in this haiku:

Under the blossoms
Two aged watchmen,
With their white heads together.

Shiori, unlike sabi, which manifests the poet's attitude toward life, derives loneliness from the structure of the poem itself. Shiori can mean "to be flexible" or "to drop" or "wither." Both meanings seem to apply in Bashō's usage. Thus, a poem with shiori may have several layers of meaning open to several interpretations while at the same time creating an atmosphere of loneliness. Bashō found shiori in the following haiku:

The Ten Dumplings
Have become smaller, too—
The autumn wind.

Also important to an analysis of the haiku are the concepts of the "cutting word," kireji, and the "season-word," kigo. The cutting word often follows the subject, but a verb is missing, forcing the reader to supply one; this omission results in a kind of ambiguity that is vague and impersonal. Kigo, the season-word, is a part of the traditional rule that a haiku must contain a word associated with a particular season, for according to Bashō, each poem must present an atmosphere of nature, which, of course, is seasonal. Fall is the season mentioned in this translation of one of Bashō's poems:

On the Stone Mountain
It is whiter than the stones:
Autumnal wind.

Slenderness can perhaps be explained best by imagining the mind as being so slender that it is able to pierce and enter any kind of object and reach and touch its innermost life. Bashō used as an example of a poem with slenderness one of his own:

The salted sea bream's
Gums are chilly, too,
At the fish shop.

With this mental slenderness, not actual physical touch, the poet feels the chilliness in this objective, impersonal poem.

Another term necessary to an understanding of some of Bashō's haiku is synesthesia, the process of describing one of the senses in terms of another. Thus, the fragrance of peach blossoms may be described as being whiter than that of daffodils; a duck's cry is white; the autumn wind is whiter than the rocks of Ishiyama (which are noted for being white). Using these surprising comparisons seems to imply an interrelatedness of all things; the descriptions are not made for their shock effect, but rather because they employ the essence of the natural, simple, even primitive, in nature.

Later in his life, Bashō developed the idea of lightness, by which he seems to have meant a kind of beauty that is always plain, simple, ordinary. On one occasion, Bashō illustrated the concept by comparing vegetable soup (light) and duck stew (heavy, dark). It is a beauty that is unsophisticated, simple, and delicate rather than sophisticated, ornate, and heavy in any way. Thus, this concept of lightness does not indicate lightness in the sense of frivolousness or lack of substance, although humor may not be missing. For the unenlightened Buddhist who views life as constant suffering, detachment from the cares of the world enables one to see the humor of things, that is, to take a "light-hearted" attitude toward things, to smile in a world full of grief.

For Bashō, then, the essential element for a successful haiku is complete impersonality, the ability to view things as nature does, devoid of emotion. His success in perfecting the haiku form resulted in his enjoying a reputation that few other Japanese poets have enjoyed. His influence is so pervasive that no poet after him could write a haiku without an awareness of that influence. Nor has that influence stopped on the shores of Japan: The writing of haiku is international, even attempted in Western languages.

"ON A WITHERED BRANCH"

First published: "Kareeda ni," c. 1673-1680
(collected in A Zen Wave: Bashō's Haiku and Zen, 1979)

Type of work: Poem

The small black body of a crow on a dead tree limb is contrasted with the dull darkness of an autumn night.

"On a Withered Branch" is a well-known haiku written by Bashō during the developing stage of his career. During this period, from 1673 to 1680, he often used the technique of the surprising comparison. Coming fairly early in his career, the poem also contains elements characteristic of some earlier work in which the poem was intended to amuse with puns, or play on words. Both in identifying wordplay and in counting syllables, English translations can rarely render the poem satisfactorily. One must see the Japanese version to understand some of the important elements of the haiku:

Kareeda ni	On a withered branch
Karasu no tomari keri	A Crow is perched—
Aki no kure	Autumn evening.

Kareeda, translated as "withered," is understood to be a "dead" branch, thus providing a contrast with the living bird perched upon it. The word karasu ("crow") is the same as the transitive verb form karasu, meaning "to cause to wither" or "to kill," thus showing some wordplay typical of Bashō's early work. Tomari ("perched") signifies stopping or staying, as a temporary stopover at a hotel. Keri is an example of the "cutting word"; a literal translation would be simply "crow's perch." There is no word for "is." Thus, the keri leaves the relationship of the perched crow to the poem's next line vague and impersonal. The autumn nightfall is simply juxtaposed with the preceding concept, allowing readers to make their own connections. The Japanese lines follow a 5-9-5 pattern rather than the typical 5-7-5: ka-re-e-da-ni, ka-ra-su-no-to-ma-ri-ke-ri, and a-ki-no-ku-re.

The image of the small (relative to a tree) living crow, with shiny black feathers, perched on the dead tree limb, provides an interesting contrast with the dull darkness of nightfall on an autumn evening. The darkness of the night is of a very different order of blackness from that of the bird. Another convention of the haiku, the “season-word,” is provided by the reference to autumn. Autumn, also the “fall” of the year, suggests the dying period of the year, even as the tree limb is a dead one.

All together, the images come together to evoke a certain kind of loneliness as the outline of the crow is viewed against the background of the immense universe.

“THE SEA DARKENS”

First published: “Umi kurete,” c. 1685
(collected in Bashō’s Haiku: Selected Poems of Matsuo Bashō, 2004)

Type of work: Poem

As night approaches, the call of a wild duck is interpreted in terms of color rather than sound.

“The Sea Darkens” belongs to a period of Bashō’s career in which he was searching for his unique identity as a poet. Most critics agree that he reached at this stage a peak level in the composition of haiku. To see how the poem distributes the seventeen syllables among the lines in a 5-5-7 (irregular) pattern, it is necessary to look at the Japanese words:

5
Umi kurete		The sea darkens
5
Kamo no koe		The cries of the wild ducks
7
Homokani shiroshi		Are faintly white.

Bashō wrote this haiku on the first of his four long journeys. The poem, written on a day spent on the seacoast, appeared in a travel journal of that trip, Nozarashi kikō (1687; The Records of a Weather-Exposed Skeleton, 1966), in 1687.

Bashō uses synesthesia as a significant convention in this poem. Synesthesia refers to one sense being described in terms of another. Thus, the sound of the duck is described as being a color, white. The cosmic loneliness, or stillness, amid the approaching darkness is broken by the sounds of the ducks flying overhead and is interpreted as “seeing white,” so to speak, rather than as “hearing sound.” Thus, a vision of the ultimate interrelatedness of all things and events in the universe is captured in this tiny poem.

“OLD POND”

First published: “Furuike ya,” c. 1686-1691
(collected in A Zen Wave: Bashō’s Haiku and Zen, 1979)

Type of work: Poem

A frog leaping into an old pond provides a contrast between the small finite and the vast infinite.

“Old Pond” is possibly the best-known haiku in English translation. Written sometime between 1686 and 1691, it is a product of the poet’s peak period. During this time, a number of the poems focused on the manifestation of sabi, that objective, nonemotional loneliness so difficult to define clearly in English, or in Japanese, for that matter.

This haiku follows the classical pattern of a 5-7-5 arrangement of the seventeen syllables in three lines:

5
Furuike ya		Old pond:
7
Kawazu tobikomu		frog jumps in 5
Mizu no oto		water-sound.

A number of translations have been made of this famous haiku. W. G. Aston’s rendition is perhaps among those closest to the actual Japanese wording, and it exemplifies the notion of juxtaposing images without using connecting words.

The colon at the end of the first line denotes the ya, or the “cutting word” that separates the subject from the rest of the poem, leaving the reader to make an appropriate association between the elements. The first image here is an ancient, ageless, primeval natural phenomenon, the pond. Possibly for centuries it has existed in stillness—infinite, timeless. In an instant, that quiet is broken by the intrusion of the splash of a small, living (and hence recent, immediate) object. This contrast elicits the accepting, perhaps welcomed, feeling of loneliness as the two elements make contact. Harold G. Henderson provides a Zen interpretation by attributing symbolism to the frog’s leap: The jump into the pond symbolizes a sudden leap to satori, or spiritual enlightenment.

SUMMARY

Matsuo Bashō is credited with perfecting the haikai form, following the lead of such masters as Matsunaga Teitoku and Nishiyama Sōin. It would be largely the efforts of Masaoka Shiki to establish formally the independence of the hokku, the opening verse of the haikai (linked verse), to form the term haiku.

While Bashō never wrote a theory of poetry, his poetic ideas focused on several elements that include, in particular, the concept of the poetic spirit, which is manifested in such qualities as sabi (loneliness); shiori, a loneliness produced out of the poem’s structure, manifested in great flexibility in meaning; slenderness, inspiration, fragrance, plainness, and lightness. Haiku need not be logical in its internal structure, but it must be objective and impersonal. Understanding the feelings of the ordinary individual in everyday life was of great importance to Bashō, and this belief is echoed in the subject matter of the haiku. Bashō may have anticipated the difficulty that some readers would have understanding some of his haiku when he commented that if they could not understand them naturally, they would have trouble understanding them at all.

Victoria Price

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Sarumino, 1691 (Monkey’s Raincoat, 1973)

Bashō’s Haiku: Selected Poems by Matsuo Bashō, 2004

Haikai shichibu-sh, n.d.

NONFICTION:

Nozarashi kikō, 1687 (travel; The Records of a Weather-Exposed Skeleton, 1966)

Oku no hosomichi, 1694 (travel; The Narrow Road to the Deep North, 1933)

Sarashina kikō, 1704 (travel; A Visit to Sarashina Village, 1966)

Oi no kobumi, 1709 (travel; The Records of a Travel-Worn Satchel, 1966)

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Essential Bashō, 1999

About the Author

Aitken, Robert. A Zen Wave: Bashō’s Haiku and Zen. New York: Weatherhill, 1979.

Campbell, Liberty. To a Far Province with Bashō. Pittsburgh, Pa.: J. Pohl Associates, 1983.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- To what extent does the view of the world found in Matsuo Bashō resemble Epicureanism?
- What are the obstacles to translating a Japanese haiku effectively into English?
- What poets writing in English have used synesthesia in Bashō’s manner?
- What forms of lyric poetry seem to come closest to haiku?
- Explain the effect of the “cutting word” in haiku.
- What does Bashō mean by “lightness”?

- Crowley, Cheryl A. Hakai Poet Yosa Buson and the Bashō Revival. Boston: Brill, 2007.
- Henderson, Harold G. An Introduction to Haiku: An Anthology of Poems and Poets from Bashō to Shiki. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1958.
- Kerkham, Eleanor, ed. Matsuo Bashō's Poetic Spaces: Exploring Haikai Intersections. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.
- Miner, Earl. Japanese Linked Poetry: An Account with Translations of Renga and Haikai Sequences. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1979.
- Qiu, Peipei. Bashō and the Dao: The Zhuangzi and the Transformation of Haikai. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2005.
- Sato, Hiroaki. One Hundred Frogs: From Renga to Haiku to English. New York: Weatherhill, 1983.
- Ueda, Makoto. Matsuo Bashō. New York: Twayne, 1970.
- _____. Matsuo Bashō. Tokyo: Kodansha, 1983.
- _____. Zeami, Bashō, Yeats, Pound: A Study in Japanese and English Poetics. The Hague, the Netherlands: Mouton, 1965.

Library of Congress

W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM

Born: Paris, France
January 25, 1874

Died: Nice, France
December 16, 1965

A prolific novelist, short-story writer, and playwright, Maugham, who wrote unabashedly for popular audiences, was a skilled craftsman and satirist.

BIOGRAPHY

William Somerset Maugham (mawm) was born in the British Embassy in Paris, France, on January 25, 1874, and was therefore a British subject. French was his first language, however, and he spent much of his life in France. His father, Robert Ormond Maugham, an attorney whose firm, Maugham and Sewell, was located in Paris, was married to Edith Mary Snell Maugham, twenty-one years his junior.

Willie, as Maugham was familiarly called, was the family's fourth son and was reared virtually as an only child. He was six years younger than his next youngest brother Henry Neville, who, with the other two brothers, Frederic Herbert (born in 1866) and Charles Ormond (born in 1865), was sent to the Dover School in England before Willie knew them well.

When Maugham was eight, his mother, suffering from tuberculosis, died a week after bearing another son, who also died. Two and a half years later, Robert Maugham succumbed to cancer, leaving Maugham an orphan. The boy was sent to England to live with his uncle, a stolid, humorless clergyman, in Kent. He attended the junior annex of King's School in Canterbury until he was sixteen. Leaving King's School in 1891, Maugham spent an academic year in Germany, where he enrolled in Heidelberg University to study philosophy and literature. It was there that he had his first homosexual encounters and began to act on the sexual impulses that would help define his life.

Enrolling as a medical student at St. Thomas's Hospital in London in 1892, he received the medical degree in 1897, the year in which his first novel, Liza of Lambeth (1897), based on his hospital experiences, was published. England was still gripped by Victorian prudery. In 1895, Oscar Wilde was convicted under the Sexual Offenses Act of 1867 for having sexual liaisons with Alfred Lord Douglas and was sentenced to a prison term. This conviction sent a chill through the homosexual world and caused the homosexual minority, including Maugham, to become more repressed than ever before.

The publication of Liza of Lambeth allowed Maugham to abandon his medical career to pursue writing. For the next six years, during which he traveled extensively in Spain and Italy, his writing received little notice. His books, which included The Making of a Saint (1898), Orientations (1899), The Hero (1901), Mrs. Craddock (1902), The Merry-Go-Round (1904), The Land of the Blessed Virgin: Sketches and Impressions in Andalusia (1905; also known as Andalusia, 1920), The Bishop's Apron (1906), The Explorer (1907), and The Magician (1908), attracted small audiences but are meaningful because they affirm the fact that Maugham never stopped writing. His first really successful novel was the autobiographical Of Human Bondage (1915).

Maugham's first play, A Man of Honour (wr. 1898-1899, pr., pb. 1903) was performed in 1903. In 1907, his play Lady Frederick (pr. 1907, pb. 1912) had its premiere at the Royal Court Theatre, and a year later, Maugham had three other plays—Jack Straw (pr. 1908, pb. 1911), Mrs. Dot (pr. 1908, pb. 1912), and The Explorer (pr. 1908, pb. 1912)—running in London.

In 1906, Maugham began an affair with Sue (Ethelwyn Sylvia) Jones that lasted for almost eight years. When she declined to marry him, he began a liaison with Syrie Wellcome that culminated in his marrying her in 1916. She divorced him in 1927; they had one daughter, Lisa, born in 1915.

During the first year of World War I, Maugham served in a British ambulance unit in France. At about the time Of Human Bondage was published, he was moved to Military Intelligence in Geneva. During 1916, he and Gerald Haxton, whom he had met during his service in the ambulance unit and whom he called the most significant male love of his life, traveled to the South Seas, where Maugham first saw Paul Gauguin's paintings and found the germ of his novel The Moon and Sixpence (1919).

After the publication of The Moon and Sixpence, Maugham returned to the South Seas and embarked on several years of world travel. Now that his writing was reaching extensive audiences, his literary future seemed assured. The year after Maugham was divorced from Syrie, he purchased Villa Mauresque at Saint-Jean-Cap-Ferrat in southern France, near Nice. Except for the six years he lived in the United States during World War II, Maugham spent the remainder of his life at Villa Mauresque, although he traveled abroad for about half of every year.

After settling into his new estate, Maugham wrote Cakes and Ale (1930), generally considered his most successful novel. In 1933, he stopped writing for the theater and concentrated on novels, short stories, and autobiographical works, producing numerous books between 1928 and his death in 1965. The most noted of these were The Summing Up (1938), Strictly Personal (1941), The Razor's Edge (1944), and A Writer's Notebook (1949). During the 1940's, Maugham, working intermittently in Hollywood, spent his winters in South Carolina and his summers at Edgartown on Cape Cod. The Razor's Edge was made into a successful film, and the well-received film Quartet (1949), based on four of his short stories, was followed by Encore (1951), based on three of his stories, and Trio (1950), for which he wrote the screenplay.

Maugham never recovered fully from his mother's death in 1882, and he frequently dissolved into tears when he thought or spoke about her. He was deeply shaken as well by the death in 1944 of Haxton, his lifelong friend who had served as his secretary. In 1945, Alan Searle, with whom Maugham had had a love affair that began at about the time Syrie divorced him, became his secretary and continued in that capacity until the writer's demise. Searle handled most of the details of Maugham's day-to-day existence and was sufficiently comforting to him that in 1962 Maugham adopted Searle legally, in part to prevent his daughter and other members of his family from being appointed guardians.

On December 10, 1965, Maugham fell and cut his head. He was taken to a hospital in Nice, where his condition became grave, and on December 15 he slipped into a coma. He died in the hospital on December 16.

ANALYSIS

Somerset Maugham never claimed to be a deep intellectual, a writer in whose work future generations of critics would reveal deep, arcane meaning. Rather, he considered himself a storyteller whose stated objective was to entertain. Perhaps in billing himself thus, Maugham sold himself short. Although a few academic critics—most notably Richard A. Cordell, who wrote seriously about Maugham's work produced from the 1930's until after Maugham's death—paid him more than condescending attention, most have scored his work. Some, like Brigid Brophy, Michael Levey, and Charles Osborne, wrote viciously about him, saying in Fifty Works of English and American Literature We Could Do Without (1968) that Maugham worked always "at the frontiers of his meager imagination" and contending that the talent he possessed was not enough "to sustain one's interest in his narrative." Despite such vitriolic expressions of derision from various quarters, Maugham's writing delighted an enthusiastic reading public for half a century.

That Maugham wrote with a conscious artistry and with remarkably even craftsmanship is undeniable. His reputation suffered in his time from various accusations that had little to do with his artistic achievement, notably his homosexual lifestyle, his seeming indifference to his daughter, his seeming misogyny, and his supposed anti-Semitism. Ted Morgan, one of his posthumous biographers, fueled anti-Maugham sentiments in his biography, Maugham (1980). Morgan demonstrates homophobia and a self-righteous misunderstanding of the role that homosexuality and male friendships played in the author's life. Robert Calder's Willie: The Life of W. Somerset Maugham (1989) sets right many of the misapprehensions set forth in Morgan's book, which, although thoroughly researched and well written, proceeds from such a biased point of view as to be frequently misleading.

Maugham is at his best when he writes from his own experience. His most celebrated work, Of Human Bondage, is consistently autobiographical. Liza of Lambeth grew out of situations Maugham encountered as a medical student. Much of his work focuses on the role of artists in society and on the sacrifices they make for the sake of art. In The Moon and Sixpence, for example, Maugham writes about Charles Strickland, a stolid, socially correct British businessman with the requisite wife and children. He secretly yearns to be a painter. Strickland finally leaves his secure life, goes to Paris, and paints. His wife, thinking that he has left her for another woman, follows him, believing she can win him back. When she learns, however, that the mistress with whom she is competing is art, she has to admit defeat. She returns to England and Strickland goes off to the South Seas, much as the painter Paul Gauguin had done, where he lives the remainder of his life painting the lustrous scenes of his land of heart's desire.

Maugham certainly had experienced the emotions he attributes to Strickland. In his mid-forties, he was married to a woman with whom he had a child out of wedlock. He also had a homosexual lover and was obsessed by a burning desire to travel as much as he could. He was a successful writer who had a distinct plan for the remainder of his creative life, but that plan was not really consistent with the life he found himself living.

Maugham knew that the life of an artist, no matter how successful, is always a precarious one. He had lived through Oscar Wilde's disgrace and had seen this notable playwright and salon dandy ruined both personally and financially by his conviction for committing homosexual acts. Over and above this, Maugham was never sure of the love of other people. Had not his mother, who loved him dearly, abandoned him by dying when he was eight years old?

Maugham's stories often focus on artists struggling to be artists, as in his notable short story "The Alien Corn," in which the protagonist, George, refuses to stand for Parliament because he wants to be a pianist. Philip Carey, the protagonist in Of Human Bondage, faces the struggle of justifying himself as the artist he needs to be.

Perhaps Maugham's incredible and steady productivity was part of his daily struggle to justify himself. Nuances in much of his writing suggest this, and a letter from Maugham to the French scholar Paul Dottin written on October 23, 1927, clearly outlines what Maugham hoped to accomplish artistically in the next decade. He was beginning to have a sense of his own mortality—he would turn sixty-five in 1939—and he outlined for Dottin his literary plans for the years before he reached that age.

He told Dottin that he hoped to write three short stories to accompany the three others that came to constitute Six Stories Written in the First Person Singular (1931); a novel set in the Malay, which became The Narrow Corner (1932); another book of short stories that did not materialize; a book set in Spain, which became Don Fernando (1935); a book of Malay stories, resulting in Ah King: Six Stories (1933); a picaresque English novel, Cakes and Ale (1930); and a final volume written to assess his work and life, The Summing Up (1938). Few authors have made such long-range, systematic plans, and the few who have did not adhere to them as doggedly as Maugham did.

Maugham did not foresee, apparently, that by 1938 he would write four more books other than those on his outline: Ashenden: Or, The British Agent (1928), The Gentleman in the Parlour: A Record of a Journey from Rangoon to Haiphong (1930), Cosmopolitans (1936), and Theatre (1937). He also failed to realize that he would live for twenty-seven years after the publication of The Summing Up and would produce a score of books in those years.

Maugham surmises in The Summing Up that his position in literary history is not likely to be a secure one. He notes that few serious critics have analyzed his work and that "clever young men who write about fiction” do not include him in their considerations. Despite such expressions, Maugham’s stock rose considerably in his later years and has gained even more ground since his death. Two major bibliographies, one of his writing and one of Maugham criticism, appeared in the early 1970’s. At least ten scholarly books about him have been published since 1970, and scholarly articles about him continue to appear in recognized journals.

OF HUMAN BONDAGE

First published: 1915

Type of work: Novel

Philip Carey, after the loss of his mother, undergoes a difficult education that leads to his accepting life as a compromise.

Of Human Bondage, published when Maugham had just ended his fourth decade, was a highly polished, considerably more mature book than its unpublished antecedent, “The Artistic Temperament of Steven Carey,” written during a sojourn in Spain and unpublished first because Maugham did not want it published at once, and later because no publisher would accept it. Any disappointment that ensued from that book’s rejection was well assuaged over succeeding years when Maugham—now a mature writer with considerable experience in writing plays, short stories, and novels—returned to the manuscript around 1911 and began to rewrite it, this time renaming the protagonist Philip Carey. The result was Of Human Bondage, probably Maugham’s best-known novel and certainly among his two or three most artistically successful ones. The philosophical scope of this book far exceeds that of the earlier version, presumably because Maugham had now matured into middle age.

By this time he realized that he did his best writing when he wrote about his own experience. Also by this time he had experienced considerable success as a playwright and was able to apply to his prose writing some of the techniques he had learned as a dramatist, thereby bringing greater dramatic tension into his fiction.

Philip Carey’s story, with certain artistic alterations, is Maugham’s own story. The novel opens when the young Philip is informed of his mother’s death. The boy went to his mother’s closet, just as young Willie did, and wrapped his arms around as many of her dresses as possible, burying his face in them, inhaling the lingering vestiges of his mother’s perfume. Like Maugham, Philip is soon sent to England to live with his uncle, a vicar, and his Aunt Louisa. Philip differs from Willie in that he has a club foot, but this touch is simply a substitution for Willie’s affliction: stuttering. The young Maugham stuttered badly, particularly after the death of his parents, and suffered from this problem throughout his life. As Philip was abused by the students and masters of the school he attended at Tercanberry, so was Maugham ridiculed for his stuttering by his masters and fellow students at King’s School.

Through Philip, Maugham broaches the question of his own loss of religious faith. Young Philip hears that if one prays fervently enough, all one’s prayers will be answered. When he puts this guarantee to the test by praying as fervently as he can that his club foot will be made whole, his prayers are not answered. This disappointment unleashes a doubt that finally causes Philip to reject the religion in which he has been reared.

Now, no longer willing to tolerate the brutality of his schoolmasters, Philip goes to Heidelberg to study. It is there, in his close association with two intelligent friends and his immersion in the study of philosophy, that Philip disabuses himself of the notion that there is a God. He finds this revelation liberating. On his return to England, he meets Gertrude, his aunt’s German friend, and with her has his first sexual experience.

Philip is expected to be practical and to become self-supporting. He tries accounting but finds it unbearable. Reminiscent of Strickland in The Moon and Sixpence, Philip flees to Paris, where he studies art for two years, only to conclude that his talent is insufficient to justify further study.

Needing to find a way to support himself, Philip returns to England and, although his uncle opposes it, becomes a medical student at St. Thomas's Hospital, there meeting Mildred Rogers, a waitress at a nearby restaurant. He has an affair with her, but it ends when Mildred runs off with someone else. Then Mildred returns and announces that she is pregnant. Philip takes her in, imposing upon himself one of the bondages referred to in the book's title. Mildred, like Sue Jones in Maugham's own life, is less interested in him than he is in her.

When Mildred returns to stay with Philip, however, he has just met Norah Nesbitt, who is more interested in him than he is in her. As soon as Mildred leaves again, Philip seeks out Norah only to find that she has now made plans to marry someone else. Mildred, now a streetwalker, returns yet again, and Philip takes her in, but they obviously have no future together, and Mildred finally leaves for good.

When Philip's old Parisian friend, Cronshaw, dies, Philip recalls Cronshaw's comment that the meaning of life can be found in a Persian rug. He muses that life has no inherent pattern, that it is up to each individual to find a pattern and impose it upon life.

Finally, almost by default, Philip falls into an affair with Sally, the daughter of his friends, the Athelnys. After a scare that Sally might be pregnant proves to be groundless, Philip decides that he wants to marry her even though he does not love her. He needs the pattern that such a marriage will provide, just as Maugham apparently sought a similar pattern in his abortive marriage to Syrie Wellcome.

A major theme that emerges from Of Human Bondage is the futility of human relationships. Humans, having only themselves to depend upon, make compromise after compromise searching for the patterns that give order to their lives. Maugham's agnosticism and some of his cynicism about humanity are important elements in this novel.

THE RAZOR'S EDGE

First published: 1944

Type of work: Novel

Larry Darrell, an enigmatic young man, is involved in a spiritual quest that intrigues and mystifies those around him.

The Razor's Edge is quite similar to T. S. Eliot's The Cocktail Party (pr. 1949, pb. 1950). Celia Copplestone is a uniquely spiritual person surrounded by a group of people who have no notion of what she is about. Larry Darrell is the fiancé of Isabel, the niece of Elliott Templeton, who invites Mr. Maugham (referred to hereafter as Mr. Maugham to distinguish the character from author W. Somerset Maugham), who is visiting in Chicago, to dinner. Templeton is an old friend of Mr. Maugham, who that evening meets Templeton's niece Isabel, her mother Sophie (a friend of the family), and Gray, who eventually will marry Isabel.

Darrell, having just returned from the war, lives very much in his own world, surrounding himself with an invisible carapace that outsiders quickly realize they cannot penetrate. The air of mystery that surrounds Larry intrigues Mr. Maugham, who is impressed and curious to know more about him.

Soon Mr. Maugham learns that Larry has postponed his impending marriage to Isabel to go abroad, first to Paris and then to the East in an attempt to find the meaning of life, much as Celia Copplestone goes off to Kinkanja to seek her destiny. Further into the novel, Mr. Maugham also learns that Larry has come face-to-face with death in the war and that one of his close friends died saving him. A sensitive person, Larry has to find answers before he can get on with his life.

Throughout the rest of the novel, Maugham carries his readers with him, involving them intimately in Larry's quest but sharing with them, both as the author and as a character in his own novel, an inability to reach the spiritual pinnacle that Larry finally achieves. Although the novel is about Larry Darrell, readers learn little about him. He reveals little of himself and, in chapter 6, when the author records a conversation that Mr. Maugham had with Larry, he begins the chapter by telling his readers that they can skip it without losing the thread of the story. He goes on to say that had he not had this conversation, he would not have written The Razor's Edge.

It is a novel of spiritual quest, much as The Moon and Sixpence and Cakes and Ale were. The Razor's Edge, however, is more mystical than those novels. When he was working on this book, Maugham himself was on a quest that led him to consult his friend, Christopher Isherwood, and Isherwood's guru, Swami Prabhavananda, to find the precise meaning of a passage in the Katha Upanishad (c. 1000 B.C.E.), that was, indeed, rendered "the razor's edge" or "the edge of the razor." The razor, in this Upanishad, represents a narrow, painful path. Swami Prabhavananda equated it with enlightenment. He pointed out that some translations suggest that the path is difficult to cross, whereas the real problem is that of discovering how to walk upon the razor's edge. The Eastern mysticism in this novel represents a turning for Maugham and reminds one of The Cocktail Party and of E. M. Forster's A Passage to India (1924), a book Maugham did not particularly admire.

The particular skill Maugham demonstrates in this book is his ability to engage his readers in a mysterious quest in which he and his readers are both participants, all of them functioning on an equal basis. This device of engagement is unique and, in this case, highly successful, although it is a device that puts an author at risk because it could easily veer out of control. That Maugham could control it masterfully is evidence of an artistic advancement in a writer who was entering the eighth decade of his life. The amazing thing about Larry is that, once having achieved his spiritual quest, he can return to New York City—perhaps to support himself as a taxicab driver—and rise above the materialism and corruption in what was then the world's largest city. Maugham allows Larry to shape the pattern in his Persian rug much as Maugham had been trying to do.

“RAIN”

First published: 1921 (collected in The Trembling of a Leaf: Stories of the South Sea Islands, 1921)

Type of work: Short story

The Reverend Mr. Davidson sets out to reform the beautiful prostitute Sadie Thompson, but, overcome by his repressed desires, finally rapes her.

Originally titled “Sadie Thompson,” “Rain” was the second story in Maugham’s collection, The Trembling of a Leaf: Stories of the South Sea Islands (1921). Clearly his most famous short story, in 1925 it was turned into a highly successful drama, adapted by John Colton and Clarence Randolph, that ran for 648 performances on Broadway. The story is a finely tuned satire in which Maugham depicts the hypocrisy of conventional morality in devastating terms. He found his material for “Rain” on a trip he took with Gerald Haxton in 1916. The two sailed from San Francisco, first to Hawaii, then, aboard the Sonoma, to Pago Pago in Samoa. Among the passengers on board was a Miss Thompson, a prostitute from Honolulu who had, as it turned out, fled Hawaii after a police raid on the establishment in which she worked. She hoped that she could ply her trade in Western Samoa.

Using Miss Thompson’s actual last name and giving her the first name “Sadie,” Maugham wove an exceptionally well-balanced story involving two couples, Dr. and Mrs. McPhail and the Reverend Mr. and Mrs. Davidson, who became fast friends on a long, transpacific journey. They share a condescending attitude toward their fellow passengers, particularly those not traveling in first class. Dr. McPhail, a medical doctor, is about forty.

When the Sonoma is quarantined in Pago Pago, the McPhails and the Davidsons are housed, with their fellow passengers, in a hotel. They soon become aware of Sadie Thompson’s presence because boisterous laughing and loud music come from her room. Davidson decides that it is his duty to reform the unregenerate Sadie, and he goes about his task with a missionary zeal of which the two women approve but that Dr. McPhail views with some suspicion, despite his admiration for the clergyman, who, unlike the retiring and timid doctor, is stouthearted, self-assured, and stalwart.

Throwing himself fully into the moral challenge before him, Davidson, a trembling mass of repressed desire, finally rapes Sadie. The aftermath of this assault is an uncontrollable guilt that results in the clergyman's committing suicide. As the story ends, music and laughter drift in from Sadie's room. Sadie can be heard complaining that all men are beasts.

In this story, Maugham is in total control, balancing his characters against each other with an admirable precision. McPhail is the moderate. His wife is in the Davidsons' camp, and the Davidsons, of course, know what righteousness is and are determined to make everyone righteous whether they desire salvation or not. The ironies in the story contribute to a tightly constructed plot that, on a philosophical level, turns out to be quite profound.

This story, more than anything else Maugham wrote, is an encomium to those who hover around the bottom of the social ladder, people such as Liza in Liza of Lambeth or Mildred in Of Human Bondage. Perhaps as he developed the character of Davidson, Maugham thought back to the days when he lived with his cleric uncle in Whitstable or when he bore the taunts of his self-righteous masters at King's School.

"THE ALIEN CORN"

First published: 1931 (collected in Six Stories Written in the First Person Singular, 1931)

Type of work: Short story

A Jewish youth rejoices in his ethnicity. Refusing to stand for Parliament, he goes to Germany to study music, then, realizing his mediocrity, commits suicide.

"The Alien Corn" is included in Maugham's short-story collection, Six Stories Written in the First Person Singular (1931), and is a telling story in terms of what it reveals about the author's values and concerns. The story was adapted for film in 1949 as one of the four parts of Quartet (1949).

The story has to do with a Jewish family trying hard not to appear Jewish. Sir Adolphus Bland, who calls himself Freddy and whose name was originally Alphonse Bleikogel, is the nephew of Ferdy Rabenstein, a flamboyant patron of the arts. Ferdy owns a period mansion in Sussex and has acquired the trappings of elegance. His son, George, is the apple of his eye.

George, unlike his younger brother, does not look Jewish, but ironically, he does not want to pass as a Gentile and cherishes his Jewish heritage. His brother, who does not want to appear Jewish, looks Jewish. George has just finished his studies at Oxford, and it is assumed that he will return to Sussex and live the life of a gentleman, standing for election to Parliament in a race he would likely win.

George, however, wants to be a concert pianist and announces that he plans to go to Munich to study music. He quarrels animatedly with his father over dinner and finally, breaking down in tears, moves the rest of the family to tears.

George's grandmother, the sister of Ferdy, volunteers to give George five pounds a week to enable him to study music as he wishes. She will finance him for two years, but if at the end of that period he is not judged excellent, he will return to Sussex and, in accordance with his father's wishes, stand for Parliament. Thus subsidized, George goes to Germany and studies for the agreed-upon period. When his time there expires, he is judged not to have exceptional ability, and it is evident that he will have to return home. Rather than do that, he kills himself.

The theme of this story—the struggling artist—is one to which Maugham returned several times during his lifetime. In Of Human Bondage, Philip Carey goes to Paris to study art and is, like George, found wanting. He lives with this defeat and accepts compromises that enable him to live. In The Moon and Sixpence, Charles Strickland goes to Paris to study art and succeeds, but the price he pays is exile and the loss of his family. Maugham, who long feared that he was a mediocre writer, as many statements in The Summing Up reveal, had only one desire in life: to write. He was certainly familiar with the uncertainties and insecurities he wrote about in "The Alien Corn."

Some critics have accused Maugham of anti-Semitism and have read such a bias into "The Alien Corn." This story obviously considers the problems of Jews who try to fit into mainstream society and who, in doing so, deny their heritage. Maugham, however, is reporting a common social phenomenon and, in this story does so objectively and amiably.

SUMMARY

W. Somerset Maugham was a highly competent dramatist who succeeded best in his fiction after he had learned to apply the devices he had used successfully in drama to other genres. His novels prior to Of Human Bondage lacked the dramatic tension and thematic intensity of such works as that autobiographical novel and of such later novels as The Moon and Sixpence, Cakes and Ale, and The Razor's Edge. If sophisticated literary scholars found his work disappointing, the general readers whom he defined as his audience read his novels and short stories with considerable appreciation and enthusiasm. In their eyes, he was a highly successful author who entertained them genially and who, in novels like those mentioned in the preceding paragraph, caused them to think.

R. Baird Shuman

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Liza of Lambeth, 1897
The Making of a Saint, 1898
The Hero, 1901
Mrs. Craddock, 1902
The Merry-Go-Round, 1904
The Bishop's Apron, 1906
The Explorer, 1907
The Magician, 1908
Of Human Bondage, 1915
The Moon and Sixpence, 1919
The Painted Veil, 1925
Cakes and Ale, 1930
The Narrow Corner, 1932
Theatre, 1937
Christmas Holiday, 1939
Up at the Villa, 1941
The Hour Before Dawn, 1942
The Razor's Edge, 1944
Then and Now, 1946
Catalina, 1948
Selected Novels, 1953

SHORT FICTION:

Orientations, 1899
The Trembling of a Leaf: Little Stories of the South Sea Islands, 1921
The Casuarina Tree: Six Stories, 1926

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Has critical displeasure with W. Somerset Maugham's success with audiences contributed to the harsh criticism he has received?
- Trace the influence of Maugham's medical training in his fiction.
- Does the theme of the futility of human relationships developed in Of Human Bondage reflect or contradict the lifestyle Maugham chose?
- What is the attitude toward religion that Maugham implies in Of Human Bondage? In "Rain"?
- Examine the importance of the image of the razor's edge in the novel The Razor's Edge.

Ashenden: Or, The British Agent, 1928
Six Stories Written in the First Person Singular, 1931
Ah King: Six Stories, 1933
East and West: The Collected Short Stories, 1934
Cosmopolitans, 1936
The Favorite Short Stories of W. Somerset Maugham, 1937
The Round Dozen, 1939
The Mixture as Before: Short Stories, 1940
Creatures of Circumstances: Short Stories, 1947
East of Suez: Great Stories of the Tropics, 1948
Here and There: Selected Short Stories, 1948
The Complete Short Stories, 1951
The World Over, 1952
Seventeen Lost Stories, 1969

DRAMA:

A Man of Honor, wr. 1898-1899, pr., pb. 1903
Loaves and Fishes, wr. 1903, pr. 1911, pb. 1924
Lady Frederick, pr. 1907, pb. 1912
Jack Straw, pr. 1908, pb. 1911
The Explorer, pr. 1908, pb. 1912
Mrs. Dot, pr. 1908, pb. 1912
Penelope, pr. 1909, pb. 1912
Smith, pr. 1909, pb. 1913
The Noble Spaniard, pr. 1909, pb. 1953
Landed Gentry, pr. 1910 (as Grace), pb. 1913
The Tenth Man, pr. 1910, pb. 1913
The Land of Promise, pr. 1913, pb. 1913, 1922
Caroline, pr. 1916, pb. 1923 (as The Unattainable)
Our Betters, pr. 1917, pb. 1923
Caesar's Wife, pr. 1919, pb. 1922
Home and Beauty, pr. 1919, pb. 1923 (also known as Too Many Husbands)
The Unknown, pr., pb. 1920
The Circle, pr., pb. 1921
East of Suez, pr., pb. 1922
The Constant Wife, pr., pb. 1926
The Letter, pr., pb. 1927
The Sacred Flame, pr., pb. 1928
The Breadwinner, pr., pb. 1930
The Collected Plays of W. Somerset Maugham, pb. 1931-1934 (6 volumes; revised 1952, 3 volumes)
For Services Rendered, pr., pb. 1932
Sheppey, pr., pb. 1933

SCREENPLAY:

Trio, 1950 (with R. C. Sherriff and Noel Langley)

NONFICTION:

The Land of the Blessed Virgin: Sketches and Impressions in Andalusia, 1905 (also known as Andalusia, 1920)
On a Chinese Screen, 1922
The Gentleman in the Parlour: A Record of a Journey from Rangoon to Haiphong, 1930
Don Fernando, 1935

W. Somerset Maugham

The Summing Up, 1938

Books and You, 1940

France at War, 1940

Strictly Personal, 1941

Great Novelists and Their Novels, 1948

A Writer's Notebook, 1949

The Writer's Point of View, 1951

The Vagrant Mood: Six Essays, 1952

The Partial View, 1954 (includes The Summing Up and A Writer's Notebook)

Ten Novels and Their Authors, 1954 (revision of Great Novelists and Their Novels)

The Travel Books, 1955

Points of View, 1958

Purely for My Pleasure, 1962

Looking Back, 1962

Selected Prefaces and Introductions, 1963

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Great Exotic Novels and Short Stories of Somerset Maugham, 2001

The W. Somerset Maugham Reader: Novels, Stories, Travel Writing, 2004 (Jeffrey Meyers, editor)

About the Author

Burt, Forrest D. W. Somerset Maugham. Boston: Wayne, 1985.

Calder, Robert. W. Somerset Maugham and the Quest for Freedom. London: Heinemann, 1972.

_____. Willie: The Life of W. Somerset Maugham. London: Heinemann, 1989.

Cordell, Richard A. Somerset Maugham, a Writer for All Seasons: A Biographical and Critical Study. 2d ed. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1969.

Maugham, Robin. Somerset and All the Maughams. New York: New American Library, 1966.

Meyers, Jeffrey. Somerset Maugham: A Life. New York: Knopf, 2004.

O'Connor, Sean. "Somerset Maugham, Warts and All." In Straight Acting: Popular Gay Drama from Wilde to Ratigan. London: Cassell, 1998.

Morgan, Ted. Maugham. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1980.

Ramana, M. V. Maugham and the East. New Delhi, India: Minerva Press, 2001.

Library of Congress

GUY DE MAUPASSANT

Born: Château de Miromesnil, near Dieppe, France

August 5, 1850

Died: Passy, Paris, France

July 6, 1893

Maupassant helped move the short-story form away from the primitive folktale to modern psychological realism in the late nineteenth century.

BIOGRAPHY

Born on August 5, 1850, in the imposing Château de Miromesnil, near Dieppe, France, Henri-René-Albert-Guy de Maupassant (moh-puh-SAHN) was the first son of Laure Le Poittevin and Gustave de Maupassant. Although both parents were from fairly well-to-do families, they were only renting the château where Maupassant was born. According to biographers, he probably was born in a small house nearby but was immediately taken to the château so his birth announcements would look more impressive. When the boy was eleven, his parents were legally separated, and he spent most of his youth with his mother, who became a powerful influence on his life.

As a member of the upper middle class, Maupassant was enrolled at a school suitable for him, a small seminary near Rouen. The place, however, was not to the boy's liking, and he purposely got himself expelled before completing school. After returning home to his mother, he fell under the tutelage of his uncle Alfred and a friend of the family who was later to become his most famous and important influence, the writer Gustave Flaubert.

When he was eighteen, Maupassant tried to complete his education by enrolling at Lycée de Rouen, but his law studies were disrupted soon after by his enlistment in the Franco-Prussian War. As a result of his military experience, he was able to get a position after the war as a clerk in the Naval Ministry in Paris, where his primary job was the supervision of printing supplies. Yet his real ambition was to be a writer, and under the guidance of Flaubert he began publishing his poetry and stories in a number of small journals. His work was also encouraged by his membership in an informal group of writers who met at Flaubert's house and included Émile Zola, Alphonse Daudet, and Ivan Turgenev. His first story to appear in a published book was in a collection of stories by various writers, including Zola; it is a story that remains one of his best, "Boule de suif," translated "Roly-Poly" or "Ball of Fat." Because the story received so much praise from Flaubert, Maupassant was encouraged to quit his government job and spend all of his time writing. He soon realized that his special skill lay in the area of the conte, or short story, a form that was highly popular at the time in newspapers and magazines. Like his American counterpart O. Henry and his Russian counterpart Anton Chekhov, Maupassant learned to master the short-story form by writing anecdotal sketches and articles for newspapers.

Maupassant's first collection of short stories was published in 1881, taking its title from the longest story in the collection, "La Maison Tellier," translated as Madame Tellier's Establishment, and Short Stories (1910). The book was a commercial success and made Maupassant's name so well known that his work was soon solicited by many additional newspapers and magazines. In the following twelve years, Maupassant published twelve collections of short stories, six novels, and two plays. Of the 250 short stories that he published during his relatively brief career, Maupassant is probably best known for such ironic-ending stories as “La Parure” (“The Necklace”) and “La Ficelle” (“A Piece of String”), although at the time that his stories were published he received the most attention for what was called his unwholesome naturalistic presentation of peasant characters and street people. In addition to his anecdotal, surprise-ending tales and his realistic stories of the lower class, Maupassant also mastered the mystery tale, a form that he helped to bring out of the nineteenth century and into the modern era by making what was previously presented as supernatural events the result of hallucinatory experiences of obsessed narrators.

The years 1883 and 1884 were high-water marks in Maupassant's career, for during this period he published his first novel, Une Vie (1883; A Woman's Life, 1888), and his most famous short story, “The Necklace”—a story so well known that it has become synonymous for many readers with the short-story form as a genre. By this time, however, Maupassant had already contracted syphilis, which was to take his life. In an era before the discovery of penicillin, there was little that the medical profession could do for him except to watch helplessly as he showed increasing signs of mental disintegration.

After 1890, Maupassant was unable to continue his writing, for his eyesight began to fail, he suffered from severe migraine headaches, his memory faded, and he suffered from delusions. He tried futilely to recuperate through a sea voyage and a stay on the Riviera, but in 1892 he attempted to kill himself and had to be taken to a sanatorium in a straitjacket. On July 6, 1893, a month short of his forty-third birthday, Maupassant died in Passy, Paris, France.

ANALYSIS

Maupassant occupies an ambiguous place in the history of modern literature. On the one hand, his short fiction has been disparaged as, at its best, mere trickery, and at its worst, probable pornography. O. Henry, who was highly influenced by Maupassant, bridled at comparisons with Maupassant, saying he did not wish to be compared with a “filthy writer.” On the other hand, the Russian short-story writer Isaac Babel gladly acknowledged his debt to Maupassant by devoting one of his best short stories to him, acknowledging that Maupassant knew the power of a period put in just the right place. At the end of the nineteenth century, only Anton Chekhov loomed larger than Maupassant as a powerful influence on the short-story form. In fact, British short-story writer A. E. Coppard once said that if he ever edited a collection of stories, it would be an easy job, for half would be by Chekhov and half by Maupassant.

In the range of short-fiction subtypes, it is obvious that Maupassant's work falls on the side of the patterned anecdote, while Chekhov's work is more impressionistic and lyrical. Whereas Chekhov's stylized realism has influenced such twentieth century writers as Sherwood Anderson, Ernest Hemingway, and Raymond Carver, Maupassant has influenced the work of such short-story masters as Eudora Welty, Flannery O'Connor, and Bernard Malamud. Maupassant falls somewhere in between writers such as Ivan Turgenev and Chekhov, who are admired for their lyricism and realism, and writers such as Ambrose Bierce and O. Henry, who are scorned for what are called narrative tricks. On the one hand, he had the ability, like Chekhov, to focus in a highly perceptive way on a small group of characters in a meaningful and revealing situation; on the other hand, like Bierce, he was able to create tight little ironic masterpieces that depend, as all short stories do, on the impact of a luminous ending. Maupassant perfected the technique originated by Edgar Allan Poe, and continued by modern short-story writers as seemingly diverse as Hemingway and Malamud, of creating a fictional realm in which everyday reality takes on a hallucinatory effect and hallucination assumes the concreteness of the physical world. It is unfortunate that, like his predecessor Poe, his lifestyle often receives more attention than his work.

“MADAME TELLIER’S HOUSE”

First published: “La Maison Tellier,” 1881
(collected in The Necklace, and Other Tales, 2003)

Type of work: Short story

A group of prostitutes attend the First Communion of the Madame’s niece in a small French village and are welcomed as if they are fine ladies.

“Madame Tellier’s House” (sometimes translated as “Madame Tellier’s Excursion”) is often called Maupassant’s masterpiece, although it is not as generally well known as his ironic-ending story “La Parure” (“The Necklace”) or his psychological thriller “Le Horla” (“The Horla”). Written while he was still under the influence of his mentor Gustave Flaubert, the story is unlike his later works in that it depends more on realistic detail and detached comic tone than on anecdote and narrative irony. The story begins with a brief portrait of Madame Tellier, who, although she keeps a house of prostitution, is herself quite virtuous. The girls in the house are described as the epitome of each feminine type so that each customer might find the realization of his ideal: the country girl blond, the mysterious Jewess, the plump “ball of fat,” and two others representing the classic French and the classic Spanish woman.

The central event of the story is a simple one. The Madame is invited to the First Communion of her little niece, and since she cannot leave her frequently quarreling girls alone, she closes the brothel and takes them all to the country with her. The arrival of the prostitutes in the small town is a classic comic scene as they march down the street in their flashy elegance while the townspeople peek out their windows in amazement. It is the scene in the church during the communion, however, that constitutes the center of the story. Remembering their own communions, the prostitutes begin to cry. Soon, throughout the church, wives, mothers, and sisters are struck by a pervasive sympathy, and everyone begins to cry. Something superhuman pervades the church, a “powerful breath of an invisible and all-powerful being.” It is as though the Holy Spirit has visited the occupants of the modest country church, a “species of madness” that passes over the people like a gust of wind. Thus, a more general communion than that of the niece is effected, and all are united in harmony and peace.

At the end of the story, the prostitutes return to Madame Tellier’s house and to their lives there, not with a sense of guilt but with a sense of having had a holiday that makes it possible for them to return to work refreshed and rested. The quarrels that formerly plagued the house no longer exist, for a true sisterhood is affirmed. Only Maupassant could carry off such a potentially sentimental situation as the whores crying in church about their lost innocence and not have it lapse into banal sentimentality. It is his genuine identification with the prostitutes, his refusal to reduce them to objects of either pity or ridicule, and his consequent elevation of them, with no hint of sarcasm, to the rank of true ladies that makes the story a masterpiece of comic realism.

“THE NECKLACE”

First published: “La Parure,” 1884
(collected in The Necklace, and Other Tales, 2003)

Type of work: Short story

A young woman loses a borrowed necklace, works for ten years to pay for it, and then discovers that it was made of paste.

What makes Maupassant’s famous story “The Necklace” so popular is not merely the ironic shock that the reader feels at the end when Madame Loisel discovers that she has worked long and hard to pay for a worthless bit of paste, but rather the more pervasive irony that underlies the entire story and makes it a classic exploration on the difference between surface flash and hidden value.

The story begins with a pretty young girl who thinks she is really a lady and feels that she needs only the external trappings of her true status. Although she is married to a simple clerk, she acts as though she has fallen from her proper station; she feels that she was born for luxuries but must endure poverty. Determined to make the best of an opportunity when she and her husband are invited to an elegant party, she borrows a necklace from an acquaintance to impress those not easily impressed and, like Cinderella at the ball, has all of her desires fulfilled as she is transported into the fairy-tale world about which she has dreamed. All of this comes crashing down to reality, however, when she reaches home and discovers that the necklace is missing. Her husband exhausts his meager inheritance and then borrows the rest, mortgaging their life away to buy a replacement for the necklace.

Now that Madame Loisel knows true poverty, she shows herself to be made of something more valuable than her petty desires for surface flash have suggested. With heroism and pride, she shoulders her responsibility with her husband and for ten years does brutal manual labor until she has paid for the necklace. When the reader discovers that the necklace was made of paste, it is a momentary shock; on closer reflection, this final knowledge proves to be anticlimactic, for one realizes that the story is about deeper ironies. What was taken to be real is found to be false. What looked rich on the outside is actually very poor. Yet Madame Loisel, who has looked poor on the outside, turns out to be genuine inside. “The Necklace” is a classic example of the tight ironic structure of the short story in which the unified tone dominates every single word.

“THE HORLA”

First published: “Le Horla,” 1887 (collected in The Necklace, and Other Tales, 2003)

Type of work: Short story

A man slowly goes mad as he is seemingly possessed by an occult external force.

“The Horla,” a story almost as famous as “The Necklace,” is often considered the first sign of the syphilis-caused madness that eventually led to Maupassant’s death. As a story of psychological horror, however, it is actually the pinnacle of several stories of madness with which Maupassant had experimented previously. The predominant mode of these stories is not the manifestation of the ghostly supernatural in the traditional sense; rather, the focus is on some mysterious dimension of reality that exists beyond what the human senses can perceive.

Told by means of diary entries, the story charts the protagonist’s growing awareness of his own madness, as well as his understanding of the process whereby the external world is displaced by psychic projections. The narrator begins considering the mystery of the invisible, the weakness of the senses to perceive all that is in the world, and the theory that if there were other senses, one could discover many more things about the reality that surrounds human life. Another predominant Maupassant theme here is that of apprehension, a sense of some imminent danger, a presentiment of something yet to come. This apprehension, which the narrator calls a disease, is accompanied by nightmares, a sense of some external force suffocating him while he sleeps, and the conviction that there is something following him.

This sense of something existing outside the self but not visible to the ordinary senses is pushed even further when the narrator begins to believe that there are actual creatures who exist in this invisible dimension. This conviction is then developed into an idea that, when the mind is asleep, an alien being takes control of the body and makes it obey. All of these ideas lead easily into the concept of mesmerism or hypnotism; under hypnosis, it seems as if an alien being has control of an individual’s actions, of which, upon awakening, he or she has no awareness. Although the narrator doubts his sanity, he also feels that he is in complete possession of all of his faculties, and he becomes even more convinced that an invisible creature is making him do things that his own mind does not direct him to do. Thus, he finally believes that there are Invisible Ones in the world, creatures who have always existed and who have haunted humankind even though they cannot be seen.

The final event that persuades him of the external, as opposed to the psychological, existence of the creatures is a newspaper article about an epidemic of madness in Brazil, in which people seem possessed by vampire-like creatures that feed on them during sleep. He remembers a Brazilian ship that sailed past his window and believes that one of the creatures has jumped ship to possess him. Now he knows that the reign of humanity on earth is over and that the forces of the Horla, which humankind has always feared—forces called spirits, jinn, fairies, hobgoblins, witches, devils, and imps—will enslave the world.

Finally, he “sees” the creature in the mirror when its presence blurs his own image by coming between him and the mirror. He decides to destroy the creature by locking it in his room and burning his house to the ground. As he watches the house burn and realizes that his servants are burning too, he wonders if indeed the Horla is dead, for he considers that it cannot, like a human being, be prematurely destroyed. His final thought is that, since the Horla is not dead, he will have to kill himself; the story ends with that decision.

What makes “The Horla” distinctive is the increasing need of the narrator to account for his madness as being caused by something external to himself. Such a desire is Maupassant’s way of universalizing the story, for he well knew that human beings have always tried to embody their most basic desires and fears in some external but invisible presence. “The Horla” is a masterpiece of hallucinatory horror because it focuses so powerfully on that process of mistaking inner reality for outer reality, which is indeed the very basis of hallucination.

SUMMARY

Guy de Maupassant had as much to do with the development of the short-story genre in the late nineteenth century as Anton Chekhov did, albeit in somewhat different ways. Yet because such stories as “The Necklace” are so deceptively simple and seem trivial, Maupassant’s experiment with the form has often been ignored. Not until the short story itself receives the recognition that it deserves as a respectable literary genre will Maupassant receive the recognition that he deserves for his contribution to the perfection of the form.

Charles E. May

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

SHORT FICTION:

La Maison Tellier, 1881 (Madame Tellier’s Establishment and Short Stories, 1910)

Mademoiselle Fifi, 1882 (Mademoiselle Fifi, and Other Stories, 1922)

Contes de la bécasse, 1883

Clair de lune, 1883

Les Sœurs Rondoli, 1884 (The Sisters Rondoli, and Other Stories, 1923)

Miss Harriet, 1884 (Miss Harriet, and Other Stories, 1923)

Yvette, 1885 (Yvette, and Other Stories, 1905)

Contes du jour et de la nuit, 1885 (Day and Night Stories, 1924)

Toine, 1885 (Toine, and Other Stories, 1922)

La Petite Rogue, 1886 (Little Rogue, and Other Stories, 1924)

Monsieur Parent, 1886 (Monsieur Parent, and Other Stories, 1909)

Le Horla, 1887 (The Horla, and Other Stories, 1903)

Le Rosier de Madame Husson, 1888

L’Inutile Beauté, 1890 (Useless Beauty, and Other Stories, 1911)

Eighty-Eight Short Stories, 1930

Eighty-Eight More Stories, 1932

Complete Short Stories, 1955

Guy de Maupassant

LONG FICTION:

Une Vie, 1883 (A Woman's Life, 1888)
Bel-Ami, 1885 (English translation, 1889)
Pierre et Jean, 1888 (Pierre and Jean, 1890)
Fort comme la Mort, 1889 (Strong as Death, 1899)
Notre cœur, 1890 (The Human Heart, 1890)

POETRY:

Des Vers, 1880 (Romance in Rhyme, 1903)

NONFICTION:

Au Soleil, 1884 (In the Sunlight, 1903)
Sur l'eau, 1888 (Afloat, 1889)
Le Vie errante, 1890 (In Vagabondia, 1903)
Lettres de Guy de Maupassant à Gustave Flaubert, 1951

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Life Work of Henri René Guy de Maupassant, 1903
(17 volumes)
The Works of Guy de Maupassant, 1923-1929 (10 volumes)

About the Author

Bloom, Harold, ed. Guy de Maupassant. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2004.
Gregario, Laurence A. Maupassant's Fiction and the Darwinian View of Life. New York: Peter Lang, 2005.
Ignotus, Paul. The Paradox of Maupassant. London: University of London Press, 1966.
Lerner, Michael G. Maupassant. New York: George Braziller, 1975.
Maupassant, Guy de. A Life: The Humble Truth. Translated and with an introduction and notes by Roger Pearson. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999.
Steegmuller, Francis. A Lion in the Path. New York: Random House, 1949.
Sullivan, Edward. Maupassant the Novelist. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1953.
_____. Maupassant: The Short Stories. Great Neck, N.Y.: Barron's Education Series, 1962.
Wallace, A. H. Guy de Maupassant. New York: Twayne, 1973.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Are the endings of many Guy de Maupassant stories genuine surprises? Should the ending of a short story be a surprise?
- Why do Americans have so much more difficulty responding favorably to a story like "Madame Tellier's House" than do French readers?
- What makes the denouement of "The Necklace" anticlimactic?
- Is the narrator of "The Horla" unreliable? Is this story told the only way it could be told?
- Explain why the short story is or is not "a respectable literary genre."

VLADIMIR MAYAKOVSKY

Born: Bagdadi, Georgia, Russia (now Mayakovsky, Georgia)
July 19, 1893

Died: Moscow, Soviet Union (now in Russia)
April 14, 1930

Mayakovsky altered the traditions of Russian poetry with his personal style and revolutionary social content.

BIOGRAPHY

Vladimir Mayakovsky (mah-yuh-KAWF-skee) was born on July 19, 1893, in the small village of Bagdadi in the province of Georgia, then a part of the Russian empire. His father was a Cossack and a forest ranger, and his mother, Alexandria Alexeyevna, was a Ukrainian. The family moved to Kutayis in 1901, so that Vladimir might attend school there. Vladimir showed early political leanings, supporting the Bolsheviks; he took part in demonstrations against repressive actions by the czarist government. As a result of the demonstrations, his school was closed in October, 1905.

In February, 1906, the poet's father died, and the family moved to Moscow. Mayakovsky enrolled in Moscow High School and soon after became a member of the Bolshevik party. He was arrested a number of times for distributing leaflets against the government. This early experience as a revolutionary was not antithetical to his poetry. Rather, it was to become a part of even his most lyrical love poems.

In 1911, Mayakovsky entered the Training College of Painting and Fine Arts. He had already written his earliest poems and planned to pursue a career as a painter or poet. He met Boris Pasternak at this time, who was to become a friend and supporter, although they did not always agree on poetic theory. His first collection of poems, Ya, was published in 1913. Mayakovsky was always asserting the presence of his ego in his poems, and some critics have seen all of his poems as thinly disguised autobiography.

In 1913, Mayakovsky became connected to the Russian Futurist movement. The movement rejected earlier traditions in art and poetry and celebrated the machine. He did reject the Futurist program of the Italian Filippo Marinetti after meeting him and hearing him lecture. Mayakovsky believed that Marinetti's movement was opposed to or indifferent to the social action he thought was necessary to change czarist society. He continued, however, to be influenced by the aesthetic ideas of the Futurists.

In 1915, Mayakovsky completed his first important poem, Oblako v shtanakh (1915; A Cloud in Pants, 1945). The poem was championed by Maxim Gorky, but many other readers found the poem vulgar and strange. It was experimental in style and structure, but it included one of the most conventional and traditional elements of poetry, a declaration of the speaker's love for a woman, who is called Maria in the poem. This love, as were so many in Mayakovsky's life and poetry, is described in exaggerated terms. He always needed a grand passion in his life and believed that life was impossible without love.

The Russian Revolution broke out in 1917, and Mayakovsky participated in various committees and conferences. He was a strong supporter of the Bolshevik cause and included pronouncements supporting its program in his poems and plays. He wrote agitprop poems and created posters against foreign intervention during the revolution. Pasternak was disturbed by what he thought was a misuse of Mayakovsky's true nature and art. As Mayakovsky later wrote, he "crushed under foot/ the throat/ of my very own songs."

Even though Mayakovsky was a dedicated Bolshevik and Communist, he ran into trouble with the authorities about his poetry and drama. A play, Misteriya-buff (pr., pb. 1918; Mystery-Bouffe, 1933), was opposed by the state publishing house and, after a production in 1918, none of the theaters in Moscow would present it. A long poem in celebration of the Russian proletariat, 150,000,000 (1920; English translation, 1949), was published in 1920 in an edition of five thousand copies, but Soviet leader Vladimir Ilich Lenin thought it was wrong to give official recognition to such an obscure and difficult poet.

Mayakovsky published a journal, Lef, beginning in 1923. It folded in a few years. Its name is an acronym for Levy front iskusstva (left front of art). An independent group of avant-garde artists and writers, of which Mayakovsky was the leader, also had this name. Also in 1923, he published one of his most important poems, Pro eto (About That, 1965). The poem is about being divided between the need for love and the necessity of social action. This division seemed to mark nearly all Mayakovsky's work. The woman who refuses him in the poem is based on Lili Brik, the great love of Mayakovsky's life. She and Osip Brik were Futurists and took part in the movement with Mayakovsky.

In 1925, Mayakovsky traveled to Mexico and later to New York. He loved travel and was constantly seeking out new places. He often visited Paris and Berlin and seemed to like an international lifestyle, but he never could bear to leave Moscow for long, even with all of its difficulties.

He next produced two important plays, Klop (pr., pb. 1929; The Bedbug, 1931) and Banya (pr., pb. 1930; The Bathhouse, 1963). Both were satiric plays that exposed the corruption of the revolutionary bureaucracy. The following year, he created an exhibition of his work, but it was badly received and few important officials attended. Mayakovsky was having difficulties with the artistic restriction of the early Stalinist era and felt increasingly isolated. His love for a woman named Tatania was unrequited; she refused to leave Paris and come to Moscow to be with him. On April 14, 1930, he shot himself in the head and died shortly thereafter. Some have said that he was playing Russian roulette with the pistol, since he was an inveterate gambler. Most critics have believed that his increasing isolation and despair resulted in his suicide.

ANALYSIS

Mayakovsky passed through a number of literary movements and styles in his brief life. He was first associated with Futurism. The movement exalted the machine and rejected symbolism and the "cult of beauty," along with most traditional poetic styles. Its origins were in Fascism in Italy. Mayakovsky had difficulties throughout his later career because of his previous connection with the very uncommunist Futurism. The dominant art movement in the Soviet Union was Socialist Realism. To be a Futurist was to be condemned to obscurity, or worse.

Some of Mayakovsky's most enduring and important influences were British and American. A number of his poems are direct echoes of the poetry of Walt Whitman. Whitman's declaration of the poet's selfhood was very much like Mayakovsky's solipsistic focus on the "I" in his poems. Another influence was the British poet Lord Byron. Byron's exaltation of the self and of the heroic stance can also be found in many poems of Mayakovsky. A Cloud in Pants has a dramatized self that comes directly out of the tradition of Whitman and Byron.

Mayakovsky's two main subjects are love and revolution. Often they are yoked together in strange ways. Both were seen by Mayakovsky as essential for the fullest life, and both are principles of transformation. Sometimes a social transformation is only mentioned at the end of the poem, and although it claims to resolve conflicts it is not a strong presence in the poem. Mayakovsky consistently rejects religion, especially Christianity. Saviors do appear in his poems but they are social ones, or the poet himself appears as a Christ figure. Traditional religion was, to Mayakovsky, a tool of reactionary interests and a power that rejected any experimental art.

In 1924, he published an elegiac poem on the death of Lenin, Vladimir Ilich Lenin, translated into English in 1939. This effort was highly praised by the authorities, in contrast to their reaction against so many other poems of Mayakovsky. Mayakovsky, however, did use the poem to protest against creating a cult of personality around the dead Lenin. He believed that there should be no statues or mausoleum but that the deeds of Lenin—and the poet—should live in the people. Joseph Stalin would soon create a cult of personality about Lenin that exceeded Mayakovsky's worst fears.

In addition to the poem on Lenin, Mayakovsky wrote a number of directly political, or agitprop, poems. One example is 150,000,000, a poem whose rhythm is supplied by “bullets,” and of which “no one is the author.” The poem arises from the people; for once, Mayakovsky eliminates his ego from the poem.

Mayakovsky often wrote against the philistines of his own society. The philistines were those who rejected art or the artist, or those who found a safe niche in the bureaucracy of the Soviet Union. They are the enemies the heroic poet is fighting against in poems such as Vo ves' golos (1930; At the Top of My Voice, 1940). He was not able to defeat them.

One other important subject in the poems is suicide. Mayakovsky dramatized his suicide beginning with some of his earliest poems. It was as if he were rehearsing it in verse until it finally came true. This pattern is another side of the egotistic romantic poet. Mayakovsky liked to portray himself as being on the verge of self-destruction. One reason was that he believed he did not receive the recognition he deserved as a poet. Whether it was the rejection by leaders such as Stalin and Lenin or the opposition of philistine bureaucrats, he believed that the Soviet Union's artistic environment was not fruitful for him. Yet his art was in large part about the Soviet Union that the revolution had brought into being. The Russian language was his tool and the Russian people his subject.

Mayakovsky's idiomatic style is hard to appreciate in English translations, but some aspects of it do come through. He ignored traditional Russian metrics and broke his lines into smaller units, often arbitrarily. He preserved rhyme, although often his rhymes are used for comic or satiric effect. Also notable is his use of common or vulgar words. To use a word such as “pants,” let alone to include it in the title of the poem, was startling at the time. Mayakovsky often invented words or neologisms and used them as rhymes or to comic effect in poems.

Mayakovsky's poetic structures are loose and rambling, although they do have a clear thematic organization. In About That, for example, the need of rescuing a man on a bridge brings a focus to the various actions that the speaker performs in the poem. He searches—and fails to find—someone in all of Moscow to save him. A Cloud in Pants is organized around four cries against ideals that have failed: love, art, revolution, and religion. Each section is very loose and rambling, but there is an overall plan.

Mayakovsky uses a number of repeated image patterns or clusters in his poems. The poems are filled, for example, with images of animals. Mayakovsky often portrays himself comically as an animal such as a bear. Another image pattern is the city. He was one of the earliest poets to focus on the city as a subject for poetry. He includes lists of streets and specific addresses in Moscow in his poems, even the phone number of Lili Brik.

A CLOUD IN PANTS

First published: Oblako v shtanakh, 1915
(English translation, 1945)

Type of work: Poem

The poet cries out against the failure of love, poetry, revolution, and religion as ideals.

A Cloud in Pants was Mayakovsky's first important poem, and it was immediately recognized by critics, especially Maxim Gorky, as a new direction in Russian poetry. The speaker, style, and structure were very different from traditional Russian poetry.

The poem begins with a prologue that announces the theme and presents the hero—the speaker of the poem—who is a “handsome,/ twenty-two year old.” The celebration of self in that description comes directly out of Walt Whitman's “Song of Myself.” The speaker has a divided nature; he shifts and changes throughout the poem. He can be “furious” or “extraordinarily gentle.” He is not a man but rather a cloud in pants.

Part I of the poem deals with the speaker's unrequited love for Maria, whom he met “in Odessa.” He stresses the “fact” of that meeting; the relationship is not poetic fantasy. She was to meet him at four but failed to come and so he is thrown into despair. In an unusual metaphor, his “nerve” dances so madly that the ceiling crashes down. Maria enters only to announce that she is getting married. The marriage is one of convenience, not love; she has been bought or stolen. He then compares himself to a volcano. Like a volcano, he is most dangerous when he is “absolutely calm.” In a last exaggerated metaphor, his heart is a building that is on fire; firefighters are called to extinguish the blaze but have little effect. At the end of the section, he utters: “My last cry/ you, at least,/ shriek through the ages that I’m ablaze.”

In part 2 of the poem, he defines his poetry as rooted in the street; he rejects the romantic language and pose of the usual poet. The nail in his boot has more meaning to him than all the books in the world. He then portrays his own history as a Futurist who was rejected by the people. He becomes a crucified Jesus. If poetry has failed him, he will “tear out my soul for you,/ to make it big/ stamp on it!/ and hand it to you, bloodstained as a banner.” The banner is the banner of revolution, which Mayakovsky predicted would come in 1916. He later cut this only slightly incorrect forecast out of the poem.

Part 3 of the poem deals with that revolution. First, he rejects love and the poetry that celebrates it and, for a moment, is in harmony with the universe. The world is soon disrupted, however, by repressive murderers, such as Galliffet, who killed the supporters of the Paris Commune. A revolutionary future will follow these and other deaths, and the poet’s verses will become sacred symbols that will be used to christen children.

The last part of the poem returns to Maria; the speaker fruitlessly asks her for love and refuge. If she cannot love him, is God love? No, he is “only an illiterate puny little godlet.” His challenge to God is met only with silence. “The universe sleeps/ resting on its paws,/ with ticks of stars, an enormous ear.” The metaphor deflates the infinite to a mangy and flea-bitten dog that can neither frighten nor help anyone.

ABOUT THAT

First published: Pro eto, 1923 (English translation, 1965)

Type of work: Poem

Love for a specific person grows into universal love and brotherhood.

The prologue suggests the theme of the poem—love. Mayakovsky insisted on writing on what was an unpopular theme in Russia in 1923. He describes the theme as a universal one; it will “erupt in a fury—having dared to repress it.” He never uses the word “love,” however, to identify the theme; it remains an ellipsis that the reader has to fill in.

Section 1 is titled “The Ballad of Reading Gaol.” The speaker of the poem is imprisoned in his apartment in Moscow as Oscar Wilde was in Reading Gaol. The first reference is not to imprisonment but to saving the man on the bridge over the Neva. The man is about to commit suicide. The poem then shifts to the speaker’s unsuccessful attempt to contact Lili Brik on the telephone. This unrequited love turns him into an animal, a polar bear who is howling. In his cold room, he becomes even more isolated; he is “Clambering on the ice-floe,/ a white polar-bear,/ on my ice-flow pillow I float by.” He returns to the man on the Neva. The man is clearly the poet himself, who is crying for help. The next section is called “Xmas Eve,” and it portrays the speaker wandering around Moscow and being insulted by passersby. A “Savior” appears in the form of a member of the Young Communist League, but he too is caught up with “the gypsy love song” and contemplates suicide, so he is of no help to the beleaguered poet.

The poem then shifts to the poet’s family; they welcome him, but they think his demand to rescue the man over the Neva is madness. Family can offer no help.

The last section of the poem, “A Petition Addressed To. . .,” redefines the Christian gospel. “Faith” deals with the afterlife; the speaker first thinks it an easy task to go from death “into the life ideal.” It is not God who will accomplish this, however, but a scientist who may or may not resurrect the speaker. The section ends in a plea for, rather than the achievement of, resurrection. “Hope” sounds close to despair: “My earthly life I never lived out to the end./ On earth,/ my love I never could fulfill." The speaker is willing to accept a love that may not be fulfilled: "Let it be. . . / you live and pain becomes dear." "Love," the last section, ends the poem on a more positive note. His love will be resurrected, and if only for his faithful love, he also will be resurrected and joined with his beloved. This love, however, expands into the world and will "flood the universe." There will be no "victims" and "our father,/ at least, will be the world,/ the earth,/ at the very least—our mother." Love for one person becomes a larger revolutionary social principle that makes the whole world a sustaining family.

AT THE TOP OF MY VOICE

First published: Vo ves' golos, 1930 (English translation, 1940)

Type of work: Poem

The poem is a spirited defense of the poet's life and work that lapses into despair at the end.

At the Top of My Voice is divided into two parts. In a subtitle, the poem is called a "First Prelude to a Poem on the Five Year Plan," which suggests that the poem is about Stalin's controversial economic plan. It might more accurately, however, be called a defense of the life and work of Vladimir Mayakovsky. Part 1 describes the survival of Mayakovsky's work after the "petrified s—t" of the centuries has been removed. The speaker describes his poetic function as a "cesspool cleaner" who has been "mobilised and drafted/ by revolution." His poetry has not been lyrical, but "my pages of fighters;/ pass in review." He uses military metaphors rather than ones drawn from nature. His poetry is rooted in the triumph of the revolution. He learned "dialectics" not from Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel but from actual conflict.

As in the Lenin poem, he rejects any statues of himself, calling them "marble slime." Instead, he is to have a "common monument" with all the "brothers and mates" who fought for the revolution. The first part of the poem ends with a demand to "step hard on the throttle" for the five year plan. The poet is content with "clean-laundered shirts," no greater honors are necessary. In a defiant final declaration he offers a defense of his life: "I'll lift up high,/ like a Bolshevik party-card,/ all the hundred volumes/ of my/ Com Party books." Mayakovsky did not possess a Communist Party card; that honor was given to the bureaucrats who served Stalin. Mayakovsky's works, however, will entitle him to a higher and truer honor.

Part 2 of the poem is unfinished, fragmentary, and very different in tone. It was as if Mayakovsky had given up the possibility of winning favor from such a corrupt government. He hopes only that "shameful common-sense" does not ever come to him. He will no longer badger his colleagues in the party with "express telegrams." The struggle no longer has meaning, "The love-boat of life/ has crashed on philistine reefs./ You and I/ are quits." In the last section, he declares his faith in the power of his poetry. "I know the power of words." Words can make "coffins" burst from the earth and stride forth. The powerful may "reject" him and he may remain "unpublished, unprinted." The power of his words, however, will live on in the centuries to come. The last line and sentence of the poem, however, were not completed. Mayakovsky had, apparently, given up his belief in the power of words to alter his situation in the Stalinist Soviet Union. He would soon commit suicide.

SUMMARY

Vladimir Mayakovsky was an innovative poet who used many modernist styles and structures in poems that startled his early twentieth century audience. He persisted in writing a personal and erotic poetry at a time when poems in praise of the Soviet state were the only ones to receive official recognition. Unable to resolve the conflicts inherent in his life and work, he took his life. Stalin later rehabilitated Mayakovsky's diminished reputation by stating that it was a crime not to honor Mayakovsky's achievements. Such official recognition would not have made him happier. He has, instead, lived on in the hearts of the Russian people.

James Sullivan

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Ya, 1913

Oblako v shtanakh, 1915 (A Cloud in Pants, 1945)

Fleita-pozvonochnik, 1916 (The Backbone Flute, 1960)

Chelovek, 1916

150,000,000, 1920 (English translation, 1949)

Pro eto, 1923 (About That, 1965)

Vladimir Ilich Lenin, 1924 (English translation, 1939)

Khorosho!, 1927 (Fine!, 1939)

Vo ves' golos, 1930 (At the Top of My Voice, 1940)

Polnoe sobranie sochinenii, 1955-1961 (13 volumes)

Mayakovsky: Poems, 1965

Poems, 1972

DRAMA:

Vladimir Mayakovsky: Tragediya, pr. 1913, pb. 1914

(Vladimir Mayakovsky: A Tragedy, 1968)

Misteriya-buff, pr., pb. 1918, revised pr., pb. 1921 (Mystery-Bouffe, 1933)

A chto y esli? Pervomayskiye grezy v burzhuaznom kresle, pr. 1920, pb. 1934

Chempionat vseмирnoy klassovoy borby, pr. 1920, pb. 1935 (The Championship of the Universal Class, 1973)

Pyeska pro popov, koi ne pobnimayut, prazdnik chto takoye, pr. 1921, pb. 1934

Kak kto provodit vremya, prazdniki prazdnuya, pr. 1922, pb. 1934

Radio-Oktyabr, pr. 1926, pb. 1927 (with Osip Brik)

Klop, pr., pb. 1929 (The Bedbug, 1931)

Banya, pr., pb. 1930 (The Bathhouse, 1963)

Moskva gorit, pr. 1930, pb. 1936 (Moscow Is Burning, 1973)

The Complete Plays, pb. 1968

SCREENPLAYS:

Baryyshyna i khuligan, 1918

Ne dlya deneg rodivshiysya, 1918 (adaptation of Jack London's novel Martin Eden)

Serdtsse kino, 1926

Dekadyukov i Oktyabryukhov, 1928

NONFICTION:

"Kak rabotaet respublika demokraticeskaya," 1922

Moye Otkrytiye Ameriki, 1926 (My Discovery of America, 2005)

"Kak delat' stikhi?," 1926 (How Are Verses Made?, 1970)

About the Author

Brown, Edward J. Mayakovsky: A Poet in the Revolution. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1973.

Obolensky, Dimitri, ed. The Penguin Book of Russian Verse. New York: Penguin Books, 1962.

Porter, Robert, ed. Seven Soviet Poets. 2d ed. London: Bristol Classical, 2002.

Shklovsky, Viktor. Mayakovsky and His Circle. New York: Dodd, Mead, 1972.

Stahlberger, Lawrence L. The Symbolic System of Mayakovsky. The Hague, the Netherlands: Mouton, 1964.

Triplet, Elsa. Mayakovsky, Russian Poet: A Memoir. Translated by Susan de Muth. London: Hearing Eye, 2002.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What circumstances would make a Russian born in 1893 like Vladimir Mayakovsky enthusiastic about the Bolshevik revolution?
- What does it mean that the Russian Futurists "celebrated the machine"?
- Contrast Mayakovsky's Reading Gaol and that of Oscar Wilde.
- Was a social revolution as important to Mayakovsky as a personal one?
- Is love in Mayakovsky's works regularly one-sided?

A. A. MILNE

Born: London, England
January 18, 1882

Died: Hartfield, Sussex, England
January 31, 1956

Although a competent playwright in his day, Milne made by far his greatest contribution to the literary world in his poetry and stories for children, which continue to be read the world over and reveal a wit and literary flourish that also captivate adult readers.

BIOGRAPHY

Alan Alexander Milne was born at Henley House in the Hampstead district of London on January 18, 1882. Henley House was a school at which his father, John Vine Milne, taught. The youngest of the three sons of John and the former Sarah Maria Heginbotham, he displayed his love of language early and was writing letters to family members by the time he was four. Among the books he loved as a young boy were Reynard the Fox and Joel Chandler Harris's Uncle Remus books. Two years before Milne's birth, Ernest Howard Shepard, who would illustrate his books for children, was born in the same neighborhood, but the two did not meet until their adult years. When Milne was eight years old, he wrote "My Three Days' Walking Tour," which appeared in a publication of the school. It is significant because the setting, Ashdown Forest, would eventually become the model of the Hundred Acre Wood, the abode of the characters in the Winnie-the-Pooh books.

His early education took place at Henley House, where one of his teachers was H. G. Wells. Wells, who would become one of England's illustrious writers, remained a friend and supporter of his former student. Alan Milne and his brother Kenneth, who were always close, enrolled in Westminster School in 1893, where Alan prepared for Trinity College, Cambridge, which he entered in 1900. There he edited Granta, a publication sometimes referred to as "the Cambridge Punch," referring to the famous English humor magazine. In the meantime he decided that he did not want to follow his father into teaching. His father, although disappointed, supported Milne in his efforts to become an established writer until 1906, when the young man obtained a position as an assistant editor of Punch.

Milne married Dorothy de Sélencourt, usually called Daphne, in 1913. Early in 1915 he volunteered for the military and served as a signal officer in World War I, but he still found time to write plays while he was in the army. In 1920, a child named Christopher Robin was born; Milne gave this name to the boy in his children's books, but the real Christopher was called Billy when young and Moon for many years thereafter. At one point in 1922, five of Milne's plays were being performed, three in the United States and two in England. Although popular at the time, his plays mirrored their time; there have been no significant revivals of them. In them he exhibited a talent for humorous and witty dialogue that he learned to use even more successfully in the timeless children's books that he developed in the mid-1920's. First came an immensely popular book of poems, When We Were Very Young, published in 1924, followed in the next few years by his two narrative classics, Winnie-the-Pooh in 1926 and The House at Pooh Corner in 1928. A second book of poems, Now We Are Six, appeared in 1927. These works delighted not only children but also the adults who read them to their children. Milne was not a close friend of E. H. Shepard, but the latter's illustrations have become as integral a part of the books as Milne's prose and verse.

By 1924, the Milnes purchased Cotchford Farm near Hartfield in Sussex on the border of Ashdown Forest. Milne continued to write but bade farewell to Christopher, Winnie, and the other characters of the Hundred Acre Wood in the final story in The House at Pooh Corner. One of his better-known plays, Toad of Toad Hall (1929), was an adaptation of Kenneth Grahame's The Wind in the Willows (1908). Otherwise he wrote essays, novels, a pacifistic rejection of war called Peace with Honour: An Enquiry into the War Convention (1934), and an autobiography, It's Too Late Now: The Autobiography of a Writer (1939). Although firmly against war, he eventually wrote that war could not be abandoned until "Hitlerism" was killed.

Milne died at the age of seventy-four on January 31, 1956, but his children's books have remained alive ever since. The Pooh books have been translated into many languages, even into Latin.

ANALYSIS

An important theme in Milne's stories and poems is the relationship between adults and children. Adults appear fairly often in the poems, seldom in the stories. When they appear, they are shown as perceived by the children or by the animals, who are, with one exception in the Pooh stories, themselves children. Having apparently lost the sense of being a child (a loss which Milne himself clearly avoided), adults in Milne's books fail to understand children. They ask tiresome questions about their wellness, which children must take pains to answer, as in the poem "Politeness," while secretly wishing that the adults would discard the habit. Children do not rebel against parents in Milne's work so much as express displeasure while acknowledging the inevitability of adults' ascendancy.

The one exception to adults' exclusion in the stories is Kanga, the diligent mother of Roo. When this little family of kangaroos comes into the Hundred Acre Wood, the other animals immediately object to the "Strange Animal." Part of Kanga's strangeness is her habit of carrying her son in her pocket, which they see as an excessive way of maintaining adult oppressiveness. Kanga is extraordinarily watchful when Roo is out of the pocket trying to enjoy himself. She is constantly insisting that it is time for them to go home and that Roo must be given two things which children are inclined to dislike: medicine and a bath. The other animals quickly decide to take action against Kanga. Their plan to steal Roo away from her avoids the starkness of real rebellion, they think, because they sneak a substitute, Piglet, into her pocket. However, Kanga's mastery of adult watchfulness foils the plot. She takes Piglet home, pretends that he is Roo, applies the bath and the medicine, and adds withering criticisms of Piglet. Fortunately for the little pig, Christopher Robin appears and insists that Roo is back with animal friends but apparently cannot recognize the newly bathed Piglet.

Christopher, however, is for all the animals a gentle version of adulthood. He represents the kind, helpful, unassuming presence for which the animals long. He regularly appears when his assistance is truly needed. At the end of the first Kanga and Roo story, of course, the other animals and the new residents become friends. There are intimations, however, that Christopher is destined for the role of adulthood. He is away from home much of the day, for he is being educated, being prepared for adulthood.

In some of the early poems children play at being adults or, as in "Nursery Chairs," scaring adults. The speaker of the "second chair" scares her nanny by pretending to be a lion in a cage. In "Disobedience" the child tells of a mother who has sinned in the manner of a child by running off "to the end of the town" and getting herself lost. A mother who runs away from home is a humorous and impossible situation to the young spirits of the Hundred Acre Wood.

For the most part Milne's children and animals simply behave like children. They live in a world fashioned by adults, but they make it their own by imposing convenient regulations on themselves beyond the imaginative capacities of adults. They imagine that a "bear" will get them if they step on the lines between sidewalk tiles, or they sit "halfway down" a stairway because it is not the top or the bottom but a place that "isn't really anywhere." An even better escape is the journey to places in the natural world left unappropriated by adults: uninhabited islands, hills, and—especially in the Pooh stories—the forest. These places are children's territory where exciting things can happen, like the appearance of the Heffalump, a mythical being that Milne knows needs no description because every child can imagine his own Heffalump. They are enchanted places, but the chief enchantment is the absence of adults and the conviction that these places are made for children and animals and in part by them, such as their dwellings, chiefly in hollow trees that conveniently incorporate remoteness and domestic necessities.

Many other themes have been discovered in the Pooh stories. Milne's animal characters exaggerate, almost caricature human traits, somewhat like those in the characters of Charles Dickens's novels, often with characteristic sayings. For instance, Pooh is a creature of "very little brain," as he freely admits. He is struggling to succeed in the face of a formidable personal limitation—as is the typical reader. Eeyore, the melancholy donkey, needs constant cheering up but in the process cheers the reader with his humorous self-deprecation. On his birthday, for instance, he offers thanks for his nonexistent birthday cake and the candles that are not there either. Tigger has an eating problem. He knows just what he likes until he tries it, in the way of many children, and discovers that he does not like it after all. Piglet, as with many children of small stature, is inclined to feel inconsequential.

As friends they help each other compensate for their deficiencies. They are presexual, preadult creatures who appeal to children not yet bewildered by these later problems, whereas adult readers are transported back to the time when their world also was one of birthday parties, unfailing friendships, and exciting adventures in which threatened catastrophes are regularly circumvented.

The style of Milne's stories and poems is simple, humorous, and, like the characters, playful. The characters wrestle with words and their permutations and confront polysyllables such as "expedition" and "resolution," which insist on coming out in the animals' mouths as "expotition" and "risso-lution." The stories have a large proportion of efficient dialogue that moves the action along and reinforces the characters' traits. Milne was also very fond of nonsense words of the type that Dr. Seuss later perfected: expressions such as "woozle," "squch," and "mastershalums." In the poems, Milne achieves little surprises with unexpected rhymes of the sort later associated with Ogden Nash: "Copses" leads to "wopses"; "quickly" leads to "tickly."

Milne's originality often begins with a borrowed idea that is promptly enhanced. The teddy bear began as a nickname for Theodore Roosevelt, but it surely came to fruition in Milne's poem "Teddy Bear" and in his later Pooh. Milne could adapt medieval materials, such as romances, even an alchemist, to poems for children. He could make a kind of child's pastoral by combining in one poem two venerable characters from children's rhymes, Little Bo-Peep and Little Boy Blue. Like many original writers, he knew how to make appropriated features his own.

WHEN WE WERE VERY YOUNG

First published: 1924

Type of work: Poetry

At a time of sentimentality and silliness in children's poetry, Milne speaks to children not in baby talk but in simple but rational English.

When published in 1924, When We Were Very Young became an immediate best seller, and, like the children's books that followed, attracted adults also. It contains forty-five poems that only occasionally veer toward the infantile vocabulary characteristic of children's poems in the early 1920's.

The last poem in When We Were Very Young was written first, in 1922. Based on Alan and Daphne Milne's observation of their two-year-old son at prayer, it was first published early in 1923. Ann Thwaite, Milne's biographer, calls "Vespers" an ironic poem by a man little interested in prayer or conventional religion. The boy in the poem is given their son's own name, Christopher Robin, a name that would later become that of the boy in the two collections of Winnie-the-Pooh stories.

The book also includes in its introduction the name Pooh, which the real Christopher had given to a swan. It also introduces Edward Bear, known as Teddy, a "short and stout" bear, which would later become Winnie-the-Pooh. Otherwise the animals in these poems are not the animals of the later stories.

"Independence" is one of the shorter poems and one of the most emphatic. It represents the voice of a child swinging on a tree branch and expressing his disdain of incessant cautions from overprotective parents. Parents, however, remain benighted, so there is no point in telling them. Children in Milne's poems are not rebels but wearily docile subjects, because complaining to adults accomplishes nothing. They just do not understand.

In a longer and more remarkable poem, "Disobedience," Milne reverses the roles. A three-year-old named James Morrison orders his mother never to "go down to the end of the town" without consulting him. Not heeding his advice, his wayward mother goes but never comes back. More often, however, the children of this book are seen when they are free of parents. They are wandering, in reality or imagination, in fields, on islands, by brooks, among trees, or solitarily, sitting on a particular stairway in their home. They are being themselves, which does not mean running wild, for they impose their own limits, such as the time-honored one of traversing paving stones without ever stepping on the lines.

WINNIE-THE-POOH

First published: 1926

Type of work: Short stories

Milne brought animal toys in his son's nursery to life by making them speak and act like real children and adapting them to a natural setting attractive to children.

In the first Pooh story, "Edward Bear" of the earlier poem becomes Winnie-the-Pooh. Pooh was the name the real Christopher Robin had given to a swan. When Pooh becomes a bear, Milne's reason for the distinctive hyphenated "the" is not known, nor is the significance, if any, of the fact that he lives "under the name of Sanders." The name may simply ridicule the adult habit of appropriating things in nature by naming them. In Winnie-the-Pooh, versions of children's animal toys appear in a wood that has been appropriated by animals that have gained the likenesses of people—particularly children.

Milne immediately establishes what became perhaps the most famous Pooh motif, the fact that the little bear eats honey to excess. Eating is often discussed and done in the stories, and in the second story Pooh, after doing his morning "stoutness exercises," overeats while visiting Rabbit and gets stuck in the hole that is the latter's doorway, a good example of the application of Pooh's status as a "Bear of No Brain." In both stories Christopher rescues the bear, in the second one reading to him for a week while the dieting Pooh grows slender enough to permit his many friends to yank him from the hole.

This pattern predominates in Winnie-the-Pooh. Either Pooh or one of his animal friends faces a problem or an embarrassment, but the wise young human, Christopher, and helpful friends extricate them from their trouble. Whenever there is a problem, there is a discussion, usually humorous, of a possible solution, and one member of the little community is a potential victim and another an often unexpected hero. Despite his small brain, for example, Pooh is the one who discovers how to save little Piglet in a flood. Friendship works in all directions in Winnie-the-Pooh.

One of the most delightful aspects of this book is its attitude toward mistakes. They happen, cause worry, but are eventually overcome. There is much fun about errors in such basic lessons as learning to count and spell. Another shortcoming is aping the mistakes of elders; Owl, for instance, falls into tiresome adult rhetoric and must be suppressed firmly but politely. The friends survive even mistakes in human relations. Eeyore, for example, somehow gets it into his head that a party for Pooh, who has just rescued his friend Piglet, is for him and begins a speech of self-praise. Christopher sets him right, and they charitably ignore Eeyore's clumsy attempts to come to terms with his humiliation. Pooh's gift, a Special Pencil Case, gives the donkey the chance to air his view that "this writing business" is much "over-rated."

THE HOUSE AT POOH CORNER

First published: 1928

Type of work: Short stories

The second Pooh book offers another ten stories of the group's friendships and adventures but works toward an awareness that childhood must come to an end.

After publishing a second book of poems, Now We Are Six, in 1927, Milne issued his second and last Pooh book in 1928. In many respects it is like his first one, although he introduces one new character, Tigger, whose bounciness signifies his impulsive and reckless character, to enliven the scene.

The last story, however, is very different. It is a goodbye to Christopher and the Hundred Acre Wood. It is the whimsically gloomy Eeyore, probably the funniest of all Milne's creatures, who celebrates in a verse of his own construction Christopher's "going." The poem itself exemplifies one of the author's favorite techniques: the speaker's interruption of his own poem to complain about such things as the difficulty of finding appropriate rhymes or other suddenly discovered poetic weaknesses. When the poem is recited to the animals, Pooh alleges that it is better than the poem he had meant to contribute, to which Eeyore replies that "it was meant to be."

As Christopher reads the poem later, the animals depart until only Pooh is left. He tells Pooh that they will take a walk together. When Pooh asks where, his answer is "nowhere," and he tells Pooh that the thing that he prefers doing is "nothing." Their walk, he points out, is a good example of "nothing." Christopher talks of some of the things that he is learning, all unfamiliar to Pooh, and then, simulating a ceremony of knighthood, dubs Pooh his most faithful knight. Pooh, however, not understanding Christopher's intention, supposes that his failure represents a failure of his own. Next Pooh is distressed to learn that Christopher will do "nothing" no more, or at least much less often because "they don't let you." Then the two trail off together. The House at Pooh Corner, as well as Milne's contributions to children's literature (other than a dramatization of Kenneth Grahame's The Wind in the Willows, which appeared in 1929) have come to an end after just a few short years in Milne's writing career.

It seems clear that the fact of Christopher and Pooh going off together signifies both the end of childhood adventures and their imperishable persistence in memory. Milne apparently needed a young son to keep him in the Winnie-the-Pooh vein, and by 1928 the real Christopher was turning eight, beyond the toys and ways of his younger years, and would soon be attending a prep school. Milne admitted that his interest in children's books was then fading. He thought that perhaps it would return when he became a grandfather, although, as it turned out, his only grandchild was not born until after his death.

As his son reported in his book The Enchanted Places (1976), Milne considered writing to be, among other things, a "thrill." At a certain point the thrill of a certain kind of accomplishment fades. The writer may still accede to the demand for more of the same, and readers would certainly have welcomed more Pooh stories, but Milne chose to end when the thrill had passed.

SUMMARY

A. A. Milne's originality as a writer for children begins with his translation of children's animal toys to a woods, where they take on the being of characters with distinctive personalities, speech habits, and a desire to fashion their own kind of life. Milne's animals play with each other and with language itself. He had an extraordinary ability to assume and express a childlike point of view. The only significant human in these books is a child, but to Pooh and Piglet and the other animals he serves as a helpful and sympathetic substitute parent. The Hundred Acre Wood is as safe as a nursery but more exciting because it is a place where adventures and small misadventures sometimes end instructively but always end happily.

Robert P. Ellis

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

Once on a Time, 1917
Make-Believe, 1918
The Man in the Bowler Hat: A Terribly Exciting Affair, 1923
When We Were Very Young, 1924
A Gallery of Children, 1925
King Hilary and the Beggarman, 1926
Winnie-the-Pooh, 1926
Now We Are Six, 1927
The House at Pooh Corner, 1928
Toad of Toad Hall, 1929
The Ugly Duckling, 1941
Prince Rabbit, and the Princess Who Could Not Laugh, 1966

LONG FICTION:

Mr. Pim, 1921 (also as Mr. Pim Passes By)
Two People, 1931
One Year's Time, 1942
Chloe Marr, 1946

SHORT FICTION:

The Secret, and Other Stories, 1929
Birthday Party, and Other Stories, 1948

POETRY:

For the Luncheon Interval: Cricket, and Other Verses, 1925
Behind the Lines, 1940
The Norman Church, 1948

DRAMA:

Wurzel-Flummery, pr. 1917, revised 1919
Belinda: An April Folly, pr., pb. 1918
The Boy Comes Home, pr. 1918
Mr. Pim Passes By, pr. 1919
The Camberley Triangle, pr., pb. 1919
The Lucky One, pr., pb. 1919 (also as Let's All Talk About Gerald)
The Red Feathers, pb. 1919
The Romantic Age, pr. 1920
The Stepmother, pr. 1920
The Dover Road, pr. 1921
The Great Broxopp: Four Chapters in Her Life, pr. 1921
The Truth About Blayds, pr. 1921
Berlud, Unlimited, pr., pb. 1922
Success, pr., pb. 1923 (also as Give Me Yesterday)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How do A. A. Milne's animal characters reflect the personalities of real people?
- Was it a good idea for Milne to give his fictional Christopher Robin the same name as his real son?
- What characteristics of the Pooh stories seem more appropriate for adults than for young children?
- What features of Milne's literary style seem to have most influenced other writers of children's books? Which contemporary writers seem to have learned the most from Milne?
- Have illustrator Ernest H. Shepard's artistic contributions to Milne's books been sufficiently appreciated?
- One critic has argued that Milne's humor derives from pushing logical ideas to "the point of absurdity." Does this criticism adequately explain the basis of Milne's humor?

The Artist: A Duologue, pr., pb. 1923
To Have the Honour, pr. 1924 (also as To Meet the Prince)
Ariadne: Or, Business First, pr. 1925
Portrait of a Gentleman in Slippers: A Fairy Tale, pr., pb. 1926
Miss Marlow at Play, pr. 1927
The Ivory Door: A Legend, pr. 1927
Gentleman Unknown, pr. 1928
Michael and Mary, pr. 1929
They Don't Mean Any Harm, pr. 1932
Other People's Lives, pr. 1933
Miss Elizabeth Bennet, pr., pb. 1936
Sarah Simple, pr. 1937
Before the Flood, pr., pb. 1951

SCREENPLAYS:

Bookworms, 1920
Five Pounds Reward, 1920
The Bump, 1920
Twice Two, 1920
Birds of Prey (The Perfect Alibi), 1930 (with Basil Dean)

MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE LONG FICTION:

The Red House Mystery, 1922
Four Days' Wonder, 1933

MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE SHORT FICTION:

A Table near the Band, and Other Stories, 1950

MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE DRAMA:

The Fourth Wall: A Detective Story, 1928 (also as The Perfect Alibi)

NONFICTION:

Lovers in London, 1905 (essays)
The Day's Play, 1910
The Holiday Round, 1912
Once a Week, 1914
Happy Days, 1915
Not That It Matters, 1919
If I May, 1920
The Sunny Side, 1921
The Ascent of Man, 1928
By Way of Introduction, 1929
When I Was Very Young, 1930
Peace with Honour: An Enquiry into the War Convention, 1934, revised 1935
It's Too Late Now: The Autobiography of a Writer, 1939 (also as Autobiography)
War with Honour, 1940
War Aims Unlimited, 1941
Going Abroad?, 1947
Books for Children: A Reader's Guide, 1948
Year In, Year Out, 1952

About the Author

Milne, Christopher. The Enchanted Places. New York: Penguin, 1976.

_____. The Path Through the Trees. New York: Dutton, 1979.

Milne, Christopher, and A. R. Melrose. Beyond the World of Pooh: Selections from the Memoirs of Christopher Milne. New York: Dutton, 1958.

Swann, Thomas Burnett. A. A. Milne. New York: Twayne, 1971.

Thwaite, Ann. A. A. Milne: The Man Behind Winnie-the-Pooh. New York: Random House, 1990.

Tyerman Williams, John. Pooh and the Philosophers; In Which It Is Shown That All Western Philosophy Is Merely a Preamble to Winnie-the-Pooh. London: Methuen, 1995.

Wullschlager, Jackie. Inventing Wonderland: The Lives and Fantasies of Lewis Carroll, Edward Lear, J. M. Barrie, Kenneth Grahame, and A. A. Milne. New York: The Free Press, 1996.

© The Nobel Foundation

CZESŁAW MIŁOSZ

Born: Šeteiniai, Lithuania

June 30, 1911

Died: Cracow, Poland

August 4, 2004

Miłosz was a Nobel Prize-winning poet whose work captured both the depths to which human beings have fallen in the twentieth century and the heights to which they continue to aspire.

BIOGRAPHY

Czesław Miłosz (MEE-lawsh) was born on June 30, 1911, in Šeteiniai, a small village near Wilno (now Vilnius) in Lithuania to Aleksandr and Weronika Kunat Miłosz, Polish-speaking descendants of Lithuanian gentry. In his autobiography, Rodzinna Europa (1959; Native Realm: A Search for Self-Definition, 1968), Miłosz reports that his first memories are of exile: Like thousands of other refugees, his family fled Lithuania for Russia when the Germans invaded at the beginning of World War I. After the war, Miłosz's family returned to a rural Lithuania that he describes as steeped in religion, superstition, and nature in his lyrical second novel Dolina Issy (1955; The Issa Valley, 1981).

Miłosz attended Zygmunt August High School and King Stefan Batory University in Wilno—a city that he often recalls in his poetry—and was a founding member of the poetry group Zagary and its literary magazine. In 1931, he traveled to Paris, where he met the French poet Oscar de L. Miłosz, a distant relative whose work and mystical temperament were a major influence on the young Czesław's own intellectual development. In 1933, Miłosz published his first book, Poemat o czasie zastygłym (a poem on frozen time). In 1934, he earned a law degree, won an award from the Polish Writers' Union, and received a fellowship that allowed him to spend another year in Paris.

When Miłosz returned to Wilno, he worked at its Polish radio station and published his second book of poems, Trzy zimy (1936; three winters). In 1937, he moved to Warsaw, where he joined a group of poets known as the catastrophists because of their apocalyptic view of the future of Europe and Western civilization. In 1939, the catastrophists' worst nightmares were realized when Germany again invaded Poland and the Nazis quickly occupied Warsaw. During the occupation, Miłosz was an active member of the Polish Resistance and a major contributor to the city's elaborate underground culture. He edited Pieśń niepodległa (1942; invincible song), a mimeographed anthology of resistance poetry, translated Jacques Maritain's À travers le désastre (1941), an attack against French collaboration with the Germans, and wrote poems such as "Świat poema naiwne" ("The World: A Naive Poem") and "Głosy biednych ludzi" ("The Voices of Poor People"), which were published by the underground presses and passed from hand to hand in the desolated city. When the Communists took power in postwar Poland, a volume of his collected poems, Ocalenie (1945; rescue), was one of the first books published by the new government.

As a prominent anti-Nazi, resistance figure, and poet, Miłosz's support was eagerly sought by the new regime. At first, he gave it: Between 1946 and 1950, he served as a Polish cultural attaché to Washington and Paris. In 1951, however, he broke with the government and became an exile in Paris. At a time when most French intellectuals were still enamored of Joseph Stalin and the Soviet Union, Miłosz courageously spoke the unwelcome truth about intellectual life in the East in the essays published as Zniewolony umysł (1953; The Captive Mind 1953)—a book that the critic Irving Howe has described as a “central text in the modern effort to understand totalitarianism.” In the same year, Miłosz’s first novel, Zdobycie władzy, 1953 (The Seizure of Power, 1955), was published and awarded the prestigious Prix Littéraire Européen.

In 1960, Miłosz accepted a position as a professor of Slavic languages at the University of California at Berkeley and moved to the United States, where he lived and worked for many years and became an American citizen. Since 1960, his books have included The History of Polish Literature (1969); numerous books of poetry, including in Miasto bez imienia (1969; Selected Poems, 1973), Bells in Winter (1978), The Separate Notebooks (1984), Nieobjęta ziemia (1984; Unattainable Earth, 1986), The Collected Poems, 1931-1987 (1988), and Provinces (1991); and three collections of essays, Emperor of the Earth: Modes of Eccentric Vision (1977), Widzenia nad zatoką San Francisco (1969; Visions from San Francisco Bay, 1982), and Ziemia Ulro (1977; The Land of Ulro, 1984). In 1978 Miłosz was awarded the Neustadt International Prize for Literature by the University of Oklahoma. In 1980, he was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature by the Swedish Academy. He died in Cracow, Poland, on August 4, 2004, at the age of ninety-three.

ANALYSIS

In the West, Miłosz observed in Świadektwo poezji (1983; The Witness of Poetry, 1983), “the separation of art and the public has been an accomplished fact” since the time of Charles Baudelaire. Yet “in Central and Eastern Europe,” he wrote thirty years earlier in The Captive Mind, “a poet does not merely arrange words in beautiful order. Tradition demands that he be a ‘bard,’ that his songs linger on many lips, that he speak in his poems of subjects of interest to all the citizens.” Czesław Miłosz was himself such a bard.

For thirty years after Miłosz went into exile in 1951, none of his books was officially published in Communist Poland. Yet during the years that he was an “unperson”—a poet whose name could not be mentioned in print and whose writings had to be circulated in underground samizdat editions and tape recordings—he became Poland’s unofficial poet laureate. When Solidarity first emerged and a monument was erected in 1981 to the memory of the Polish workers slain in the Gdansk food strikes of 1970, the words on its base were quite naturally taken from one of his poems: “You who wronged a simple man . . . / Do not feel safe. The poet remembers/ You can kill one, but another is born./ The words are written down, the deed, the date.” When the first officially sanctioned edition of his collected poetry since the war was published in Poland in the same year, two hundred thousand copies sold out within a month.

“The poet remembers. . . .” To Miłosz and his Polish readers, that is more than merely a warning or a promise. It is a definition of vocation. What Miłosz did in each of his books was, above all, to remember: to keep his and his era’s past alive in the present through the power of his words. Because those words are written mostly in Polish, Miłosz can be read in the United States only in translation. He always understood this predicament. “The abyss for me was exile,” he wrote in The Captive Mind shortly after immigrating to the West. “My mother tongue, work in my mother tongue, is for me the most important thing in life.” When he finally broke with his country, he said in The Captive Mind, he fully expected the consequences to be not merely exile but “sterility and inaction.”

“Wrong Honorable Professor Miłosz,” he wrote sardonically of himself in the poem “A Magic Mountain,” “Who wrote poems in some unheard-of tongue./ Who will count them anyway.” In one section of the cycle “Gdzie wschodzi słońce i kedy zapada” (“From the Rising of the Sun”), he summarized his situation with even greater irony and wit. “Oh yes,” he writes, “not all of me shall die, there will remain/ An item in the fourteenth volume of an encyclopedia/ Next to a hundred Millers and Mickey Mouse.” Nevertheless, Miłosz remained faithful to both his native language and his Eastern European sense of the poet’s vocation. “Whatever I hold in my hand, a stylus, reed, quill or a ballpoint,” he announces in the opening section of the same cycle, “Wherever I may be . . . / I attend to matters I have been charged with in the provinces.”

Memory has always been his muse, he declared in the early poem “Sroczosć” (“Magpiety”). In his Nobel lecture (1981), he explained why. “Perhaps our most precious acquisition is . . . respect and gratitude for certain things which protect people from internal disintegration and from yielding to tyranny,” he wrote. Paramount among those things is memory. Yet, he went on to say, “our planet that gets smaller every year, with its fantastic proliferation of mass media, is witnessing a process that escapes definition, characterized by a refusal to remember.” Under these circumstances, he insisted, the poet’s role must be to see and to describe. Yet “‘To see’ means not only to have before one’s eyes. It may also mean to preserve in memory. ‘To see and to describe’ may also mean to reconstruct in imagination.”

The reader of Miłosz’s poetry is immediately struck by this effort “to reconstruct in imagination,” to make memories live again through description. Poem after poem is built of powerful and recurrent images of his Lithuanian boyhood, his World War II youth, and his California émigré adulthood. The poems vary in tone, of course—many strive to make affirmations in the face of the historical tragedies that he has seen in his long life. The strongest and most memorable poems, however, are those in which he recalls the war years and their aftermath with a survivor’s painful guilt.

“DEDICATION”

First published: “Przedmowa,” 1945 (collected in New and Collected Poems, 1931-2001, 2001)

Type of work: Poem

This keynote poem is one of the first expressions of Miłosz’s lifelong commitment to understand and testify to the history and experience of his Europe.

“Dedication,” written soon after the occupation and destruction of Warsaw, is an homage to those who died from one who survived. In it, Miłosz acknowledges the difficulty of speaking about the unspeakable, reveals his guilt at having lived to tell the story of those years, and dedicates himself to writing poetry that will grapple with history and memory.

It begins by directly addressing those to whom it is dedicated—“You whom I could not save/ Listen to me”—as if the poet sees them before him and must speak to give their spirits rest. He then confesses his own lack of skill and expresses his decision to abandon the aesthetic of complexity that characterized his prewar writing: “Try to understand this simple speech as I would be ashamed of another./ I swear there is in me no wizardry of words.” In the second stanza, he tries to understand why he survived and fails. All he can say is that, somehow, “What strengthened me, for you was lethal.” He then recalls the excitement of the prewar years, when the catastrophists and other talented young people, now dead, faced anxiety with energy and art. “You mixed up farewell to an epoch with the beginning of a new one./ Inspiration of hatred with lyrical beauty,/ Blind force with accomplished shape.”

The third stanza links the dead with the destroyed city, nearly burned to the ground by the Germans while the Soviet army watched from the opposite bank of the Vistula River. “Here is the valley of shallow Polish rivers. And an immense bridge/ Going into white fog. Here is a broken city.” The white fog literally describes the smoldering city. It also suggests that what lay on the far side of the bridge—the Soviet Army, doing nothing to help—was shrouded in silence in Communist Poland, where official dogma whitewashed the Soviets and made them the city’s saviors.

In the fourth stanza, the elegiac tone of the first three stanzas is replaced by an angrier, tougher voice, a voice that seems to rebuke the poet himself, while insisting that after this destruction poetry can never be the same. “What is poetry which does not save/ Nations or people?” the poet asks. He then quickly and absolutely answers his own question: “A connivance with official lies,/ A song of drunkards whose throats will be cut in a moment,/ Readings for sophomore girls.” The poet clearly speaks from bitter experience. Only now does he see what poetry must be and do. Moreover, while he does not condemn totally his own earlier efforts in a different poetic vein, he strongly feels the need to move beyond them. “That I wanted good poetry without knowing it,/ That I discovered, late, its salutary aim,/ In this and only this I find salvation,” he says. That “late” is a profound self-indictment that echoes throughout the remainder of Miłosz’s career—an indictment to which he pleads guilty and of which he will never quite exonerate himself.

In the final, haunting stanza, the young poet who wanted to escape the provinces for the cosmopolitan worlds of Paris and Warsaw (see his 1980 poem, “Bypassing Rue Descartes”) finds himself returning to his roots, as he compares the book that he is dedicating with the village ceremonies of his childhood in Lithuania. “They used to pour millet on graves or poppy seeds,” he recalls. “To feed the dead who would come disguised as birds./ I put this book here for you, who once lived/ So that you should visit us no more.” It proves to be a vain hope. In the other poems in his first postwar book, and in many of the poems that will follow, Miłosz is drawn back, again and again, to these same memories of the war and its dead.

“IN MILAN”

First published: 1962 (collected in New and Collected Poems, 1931-2001, 2001)

Type of work: Poem

This poem reveals the conflict that Miłosz always felt between his commitment to writing a poetry of history and memory and his attraction to an art celebrating beauty and the senses.

“In Milan,” which was written in France in 1955 but first published in his 1962 collection Król Popiel i inne wiersze (King Popiel, and other poems), expresses the conflict that Miłosz faced as an artist throughout his career. As “Dedication” shows, he felt compelled to use his art to bear witness to his time. Yet he always felt an equally strong attraction to embracing the beauty of existence and the pleasures of the senses, to transcending his experience of history through mysticism, nature, and art. These two impulses are apparent in the mix of poems that he chose to include in each of his collections. Occasionally, as for “In Milan,” they become the subject of the poems themselves.

The poem begins with two brief stanzas. The first recalls a time, years ago, when the impulse to celebrate the beauty of life led the poet to write poems on Italy. The second recounts a charge made by a friend as they walked at night through a piazza: that Miłosz’s art was “too politicized.” The third, longest stanza records Miłosz’s reply—a response that is both deeply felt and tinged with regret.

He would love to write poems about the beauty of the world, Miłosz says: “I am for the moon amid the vineyards . . . I am for the cypresses at dawn.” He could “compose, right now, a song/ on the taste of peaches, on September in Europe.” In fact, “I would like to gobble up/ All existing flowers, to eat all the colors./ I have been devouring this world in vain/ For forty years, a thousand would not be enough.” He would desperately like to be “a poet of the five senses”—because those senses are so powerful, because it would be easy to lose oneself in their pleasures—but “That’s why I don’t allow myself to become one.” Because “Thought has less weight than the word lemon,” it needs a poet to express it, to defend it, to insist on its importance.

In this poem, Miłosz manages to have it both ways. In a poem of ideas, which regrettably insists on his commitment to ideas in poetry, he creates an occasion that allows him to write exactly the kind of poem that he claims he must not allow himself to write: a poem full of beauty, emotion, and sensuous imagery.

SUMMARY

“Have I fulfilled anything, have I been of use to anyone?” Czesław Miłosz asks in “From the Rising of the Sun.” The self-doubt seems genuine and is still evident in an extraordinary later poem such as “Far Away,” published when he was eighty. Yet while Miłosz could not stop asking himself these questions, his readers certainly may. He created a body of poetry and prose that serves as an eloquent testament to the human spirit struggling with the extremes of twentieth century experience. In that—in his poetic witness—Miłosz was, indeed, “of use” to everyone fortunate enough to have discovered his work.

Bernard F. Rodgers, Jr.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Poemat o czasie zastygłym, 1933
Trzy zimy, 1936
Wiersze, 1940 (as J. Syruć)
Ocalenie, 1945
Światło dzienne, 1953
Traktat poetycki, 1957 (A Treatise on Poetry, 2001)
Król Popiel i inne wiersze, 1962
Gucio zaczarowany, 1964
Wiersze, 1967
Miasto bez imienia, 1969 (Selected Poems, 1973)
Gdzie wschodzi słońce i k dy zapada, 1974
Utwory poetyckie, 1976
Bells in Winter, 1978
Poezje, 1981
Hymn o perle, 1982
The Separate Notebooks, 1984
Nieobjęta ziemia, 1984 (Unattainable Earth, 1986)
The Collected Poems, 1931-1987, 1988
Provinces, 1991
Facing the River: New Poems, 1995
Wiersze wybrane, 1996
Piesek przydrożny, 1997 (Road-Side Dog, 1998)
Poezje wybrane—Selected Poems, 1998
To, 2000
New and Collected Poems, 1931-2001, 2001
Second Space: New Poems, 2004
Selected Poems, 1931-2004, 2006

LONG FICTION:

Zdobycie władzy, 1953 (The Seizure of Power, 1955)
Dolina Issy, 1955 (The Issa Valley, 1981)

NONFICTION:

Zniewolony umysł, 1953 (criticism; The Captive Mind, 1953)
Kontynenty, 1958
Rodzinna Europa, 1959 (autobiography; Native Realm: A Search for Self-Definition, 1968)
Człowiek wśród skorpionów, 1962 (criticism)
The History of Polish Literature, 1969 (enlarged 1983)
Widzenia nad zatoką San Francisco, 1969 (Visions from San Francisco Bay, 1982)
Prywatne obowiązki, 1972
Ziemia Ulro, 1977 (The Land of Ulro, 1984)
Emperor of the Earth: Modes of Eccentric Vision, 1977
Ogród nauk, 1979
Nobel Lecture, 1981
Świadectwo poezji, 1983 (criticism; The Witness of Poetry, 1983)
Zaczynając od moich ulic, 1985 (Beginning with My Streets: Essays and Recollections, 1991)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How does the memory of a poet like Czesław Miłosz differ from the memory of a historian?
- Does Miłosz ever “escape the provinces”?
- Peter Filkins has written about the poetry and antipoetry of Miłosz. What is the latter and how does it relate to the former?
- Which seem more successful: the poems that Miłosz wrote during World War II or the later poems recollecting the war?
- Miłosz lived and wrote for many years in the United States and assisted in translating his poems into English. Can he be considered in any sense an American poet?

Rok myśliwego, 1990 (A Year of the Hunter, 1994)

Legenda nowoczesności, 1996 (Legends of Modernity: Essays and Letters from Occupied Poland, 1942-1943, 2005)

Życie na wyspach, 1997

Striving Towards Being: The Letters of Thomas Merton and Czesław Miłosz, 1997

Abecadło Miłosza, 1997 (Miłosz's ABCs, 2001)

To Begin Where I Am: Selected Essays, 2001

Rozmowy Czesław Miłosz: Aleksander Fiut "Autoportret przekorny," 2003

EDITED TEXTS:

Pieśń niepoddległa, 1942

Postwar Polish Poetry, 1965

With the Skin: Poems of Aleksander Wat, 1989

A Book of Luminous Things: An International Anthology of Poetry, 1996

About the Author

Atlas, James. "Poet, Exile, Laureate." The New York Times, October 10, 1980, p. A10.

Bayley, John. "Return of the Native." The New York Review of Books 28 (June 25, 1981): 29-33.

Carnecka, Ewa, and Aleksander Fiut. Conversations with Czesław Miłosz. Translated by Richard Lourie. San Diego, Calif.: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1987.

Carpenter, Bogdana. "The Gift Returned: Czesław Miłosz and American Poetry." In Living in Translation: Polish Writers in America, edited by Halina Stephan. New York: Rodopi, 2003.

Filkins, Peter. "The Poetry and Anti-Poetry of Czesław Miłosz." The Iowa Review 19 (Spring/Summer, 1989): 188-209.

Haven, Cynthia, ed. Czesław Miłosz: Conversations. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2006.

Hoffman, Eva. "The Poet of the Polish Diaspora." The New York Times Magazine, January 17, 1982, p. 29.

Jastremski, Kim. "Home as Other in the Work of Czesław Miłosz." In Framing the Polish Home: Postwar Cultural Constructions of Hearth, Nation, and Self, edited by Bozena Shallcross. Athens: Ohio University Press, 2002.

Malinowska, Barbara. Dynamics of Being, Space, and Time in the Poetry of Czesław Miłosz and John Ashbery. New York: P. Lang, 2000.

World Literature Today 52 (Summer, 1978). Special issue on Miłosz.

Woroszyński, Wiktor. "Miłosz in Polish Eyes." The New Republic 84 (May 23, 1981): 28-31.

Library of Congress

JOHN MILTON

Born: London, England
December 9, 1608

Died: London, England
November 8, 1674

Milton, author of the last and greatest epic poem in English, Paradise Lost, is generally considered to be second only to William Shakespeare as the greatest English poet.

BIOGRAPHY

John Milton was born in Bread Street, Cheapside, London, England, on December 9, 1608. His father, John Milton, was a very successful scrivener, one who copied legal documents and performed some of the services associated with banking and finance. His mother's name was Sara Jeffrey Milton. Though the younger Milton was never rich, his father made enough money to guarantee his son's financial independence throughout the great poet's lifetime. Milton was a precocious child, demonstrating a particular facility with ancient and modern languages. By the time he was graduated from college, Milton read, spoke, and wrote Latin nearly as well as he did English and was competent in Greek, Hebrew, French, and Italian. From approximately the age of nine to twelve, Milton was tutored at home, and from the age of twelve to sixteen he walked about three blocks to attend St. Paul's School at the famous London cathedral.

Milton started college in 1625, a few months after turning sixteen, attending Christ's College, Cambridge, where he earned the nickname "the lady of Christ's" because he took meticulous care of his appearance, had delicate features, and disdained many of the masculine activities, such as drinking and visiting brothels, that occupied many of his schoolmates. He may have been "rusticated," or suspended from school, briefly, in 1626, because of a conflict with one of his teachers, but he returned to earn his B.A. in 1629 and his M.A. in 1632. Initially, Milton had planned to be a minister, but as a Puritan, or radical Protestant, he came to believe that the Anglican Church was too much like the Catholic church and decided to dedicate his life to poetry instead. While in school, Milton began writing poetry, mostly in Latin, and in December, 1629, just after his twenty-first birthday, he wrote, in English, "On the Morning of Christ's Nativity," which in effect signaled his great promise as a poet.

In the early 1630's, Milton's family moved to Horton, Buckinghamshire, seventeen miles west of London, where Milton's father retired to a country estate. After leaving Cambridge in 1632, Milton lived with his family for six years (usually called the Horton period). During this time, he read voraciously, attempting to complete his education by reading everything that was written in the languages that he had mastered. While at Cambridge and during the years of the Horton period, Milton wrote many of the early works that helped to make him famous during his lifetime—the twin "mood" poems "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso," the masque, or play, Comus (pr. 1634, pb. 1637), the pastoral elegy "Lycidas," and several of his familiar sonnets, such as "How Soon Hath Time." Some poems, such as "Lycidas," were published under very particular circumstances and can be easily dated, but most of Milton's early poems circulated in manuscript well before they were formally published for the first time in his collected poems of 1645.

In August, 1638, Milton set out on his Grand Tour, a trip on the European continent that most educated men undertook in Milton's day to complete their studies and to polish them as gentlemen. Milton traveled mostly in Italy, where he met many important people, including the great astronomer Galileo. He returned home somewhat prematurely in August, 1639, because England was nearing its momentous civil war.

The English Civil War, which began in 1642, was caused by a power struggle between the monarchy and Parliament. In 1625, Charles I had taken over the throne from his father, James I, and by 1629 had dissolved Parliament in an attempt to govern autocratically. Parliament, however, insisted on a more representative form of government, and years of political infighting culminated in armed conflict in August, 1642. In 1647, the king's forces were defeated, and the king was taken prisoner. Then, in an act unprecedented in English history, Charles was executed on January 30, 1649. This began the period of the Puritan commonwealth, ultimately headed by Oliver Cromwell. These historical events are important in Milton's life because after his return from Italy he published relatively little poetry between "Lycidas" in 1638 and Paradise Lost (1667, 1674). Milton spent twenty years writing prose in support of various personal and political causes; most of this prose is only read now by highly specialized scholars.

Of the approximately twenty prose works that Milton published between 1641 and 1660, the most widely known are Of Education and Areopagitica, both published in 1644. The first outlined an ideal system of education, and the second argued against censorship, with the latter now considered one of the world's most important defenses of freedom of the press. In fact, Milton's Areopagitica helped inspire the writing of the U.S. Constitution's Bill of Rights.

Between 1643 and 1645, four of Milton's prose works argued for more liberal divorce laws, presumably because of the crisis of his first marriage. In June, 1642, Milton had married the first of his three wives, seventeen-year-old Mary Powell. Within six weeks of the marriage, she left him, returned to her father's home in Oxford, England, and did not rejoin Milton until 1645. Her motives are still not entirely clear—she may have been responding to family or political pressures, but the passion of Milton's divorce tracts indicated considerable marital discord. In 1643, The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, the first of Milton's four divorce tracts, made him quite infamous, and he was often portrayed throughout his life as "Milton the Divorcer," a sexual libertine, because of his liberal opinions on divorce. After returning to her husband, Mary Powell gave birth to four children and died in 1652 after giving birth to their last. In 1656, Milton married his second wife, twenty-eight-year-old Katherine Woodcock, who also died giving birth two years later. This death probably inspired one of Milton's greatest sonnets, "Methought I Saw My Late Espousèd Saint," though some contend that the poem refers to Mary Powell. In 1663, he married Elizabeth Minshull, who outlived him. The divorce pamphlets made Milton infamous, but the prose works that caused Milton the most controversy in his lifetime were the four that he wrote between 1649 and 1654 to justify the execution of Charles I. Almost as soon as Charles was executed, there was a backlash of negative sentiment all over Europe, as well as England, and Milton came to be known as the defender of regicide as well as of divorce.

In the 1650's, then, Milton's life was anything but happy. Scorned in many quarters for his views on divorce and the regicide, embroiled in politics rather than fulfilling his calling as a great national poet, suffering from the death of two wives, Milton also went totally blind early in 1652. Modern ophthalmic research generally agrees that Milton's blindness was caused by glaucoma, but the more romantic theory is that it was caused by years of reading and writing by low candlelight. Whatever the cause, Milton's blindness was a great burden for one who by then was planning to write the next verse epic to rival the great epics of Homer, Vergil, and Dante. In Milton's most widely known sonnet, "When I Consider How My Light Is Spent," Milton describes this anxiety but ends the poem with an assertion of calm faith that God will use his talents as He sees fit.

Ironically, Milton's blindness probably helped save his life when the commonwealth collapsed and the monarchy was restored. When Cromwell died in 1658, his son Richard was not able to maintain power. Parliament invited Charles II, the son of Charles I, to return from exile in France, and the restoration of the monarchy took place in May, 1660. Many of those involved in the execution of Charles I were then executed themselves, but Milton was spared in spite of his active and public role in the justification of the regicide. Yet he was severely punished, despite being relatively old at fifty-one, being totally blind, and possessing a considerable literary reputation. Besides a short period of imprisonment, he lost his government position as secretary for foreign tongues (Latin secretary), paid a fine, and suffered the confiscation of most of his property. The playwright Sir William D'Avenant and the poet Andrew Marvell, who had been his assistant as Latin secretary, may have helped Milton earn clemency by speaking in his behalf.

After 1660, Milton returned to writing poetry and later published his three major poems, Paradise Lost (1667, 1674), Paradise Regained (1671), and the classical tragedy Samson Agonistes (1671), the last two printed in one volume in 1671. The precise dating and even the sequence in which Milton wrote these works is still a matter of scholarly conjecture, but after his blindness he wrote with the help of an amanuensis, someone who served as a secretary to record, usually every morning, what Milton dictated while composing the verses in his head. Sometimes Milton's daughters served in this capacity, sometimes paid assistants. Milton published additional prose works in these last years of his life, most notably The History of Britain (1670). He also completed the monumental Latin work De doctrina Christiana libri duo Posthumi (1825), a systematic exposition of Christian doctrine, which attempted to bring the Old and New Testaments into harmony. Although willed to one of his secretaries, the manuscript disappeared and remained unpublished until 1825. Milton died on November 8, 1674, in London, one month short of his sixty-sixth birthday, from complications arising from gout.

ANALYSIS

Milton is not "easy reading" for the modern student of literature. Extremely well-schooled in the Bible, the Greek and Latin classics, and the learning of his own time, Milton frequently alludes to materials that were common knowledge for his educated seventeenth century audience but that are usually simply arcane footnotes for today's readers. The modern reader also confronts vocabulary no longer in use, highly figurative language, and a convoluted syntax influenced by Milton's lifelong study of Latin. Yet the effort is always worth the trouble; the modern reader who becomes more comfortable with Milton's style discovers a majesty and delicacy of expression in both verse and prose that can be found in few other authors. In act 2, scene 2, of William Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra (pr. c. 1606-1607, pb. 1623), Antony's friend, Enobarbus, says of Cleopatra, "age cannot wither her, nor custom stale her infinite variety." The same can be said of Milton and his literary achievements.

Like Shakespeare, Milton remains a literary giant hundreds of years after his death because he completely mastered the wide variety of literary forms that he attempted. On one hand, Milton perfected the fourteen-line Italian sonnet, which demanded poetic significance in a brief form. On the other hand, he was the last poet in English to rise to the level of Homer, Vergil, and Dante in the epic poem, his massive and flawlessly sustained blank verse of Paradise Lost covering twelve books and more than ten thousand lines. Between these two extremes, Milton wrote "Lycidas," which the critic Marjorie Hope Nicholson calls "the most perfect long short poem in the English language"; Samson Agonistes, which might be the last great classical (and Christian) verse tragedy; and the "brief epic" sequel to Paradise Lost, Paradise Regained.

In some cases, even Milton's minor verse has survived the passage of time. For example, in 1631, Milton joined many of his fellow Cambridge students in commemorating the death of Thomas Hobson, the eccentric university "carrier," who drove a coach carrying students and mail between Cambridge and London for sixty-seven years until his death in 1630. In two poems titled "On the University Carrier," Milton adopts a witty style very different from the "grand style" associated with his major works, yet he manages a poetic depth and genuine pathos astounding for so slight an occasion.

The "infinite variety" of Milton's work refers as well to the evocative power of the single line, even the single phrase or word. The poetic force of the emotionally charged and intellectually rich details in all of his poems is sometimes hard for beginning students to see, given the difficult context of Milton's poetry; however, focusing on some of the more familiar examples of this quality can lead the patient and industrious student to many other examples. For example, at the end of "Methought I Saw My Late Espoused Saint,” the blind Milton wakes from the dream in which he “sees” her: “But O, as to embrace me she inclined,/ I waked, she fled, and day brought back my night.” The rich, evocative quality in the words “day” and “night” suggests both his grief for Katherine and the crushing burden of his blindness. In his dream, Milton imagines actually seeing Katherine for the first time, since he had married her after the onset of his blindness; but as the literal day returns, he experiences both a literal and a figurative night, on one hand unable again to see, and on the other tormented by his sense of loss and loneliness. “Night” can also suggest the political difficulties that Milton was experiencing in a declining Puritan government. Throughout Milton’s works, the student will find such rich details that reward continued study and revisitation.

Finally, the ageless appeal of Milton’s works comes from his effective treatment of some of the most significant themes that literature can offer. From Comus to Samson Agonistes and Paradise Regained, Milton is investigating the nature of good and evil, the nature of temptation, and the power of reason, patience, and faith to create a meaningful human existence. Milton’s dominant Christian theme beginning with Comus concerns his concept of Providence and the idea that God’s destiny for humans mysteriously includes freedom of choice. At the end of Paradise Lost, Adam and Eve learn that obeying Providence provides them with “a Paradise within thee, happier far.” Yet Milton’s works can be read either within the boundaries of Christianity, as Milton intended them, or in a more secular way, as many twentieth century critics chose to do. As early as 1900, the Scottish critic Sir Walter Raleigh could admire Paradise Lost even though he considered it “a monument to dead ideas.” A more secular reading of the poem finds great pathos in the image of human beings struggling to make sense of a world where death, pain, unhappiness, and failure are daily reminders of a less-than-perfect existence. Milton is essentially attempting to explain the presence of evil in a world that he believes is completely in the control of a benevolent, supernatural deity. Yet his Christian explanation can be secularized and remain very much the same: Evil in the world exists because of the failure of human choice, the refusal to follow reason—the best available guide for human conduct. Finally, however, Milton survives as a great poet of hope, celebrating the power of learning, patience, faith, and endurance. The final scene in Paradise Lost, of Adam and Eve forever banished from the perfection of Eden but conquering their despair and fear to face an unknown, new world, is as powerful an image as any in literature.

“LYCIDAS”

First published: 1638 (collected in Poems of Mr. John Milton, 1645)

Type of work: Poem

In the form of a pastoral elegy, Milton mourns the death of a fellow Cambridge student, Edward King, who drowned in the Irish Sea in 1637.

The nominal subject of “Lycidas” is the death of Edward King, a fellow student one year behind Milton at Cambridge, who died when his boat capsized in the Irish Sea on August 10, 1637. In a commemorative volume of poems, Milton saw an opportunity to test his poetic skill and comment on those whom he considered to be the corrupt clergy in his day. He chose the form of pastoral elegy, wherein a shepherd laments the death of a fellow shepherd, because the pastoral elegy was a classic type of poem rooted in Greek and Roman literature that allowed for the presentation of allegorical meaning. As the poet speaks of an idyllic rural life of shepherds, it is understood that he can be talking about contemporary life and universal truths at the same time. Milton uses a traditional pastoral name, Lycidas, to refer to King, and he employs a number of other pastoral conventions.

It is customary to see “Lycidas” as a poem in three parts, opening with a conventional pastoral lament for the premature death of the friend, portrayed as a fellow shepherd. The surviving shepherd has a responsibility to commemorate the friend in song, so he asks the Muses to inspire the song/poem he has now undertaken. This invocation is followed by another convention of the pastoral elegy, the accusation that protective forces (in this case, the pastoral nature deities) failed to prevent the death. In a poem filled with associative leaps, Milton moves at this point to a complaint about being an artist in an unappreciative world. Even Calliope, the muse of epic poetry, was not able to save from destruction her own son, the poet Orpheus, when the mob, or “rout,” disapproved. It is clear, continues the speaker, that the poet’s task in this world is a thankless one. Why then does the poet persist? The pursuit of fame is the most obvious answer, but fame can be denied by premature death, as was the case with Lycidas. The final answer to this line of questioning, provided by Phoebus Apollo, the god of poetic inspiration, is that “Fame is no plant that grows on mortal soil.” True fame is winning the salvation of Jove (or God). With this consolation, the first section of the poem ends.

In the second section of the poem, Milton criticizes the church government of his day, much as he would in his antiepiscopal prose tracts of the early 1640’s. To lead into and allegorize this criticism, Milton begins the section by having his shepherd-poet call forth Triton, spokesman for Neptune, the god of the sea, who explains that Neptune, the sea, was not responsible for Lycidas’s death. Triton reports that the sea and winds were calm that day; the drowning was caused by the defective ship in which Lycidas was sailing, “that fatal and perfidious bark,/ Built in th’ eclipse.” Allegorically, this ship is the church, and Saint Peter, the founder of the Christian church and the keeper of the keys to Heaven, arrives to deliver a stern rebuke. Peter says that Lycidas was far superior to those who dominated the church in Milton’s day, those who do not care about their congregations or flocks: “the hungry sheep look up, and are not fed.” Yet Peter warns that proper punishment awaits these negligent leaders: “that two-handed engine at the door/ Stands ready to smite once, and smite no more.” Exactly to what Milton intends this “two-handed engine” to refer is hotly debated—it is one of the famous “cruxes” of Milton scholarship—but it is clear at least that the punishment will be severe and final.

The last section is far less angry and more clearly pastoral in its setting. The valleys come and bring flowers to spread on the waters of the river Alpheus in memory of Lycidas’s passing. In the final consolation, the poet tells his fellow shepherds to stop their weeping because Lycidas is not really dead. Just as the sun sinks in the west but rises again every morning in the east, Lycidas is rising in Heaven.

From this point, Lycidas will be the protective deity of all those who sail the Irish Sea. The lament now done, the shepherd poet, having sung since morning, watches the sun sink below the bay, rises, and departs: “tomorrow to fresh woods, and pastures new.”

Milton’s poem has survived as great art because it is much more than a memorial for a dead friend or even an attack on seventeenth century clergy. Milton transcends these immediate purposes and creates a hauntingly evocative testimony to the fragility of human life. It is a poem about the fear of premature death, a fear that Milton felt keenly, given his great aspirations to become a national poet and his slow progress toward the great epic poem that would fulfill his aspirations. “Lycidas” is a poem that faces the fears of premature death and overcomes them because it is also a poem about rebirth, specifically a Christian rebirth, but also a more abstract rebirth that can give hope to all people, hope that life can be meaningful in the face of corruption, apparent chance, and disappointment. What began in part as a formal exercise, an attempt to demonstrate skill in a classic poetic form, became one of the world’s greatest poems, a personal expression of fear and anger balanced with a final affirmation of faith in cosmic order.

PARADISE LOST

First published: 1667, 1674

Type of work: Epic poem

After being cast out of Heaven, Satan leaves Hell, travels to the newly created world, and succeeds in tempting Adam and Eve to sin against God.

In the tradition of the epic poem, Paradise Lost begins in medias res, in the middle of the story, showing in the first two of twelve books how Satan and his followers gathered their forces on the burning lake of Hell and sought out the newly created race of humans on Earth. (The revolt and resulting war in Heaven that preceded this action and earned the devils their place in Hell is reported in books 5 and 6.)

In book 3, God observes Satan traveling toward Earth, predicts the fall of human beings, and asks for someone to ransom them. Christ, the Son, accepts. In book 4, Adam and Eve are introduced, as Satan lies hidden in the Garden of Eden. Satan appears in Eve's dream, encouraging her to taste of the forbidden Tree of Knowledge, and in book 5 God sends the angel Raphael to warn Adam and Eve of their danger. Raphael begins the story of Lucifer's revolt in Heaven, which he completes in book 6, and in book 7 Raphael tells of how God responded to Satan's revolt by creating a new world, the earth, and a new race in Adam and Eve. In book 8, Adam describes to Raphael his and Eve's creation, and Raphael delivers his final warning and departs. Book 9 tells the story of Satan's successful temptation of Eve, the eating of the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge, and the resulting discord between Adam and Eve. In book 10, Christ passes judgment on Adam and Eve, and Sin and Death build a bridge from the gates of Hell to Earth as Satan is returning to Hell. At the end of book 10, Adam and Eve resolve their discord and petition God for forgiveness, which is granted in book 11 as God sends the archangel Michael to give Adam a vision of the future for humans. In book 12, after the vision of Christ's sacrifice and redemption of the human race, Adam and Eve are expelled from Eden.

This brief synopsis, of course, does not communicate the grandeur and emotional intensity of Milton's great poem. Milton begins Paradise Lost with two captivating books set in Hell and featuring Lucifer, or Satan, who rallies his defeated forces and vows eternal war on God before journeying toward Earth to destroy Adam and Eve. In Hell, Satan has a kind of heroic splendor, and such apparent grandeur led English Romantic poets such as William Blake and Percy Bysshe Shelley to identify with Satan as a tragic rebel and to proclaim that Milton subconsciously admired Satan. Although Milton's subconscious mind must forever remain a mystery, this interpretation is very dubious, and generations of readers misled by Blake and his followers should read the poem more carefully. Milton began his epic with this larger-than-life portrait of Satan in order to provide God (who will obviously win) with a worthy adversary. Yet Satan's pseudoheroic size is severely diminished in all of his appearances outside the first two books, and by the end of the poem Satan is not at all prominent, the heroic focus having shifted to the figure of Christ and the tragic focus having shifted to Adam and Eve. By the end of the poem, Satan is defeated and overshadowed by the larger themes of redemption and human responsibility.

One of the main causes of this Romantic distortion of Paradise Lost is the contrast between the first two books and book 3, where God the Father delivers theological lectures and clears Himself of blame for the Fall that He foretells but does not predestine. Compared to Hell and Satan, the figures of God and Christ the Son discoursing in Heaven seem dull, at least to most modern-day readers. It is almost with relief at the end of book 3 that the reader finds Milton returning to the description of Satan, who nears the Earth and passes through what is called the Paradise of Fools.

Only when the reader meets Adam and Eve is there a narrative interest to compete with Satan's pseudoheroic stature, but the success of Milton's poem comes from the fact that the two human characters, who finally become much more interesting even than the diabolical Satan, are domestic rather than heroic figures. Gradually, Adam and Eve become characterized as much by their conflict with each other as by their conflict with Satan. In what are now seen as strikingly sexist characterizations, Milton describes Adam as "for contemplation . . . and valor formed" while Eve is formed "for softness . . . and sweet attractive grace." Yet the love between them is so convincingly real that even Satan is jealous as he watches "these two/ Imparadised in one another's arms." When Eve falls to Satan's temptations in book 9, she is attempting to rise toward Adam's supposedly superior status, and when Adam accepts sin and death with her, knowing the consequences, he does so out of "uxoriousness," or excessive love for and submission to a wife. The immediate consequence is domestic bickering, each blaming the other for what has happened. Then Eve initiates a reconciliation, Adam suggests praying for forgiveness, and the poem ends with the first married couple walking "hand in hand" out of Paradise.

This rich quality of domestic tragedy has helped make Paradise Lost significant and powerful for twentieth and twenty-first century readers. It also may have had some effect on the creation of the modern novel. It can be argued that eighteenth century writers, overwhelmed by Milton's achievement in Paradise Lost, were too intimidated to attempt again the epic scope in poetic form. Since no one was going to be able to surpass Milton in verse, the artistic impulse to work with epic size shifted to prose, and the novel was born in the eighteenth century with Daniel Defoe, Samuel Richardson, and Henry Fielding. Certainly by shifting the epic subject from the traditional subjects of war and valor to marriage, Paradise Lost elevated domestic subject matter for centuries to come.

AREOPAGITICA

First published: 1644

Type of work: Essay

Milton addresses the English Parliament and urges it to protect the freedom of the press by not permitting the licensing, or censorship, of books.

Areopagitica is the most famous of Milton's prose works because it has outlasted the circumstances of its original publication. On June 14, 1643, the English Parliament passed a law called the Licensing Order, which required that all books be approved by an official censor before publication, and on November 23, 1644, Milton wrote Areopagitica, pleading for the repeal of the law. His arguments were not successful—official censorship of books in England lasted until the nineteenth century—but Areopagitica has long been an inspiration for those demanding a free press. In fact, its arguments against censorship are nearly as fresh and convincing today as they were in the middle of the seventeenth century.

Milton realized how difficult it would be to change Parliament's opinion, so he marshaled his argument with great subtlety. His title alludes to a famous speech by the Greek educator Isocrates, and Milton uses a classical argumentative structure and many techniques of classical rhetoric that would have commanded respect from his seventeenth century audience. Yet the modern reader, unaware of classical rhetoric, can still marvel at the cleverness and logic that Milton uses to persuade his contemporary lawmakers. He begins by praising Parliament for its defense of liberty in the past. He then offers a historical review of censorship, pointing out that freedom of the press was highly valued in ancient Greece and Rome. Milton traces the tradition of tyrannical censorship to the Roman Catholic Council of Trent and the Spanish Inquisition, both of which found few champions among the members of the English Protestant Parliament. As Milton points out, the Roman Catholic church was a traditional enemy of the freedom-loving Parliament.

Milton's next tactic is to disarm the argument that censorship serves society by destroying bad books. In a world where good and evil are often intermingled and difficult to discern, the reading of all books—good and bad—contributes to the human attempt to understand and pursue Truth. God gave human beings Reason as a reliable guide, and judgment is the exercise of Reason; true Christian virtue rests in facing trials and choosing wisely. In one of the most famous passages from Areopagitica, Milton says:

He that can apprehend and consider vice with all her baits and seeming pleasures, and yet abstain, and yet distinguish, and yet prefer that which is truly better, he is the true warfaring Christian. I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed. . . . That which purifies us is trial and trial is by what is contrary.

Milton then shows that external restraint is futile in the attempt to make human beings good. The temptations to evil are infinite, and to protect humans from all harm, the number of censors would have to be infinite as well. Even if censorship were limited to books, too many censors would be required for the great number of books to be examined, and the work of reading so many bad books would be tedious drudgery. Those best qualified to judge would be disinclined for this work, and censorship would fall to ignorant and less qualified men.

Milton's final points are that censorship will discourage intellectual activity, impede the pursuit of Truth, undermine the nation's respect for scholars, and cast doubt on the ability of ordinary persons to think for themselves. Furthermore, censorship will limit the pursuit of new truths since its activity is by nature conservative; only accepted truths would ever pass examination. Yet truth is never stagnant and never simply accepted uncritically from an external authority. Human beings come to know Truth from constant testing and discussion, a process that can be tolerated because Truth is so powerful: "And though all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field. . . . Let her and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the worse, in a free and open encounter?"

In the face of such eloquence, there is only one disappointment in Areopagitica: Milton is not willing to give the same freedom from censorship to books espousing Roman Catholicism. Milton, most Puritans, and many Englishmen saw Catholicism as tyrannical, even evil. In his journey to Italy, Milton had seen a Catholic government imprison Galileo for asserting that the earth was not the center of the universe. In England, on November 5, 1605, the Roman Catholic conspirator Guy Fawkes had come dangerously close to blowing up the king, his ministers, and Parliament with twenty barrels of gunpowder (the Gunpowder Plot). It stands to reason that a lawful society cannot tolerate what would destroy it, and the radically Protestant Milton saw Roman Catholicism as a serious threat to social order: "I mean not tolerated Popery, and open superstition, which as it extirpates all religions and civil supremacies, so itself should be extirpate, provided first that all charitable and compassionate means be used to win and regain the weak and the misled."

In spite of this flaw in Milton's argument, Areopagitica remains one of the most eloquent defenses of an essential social freedom and therefore an invaluable document in the history of Western society.

SUMMARY

If John Milton had written only Paradise Lost, he would still be considered one of the world's greatest poets; but, like Shakespeare, Milton graced nearly everything he touched, from delicate Italian sonnets, such as "Methought I Saw My Late Espousèd Saint," to the sonorous majesty of his great verse tragedy, Samson Agonistes. Milton wrote the greatest pastoral elegy ever written, "Lycidas," and one of the greatest defenses of a free press, Areopagitica. Shakespeare is almost universally appealing to the twenty-first century because his work seems less learned and doctrinaire than Milton's, but after becoming well acquainted with Milton, the modern reader will find universal meaning, poetic grace, and emotional intensity second only to that found in Shakespeare.

Terry Nienhuis

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Poems of Mr. John Milton, 1645

Paradise Lost, 1667, 1674

Paradise Regained, 1671

Samson Agonistes, 1671

The Poetical Works, 1952-1955

DRAMA:

Comus, pr. 1634, pb. 1637 (as A Maske Presented at Ludlow Castle)

NONFICTION:

Animadversions upon the Remonstrant's Defence Against Smectymnuus, 1641

Of Prelatical Episcopacy, 1641

Of Reformation Touching Church Discipline in England, 1641

The Reason of Church-Government Urg'd Against Prelaty, 1642

An Apology Against a Pamphlet . . ., 1642

The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, 1643
The Judgement of Martin Bucer Concerning Divorce, 1644
Areopagitica, 1644
Of Education, 1644
Colasterion, 1645
Tetrachordon, 1645
The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates, 1649
Eikonoklastes, 1649
Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio, 1651
Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio Secunda, 1654
Pro Se Defensio, 1655
A Treatise of Civil Power in Ecclesiastical Causes, 1659
Considerations Touching the Likeliest Means to Remove Hirelings Out of the Church, 1659
The Readie and Easie Way to Establish a Free Commonwealth, 1660
The History of Britain, 1670
Of True Religion, Heresy, Schism, and Toleration, 1673
De doctrina Christiana libri duo Posthumi, 1825
Complete Prose Works of John Milton, 1953-1982 (8 volumes)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Works, 1931-1938 (18 volumes)

About the Author

Bunberry, Timothy J. Milton the Dramatist. Pittsburgh, Pa.: Duquesne University Press, 2007.

Duran, Angelica, ed. A Concise Companion to Milton. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2007.

Hanford, James H., and J. G. Taaffe. A Milton Handbook. 5th ed. New York: Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1970.

Hill, Christopher. Milton and the English Revolution. London: Faber & Faber, 1977.

Lewalski, Barbara Keefer. The Life of John Milton: A Critical Biography. Rev. ed. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2003.

Lewis, C. S. A Preface to "Paradise Lost." London: Oxford University Press, 1942.

Nicholson, Marjorie Hope. John Milton: A Reader's Guide to His Poetry. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1963.

Parker, William Riley. Milton: A Biography. 2 vols. Oxford, England: Clarendon Press, 1968.

Shawcross, John T. Rethinking Milton Studies: Time Present and Time Past. Newark: University of Delaware Press, 2005.

Waldock, A. J. A. "Paradise Lost" and Its Critics. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1947.

Wittreich, Joseph. Why Milton Matters: A New Preface to His Writings. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What literary tradition encouraged John Milton to write a pastoral elegy early in his developing poetic career?
- Investigate the relationship between Milton's Areopagitica and the American Bill of Rights.
- Is it possible to detect whether Milton favors the mood of "L'Allegro" or "Il Penseroso"?
- Given the history of sonnets written in English before his time, which topics in Milton's sonnets seem most unusual?
- Paradise Lost begins in the traditional manner of an epic. How does the syntax of the first sentence obscure this fact?
- Explain whether Milton's depiction of God is more or less convincing than Dante's in La divina commedia (c. 1320; The Divine Comedy, 1802).
- Was Paradise Regained a relative failure?

YUKIO MISHIMA

Born: Tokyo, Japan
January 14, 1925

Died: Tokyo, Japan
November 25, 1970

Japan's best-known writer after World War II, Mishima blended patriotism, sex, and death into a series of fictional works that chronicle Japan's rise to a modern nation, while lamenting the loss of traditional values and morality.

BIOGRAPHY

Yukio Mishima (mee-she-mah), whose name at birth was Kimitake Hiraoka, was born in Tokyo, Japan, on January 14, 1925, to a family descended from samurai nobility. His father was Azusa Hiraoka; his mother, Shizue Hashi Hiraoka. Kimitake, who took the name Yukio Mishima when he began to write in 1941, was a frail child who, perhaps because of his lack of physical prowess, became enamored at an early age with the warriors of feudal Japan who followed bushido as a code of conduct. Bushido, which means “way of the warrior,” stressed self-sacrifice, indifference to pain, control of both mind and body, and loyalty to the Japanese emperor. Mishima came to live and die by this code. Reared largely by his grandparents during his early years, he was enrolled in 1931 at the Gakushuin (Peers’ School), advancing in 1937 to the middle school and in 1942 to the senior school. During this time, Mishima began to distinguish himself in literature. His first long work, Hanazakari no mori (1944; the forest in full bloom), was published in the school magazine when he was thirteen and later, in 1944, as a book. In fact, he was graduated first in his class from the Gakushuin in 1944 and was awarded a silver watch by Emperor Hirohito.

Coming to maturity in the 1930’s and 1940’s, during Japan’s imperialist wars with China and the United States, Mishima was kept out of military service by poor health. Instead of dying nobly as a warrior in combat, he was assigned by the War Ministry to work in an airplane factory. After the war, he returned to his schooling, this time to Tokyo University, where he studied law, but writing was becoming more and more compelling. He discontinued his studies in 1947 to work for Japan’s Ministry of Finance and quit that job the following year to write full time. His first mature publication, Kamen no kokuhaku (1949; Confessions of a Mask, 1958), appeared in 1949 and was an immense success.

Discontented with his frail body and fragile health, he began to lift weights in the mid-1950’s and to practice martial arts such as samurai swordsmanship and kendo, the Japanese art of fencing with bamboo swords. By his mid-thirties, Mishima was an astonishingly handsome and muscular man, a perfect embodiment of the young, bronzed manhood that he came to celebrate in such works as Hagakure nyūmon (1967; The Way of the Samurai, 1977) and Taiyō to tetsu (1968; Sun and Steel, 1970). Yet he was a man of many contradictions. Although he married and had children, Mishima retained his strongest sexual feelings for men. An intensely private man, he was a public performer as both a stage and a motion-picture actor—he played the leading role in a film version of “Yūkoku” (“Patriotism”), one of his own stories—and he entered into public debates with left-wing college students. A fervent nationalist, Mishima lived on the outskirts of Tokyo in a Western-style home and collected British antiques.

During the 1950’s and 1960’s, Mishima wrote prolifically, publishing novels, short stories, essays, and plays. He published more than 250 books in Japan during his lifetime, and the collected edition of his works in Japanese runs thirty-six volumes. Novels such as Kinjiki (1951) and Higyō (1953; both translated as Forbidden Colors, 1968), a controversial account of homosexuality in Tokyo; Shiosai (1954; The Sound of Waves, 1956); Kinkakuji (1956; The Temple of the Golden Pavilion, 1959); and Utague no ato (1960; After the Banquet, 1963), a novel of Japanese political life, earned for him an international reputation as Japan's greatest contemporary novelist. He came to the United States three times and traveled to many foreign cities. His revival of No plays, the classical drama of Japan, was a great success not only in Japan but also all over the world; several one-act plays were staged in New York late in 1960. In addition, he wrote many popular Japanese detective novels and commercial books.

In 1967, Mishima formed what came to be considered his own private army, the Tate No Kai, or Shield Society. This group of student warriors trained at Japanese army bases and swore to restore the prestige of a defeated Japan, raising it to its old imperial glory. Mishima and his Shield Society were never taken seriously by their own compatriots, and Mishima's right-wing politics seemed strident and out of date in a rapidly developing, prosperous Japan.

Increasingly frustrated in effecting his imperialist views, Mishima and four of his young followers entered the Tokyo headquarters of Japan's Eastern Ground Self-Defense Forces on November 25, 1970. They took its commander hostage, and Mishima, dressed in full Shield Society uniform and wearing a samurai headband, proceeded to address the troops below from a balcony but received only heckling in return. Finally, he shouted, "Long live the emperor!" and went back inside. There, he stripped to the waist, knelt on the floor, and began the rite of seppuku, the ancient ritual suicide whereby a warrior performs self-disembowelment. After plunging a knife into his left side and cutting open his stomach, Mishima lowered his head, and a young follower standing behind him decapitated him with one stroke of his sword. Mishima's suicide shocked the world. He died at the age of forty-five, on the very date that he had given his publisher the final pages of his last masterpiece, Hōjō no umi (1969-1971; The Sea of Fertility: A Cycle of Four Novels, 1972-1974). His art and his life came to an end within hours of one another and with a single act.

ANALYSIS

When the war ended in 1945, the code that Mishima glorified ended with it. Japan was no longer a muscular military nation whose young warriors died for the glory of the emperor. The emperor, in fact, was forced to renounce his claims to deity after the war, and a new constitution was adopted that stripped the emperor of all power, abolished the military, and ended the nation's foreign influence. Mishima increasingly came to deplore the new Japan that developed between 1945 and 1970. Although the nation was swiftly becoming a prosperous industrial giant, Mishima felt that it was crass, materialistic, and vulgar, a nation that had forsaken its glorious traditions of the past, lost its spiritual focus, and betrayed the proud young warriors who had died for it during the war.

Mishima's writings reflect the changing historical period. His last great work, a series of four novels called The Sea of Fertility, give a panoramic view of Japan from 1913 to the 1970's, moving from romance and idealism to opportunism and decay. The Japan of the final novels is one of Coca-Cola signs and litter, cruelty and sexual perversion. Yet Mishima is far from a gloomy writer. His work abounds in the Japanese love of flora, fauna, and natural surroundings, and there is in his writing a deep sensuality and spirituality. Not a particularly religious man, Mishima nonetheless has a deep reverence for things and a sense of the heart-breaking loveliness of mortal and fleeting life. Mizoguchi, the young monk in The Temple of the Golden Pavilion, one of Mishima's best novels, can achieve freedom only by destroying the ideal beauty of Kinkakuji (the Golden Temple), a fifteenth century Zen temple. The greatest beauty is a beauty that does not last.

While Mishima is quintessentially Japanese in many of his values and sensibilities, he is also a very Western author. Among his favorite writers were Thomas Mann, Marcel Proust, Fyodor Dostoevski, and the classic Greek dramatists. Like Mann, the German author of Buddenbrooks: Verfall einer Familie (1901; English translation, 1924), and Proust, who wrote the epic À la recherche du temps perdu (1913-1927; Remembrance of Things Past, 1922-1931, 1981), Mishima is concerned with the tragic implications of a developing commercial world and the destruction of art, spirit, and morality. Like Russian novelist Dostoevski, Mishima explores inner dualities of good and evil, mind and body, reality and imagination. He has been compared to Ernest Hemingway in his masculine code of violence, to Edgar Allan Poe in his coupling of love and death, and to Walt Whitman in his masculine eroticism. Mishima felt at home with all of these writers.

It is his peculiar eroticism that many readers find repellent. Mishima, like the boy in Confessions of a Mask, finds sexual arousal and beauty in the sight of bloody young males dying in agony, and in the thought of young men, such as the kamikaze pilots of World War II, plunging gloriously to their death in suicide attacks. One of his most difficult works, "Patriotism," is the story of a young military officer and his wife who, after making passionate love to one another, commit ritual seppuku. The scene is portrayed in gory and nauseating detail. As if in preparation for his own death, Mishima directed a film version of the story and played the role of the young officer.

It is too easy to see in all of this simply the mind of a sadomasochistic deviant. The contradictory pulls of Eros and Thanatos, love and death, are strong within each individual, and for Mishima, death had a greater attraction than life, as it does for many saints and martyrs. In espousing an eroticism that many find repellent, he is to be applauded for his courage. Mishima looked into his own heart and stated what he found there with honesty, candor, and conviction. The same is true for his unpopular political views. While his politics seemed antiquated and slightly ridiculous even to his fellow Japanese, his beliefs were nonetheless intelligently formulated and passionately held. Further, he had the courage of his convictions; Mishima was willing to die for what he believed.

What is most important about Mishima, however, is his artistry. His books are rich in background and historical detail, his descriptions of Japanese life are accurately observed and beautifully described, and his characters are sharply focused and often memorable. He has a remarkable eye for the quirky and eccentric behavior of individuals, and he is a candid explorer of the human soul, often taking readers where few other writers have gone. Finally, he is a deeply personal writer who bravely faced the worst in himself, transforming these private insights into public works of art. Mishima transforms his readers as well, making them see and feel in new and unsettling ways. That is the mark of a major writer.

CONFESSIONS OF A MASK

First published: Kamen no kokuhaku, 1949
(English translation, 1958)

Type of work: Novel

Growing up in Japan in the 1930's and 1940's, a young boy discovers the contradictions and confusions within his nature, the reality behind the mask that he wears for the world around him.

Confessions of a Mask has been compared to James Joyce's A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man (1914-1915, serial; 1916, book) and D. H. Lawrence's Sons and Lovers (1913). Like those novels, Mishima's work is a bildungsroman, the story of a young man's growth to maturity. Yet while Joyce and Lawrence emphasize the struggle of a boy to achieve a conventional, heterosexual manhood, Mishima emphasizes the seemingly aberrant desires of his young protagonist, whose struggle is to face his feelings honestly and openly.

The confession begins with the narrator's earliest memories, almost all of them connected with either sex or death. Almost dying at the age of four of autointoxication (Mishima himself suffered from this chronic illness), he remembers at the same time the image of a young man carrying buckets of excrement and becomes strangely aroused by his handsome face and close-fitting trousers. The image associates sex and filth, just as the boy's later arousal by marching soldiers combines beauty and death. These dualities occur throughout the novel, as do masks and false appearances. Captivated by a picture-book illustration of a knight holding a sword aloft on a white horse, the boy is later shocked to find out that it is the picture of a woman, Joan of Arc, not of a man. Like the boy, the knight's sex is masked and is not what it appears to be. A later book illustration, that of Saint Sebastian, whose body was pierced by arrows, arouses him even further. Finding exquisite beauty in the saint's white flesh dripping blood, the boy finds sexual arousal in agonizing masculine death.

The narrator's first strong sexual feelings are for a young tough named Omi, a fellow student at school. Omi is the opposite of the frail, thin, unhealthy narrator. Omi is physically strong, mentally weak, and, being older than the other boys, sexually mature. The narrator falls in love with him, desires him carnally, and longs to see his naked body, a desire that is fulfilled one day in gym class. Omi's beautiful nakedness, however, fails to satisfy the boy's longing. It merely makes him feel jealous, ashamed of his own comparative ugliness.

The boy soon learns to mask his true feelings, pretending to desire the opposite sex and to anticipate sexual fulfillment with women. Yet he has no adolescent fantasies about women (though he does for young sailors and soldiers on the streets) and only achieves sexual satisfaction through masturbation. At the age of twenty, he begins to see the sister of a schoolmate, a girl named Sonoko, and it is even expected that he will become engaged to her. He tries to convince himself that he is deeply in love with Sonoko: They exchange love letters and photographs, hold hands, and eventually kiss. Still, the young man has no sensation of pleasure, no sexual arousal. Finally, in order to discover if he is a "normal" male, he goes to a prostitute but is unable to have sexual intercourse with her.

By the end of the novel, he has ended his relationship with Sonoko, who then marries someone else. In the final scene, he meets Sonoko, now a married woman, in a chance encounter, and she hints that she still loves him, is even willing to have an extramarital affair with him. Yet as she tells him this in a tawdry Japanese dance hall, he glances at a nearby table at a young male, a gang tough who has removed his shirt and is flexing his muscles. Burning with sexual desire, the protagonist knows what his destiny will be. He can wear a mask no longer.

THE SEA OF FERTILITY

First published: Hōjō no umi, 1969-1971

(English translation, 1972-1974);

includes Hara no yuki, 1969 (Spring Snow, 1972); Homba, 1969 (Runaway Horses, 1973); Akatsuki no tera, 1970 (The Temple of Dawn, 1973); Tennin gosui, 1971 (The Decay of the Angel, 1974)

Type of work: Novels

Widely recognized as Mishima's masterpiece, this series of four novels offers a sweeping view of modern Japan, chronicling the nation's changing values from 1913 to 1970.

The Sea of Fertility: A Cycle of Four Novels is a tetralogy whose title is taken from a name on the surface of the moon. It suggests both the fertile sea of earthly life and the arid sea of the cosmic moon—being and nothingness. Mishima said that he put everything he knew about life into these four novels; the very last words of the final book were written and submitted to his publisher on the day that he died.

Spring Snow is Mishima's version of William Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet (pr. c. 1595-1596, pb. 1597). A story of star-crossed lovers, Kiyo Matsugae and Satoko Ayakura, the novel is romantic, poignant, and tragic. As the title suggests, spring is the season of love, while snow is the cold, life-covering element of death, and this novel combines the two. Satoko, the daughter of a nobleman, is engaged by imperial decree to a prince of the court, while Kiyo, also from a noble family, is a student at Peers' School who falls in love with her. By doing so, however, he challenges the emperor himself. The lovers meet secretly, love passionately, and take terrible risks. Emotionally weak and immature, Kiyo tries to distance himself from Satoko, who becomes pregnant, gets an abortion, and, in disgrace, isolates herself in a nunnery. Kiyo, guilty and desperately ill, comes daily to see the cloistered Satoko and eventually dies for love.

Two minor characters in Spring Snow figure prominently in the second novel of the cycle, Runaway Horses. Before Kiyo dies, he tells his school friend, Shigekuni Honda, of a dream in which he sees his friend Honda again, beneath a waterfall.

Another minor character, Kiyo's tutor, Shikeyuki Iinuma, also reappears in the second novel, which takes place some eighteen years after Kiyo's death. Honda, now an associate judge in the Ōsaka Court of Appeals, meets Isao Iinuma, son of Kiyo's tutor, who is now headmaster of his own academy. When Honda sees the boy bathing beneath a waterfall near the shrine, he notices three small moles on the left side of the boy's breast—the same three moles that Kiyo had. He concludes that the boy is Kiyo reincarnated, the incarnation of Kiyo's earlier dream.

Whereas Kiyo was a romantic dreamer, Isao is a political idealist who wants to purify the corrupt Japanese government of Westernized financiers and restore the empire's former glory. Using as his model The League of the Divine Wind, a group of student rebels who tried to overthrow the Japanese government in 1873, Isao forms his own student rebel group, whose members pledge to assassinate the most prominent financiers in Japan and to kill themselves by seppuku if their plan fails. The assassination plan indeed fails, and the rebel students are imprisoned. Honda, convinced that Isao is the reincarnation of his old friend Kiyo, resigns from the court and becomes defense counsel for the students, who are given their freedom and treated as patriotic heroes. Isao, however, more in love with romantic death than political reform, carries out his plans of assassination by killing a financier named Kurahara and then taking his own life by seppuku.

Reincarnation, something in which Mishima did not personally believe, also plays a part in the final two novels of the tetralogy. In Runaway Horses, Kiyo/Isao has a dream in which he becomes a woman. In The Temple of Dawn, he becomes that woman, a Thai princess named Ying Chan; later, in The Decay of the Angel, he will reappear as a boy named Toru. In both novels, Honda is again the central controlling sensibility through whose eyes are seen Kiyo's various incarnations.

Both The Temple of Dawn and The Decay of the Angel emphasize the decay of the final book's title. From the earlier two novels of romantic passion and patriotic sacrifice, readers descend to a world of ugliness, corruption, and death. In The Temple of Dawn, Thailand is a place of drizzling rain and fragmented images, India a nation of beggars, lepers, and public crematoriums, and Japan a defeated nation of bombed-out ruins and perverted sexuality. Honda has become materially wealthy but physically and morally impoverished. Trapped in a sterile marriage, he is reduced to peeping at the sexual activity of others through holes in walls and behind bushes. Ying Chan, the object of Honda's sexual fantasies, turns out to be a lesbian and dies from a snakebite after returning to Thailand. There is equal sterility in The Decay of the Angel. Honda, now seventy-six years old, dreams of angels; going to Udo Beach, where a mythical angel supposedly descended in the fourteenth century, he finds a shore littered with Coca-Cola bottles, food cans, plastic bags, and garbage. Meeting Toru, a young signalman who has the distinctive three-mole marking on his breast, Honda adopts the sixteen-year-old, but Toru turns out to be evil incarnate, a destroyer of human life and spirit, a malevolent genius who ends up blind, helpless, and isolated.

Mishima's four novels move from spring, youth, and love to old age, senility, and death, from the romantic idealism of early twentieth century Japan to a crass, decaying, and valueless society of the 1970's. Like his principal character Judge Honda, who serenely looks forward to death at the end of the tetralogy, Mishima himself saw at the end of his life only an empty garden, no memories, nothing.

SUMMARY

Yukio Mishima has been compared to the American author Ernest Hemingway in his masculine code of violence and death, to the British author D. H. Lawrence in his mystical sense of primitive impulses, to the French author André Gide in his candid treatment of homosexuality, and to the great Japanese writers of the past.

Yet Mishima is always uniquely himself. His way of combining beauty and death, his peculiar eroticism, and his conservative political and social views make him unlike any other author, and while he often repels his readers, he just as often fascinates them. While every age produces very good writers, it produces very few geniuses. Mishima was such a rarity—a writer of genius.

Kenneth Seib

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- Kamen no kokuhaku*, 1949 (Confessions of a Mask, 1958)
Ai no kawaki, 1950 (Thirst for Love, 1969)
Kinjiki, 1951 (translated with Higyō as Forbidden Colors, 1968)
Higyō, 1953 (translated with Kinjiki as Forbidden Colors, 1968)
Shiosai, 1954 (The Sound of Waves, 1956)
Kinkakuji, 1956 (The Temple of the Golden Pavilion, 1959)
Kyōko no ie, 1959
Utage no ato, 1960 (After the Banquet, 1963)
Gogo no eikō, 1963 (The Sailor Who Fell from Grace with the Sea, 1965)
Kinu to meisatsu, 1964 (Silk and Insight, 1998)
Haru no yuki, 1969 (Spring Snow, 1972)
Homba, 1969 (Runaway Horses, 1973)
Akatsuki no tera, 1970 (The Temple of Dawn, 1973)
Tennin gosui, 1971 (The Decay of the Angel, 1974)
Hōjō no umi, 1969-1971 (The Sea of Fertility: A Cycle of Four Novels, 1972-1974); includes Spring Snow, Runaway Horses, The Temple of Dawn, and The Decay of the Angel

SHORT FICTION:

- Kaibutsu*, 1950
Tōnorikai, 1951
Manatsu no shi, 1953 (Death in Midsummer, and Other Stories, 1966)

DRAMA:

- Kantan*, wr. 1950, pb. 1956 (English translation, 1957)
Dōjōji, pb. 1953 (English translation, 1966)
Yoro no himawari, pr., pb. 1953 (Twilight Sunflower, 1958)
Shiroari no su, pr., pb. 1955
Aya no tsuzumu, pr. 1955, pb. 1956 (The Damask Drum, 1957)
Aoi no ue, pr., pb. 1956 (The Lady Aoi, 1957)
Hanjo, pb. 1956 (English translation, 1957)
Kindai nōgakushū, pb. 1956 (includes Kantan, The Damask Drum, The Lady Aoi, Hanjo, and Sotoba Komachi; Five Modern Nō Plays, 1957)
Sotoba Komachi, pb. 1956 (English translation, 1957)
Tōka no kiku, pr., pb. 1961
Sado kōshaku fujin, pr., pb. 1965 (Madame de Sade, 1967)
Suzakuke no metsubō, pr., pb. 1967
Waga tomo Hittoñ, pb. 1968, pr. 1969 (My Friend Hitler, 1977)
Chinsetsu yumiharizuki, pr., pb. 1969

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Yukio Mishima revived No plays. What are the features of these plays?
- What did Mishima see as the chief reasons for the decay he saw in Japan?
- Is the capacity to see beauty in the death of young warriors a defect in Mishima or primarily an unfortunate consequence of the circumstances through which he lived?
- Mishima “bravely faced the worst in himself” and made art of the experience. Can you think of other writers of whom such a statement might be said?
- Does the confessional mode of Confessions of a Mask contradict the expectations of a bildungsroman?
- Is Mishima’s finding “an empty garden” at the end of his life a disappointing conclusion or a satisfactory one?

Yukio Mishima

NONFICTION:

Hagakure nyūmon, 1967 (The Way of the Samurai, 1977)

Taiyō to tetsu, 1968 (Sun and Steel, 1970)

Yukio Mishima on "Hagakure": The Samurai Ethic and Modern Japan, 1978

EDITED TEXT:

New Writing in Japan, 1972 (with Geoffrey Bownas)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Hanazakari no mori, 1944 (short fiction and plays)

Eirei no Koe, 1966 (short fiction and essays)

About the Author

Cornyetz, Nina. The Ethics of Aesthetics in Japanese Cinema and Literature. New York: Routledge, 2007.

Keene, Donald. Five Modern Japanese Novelists. New York: Columbia University Press, 2003.

Miller, Henry. Reflections on the Death of Mishima. Santa Barbara, Calif.: Capra Press, 1972.

Miyoshi, Masao. Accomplices of Silence: The Modern Japanese Novel. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1974.

Nathan, John. Mishima: A Biography. Boston: Little, Brown, 1974.

Petersen, Gwenn Boardman. The Moon in the Water: Understanding Tanizaki, Kawabata, and Mishima. Honolulu: University Press of Hawaii, 1979.

Piven, Jerry S. The Madness and Perversion of Yukio Mishima. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2004.

Scott-Stokes, Henry. The Life and Death of Yukio Mishima. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1974.

Wolfe, Peter. Yukio Mishima. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1989.

Yourcenar, Marguerite. Mishima: A Vision of the Void. Translated by Albert Manguel. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux, 1986.

Library of Congress

GABRIELA MISTRAL

Born: Vicuña, Chile

April 7, 1889

Died: Hempstead, New York

January 10, 1957

Mistral was an innovator whose lyric poetry brought a new and complex blend of powerful feeling, natural imagery, and technical mastery to Latin American literature.

BIOGRAPHY

Lucila Godoy Alcayaga, whose pen name was Gabriela Mistral (mee-STRAHL), was born on April 7, 1889, in Vicuña, a small village in the remote mountain region of northern Chile. Although her father abandoned the family when Mistral was three, he left her a double legacy. He was the village schoolteacher, and he occasionally wrote verses. By the time she was fifteen, Mistral was teaching in the rural schools of the region and publishing poems in the local newspapers. The most important and enduring legacy she received was the rugged, wild landscape in which she played and worked. In the early years it became a part of her being, and the rhythms and images of its life were to inform all of her poetry.

Before she was twenty-one Mistral had endured the one great love affair of her life, a passionate relationship with a young railroad worker, Romelio Ureta, that ended in a bitter separation. When, after several years of estrangement, Ureta took his own life, Mistral was overwhelmed with grief and guilt. Out of these conflicting and painful emotions she composed three of her most famous poems, “Sonetos de la muerte” (1914; sonnets of death).

Her first volume of poetry, Desolación (1922; desolation), was published in New York at the urging of a group of American high school Spanish teachers who wanted Mistral to make available more of her poetry. The frank physical descriptions in the love poems in the book shocked conservative literary critics, but the book was generally hailed as the debut of a refreshingly distinctive and original lyric voice.

In 1922, Mistral began the series of journeys that was to make her renowned as an educator and humanitarian as well as a poet. She spent two years in Mexico helping to organize that country’s rural education program. She then traveled through the United States and Europe. Her second book, Ternura (1924, 1945; tenderness), was published in Madrid and demonstrates the range and variety of her poetic gifts. The lullabies and children’s songs that make up the book represent Mistral’s single-handed attempt to begin a tradition of children’s literature in Latin America.

In 1935, she was named Consul for Life by the Chilean government and spent the 1930’s and the war years of the 1940’s in several European cities. She viewed with horror the growing violence and political chaos as the world prepared for war. Tala (1938; felling of trees), her third collection of poems, was intended to alleviate at least a part of the suffering she witnessed. She rushed the book to press in order that the proceeds from its sale might help the Basque children displaced from their homes by the Spanish Civil War.

In 1945, she became the first Latin American writer to receive the Nobel Prize in Literature. Her response upon hearing the news is characteristic of her self-effacing attitude toward her literary work:

"Perhaps it was because I was the candidate of the women and children."

Mistral made one final, triumphant journey to Chile in 1954 and marked the occasion by publishing her fourth book, Lagar (1954; winepress). She spent her last years in Roslyn Harbor on Long Island, New York. Her health was failing but she continued her writing and her work to further the cause of human rights. Among her final projects was a long narrative poem, Poema de Chile (1967; poem of Chile), which was published posthumously. On January 10, 1957, she died in Hempstead, New York. She was buried near her childhood home in her beloved valley of the Elqui River where she had once shared her dreams with the trees and her songs with the mountain winds.

ANALYSIS

The pseudonym Gabriela Mistral chose for herself reveals the two primary sources of her poetic themes and techniques. Gabriela is from the archangel Gabriel, who will sound the trumpet raising the dead on Judgment Day. Mistral is the name of a strong Mediterranean wind that blows through the south of France. Thus, in Mistral's poems her redeeming Christian faith is united with nature to create a unique vision of human experience. The establishment of unifying relationships between different, often contradictory levels of existence lies at the heart of all her poetry. She spiritualizes the most mundane events of the life and, in turn, expresses moments of transcendence in the most homely and familiar of images. The power that achieves such unity, in poetry and in life, is love.

Mistral's development as a poet closely parallels the publication of her four volumes of poetry. Desolación, her first book, demonstrates the variety of subject matter and the intensity of feeling that is characteristic of all her work. The collection is divided into sections, including "Life," "The School," and "Nature." The love poems of the "Grief" section are the most strikingly original and the most frequently read. These frank celebrations of physical love, with their heights of passion and depths of sorrow and, above all, the absolute, uncompromising honesty of their feeling, establish the distinctive characteristics of Mistral's lyric voice. In poems such as "Ecstasy" and "Intimacy," the lover refines her physical experience to a point at which, having reached its bodily limit, it is transformed into a spiritual encounter. Such extremes of passion are continually accompanied by fears that either the young man or love itself will prove weak and, finally, false. When these fears are realized (her lover betrays her by dying), the poet explores, in poems filled with bitterness and rape, the emotional effects of loneliness and abandonment. Throughout her work, loneliness and the fragility of human feeling remain the chief threats to love, happiness, and fulfillment.

Mistral's next book, Ternura, is a collection of lullabies and children's songs. Its simple, innocent verses, meant to be sung to and by children, seem far removed from the fierce and complex love poems of Desolación. Instead of a harmony between man and woman, these songs strive for a similar spiritual harmony between a mother and her child. A lullaby in Ternura may, for instance, build correspondences among the sea rocking its waves, the night wind rocking the wheat, God the Father rocking his thousands of worlds, and a mother rocking her infant to sleep. The motion of rocking and the love that inspires it unite the human, natural, and divine levels of existence, assuring the safety of the child and the dignity of the mother's vocation.

Mistral's final two books, Tala and Lagar, are less accessible and therefore less popular than either Desolación or Ternura. They contain the poems most admired by literary critics and by her fellow poets. In many of the poems of her later books, Mistral extends her lyric voice to dramatize the plight of those people, particularly women, whom the modern world ignores or forgets. Exiled from their native lands, destined by an inscrutable fate to outlive all their loved ones, these women must endure a succession of empty, lonely years. They perform for no one the daily rituals of planting, cleaning, and cooking and can only look forward to a death among indifferent strangers. These are not happy poems, but they fulfill Mistral's promise to give a voice to the millions of people throughout the world who suffer in silence. She once said that "love without words is a knot that strangles." It was to undo such a knot that Mistral focused upon the outcast and the abandoned. By giving them words, she hoped to bring them once more into a human community united by love.

In her later work, Mistral also attains a full and remarkable mastery of natural imagery. She isolates a single natural object and, by tracing the stages of its organic life, figuratively presents the subtle shifts in her own emotional life. Mistral successfully transforms the world of nature into a symbolic language that gives shape and substance to her emotional and spiritual experiences. Mistral once advised her fellow poets that it was their obligation as artists to mirror in their works the beauty of nature. In this way they would be certain to extend and affirm the creative activity of God, the model for all artists. In her later poetry Mistral frequently comes as close as possible to following her own advice.

“SONNETS OF DEATH”

First published: “Sonetos de la muerte,” 1914 (collected in A Gabriela Mistral Reader, 1993)

Type of work: Poem

The poems trace Mistral’s attempt to overcome the grief and guilt caused by her first failed love affair.

The “Sonnets of Death” are Mistral’s most famous poems. They are also the poems that established her reputation in her native Chile. In 1914, she submitted them to a national poetry contest and won first prize. She was forced out of anonymity and into the literary life of her country.

The poems grew out of Mistral’s love affair with Romelio Ureta, a young man she met in her early years as a rural schoolteacher. The relationship broke off when Ureta became engaged to another woman. Before the marriage, however, he took his own life. The three sonnets trace Mistral’s attempt to sort out and reconcile the grief, remorse, disappointment, anger, and guilt that Ureta’s abandonment and death raised in her.

The sonnets contain the intense, direct feelings, the natural imagery, and the search for some permanent state of harmony that are the distinctive characteristics of Mistral’s poetry. In the first sonnet, for instance, the poet imagines visiting the cemetery and taking from a frozen niche the burial urn containing the ashes of her lover. Rather than causing sadness, however, the occasion elicits a gleeful sense of triumph. She will scatter rose dust over the dead man’s remains, and she will leave the graveyard singing songs of beautiful vengeance. The source of this unexpected happiness is revealed in the final two lines of the poem. The poet now is certain of the constancy of her lover, for she is sure the rival woman will not quarrel with her for possession of the “handful of bones,” which is all that remains of him.

In the second sonnet, the poet imagines an almost macabre afterlife for her lover and herself. When she has died and has been buried beside him, she anticipates an eternal and intimate conversation between them, carried on beneath the ground in the “quiet city” of the dead.

In the final sonnet, the poet begins to glimpse a truly plausible and satisfying resolution to her dilemma. This resolution is typical of those Mistral would reach in many of her later poems. She shifts the perspective in the poem from the human to the divine level by calling on Christ to act as protector and guide for her dead lover. She asks Christ in the closing couplet to verify and approve the sincerity, constancy, and holiness of her love. Only Christ, who is to judge her in the next life, can fully understand the depth of her feeling in her present human life. These lines attain a short but hard-won moment of peace within the imagined presence of Christ, and they bring to a close the most extreme and bitter period of Mistral’s mourning. The process of writing poetry becomes her means of experiencing a temporary redemption.

“WE WERE ALL TO BE QUEENS”

First published: “Todas íbamos a ser reinas,” 1938 (collected in Women’s Writing in Latin America: An Anthology, 1991)

Type of work: Poem

Mistral recalls, from an adult perspective, the lost innocence and unrealized possibility of her childhood.

In “We Were All to Be Queens,” Mistral follows the dreams and hopes of childhood as they are thwarted and destroyed by the realities of adult life. The opening stanzas recount the dream shared by four young girls, the poet among them, who expect to marry kings as powerful and gifted as the biblical King David and to reign over distant kingdoms. These faraway lands are to be fruitful, filled with “trees of milk” and “trees of bread.” Most importantly—in an image repeated throughout the poem—the kingdoms will border the mysterious and magical sea. The girls, sequestered for years behind the tall mountains of the Andes, will at last have their dreams fulfilled when, as queens, they see and touch the ocean. They will be liberated and transformed by contemplating the broad expanse of water and the distant horizon.

The second half of the poem tells the sad fate of the girls’ dreams as each girl grows to adulthood. Rosalie is the only one of the four to kiss a genuine sailor. Ironically, the real sea, not the sea of her fantasies, devours her lover in a storm. Soledad raises seven brothers and leaves her “life-blood in the bread” she bakes. Her eyes remain “forever black/ for never having looked on the sea.” Efigenia follows a stranger, but he does not lead her to the sea. Lucila, who is Mistral as a child, alone receives her kingdom; but it is an entirely imaginary place where the future poetess counts her sons among the clouds and sees her husbands in the rivers. Such, in fact, was to be Mistral’s fate; she never married or had children of her own. Her poetry and her students were to be her only children.

The poem ends with a vision of the future generations of young girls who will continue the cycle of dreaming and disappointment, longing from their remote valley for a glimpse of the mythical sea, without ever achieving it. This is not a bitter ending, nor is the poem simply pessimistic. The poem is a part of the insulated, innocent world of the girls and of the larger adult world beyond it. By blending these two perspectives, Mistral attains the kind of harmony that characterizes much of her poetry. The result in this poem is a sweet sadness in which the naïve hopes of the young girls are preserved and cherished even as their inevitable disappointment is acknowledged. Such a subtle and difficult balance demonstrates Mistral’s ability to hold two contradictory, often mutually destructive human experiences in a creative tension. In “We Were All To Be Queens,” an acceptance of an unimaginatively literal adult reality makes the dreams of childhood all the more precious and necessary. In the space of memory between these two conflicting poles of experience, Mistral creates her poem.

“FINAL TREE”

First published: “Último árbol,” 1954 (English translation, 1971; collected in Twentieth-Century Latin American Poetry: A Bilingual Anthology, 1996)

Type of work: Poem

Mistral represents her approaching death as the act of bequeathing her body, with its history of joys and sufferings, “to the last of my trees.”

Mistral chose “Final Tree” as the epilogue for her last book, Lagar, and ever since it has been printed as the closing poem in collections of her work. This placement is fitting not only because of the poem’s subject matter but also because it is one among many of the later poems that demonstrate the furthest refinement of Mistral’s ability to express her inner life through natural imagery.

The speaker of the poem is anticipating her own death. She represents the event figuratively as the act of returning her body, fulfilled and completed like a piece of “fretwork,” to the last of her trees. She fears that, in what she calls her “second life,” she will lack the “solace/ of freshness and silence” the tree offers her and that all she has learned and experienced will have been taken from her. To prevent such a wasteful forgetting, the speaker bequeaths to her final tree, for safekeeping, the experiences that have matured her body and educated her spirit. Among these are her times of mourning and her times of joy, her moments of silence and her moments of song, and the solitudes she has brought upon herself and those forced upon her by the betrayal or absence of others.

It is not inappropriate to see in this list of leave-takings a final tribute to Mistral's art. It is entirely fitting that the poet who, as a girl, spent hours in her father's garden talking to flowers and birds should choose a tree as the symbol of her poetry. To this last and most faithful companion, the sole survivor of a now vanished forest of friends, she entrusts her most precious memories before she departs this life. In this way she guarantees that the essence of what she has lived and learned will be preserved by the protective final tree in case she passes again through the world and needs a comforting place to rest.

Such a reading of the poem also helps to explain the unexpected turn it takes in its final three stanzas. In these stanzas, the poet slips into a dreamy confusion. She wonders if she may already have died without realizing it and is now singing her song in death from beneath the restful shade of her final tree. If this magical tree represents Mistral's poetry, the otherworldly dream she enjoys within its sheltering foliage may be the figurative equivalent of the creative process itself. Only within this privileged space, where the distinctions and separations of daily existence are dissolved, can the poet create new harmonies and achieve a mystical consciousness that blends present and future time, natural and transcendent experience.

It is understandable that Mistral should close her last book of poems with this grateful memorial to her art. "Final Tree" celebrates the transforming processes out of which she created her poetry.

SUMMARY

In a century marked by rapid and radical innovation and enervated by doubt, isolation, and fear, Gabriela Mistral stands out as a remarkable paradox. While other poets experimented with new styles and succeeded only in confusing and alienating their readers, Mistral combined the new with the traditional to create a poetry read and appreciated by a large and diverse audience. In an era in which artists seemed cut off from the social and political realities of their world, Mistral devoted her life and her art to humanitarian service. She attained the position of the genuinely engaged artist that her more radical contemporaries frequently wrote about but seldom achieved. This was possible because her poetry grew directly out of the principles that guided her life.

Lawrence Byrne

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Desolación, 1922

Ternura, 1924 (enlarged 1945)

Tala, 1938

Antología, 1941

Lagar, 1954

Selected Poems of Gabriela Mistral, 1957

Poesías completas, 1958

Poema de Chile, 1967

A Gabriela Mistral Reader, 1993

About the Author

Agosin, Marjorie, ed. Gabriela Mistral: The Audacious Traveler. Athens: Ohio University Press, 2003.

Arce de Basquez, Margot. Gabriela Mistral: The Poet and Her Work. Translated by Helene Masslo. New York: New York University Press, 1964.

- Castleman, William J. Beauty and the Mission of the Teacher: The Life of Gabriela Mistral of Chile, Teacher, Poetess, Friend of the Helpless, Nobel Laureate. Smithtown, N.Y.: Exposition Press, 1982.
- Fiol-Matta, Lucia. A Queer Mother for the Nation: The State and Gabriela Mistral. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2002.
- Gazarian-Gautier, Marie-Lise. Gabriela Mistral: The Teacher from the Valley of Elqui. Chicago: Franciscan Herald Press, 1975.
- Marchant, Elizabeth A. "Nation and Motherhood in Gabriela Mistral." In Critical Acts: Latin American Women and Cultural Criticism. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1999.
- Pan-American Union, Department of Cultural Affairs. Gabriela Mistral. Washington, D.C.: Author, 1958.
- Preston, Mary Charles Ann, Sr. A Study of Significant Variants in the Poetry of Gabriela Mistral. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1964.
- Taylor, Martin C. Gabriela Mistral's Religious Sensibility. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1968.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Gabriela Mistral wrote three sonnets about the death of her lover. Why would she use such an exacting form on a subject of great emotional significance to her?
- Examine the tone of "We Were All to Be Queens." How should the reader take these accounts of unfulfilled dreams?
- What experiences of her life made Mistral particularly sensitive to the plight of the exile?
- Determine why there was no tradition of children's literature in Latin America before Mistral's Ternura.
- What literary models did Mistral have for her Poema de Chile?

ROHINTON MISTRY

Born: Bombay (now Mumbai), India
July 3, 1952

Though he usually sets his fiction in his native Bombay, the Canadian Mistry transcends the limits of time and place in his vivid and moving portrayals of the human condition.

BIOGRAPHY

Rohinton Mistry was born in Bombay (now Mumbai), India, on July 3, 1952, the second of four children of Behram Mistry, an employee of an advertising agency, and Freny Jhaveri Mistry. The family were members of Bombay's Parsi community. Rohinton was educated at the Villa Theresa Primary School and St. Xavier High School. During his high school years, he learned to play the guitar and the harmonica, and he became a member of a band that played British and American folk-rock songs. At nineteen, while attending a music school, Mistry struck up an acquaintance with Freny Elavia, who would eventually become his wife.

Both Mistry and Elavia continued their schooling at the University of Bombay. Mistry studied mathematics and economics at St. Xavier's College, graduating with a B.S. degree. Meanwhile, Freny Elavia, who was now his fiancé, had gone to Toronto, Canada, for a year's visit with relatives. In 1975, Mistry immigrated to Canada, became a citizen, and married Elavia.

The couple settled in Toronto. Mistry found employment as a clerk at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, where he eventually became head of customer services. Mistry also attended night classes, first at York University and then at the University of Toronto, where he concentrated on literature and philosophy. There he became familiar with the works of the Irish writer James Joyce and those of the nineteenth century British novelists Charles Dickens and Anthony Trollope, authors to whom Mistry would later be compared by reviewers. In 1983, Mistry received a B.A. from the University of Toronto. During this period, Mistry's wife, Freny, had also been furthering her education. In 1981, she earned a B.A. from the University of Toronto. The following year, she received a bachelor of education degree from the same school and was promptly employed as a high school teacher in nearby Brampton.

Although Mistry had done a little writing while he was at the University of Toronto, he had not submitted works for publication. However, at Freny's urging, he decided to enter a short story in the 1983 Hart House Literary Contest. For his subject matter, Mistry turned to what he knew best: life among the Parsis in Bombay. His story "One Sunday" earned him first prize and $250, and the following year, "Auspicious Occasion," which was set in the same apartment house as its predecessor, again won the Hart House competition. With the encouragement of the well-known Canadian writer Mavis Gallant, who had been one of the judges for the contest, Mistry continued to turn out short stories and to submit them for publication. It was Gallant who was indirectly responsible for having Mistry's work included in an anthology of new Canadian writing. Another person who aided him immeasurably in those early years was Ken Adachi, a literary critic for the Toronto Star. Mistry credits Adachi for making sure that Canadian publishers did not overlook the short stories he submitted to them.

In 1985, after receiving a grant from the Canada Council, Mistry decided to resign from his position with the bank and devote himself full time to his writing. The wisdom of his decision became evident when that same year he won the Annual Contributor's Award from Canadian Fiction Magazine.

Since Mistry was now able to travel at will, in 1986 he accompanied his wife to Long Beach, California, where she had accepted a teaching position in a local high school. However, the Mistrys were both so appalled by the violence all around them, which Rohinton Mistry saw as the result of persistent racism, that they did not wish to remain in the United States. As soon as Freny's year was up, they returned to Canada.

Mistry's first book-length publication was a collection of short fiction with a single setting, the fictional Bombay apartment building called Firozsha Baag. This was the place where the author had set his first two prizewinning short stories, both of which were included in the volume. Tales from Firozsha Baag was published in Canada in 1987 and in 1989 in the United States, where it was retitled Swimming Lessons, and Other Stories from Firozsha Baag. In 1988, the book was short-listed for the prestigious Governor-General's Award for Fiction.

Mistry's first novel, Such a Long Journey (1991), was also set in a Parsi apartment building in Bombay. However, though the book reflects the author's sympathy with the Parsis, who in 1971 must deal with their plight as a relatively powerless minority in the new, Hindu-dominated nation of India, it emphasizes the need for understanding, no matter what one's beliefs, and for behavior in accordance with a universal moral code. Such a Long Journey won the Governor-General's Literary Award for Fiction in 1991 and the Commonwealth Writers Prize, the Trillium Award, and the Smith Books/Books in Canada award for best first novel in 1992. It was also a finalist for the 1991 Man Booker Prize in the United Kingdom. A film based on the novel was successful in Canada and was later released in the United States.

Most of Mistry's second novel, A Fine Balance (1995), takes place in a city that, though unnamed, is much like Bombay. The book is much longer and more complex than Such a Long Journey; it has four protagonists, two of them Hindus and two Parsis, as well as a saintly Muslim tailor. A Fine Balance won the 1995 Giller Prize, the Canada-Australia Literary Prize, the Royal Society of Literature's Winifred Holtby Prize, the 1996 Los Angeles Times Book Award for Fiction, and the 1996 Commonwealth Writers Prize for Best Novel. It was short-listed for the 1996 Man Booker Prize. In 2001, it became the first Canadian work to be chosen by television talk-show host Oprah Winfrey for her book club. A theatrical version of A Fine Balance was staged in 2006, and the next year there was a critically acclaimed revival of the production at the Hampstead Theatre in London.

Although Family Matters (2001) is more limited in scope than its predecessor, again it demonstrates that Muslims, Hindus, and Parsis can live together in harmony. Ironically, in this novel they are sometimes kinder to each other than the members of the small family unit that is central to the narrative. Family Matters won the 2002 Kiriama Prize and was short-listed both for the James Tait Black Memorial Prize for Fiction and the 2002 Man Booker Prize. In 2006, Mistry won the Timothy Findley Award from the Writers' Trust of Canada.

ANALYSIS

There was never an apprenticeship period for Rohinton Mistry. The first short stories he submitted for publication were admired by critics for their highly polished style, their precise descriptions, and their vivid revelations of character. These qualities have placed Mistry in the first rank of Canadian writers.

Mistry is, above all, a realist. All of his fiction is firmly rooted in time and place. Most of it is set in his native Bombay, though he may venture briefly into the country, as he does in A Fine Balance, or even use Canadian settings, as he does in "Swimming Lessons," the final story in his collection Tales from Firozsha Baag. However, the central reality in every one of Mistry's works is Bombay, and, more specifically, a particular building in an area inhabited primarily by people who, like Mistry himself, are Parsis. Firozsha Baag is the name of the apartment complex where the stories in his first book take place. In Such a Long Journey, A Fine Balance, and Family Matters, the apartments where the characters live symbolize their way of life, their security, and their independence.

Mistry's realism is evident in the way he lingers over descriptions of everyday life, showing a woman at her morning chores, a family eating dinner, or children doing their homework. His lavish use of detail in these passages effectively introduces readers to a place and a people that might otherwise seem alien to them. However, these scenes have another important function: they make it all the more horrifying when the lives of such ordinary people are disrupted by outside forces.

One source of such disruption is religious intoler-erance. The older characters in the novels can recall a time when Indians of various faiths—Parsis, Sikhs, Hindus, and Muslims—lived together in harmony. However, that all ended with the bloodbath that followed Indian independence and the division of the subcontinent along religious lines. Mistry points out that people of different faiths can still coexist and can even become friends. In A Fine Balance, for example, a kindly Muslim tailor accepts two Hindu boys as apprentices, and later they save his life from Hindu extremists. As a realist, however, Mistry knows that too often intolerance wins out. Like Vikram Kapur, the shopkeeper in Family Matters, Mistry's decent people are often martyred.

Mistry's characters also live in fear of powerful, wealthy men and of corrupt government officials. The injustices that were perpetrated during Indira Gandhi's tenure as prime minister of India are major themes of two of Mistry's novels, Such a Long Journey and A Fine Balance, both set in the 1970's. In A Fine Balance, a wealthy local leader has a man who attempts to vote his convictions tortured and his family killed. In the same novel, a bureaucratic decision to force sterilization maims two characters and makes them beggars.

However, one should not conclude that Mistry takes a totally bleak view of the human condition. Though it is clear that human beings have very little control over what happens to them, they do have the power to choose between good and evil. Those who choose good, even at the cost of their own lives, are the real heroes and heroines of Mistry's fiction.

SUCH A LONG JOURNEY

First published: 1991

Type of work: Novel

A Parsi bank clerk and devoted family man deals with one crisis after another, including his own innocent involvement in government corruption.

Gustad Noble, the protagonist of Such a Long Journey, is a well-meaning man with a highly developed sense of duty. Lesser men might well have become embittered by the losses that his family has incurred. Noble's grandfather had a thriving furniture business; his father, a successful bookstore. Mismanagement by Noble's dissolute uncle resulted in bankruptcy and the loss of everything the family had accumulated over the years. Though Noble sometimes recalls those earlier days of relative luxury, he tries to make the best of his modest circumstances.

As the novel opens, he is praising Ahura Mazda and contemplating his own good fortune. At fifty, Noble is healthy; his wife, Dilnavaz, is attractive, good-natured, and efficient; his son, Sohrab, has just been admitted to the Indian Institute of Technology (ITT); and both his younger son, Darius, and his daughter, Roshan, are intelligent, obedient children. Noble's only worries are the stench outside his apartment building, caused by passersby urinating on the wall; the repression of the Bengalis in East Pakistan; and, more immediately, a letter from his old friend, Major Jimmy Bilimoris, asking Noble to make bank deposits that will provide relief for Bengali refugees.

That very day, things begin to go wrong. Sohrab announces that he no longer wants to go to ITT, and his frustrated father evicts him. Roshan develops a stomach disorder, and her parents cannot agree as to how to treat her. Neither the folk remedies of Dilnavaz nor the expensive medicines of a backstreet doctor whom Noble trusts seem to help. Noble's only success in that troubled period of his life involves the wall: he hires an artist to cover it with religious figures representing every faith, and immediately the urination ceases.

When packets of bills begin arriving from the major, Noble begins to think that he has made a mistake. At first, he hides the money in his apartment, thinking that it might be best to return it, but vandalism and explicit threats change his mind. Then Noble is informed that the major has been arrested, and he discovers that the money was never meant to aid refugees but was intended to swell the coffers of high officials, including the prime minister herself.

In the end, though the major is executed, Noble escapes prosecution and keeps his job; his daughter gets well; and Sohrab and he are reconciled. However, Noble has lost his innocence. He can no longer be certain about the future. It seems as unreliable as the wall he had preserved and beautified, which in the final pages of the novel is being knocked down in accordance with a government order.

A FINE BALANCE

First published: 1995

Type of work: Novel

Three men and a widow, brought together by chance, struggle to survive in a corrupt and brutal society.

Mistry's second novel, A Fine Balance, is a long, complex work, with four protagonists and a variety of settings. Moreover, although most of the events in the novel take place in the mid-1970's, there are also lengthy passages tracing the early lives of the major characters, thus placing them within the context of their families and their communities. These accounts are also important because they explain why the three men left home to come to what is assumed to be the city of Bombay and also why the widow, Dina Dalal, whose older brother has a home there, is living alone, attempting to support herself.

The first chapter of A Fine Balance is devoted to Dina. She was born Dina Shroff, the daughter of a Parsi physician, a good man too idealistic to have earned much money or to have saved anything for the future. Dina's brother, Nusswan, who is eleven years her senior, viewed his father with contempt; by the time he was sixteen, Nusswan had already decided to go into business and spend his life looking after himself. By contrast, Dina wanted to be a doctor just like her father, and she was bright enough to fulfill her dream. However, when Dr. Shroff died on one of his mission trips to a remote area, Nusswan took charge. There was no question of further macist. They made a home together and were blissfully happy. However, on their third anniversary, Rustom was run over and killed. Dina cannot live with her tyrannical brother. She returns to Rustom's flat, starts a tailoring business, and, when her eyes begin to fail, she decides to find two tailors to work for her, though she must conceal them from the rent collector, since the flat is not supposed to be used except as a residence.

Narayan and Ishvar Darji were born in a rural village. As leatherworkers, their family belonged to the lowest Hindu caste, the untouchables, and were the prey of everyone from a higher caste. Determined to give them a better life, their father apprenticed them to a kindly Muslim tailor. Eventually the boys save their mentor from rioting Hindus. Narayan returns to his village, sets up shop, marries, and has a son, Omprakash, who eventually goes to town to be Ishvar's apprentice. Thus Omprakash and Ishvar are not present when, after attempting to vote independent of the local political leader, Narayan is tortured and killed, and his whole family is burned to death. With their Muslim friend's business declining, Omprakash and Ishvar go to the city, hear about Dina, and become her employees.

The fourth protagonist, Maneck Kohlah, is the son of one of Dina's school friends, who with her husband runs a profitable general store in the north of India. After Maneck finishes college, he wants to return home and spend the rest of his life there. Meanwhile, he is far happier as Dina's lodger than when he was living in the college dormitory.

At first, all goes reasonably well. Dina's wholesaler accepts the garments that the tailors turn out; they find a slum shanty where they can live; and they seem to appreciate the kindnesses shown them by Dina and Maneck. Gradually the four become a family, and in that context, the others forgive even Omprakash's periodic rebellions, as a family would the sullenness of a boy who is still young. However, the four of them fall prey to ambitious and corrupt government officials who take their cues from Prime Minister Indira Gandhi's declaration of emergency. The slum village where the tailors live is bulldozed. Then, just when Omprakash is about to return to his village to be married, he and his uncle are bused off to be forcibly sterilized. Ishvar loses his legs, Omprakash, his future, and both become beggars. Trapped by the schooling. Dina became the household drudge. Then she met and married Rustom Dalal, a phar-rent collector, Dina loses her home and her business; she has to return to her brother and a life of drudgery. Maneck, too, abandons his dream. Having lost his faith in the human race, in life itself, he cannot return to that innocent world he left, and he takes his own life.

FAMILY MATTERS

First published: 2001

Type of work: Novel

When an elderly man becomes a bedridden invalid, each member of his extended family must decide how to deal with the situation.

As the title suggests, Family Matters is a story about relationships. The central character in the book is Nariman Vakeel, an elderly Parsi widower. Nariman lives in a spacious flat in an apartment building in Bombay, along with his unmarried stepdaughter, Coomy Contractor, and his stepson Jal Contractor, who is also single. Nariman is a retired English professor, a kindly man whose students remember him with affection. However, because they blame him for their mother's tragic death, Nariman's stepchildren loathe him so much that even though he adopted them legally, they refuse to use his name, though they are perfectly willing to share his home.

As Nariman's health fails and his memory becomes unreliable, Coomy avenges herself on him by systematically humiliating him. She forbids Nariman to take his usual walks around the neighborhood; she even puts him on a schedule for visiting the bathroom. Then he breaks his ankle, and Coomy and Jal dump him unceremoniously at the small, two-bedroom apartment where Nariman's daughter, Roxana Chenoy, lives with her husband, Yezad, and their two sons, Murad and Jehangir. Supposedly, Nariman is to remain there only until his cast comes off. However, when Coomy deliberately damages the ceiling of his bedroom, it becomes obvious that she does not intend ever to let him return to his home.

By contrast, Roxana is always kind to her father. Though she may weep in private, she never lets him see how exhausted she is. Her sons love their grandfather and like having him near; nine-year-old Jehangir becomes his constant companion. However, Yezad resents having his household disrupted, and because Coomy and Jal are not there to take the blame, he lashes out at his wife and his sons. Moreover, Nariman's presence soon pushes the family to the brink of financial disaster. The pittance Jal contributes to Nariman's keep is not enough to feed the invalid properly, much less to buy his medicine. In desperation, Yezad decides his only option is to ensure his own promotion to store manager by persuading his high-principled employer, Vikram Kapur, to go into politics, as he has long threatened to do. Reasoning that an encounter with Hindu extremists will push Kapur into a decision, Yezad arranges an attack on his shop. However, the hoodlums murder Kapur, leaving Yezad unemployed and consumed by guilt.

In the end, Coomy is killed, and a repentant Jal not only takes his father-in-law back home but also persuades the Chenoy to move in with him. However, Mistry is too much of a realist ever to let compassion win a total victory. Whereas earlier in the novel he showed Parsis, a Punjabi, and a Muslim living together in harmony, in the epilogue to Family Matters Yezad has become so fanatical that he has turned against his best friend and is alienating his own family.

SUMMARY

Though his fiction contains some lighthearted scenes, Rohinton Mistry is too much a realist to be optimistic about human existence. His characters are subject to disease, old age, and eventual death: that is simply a given. However, they also live in fear of each other. In Mistry's India, a knock on the door or a riot on the street outside can spell doom for someone who has never harmed anyone else. Although his novels stress the need for political reforms and for creating bridges between religious groups, they also emphasize a spiritual truth: In the final analysis, human beings have control only over their own behavior.

Rosemary M. Canfield Reisman

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Such a Long Journey, 1991

A Fine Balance, 1995

Family Matters, 2001

SHORT FICTION:

Tales from Firozsha Baag, 1987 (pb. in U.S. as Swimming Lessons, and Other Stories from Firozsha Baag, 1989)

About the Author

Allen, Brooke. Twentieth-Century Attitudes: Literary Powers in Uncertain Times. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 2003.

Bahri, Deepika. Native Intelligence: Aesthetics, Politics, and Postcolonial Literature. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2003.

James, Jamie. "The Toronto Circle." Atlantic Monthly 285, 4 (April, 2000): 126-131.

Malak, Amin. "The Shahrazadic Tradition: Rohinton Mistry's Such a Long Journey and the Art of Storytelling." Journal of Commonwealth Literature 29 (1993): 108-118.

Mistry, Rohinton. "The Imam and I." In Away: The Indian Writer As an Expatriate, edited by Amitava Kumar. New York: Routledge, 2003.

_____. Interview with Robert Mclay. In Writing Across Worlds: Contemporary Writers Talk, edited by Susheila Nasta. London: Routledge, 2004.

Morey, Peter. Fictions of India: Narrative and Power. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 2000.

_____. Rohinton Mistry. Manchester, England: Manchester University Press, 2004.

"Rohinton Mistry." In Writers of the Indian Diaspora: A Bio-Bibliographical Critical Sourcebook, edited by Emmanuel S. Nelson. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1993.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Which of Rohinton Mistry's characters are meant to be viewed as models of human behavior?
- How does Mistry define a community? What are the advantages of strong communal ties?
- Do the arranged marriages in Mistry's novels seem to be successful? Why or why not?
- How does a corrupt government affect the lives of characters in Mistry's novels?
- How do religious beliefs affect the lives of Mistry's characters?

Library of Congress

MOLIÈRE

Born: Paris, France
January 15, 1622 (baptized)
Died: Paris, France
February 17, 1673

By adding realistic characterization and penetrating social criticism to conventional farce, Molière produced a new type of French comedy and earned a reputation as France's finest comic playwright.

BIOGRAPHY

Jean-Baptiste Poquelin was born in Paris, France. Although his date of birth is not known, he was baptized on January 15, 1622. Jean-Baptiste was the oldest child of Marie Cresse Poquelin and Jean Poquelin, a prosperous upholsterer who was connected with the court. The boy was educated at the Jesuit College of Clermont, then studied law, becoming a notary in 1641. Meanwhile, his father had arranged for Jean-Baptiste to inherit the court office, which he himself had purchased from his brother. The young man's future seemed assured.

Jean-Baptiste, however, had fallen under the spell of the theater, in the person of the actress Madeleine Béjart, whose parents were neighbors of the Poquelin family. With Madeleine, her brother Joseph, her sister Geneviève, and nine other actors, Jean-Baptiste, or Molière (mohl-YEHR), as he now called himself, founded the Illustre Théâtre and began to present plays. Molière's action was much more than a change of profession; in his day, actors and actresses were considered disreputable, even, according to many in the Roman Catholic Church, destined for eternal damnation. Therefore, when Molière became an actor, he lost his social standing, his security, and seemingly his future.

The new troupe did not prosper in Paris. After being imprisoned for debt, Molière, now the manager, decided to take his company on a tour of the provinces. Little more is known about Molière's life during the next thirteen years except the names of some of the towns and cities where the company appeared. Evidently, at this time Molière polished his skills as an actor, alternating in leading roles and, incidentally, excelling in comedy. Molière also began to write for his troupe. At first, he produced short farcical sketches; by 1655, however, his first full-length comedy had been presented. Three years later, Molière believed that his company was ready once again to try its luck in Paris, where the court of Louis XIV was the center of not only political power but French culture as well.

In Paris, Molière's company became the "troupe de Monsieur." The name signified that it was under the protection, or sponsorship, of the king's oldest brother, who, according to long-standing tradition, was called simply Monsieur. On October 24, 1658, at the Louvre, Molière's troupe appeared before King Louis XIV, his brother, and the rest of the court, presenting a tragedy by Pierre Corneille and a farce by Molière himself. Although the tragedy was not well received, the king was particularly enthusiastic about Molière's play, and as a result, he granted the troupe permission to perform at the salle du Petit-Bourbon, or the Petit-Bourbon Theater, which initially was shared with an Italian company but later was assigned solely to the troupe de Monsieur.

On November 18, 1659, the company produced Les Précieuses ridicules (pr. 1659, pb. 1660; The Af- fect Young Ladies, 1732). It was Molière's first comedy of manners. In it, he satirized the pedantry and the folly, the affectations and the snobbishness, that were characteristic of Parisian society, and especially of those women who aspired to higher social standing. The play was the troupe's greatest financial success to that point. In 1660, Molière first appeared as a character named Sganarelle, playing the part of the bourgeois husband in a delightful comedy called Sganarelle: Ou, Le Cocu imaginaire (pr., pb. 1660; Sganarelle: Or, The Imaginary Cuckold, 1732). Later, perhaps thinking that it brought him good luck, Molière used the name of Sganarelle for quite different characters in other comedies. He always insisted on playing the Sganarelle role himself. Interestingly, all the plays in which some Sganarelle appeared happened to be successful.

Although as manager Molière could make decisions about casting and production, he had no power to prevent his jealous rivals from injuring him and his company, in one way or another. In 1661, they managed to have a court official obtain approval for a new colonnade; oddly, the new construction necessitated the demolition of Molière's theater. Unwilling to countermand the orders of his official, the king instead arranged for Molière's troupe to be moved to the Palais-Royal Théâtre, where they were to remain for the rest of Molière's lifetime. There, they continued to present plays by various writers, regularly introducing new works by Molière, some of which were highly successful and some of which were failures. One of the latter was the first play produced in the Palais Royal, a heroic comedy. The second play presented after the move, however, L'École des maris (pr., pb. 1661; The School for Husbands, 1732), in which Molière played another Sganarelle, was very popular. The play was based on a work by the Roman writer Terence, in which the playwright contrasted two kinds of education, harsh and permissive. Molière decided to examine this issue in regard to girls, not boys. The side of harshness in his play is represented by the foolish Sganarelle, who has kept his ward in strict seclusion, intending eventually to make her his wife. In contrast, there is another guardian, Ariste, who has put no limits on the girl's sister. As the play proceeds, Sganarelle's rebellious ward manages to trick her guardian into helping her marry her young lover.

The story of the older man and the young woman was repeated over and over again in Molière's plays; it was also relevant to his own life. In 1662, the forty-year-old Molière married the actress Armande Béjart, who was probably the sister of his friend and former mistress Madeleine Béjart. Armande was a spoiled girl of twenty. Her hard-heartedness and infidelity are reflected in many of Molière's plays, such as L'École des femmes (pr. 1662, pb. 1663; The School for Wives, 1732). It is a mark of Molière's capacity for artistic detachment that, although he makes fun of coquettes like Armande in such plays, he also satirizes older men like himself, who marry young women and then suffer the torments of jealousy.

In the last decade of his life, Molière was troubled by domestic unhappiness and besieged by his personal and professional enemies. In addition, he had contracted tuberculosis, and, in the vain hope of a cure, he found himself forced to rely upon the medical profession, which, it is obvious from his plays, he deeply distrusted. Despite these personal difficulties, it was during this period that the playwright produced his greatest comedies.

In Paris, on February 17, 1673, even though he was ill, Molière insisted on appearing in the title role of Le Malade imaginaire (pr. 1673, pb. 1674; The Imaginary Invalid, 1732), which is, ironically, the story of a man who merely thinks himself to be unwell. Shortly after finishing the performance, Molière collapsed and died. Because he had not received the final rites of the Church, the clergy, never his friends, found an excuse to refuse him burial in consecrated ground; however, after the intervention of the king, Molière was buried in Saint-Joseph's cemetery in Paris.

ANALYSIS

Molière's art derived from two sources. The first was the French farce, a story of trickery, punctuated with physical action, which had delighted simple audiences during the Middle Ages and continued to please more sophisticated audiences in Molière's own century. The second was the commedia dell'arte, which had originated in Italy and had only recently been introduced to France. These were plays with set situations but with improvised dialogue, presented by actors in masks, who represented character types. In developing his own kind of comedy, Molière depended for his plots on farce, with its elaborate schemes of deception, mistaken identity, disguise, and misdirection. The commedia dell'arte, however, suggested possibilities for stylization in production and even in dialogue. Furthermore, the characters who are the targets of Molière's satire, for example, the miser, the greedy doctor, the jealous husband, and the coquette, are based on the stock characters of the commedia dell'arte. What Molière did with these characters was to individualize them and to place them in the society of his own time, while still retaining in them the outlines of the universal types that they represented.

Molière's comedies are structured like the old French farces, which first identified the person to be deceived, then played a number of tricks on him, and finally exposed and humiliated him. At the beginning of the play, Molière establishes some obsession in the dupe, which justifies his being embarrassed or thwarted, and similarly, he gives enough good qualities and appropriate goals to his tricksters so that at the end of the play, when they win, the audience is delighted. An example of such a gull would be Sganarelle in The School for Husbands. Because he is obsessed with his distrust of women, he deserves to be tricked. The ward and her young lover are attractive, their love is appealing, and their goal is to marry each other. Obviously, the audience identifies with them as they try to outwit the tyrannical Sganarelle and is delighted when they succeed.

In most comedies, as in this one, the tricksters are the disempowered, the servants or slaves instead of their masters, the young instead of the old, and women instead of men. It is for this reason that one does not disapprove of the lies and deception to which such characters must resort, for, after all, a person without power must triumph over the powerful by wit alone.

In neoclassical comedy, there is also a raisonneur, or a man of reason, who speaks for the author, while also reflecting the dominant intellectual tendencies of his time. In the speeches of Molière's raisonneurs, the audience would recognize Aristotle's theory of the Golden Mean, which in most cases placed virtue in a middle place between two extremes, for example, praising financial prudence as being neither extravagance nor miserliness. The obsessions of Molière's gulls would be examples of these extremes, where neither reason nor virtue dwells. The raisonneur would exemplify the ideal of the age, the honnête homme, the moderate, polite, honest gentleman, who is both rational and good.

If Molière's plays were nothing more than a dramatization of the advantages of moderation, however, they would be amusing but hardly memorable. Molière's best comedies not only warn of the consequences of obsession; they are also reminders that, by nature, human beings are obsessive creatures, and that although obsession may lead to embarrassment or even to tragedy, it is also obsession, not bland moderation, that creates lovers and saints. It has been suggested that Molière's plays reflect his own realization that two selves were at war within his own nature. One of the selves stressed the advantages of moderation; the other was at the mercy of his own emotions. Thus, Molière could see how foolish the lovesick older man might be, but he himself was tormented by his own love for his young, faithless wife; similarly, he could understand the need for discretion, but he could not deny his own idealism, and he castigated hypocrites wherever he found them, thus risking his career and even his freedom. Molière's best comedies do justice not only to the prudent plan for life that is the playwright's official stance, as voiced by his raisonneur, but also to the idealism, the passion for justice, and even the illusions whose loss, if perhaps necessary for survival, gives a tragic dimension to human existence.

THE SCHOOL FOR WIVES

First produced: L'École des femmes, 1662 (first published, 1663; English translation, 1732)

Type of work: Play

An older man discovers that he cannot manipulate a young woman as if she were a mere object.

The first scene of The School for Wives establishes the pattern of the drama. Arnolphe is the man in power, the guardian and virtual jailer of his young ward Agnès, whom he has kept in seclusion and in ignorance so that she will make him a virtuous wife. He refuses to listen to his friend Chrysalde, the raisonneur, who warns him against carrying out his plans. It soon becomes clear that Arnolphe deserves to be thwarted, not only because of his treatment of Agnès but also because he has other unappealing qualities. He is ill-natured, a man who spreads vicious gossip about husbands whose wives have cuckolded them; he is also a social climber, who has changed his name to “Monsieur Delafield” in order to pretend that he is an aristocrat.

This change of name makes possible a confusion of identity central to the plot. Because he is unaware of the name change, young Horace, the son of Arnolphe’s friend Oronte, is soon innocently confiding in Arnolphe himself about the progress of his love affair with a girl whom he knows only as the ward of a Monsieur Delafield.

Although at first it seems that Arnolphe will be able to outwit the lovers, actually his advantage is very slight, because he discovers their encounters only after they have occurred. In scene after scene, Horace tells Arnolphe how his preventive measures have only served to benefit the young lovers. For example, when, in obedience to her guardian, Agnès threw a brick at Horace, she attached a love letter to it. Later, when Arnolphe set a trap for Horace, in the commotion, Agnès managed to escape from the house where her uncle had been keeping her a prisoner.

In their first conversation, Chrysalde warned Arnolphe that merely keeping Agnès ignorant would not keep her virtuous; in fact, he argued that a well-educated, rational woman would be better able to deal with her world than one who was too innocent to suspect wrongdoing. Certainly, the conversations that Agnès has with her guardian support Chrysalde’s position. It is fortunate that Horace is honorable, for Agnès easily concludes that anything that brings her such pleasure as Horace’s embrace could not possibly be wrong. Yet even if Agnès is too innocent to be skeptical about such delights, she is not stupid. It does not take her long to realize that the book about women’s duties that Arnolphe gives her to read is biased; every maxim in it is intended to persuade women that they exist only for the pleasure of men. Not surprisingly, she prefers Horace’s romantic devotion to Arnolphe’s obvious distrust of women. Furthermore, Agnès is manifestly unwilling to remain passive, the mere ball of wax that Arnolphe boasts that he can mold as he wishes. Just as Chrysalde warned it would, Arnolphe’s plan for producing a faithful wife fails, as it deserves to fail, because it is based on his own overwhelming egotism.

Agnès, however, does live in a hierarchical society, where women’s freedom is extremely restricted. Therefore, in order to bring the lovers together, Molière must turn to fate or coincidence. In the final act of the play, Oronte appears with his long-absent friend Enrique. The two men have agreed on a marriage between Horace and the daughter of Enrique, whose identity has long been kept secret, but who in actuality is Agnès herself. Thus, Arnolphe loses his intended wife, and the lovers are married with the blessing of their parents.

There are a number of themes in this play. Obviously, one of them concerns the status of women. Molière is proving that men will be happier with women who are educated, respected, and trusted than with those who are deliberately kept in ignorance. Another is the theme of irrational obsession, as embodied in the character of Arnolphe. Essentially, Arnolphe’s nastiness toward unfortunate husbands, his tyranny over Agnès, and his snobbishness, as reflected in the assumed title, are all aspects of a single character flaw, the fact that Arnolphe has no sense of himself, but only a consciousness of externals. That is the point of Chrysalde’s long speech in act 4, where he attempts to persuade Arnolphe that he has misdefined honor, thinking of it as reputation, when it should be internal integrity. That is, of course, the ideal of the honnête homme. Chrysalde then says that he is not advocating the kind of tolerance that rejects all moral values; that would be the other extreme, not the Golden Mean. Instead, he is insisting on the middle way of the prudent man, who, unlike Arnolphe, finds his security not in the conduct or the opinions of others but in himself.

The very fact that The School for Wives was so successful inevitably brought bitter criticisms of the play from Molière’s rivals. In order to answer them, he wrote a one-act sketch, meant to accompany the play whenever it was performed. La Critique de “L’École des Femmes” (The Critique of “The School for Wives,” 1957) was first presented on June 1, 1663. It is an interesting commentary on Molière’s art. For example, he describes his characters as realistic but defends himself against the charge of personal ridicule by arguing that his satire is universal. To those who object to his double entendres, Molière responds that sexual suggestions come from the reader, not the writer. The Critique of "The School for Wives" makes it clear that Molière was not only an inspired dramatist but also an extremely careful craftsman who took his work very seriously.

TARTUFFE

First produced: 1664 (first published, 1669;
English translation, 1732)

Type of work: Play

A decent but gullible man is nearly ruined by the machinations of a religious hypocrite.

With Tartuffe, Molière moved further away from the simple structure derived from French farce. In this play, there is again a middle-aged man, Orgon, who can be tricked because of his obsession. Yet, although the trickster, Tartuffe, is a person outside the power structure, in this case he is a vicious hypocrite who must be stripped of his power over Orgon if poetic justice is to prevail. Therefore, there is another pair of tricksters—Orgon's wife Elmire and his servant Dorine—who must set things right and aid the usual young lovers.

The structure of this play is also unusual in that the title character does not appear until the third act. In the first two acts, the characters voice their opinions of Tartuffe, this mysterious, seemingly pious man whom Orgon, the head of a prosperous Parisian household, has taken into his home as an honored guest. Except for Madame Pernelle, Orgon's mother, the family members are unanimous in voicing their dislike of the man. Orgon's young wife, Elmire, her stepson Damis, her stepdaughter Mariane, and her brother Cléante, the raisonneur, as well as the impertinent servant Dorine, all see Tartuffe for the hypocrite that he is.

After this preparation has been made, Orgon enters, and Molière begins to substantiate the fact that he is indeed besotted by this stranger. In a hilarious dialogue, Dorine attempts to report on the family, only to be answered over and over again by Orgon's anxious inquiry, "And Tartuffe?" followed by a heartfelt "poor fellow." Since Tartuffe's activities involve gluttonous eating and a good deal of sleeping, Orgon's concern about the man is ridiculous. The fact that Orgon's infatuation could have serious results is soon made clear, when he reveals his plan to make Tartuffe a member of the family by giving him his daughter in marriage. It is at this point that Elmire and Dorine begin to formulate plans to deceive the deceiver by attacking his own weaknesses.

Tartuffe's susceptibility to lust is revealed as soon as he makes his long-awaited entrance in the third act, when he begs Dorine to cover her bosom, so as not to tempt him to sin. Elmire's plan seems foolproof: She will lead him to make his designs upon her explicit and then threaten to tell Orgon unless Tartuffe relinquishes his claims on Mariane. The plan fails, however, and Tartuffe plays upon Orgon's emotions so skillfully that he manages to get Damis disinherited and himself made Orgon's heir. Now both of Orgon's children are powerless, and, of course, the raisonneur is still being ignored. Somehow, Elmire and Dorine must expose Tartuffe's perfidy so that even Orgon cannot deny it. They do have an ally, Tartuffe's own weakness.

Actors, directors, and critics agree that the nature of that weakness is the central issue of Tartuffe. There is no doubt that Tartuffe is bent on having his way with Elmire. Yet even in the scenes where he attempts to seduce her, he can be seen as dominated by the desire for power. Whether his later arrogance is the result of his humiliation by Elmire or merely his true nature, Tartuffe viciously seeks to deprive his former patron of his property, his freedom, perhaps even of his life, and he is stopped only by the intervention of the godlike King, who Molière says cannot be deceived.

This graceful compliment was not only politic but also probably expressed Molière's gratitude to Louis XIV, who had supported the playwright through his various attempts to stage this play. For some time, Molière had been suspect in the eyes of an influential group at court, which considered itself the guardian of public morals. This group managed to have two versions of Tartuffe suppressed, first in 1664, then in 1667. Only after Louis XIV obtained the opinion of a theologian who was too prominent to be refuted was the final version of Tartuffe presented. Within its first year, it was performed fifty-five times. It has continued to be one of Molière's most popular plays, and it is considered one of his greatest masterpieces.

THE WOULD-BE GENTLEMAN

First produced: Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, 1670 (first published, 1671; English translation, 1675)

Type of work: Play

A commoner who wishes to climb the social ladder becomes an easy dupe.

Even during his final decade, when he was producing comedies as complex and thought provoking as Tartuffe, Molière sometimes wrote works that were much more like French farce in their simplicity and lightheartedness. The Would-Be Gentleman is such a play.

The gull in this comedy-ballet is M. Jourdain, a commoner who has inherited some money and now wishes to become something that he is not, a gentleman. Like so many of Molière's obsessed characters, Jourdain defines what a person is in terms of externals. In contrast, his practical wife, Madame Jourdain, sees clearly what he is, what she is, and where they belong in society. Perhaps because this play takes place among the bourgeoisie, not among the gentry, there is no honnête homme in it to serve as the voice of reason. Instead, the function of the raisonneur is filled by Madame Jourdain herself, who, along with the servant Nicole, points out the merits of moderation.

As far as structure is concerned, The Would-Be Gentleman consists of a series of episodes, each one act long, which are brightened by songs and separated by interludes of dance. In each episode, tricksters take advantage of M. Jourdain's social ambitions. In the first act, a musician and a dancing master are instructing him; in the second, they are joined by a fencing teacher, and finally by a master of philosophy, who astonishes M. Jourdain by convincing him that he has been talking prose all of his life. M. Jourdain's willingness to be duped is illustrated when he sees his new coat, made with the flowers upside down; all his tailor has to say is that this is the fashion of the gentry, and once again M. Jourdain denies his reason and accepts the coat. If he can be so easily fooled by tradespeople, the would-be gentleman is no match at all for an impecunious nobleman. For some time, Count Dorante has been "borrowing" money from M. Jourdain. Now he has plans to maximize his profits by persuading his victim that the aristocratic Dorimène might become his mistress, if only M. Jourdain will send enough magnificent gifts to her.

Throughout all of these incidents, the audience remains delighted but disengaged, sympathetic only with the sensible wife who, like all raisonneurs, is certain to be ignored. When the happiness of two young lovers is threatened because of M. Jourdain's social ambitions, however, it is time for a trickster of a different kind. As so often in these comedies, this turns out to be the thwarted young man. Because he is not a nobleman, Cléonte has been refused the hand of M. Jourdain's daughter. In a wonderful fifth act, Cléonte takes advantage of M. Jourdain's reliance on appearances. Dressed as the Grand Turk and speaking in gibberish, he wins his lady, and the play ends with several marriages, including that of Dorante to Dorimène, and, of course, the final ballet.

It is obvious that, except for the use of a woman as raisonneur, The Would-Be Gentleman is much like Molière's simpler early plays. Because it avoids the dark possibilities of plays such as Tartuffe and satirizes the pretentious bourgeoisie for an audience that considered itself vastly superior to it, The Would-Be Gentleman produced no controversy at court. It is interesting that Louis XIV pronounced it his favorite of Molière's works. The play has continued to delight later audiences even as it once pleased Molière's king.

THE MISANTHROPE

First produced: Le Misanthrope, 1666 (first published, 1667; English translation, 1709)

Type of work: Play

An idealist who insists on being honest finds that he cannot survive in society.

Although in some of Molière's plays the protagonist is deceived because he is both egotistical and foolish, in more thoughtful works, such as Tartuffe and The Misanthrope, it is an excess of virtue that makes him vulnerable. In Tartuffe, Orgon was obsessed by religion; in The Misanthrope, Alceste is obsessed by honesty.

The Misanthrope begins with a conventional opening dialogue between the central character, Alceste, and his friend, the easygoing Philinte, who is the raisonneur. In this scene, Alceste states his determination to speak nothing but the truth, and the horrified Philinte vainly attempts to warn him of the consequences. In society, Philinte points out, a little dishonesty is essential. Otherwise, there would be open warfare. Alceste, however, is adamant. The scenes that follow trace the consequences of his resolution, from the failure of a lawsuit to the loss of his beloved Célimène.

It is Célimène who is Alceste's one irrationality. Ironically, he is in love with the most deceitful woman at court. As far as the play is concerned, Célimène fulfills the function of the trickster. Her only motivation, however, is a selfish one: She lies so as to accumulate as many admirers as possible. Obviously, she is, in her own way, as obsessive as Alceste, without the excuse of virtue. Therefore, it is not surprising that she is finally exposed through some carelessness about letters. Nevertheless, she dashes Alceste's hopes; she would agree to marry him, she says, but not at the cost of leaving society, as the disillusioned Alceste has resolved to do. She would rather replace the lovers who have abandoned her than spend her youth in a desert.

Although Alceste loses Célimène forever, there is another match at the end of The Misanthrope, which actually materializes through Alceste's own insensitivity. Throughout the play, the gentle, rational Éliante has shown no interest in Philinte, who loves her and who sees in her the social but virtuous female counterpart of himself. Unfortunately, Éliante is as irrationally in love with Alceste as Alceste is with Célimène. Unlike Alceste, however, who always makes excuses for Célimène, Éliante can see the unpleasant truth about someone whom she loves. After Alceste has been rejected by Célimène, he churlishly offers to marry Éliante, making it quite clear that she is his second choice. At that moment, Éliante realizes that Alceste is less than a perfect person. Although honest, he is insensitive and inconsiderate. Without a second thought, Éliante rejects him, and, suddenly aware of the virtues of her friend, the devoted Philinte, she accepts his proposal of marriage.

With so slight a plot, The Misanthrope depends for its interest on characterization and on theme. Molière's contemporaries recognized in his characters most of the types present in aristocratic society, for example, dilettantes such as Oronte, empty-headed fops such as Acaste and Clitandre, and hypocritical prudes such as Arsinée. Through Célimène's admittedly catty descriptions, Molière includes other character types who do not actually appear on stage: the incessant talker, the dramatically mysterious man, the name-dropper, the tediously dull woman, and the equally boring egotist. The result is a comprehensive view of a society that obviously deserved to be satirized.

As to Molière's own attitude toward that society, critics continue to disagree. Although Philinte and Éliante obviously represent good sense and moderation, some argue that Molière identifies more closely with Alceste. There is good reason for Philinte to remain loyal to his friend, who, unlike most of the other courtiers, takes life seriously. As a satirist, Molière could hardly do less.

SUMMARY

From the plots and character types familiar to his audience, Molière developed modern comedy. His plays vary from simple to complex, from farce and comedy-ballet to comedy of manners and what might be termed comedy of character. Whatever their nature, they play beautifully. The words, the situations, and the scenes are as funny to twenty-first century audiences as they were in Molière's time. Furthermore, in the plays that are considered Molière's masterpieces, such as Tartuffe and The Misanthrope, audiences find something more than humor: a realistic view of the world as the home of fools, along with a belief that good will ordinarily triumph over evil, but only by the narrowest margin.

Rosemary M. Canfield Reisman

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

DRAMA:

- L'Étourdi: Ou, Les Contre-temps*, pr. 1653, pb. 1663 (verse play; The Blunderer, 1678)
- Le Dépit amoureux*, pr. 1656, pb. 1663 (adaptation of Niccolò Secchi's L'Interessé: The Love-Tiff, 1930)
- Les Précieuses ridicules*, pr. 1659, pb. 1660 (The Affected Young Ladies, 1732)
- Sganarelle: Ou, Le Cocu imaginaire*, pr., pb. 1660 (Sganarelle: Or, The Imaginary Cuckold, 1732)
- L'École des maris*, pr., pb. 1661 (verse play; The School for Husbands, 1732)
- L'École des femmes*, pr. 1662, pb. 1663 (verse play; The School for Wives, 1732)
- La Critique de "L'École des femmes,"* pr., pb. 1663 (The Critique of "The School for Wives," 1957)
- L'Impromptu de Versailles*, pr. 1663, pb. 1682 (The Versailles Impromptu, 1714)
- Tartuffe: Ou, L'Imposteur*, pr. 1664, revised pr. 1667, pb. 1669 (verse play; Tartuffe, 1732)
- L'Amour médecin*, pr. 1665, pb. 1666 (Love's the Best Doctor, 1755)
- Don Juan: Ou, Le Festin de Pierre*, pr. 1665, pb. 1682 (Don Juan, 1755)
- Le Médecin malgré lui*, pr., pb. 1666 (The Doctor in Spite of Himself, 1672)
- Le Misanthrope*, pr. 1666, pb. 1667 (verse play; The Misanthrope, 1709)
- Amphitryon*, pr., pb. 1668 (verse play; English translation, 1755)
- L'Avare*, pr. 1668, pb. 1669 (The Miser, 1672)
- Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme*, pr. 1670, pb. 1671 (The Would-Be Gentleman, 1675)
- Les Fourberies de Scapin*, pr., pb. 1671 (The Cheats of Scapin, 1701)
- Les Femmes savantes*, pr., pb. 1672 (verse play; The Learned Ladies, pr., pb. 1693)
- Le Malade imaginaire*, pr. 1673, pb. 1674 (The Imaginary Invalid, 1732; also known as The Hypochondriac)
- Dramatic Works*, pb. 1875-1876 (3 volumes)
- The Plays of Molière*, pb. 1926 (8 volumes)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What do Molière's plays reveal about his attitude toward society?
- Although the word "farce" has acquired pejorative meanings, it is a legitimate theatrical form. What are the characteristics of farce?
- Very often comedies end in unions, in marriages, but for Molière, marriage is sometimes the trouble. In such cases, does he have a different formula for concluding a comedy?
- Are the troubles in Orgon's family seventeenth century ones, or are there contemporary equivalents?
- Consider the fact that Tartuffe is not only a foolish person but also a dangerous one.
- Molière is considered to be the developer of modern comedy. What comic playwrights today most closely reflect a world-view like his?

About the Author

- Chapman, Percy Addison. The Spirit of Molière: An Interpretation. Edited by Jean-Albert Bede. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1940.
- Gossman, Lionel. Men and Masks: A Study of Molière. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1963.
- Guicharnaud, Jacques, ed. Molière: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1964.
- Howarth, W. D., and Merlin Thomas, eds. Molière: Stage and Study. Oxford, England: Clarendon Press, 1973.
- Koppisch, Michael S. Rivalry and the Disruption of Order in Molière's Theater. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2004.
- Mander, Gertrud. Molière. Translated by Diana Stone Peters. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1973.
- Polsky, Zachary. The Comic Machine, the Narrative Machine, and the Political Machine in the Works of Molière. Lewison, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2003.
- Scott, Virginia. Molière: A Theatrical Life. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
- Smith, Gretchen Elizabeth. The Performance of Nobility in Molière's Comédies-Ballets: Staging the Courtier. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2005.

MICHEL EYQUEM DE MONTAIGNE

Born: Château de Montaigne, Périgord, near Bordeaux, France
February 28, 1533

Died: Château de Montaigne, Périgord, near Bordeaux, France
September 13, 1592

Montaigne, in The Essays, created a new literary form, the personal essay, which writers elsewhere would develop into a major literary genre.

BIOGRAPHY

Michel Eyquem de Montaigne (mon-TAYN) was born to wealthy parents, Pierre Eyquem and Antoinette de Louppes, in the family château in southwestern France on February 28, 1533. From childhood, he was taught to speak Latin even before his own native language, for his German tutor knew no French and instructed his pupil exclusively in the language of antiquity. Consequently, during his first ten years, Montaigne knew little French at all. From classical languages, however, he learned clarity of expression and thought, and his writings are enriched by references to Roman history, mythology, and authors such as Cicero, Vergil, and Seneca.

Montaigne's training in classical languages and literature was also an indication of his century. The rapid spread of Greek and Roman classics and the newly revived humanistic learning of the Renaissance was no more than a quarter of a century old in France when he was born, and it was not unusual for children such as Michel to learn Latin. Earlier, however, the Latin that he was taught would have been church Latin, but Montaigne learned the secular Latin of the great poets and orators of the past. Montaigne went on to become one of the principal proponents of this classical learning, called the New Philosophy, and its insistence upon the individual as the measure of all things and upon a healthy skepticism in the pursuit of truth. Montaigne, in fact, took as his motto "Que sais-je?" ("What do I know?"), reflecting his rejection of authority, his tolerance for all ideas, and his restless and searching mind.

Montaigne's father, a wealthy merchant, sent his son to the Collège de Guyenne in Bordeaux from 1539 to 1546 and later to the University of Bordeaux to study philosophy. Later still, in 1559, Montaigne studied law at the University of Toulouse. In 1557, his father was elected mayor of Bordeaux, leaving his post as counselor in the parliament of Bordeaux and passing it on to his son. Montaigne served as counselor until 1570, during a time of great religious and political upheaval in France. A series of civil wars between Catholics and Protestants (who acquired the derisive name Huguenots) divided the country, culminating in 1572 with the ambush slaying of twenty thousand Huguenots on St. Bartholomew's Day (August 24).

One of Montaigne's fellow counselors on the Bordeaux parliament was Étienne de La Boétie, a gifted poet, dedicated humanist, and distinguished civil servant, and the two men developed a close friendship. La Boétie died suddenly in 1563, at the young age of thirty-two, and his death was one of the great losses of Montaigne's life. Montaigne's essays are filled with references to friends and friendship, and years after La Boétie's death Montaigne noted in his diaries his still painful recollections of his friend.

In 1565, Montaigne married Françoise de la Chassaigne, the daughter of a fellow counselor. They had six daughters, only one of whom, Léonore, survived infancy. The marriage itself seems to have been a reasonably happy one, but the subject is much debated by Montaigne scholars. The Essais (books 1-2, 1580; books 1-2 revised, 1582; books 1-3 1588; books 1-3 revised; 1595; The Essays, 1603) are full of acerbic comments about wives and marriage, and in his essay “De la diversion” (“Of Diversion”), Montaigne admits that he made himself fall in love to distract himself from the overpowering grief of La Boétie’s death. In another essay, he insists that a good marriage—and there may not be one, according to Montaigne—is based not on love but on friendship. Whether of love or of friendship, his marriage lasted twenty-seven years.

When his father died in 1570, Montaigne retired to the family estate that he inherited. There he spent the greater part of his time writing and thinking in the tower library of his chateau. For his career as a civil servant, he was ordained in 1571 into the Order of St. Michael, and King Charles IX gave him the title Gentleman of the King’s Chamber. Mainly, though, he led the secluded life of a philosopher-author, and in March, 1580, the first edition of The Essays appeared for the amusement of a few friends and relatives.

After nine years of self-imposed exile to write a book, Montaigne set out on a seventeen-month journey to Italy via Switzerland and Germany. In part, the trip was intended to relieve the intense pain of a kidney stone, an illness that had killed his father, and Montaigne took curative waters and treatment at various foreign spas. While he was away, his fellow citizens of Bordeaux nominated and elected him mayor in 1581, a post that he held until 1585, at which time he resigned and left Bordeaux when the plague broke out. Montaigne and his family wandered from place to place for six months, returning home around the end of 1586.

Montaigne lived the remainder of his life in retirement and seclusion, and he continued to write. A second edition of The Essays appeared in 1588 with some additions, and a final version came out in 1595 that included three books of essays and was almost twice as long as the 1580 book. It is this volume, the work of a fully mature mind, that stands as Montaigne’s final monument. He died in his family chateau on September 13, 1592, and was buried in a small church in Bordeaux. Three centuries later, in 1886, his remains were placed in the entrance hall of the building of the faculties of theology, science, and letters of the University of Bordeaux. They remain there to this day, appropriately secluded in a place of books and learning, the two principal passions of Montaigne’s life.

ANALYSIS

The word “essay,” a familiar literary term today, was coined by Montaigne, but the word had a meaning that is different from its modern meaning. Essay derives from the Latin word exagium, a weighing, and from the French word essai, a trial or test. Montaigne’s writings were weighings of himself and his beliefs, in the same way that one would weigh, or “assay,” precious ore to determine its worth. They are equally a test of his judgments, a testing of ideas and random thoughts, and an attempt to assess himself and his experiences at various points of his life. The subject of his essays, as he says in many places, is always himself, and his task as an author is to see himself as accurately as he can and to be truthful about what he believes.

Montaigne, however, never thought that his own life and thoughts would hold fascination for centuries of readers. What, then, has attracted readers to Montaigne over the centuries? First, there is his common sense and universality. He is attractive to readers precisely because he is so much like them that his thoughts often seem commonplace. Second, preceding Sigmund Freud, Montaigne had a strong sense of the divisions within the human psyche, the conflict of humanity against itself, and the inability of human reason to solve all of humankind’s problems. What Montaigne seeks is what one would today call “the integrated personality,” a unified sense of being and an orderly view of life. Finally, readers appreciate Montaigne’s clarity of thought and expression, his confessional style, and his mordant wit—all qualities found in the best contemporary essayists such as Joan Didion and Tom Wolfe.

Exactly how to categorize Montaigne’s thought, however, is not an easy task. He has been called a hedonist, a skeptic, a stoic, and even an existentialist, but none of these seems fully adequate. He is a hedonist in his love of life and enjoyment of sensual pleasures, but in essays such as “De la moderation” (“Of Moderation”), he warns that a person can become a slave to his or her senses. His essays on idleness, lying, cruelty, cowardice, vanity, and drunkenness testify to his skeptical view of humankind’s innate goodness, but these are equally balanced by essays on constancy, friendship, virtue, repentance, and moderation. Montaigne’s stoicism is clear in his thoughts on death, and he titles one of his essays “Que philosophe c’est apprendre à mourir” (“To Philosophize Is to Learn to Die”), but he also emphasizes the enjoyment of this life. Finally, like the existentialists of the twentieth century, Montaigne sees life in a continual flux, making the attainment of absolute truth impossible. Yet if the absurdity of the human condition prevents people from having true knowledge, they can at least know themselves in their perpetually changing condition.

Perhaps the best term for Montaigne is one suggested by Donald Frame, professor emeritus of French at Columbia University. Montaigne is an “apprehensive humanist,” a lover of reason and books, and a student of human custom and behavior, who is uneasy about the human condition. While the mass of humans may be ignorant, stupid, lazy, and lustful, they can still accomplish occasional great things. Life is paradox and contradiction—composed, Montaigne says, of contrary things—and one must learn to accept human contrariness.

Finally, Montaigne’s use of paradox and irony, of balanced phrase and metaphor, are masterful, and perhaps no one has written in the French language with greater elegance and grace. The Essays are stylishly written reflections upon the oppositions of humanity and God, good and evil, action and inaction, faith and reason. If Montaigne reaches no conclusions, his journey consists of fascinating intellectual twists and turns; and if he continually asks, “What do I know?” he always does so with wit, modesty, and candor.

“OF CANNIBALS”

First published: “Des cannibales,” 1580
(collected in Complete Works: Essays, Travel Journal, Letters, 1957)

Type of work: Essay

What people call barbarism is merely vanity and ignorance on their part, for the behavior of “civilized” people surpasses the barbarism of supposedly “uncivilized” people in every way.

Montaigne’s age was one of adventure and exploration, and many travelers returned to Europe with tales of strange and fascinating people elsewhere. During a French expedition to South America in 1557, the explorer Villegaignon encountered a tribe of cannibals in what was then called “Antarctic France” but what is now called Brazil. Some of them returned with the crew. Montaigne not only met one of these cannibals at Rouen in 1562 but also employed a servant who had spent a dozen years living among them in their native land.

From this firsthand knowledge, Montaigne in “Of Cannibals” reverses the egocentric European belief in the superiority of Western culture. Not simple, ignorant, and barbarous as some would insist, cannibals live in harmony with nature, employ useful and virtuous skills, and enjoy a perfect religious life and governmental system. Instead, it is the European who has bastardized nature and her works, while the so-called savage lives in a state of purity. Much like American author Herman Melville, who later chronicled his life among the cannibals in Typee: A Peep at Polynesian Life (1846), Montaigne sees more barbarous behavior among his immediate neighbors.

As evidence, Montaigne cites everything from language usage to architecture. The cannibals have, he says, no words for lying, treachery, dissimulation, avarice, envy, and other vices. They have no slaves, no distinctions between rich and poor, and no mania for owning things. They live in a land of plenty, eat only one meal a day, and spend the whole day dancing. Their religious and ethical beliefs are admirably simple. They believe in the immortality of the soul, in a kind of heaven and hell, and in divine prophecy. They have, in fact, tribal prophets who, if they fail to prophesy correctly, are immediately put to the sword, a swift justice that Montaigne does not condemn, for false prophets should be severely punished. As for their priests, they daily preach only two virtues: love and courage.

In wars with nations beyond their territory, the cannibals know neither fear nor cowardice even though their battles often end in bloodshed. Each man brings back the head of an enemy as a trophy and hangs it over the entrance of his dwelling. The enemy prisoners brought back are slain and eaten, not for nourishment but for revenge. Such behavior has earned for them the name “savages,” but Montaigne sees more savagery in the European practices of torturing or burning alive—and, what is worse, doing it in the name of religion. While the cannibals clearly violate rules of reasonable behavior, Montaigne concludes, the Europeans surpass them in every kind of barbarity and cruelty.

There is little doubt that Montaigne romanticizes “the noble savage” in his essay, as authors were to do for centuries afterward, but he is one of the first great thinkers to question the Eurocentric view of human behavior, the notion that the standard for human behavior is white, Christian, and European. While it is doubtless true that he idealizes the life of Brazilian tribal peoples, nonetheless he sees the dignity, nobility, intelligence, and harmony of their lives. He forces the readers to confront themselves and their own social behavior; as Montaigne notes, there is such a distance in character between the cannibals and his audience that either the cannibals are savages or his readers are. Montaigne tries hard throughout his essay to find fault with the cannibals’ behavior and way of life but can offer only one, slightly humorous, observation: They do not wear trousers.

“APOLOGY FOR RAYMOND SEBOND”

First published: “Apologie de Raimond Sebond,” 1580 (collected in Complete Works: Essays, Travel Journal, Letters, 1957)

Type of work: Essay

People are incapable of true knowledge, for they exist in an eternal flux while truth is immutable and unchanging.

Raymond Sebond was a fifteenth century Spaniard who taught philosophy and theology at the University of Toulouse, dying there in 1436. His book Theologia naturalis (natural theology) was published posthumously in 1484 and was a popular success in France. It argues for the truths of Christianity on the basis of the natural world—the book of nature—and Sebond claims that God is in evidence in the Creation more than in theology or Scripture.

The “Apology for Raymond Sebond” is three times as long as any other essay that Montaigne wrote, and it is by far his most puzzling work. Supposedly a defense of Sebond’s Christian doctrine, the essay has been seen as an attack on authoritarian religion and a covert undermining of Christian faith. Less than one-tenth of the essay defends Sebond’s ideas at all. Primarily, the work argues the impotence of human reason and humanity’s inability to determine truth, set as a counterargument to a group of Sebond’s critics.

Montaigne begins with the first objection to Sebond’s theology—that the divine can be conceived only by faith, not by human intelligence. Montaigne admits that faith is more apt to solve the mysteries of religion than reason, yet humans seem improperly suited to divine faith. Humankind’s often immoral behavior testifies to the inability of faith alone to raise it above itself. Faith must be accompanied by ideas and reasonings in order to set humanity on the road to knowledge, to make it capable of the grace of God.

It is at this point that Montaigne addresses the issue of human knowledge, the heart of the essay, and his reflections reveal a deep despair about the human condition, an undercurrent of pessimism found in such other Renaissance works as William Shakespeare’s Hamlet, Prince of Denmark (pr. c. 1600-1601, pb. 1603) and John Donne’s sermons and devotions. Humankind is a puny and miserable creature, swollen with vanity, who calls itself master of the universe while unable even to master its own passions and weaknesses. Viewing itself as the equal of God, it is actually no better than an animal. “When I play with my cat,” Montaigne says, “who knows if I am not a pastime to her more than she is to me?” Citing the Renaissance notion of the Great Chain of Being, an orderly universe in which each thing is in its properly fixed place, Montaigne insists that there is a natural order that constrains and limits humanity’s vain ambitions to become a god, and that people must be forced to accept the barriers of this order.

If people are made in God’s image, then God is, like them, an animal. If He is an animal, then He has a body, and if He has a body, then He is also subject to corruption. However, if God has no body, then He has no soul, for the soul exists only in the body. This paradox is unthinkable to Montaigne. Similarly, if a person has a divine soul that knows all things, then it would at least know itself, if nothing more than its outward body. Montaigne sees medical doctors everywhere disputing even simple matters of human anatomy, however, and for all its science, arts, and learning, humanity knows very little about itself. Therefore, Montaigne concludes, the human mind can never penetrate the dark recesses of hidden truth. Learning consists of nothing more than an infinite confusion of opinions, and people are in agreement about nothing. They can never know truth.

The ultimate truth is knowledge of God, and at the end of the essay, Montaigne more or less returns to Sebond, adding a few paragraphs stating that humankind is nothing without God and that God must lend a helping hand if humans are to attain knowledge of Him. By then, however, it is too late. Montaigne has raised profound questions about humankind, God, and human knowledge, and his candid reasoning has led him (and the reader) to unsettling conclusions.

SUMMARY

Michel de Montaigne's place in the history of world literature has been secure for more than four hundred years. He is not only the father of the modern essay form but also a writer of singular artistry who has been admired down through the centuries by such noted authors as Lord Byron, Gustave Flaubert, Thomas Carlyle, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Virginia Woolf, André Gide, T. S. Eliot, and many others. His epigrammatic style makes him an often-quoted author, while the clarity of diction, the balanced phrasing, and the proper words in proper order make his statements ring with truth and stay in the mind.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What does the etymology of the word “essay” reveal about the intentions of Michel Eyquem de Montaigne?
- Francis Bacon was a contemporary of Montaigne and is also famous for writing essays. How do Bacon's essays differ from those of Montaigne?
- What does Montaigne tell the reader in “Of Cannibals”?
- In an essay called “On the Inconsistency of Our Actions,” Montaigne tells readers that they must examine their “innermost recesses,” but then he calls this activity “high and hazardous” and judges that it would be better if “fewer people meddled with it.” Can you resolve Montaigne's own inconsistency here?
- Montaigne tells readers that “It is myself I portray.” This does not seem like an unusual activity today. What made it unusual in the late sixteenth century?

“Free association artistically controlled—this is the paradoxical secret of Montaigne's best essays,” said British novelist and essayist Aldous Huxley. “One damned thing after another—but in a sequence that in some almost miraculous way develops a central theme and relates it to the rest of human experience.” Perhaps the American essayist Emerson summarized him best: Montaigne is “never dull, never insincere, and has the genius to make the reader care for all that he cares for.”

Kenneth Seib

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

NONFICTION:

Essais, books 1-2, 1580; books 1-2 revised, 1582; books 1-3, 1588; books 1-3 revised, 1595 (The Essays, 1603)
Journal du voyage, 1774 (Travel Journal, 1842)
Complete Works: Essays, Travel Journal, Letters, 1957

TRANSLATION:

La Théologie naturelle, 1569 (of Raymond de Sebond's Theologia naturalis)

About the Author

Bloom, Harold, ed. Michel de Montaigne. New York: Chelsea House, 1987.
_____. Montaigne's Essays. New York: Chelsea House, 1987.
Burke, Peter. Montaigne. New York: Oxford University Press, 1981.
Emerson, Ralph Waldo. "Montaigne: Or, The Skeptic." In Representative Men: Seven Lectures. Boston: Philips, Sampson, 1850. Reprint. New York: Modern Library, 2004.
Frame, Donald. Montaigne: A Biography. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1965.
Hartle, Ann. Michel de Montaigne: Accidental Philosopher. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
Hoffmann, George, ed. The New Biographical Criticism. Charlottesville, Va.: Rockwood Press, 2004.
Langer, Ullrich, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Montaigne. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
Levine, Alan. Sensual Philosophy: Toleration, Skepticism, and Montaigne's Politics of the Self. Lanham, Md.: Lexington Books, 2001.
Regosin, Richard L. The Matter of My Book: Montaigne's "Essays" as the Book of the Self. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1977.
Tetel, Marcel. Montaigne. Rev. ed. Boston: Twayne, 1990.

Courtesy, Archives of Ontario

L. M. MONTGOMERY

Born: Clifton, Prince Edward Island, Canadian Maritime Province (now New London, Prince Edward Island, Canada)
November 30, 1874

Died: Toronto, Ontario, Canada
April 24, 1942

A pioneer in developing novel series about young girls' coming-of-age, including her novels about Anne of Green Gables, Montgomery emphasizes imagination, ambition, and education, along with conventional social graces and domestic skills.

BIOGRAPHY

Although descended from prominent Canadian families, Lucy Maud Montgomery considered herself an orphan and outsider. Shortly after Lucy's birth, her mother, Clara, developed tuberculosis, and the Montgomerys moved to the Macneill farm near Cavendish (the model for Avonlea) to live with Clara's parents, Lucy and Alexander Macneill. When Montgomery was about two, Clara died; her wake remained Montgomery's most vivid early memory.

For years, Montgomery's father, Hugh, traveled on business, leaving Montgomery to be raised primarily by the Macneills. Supposedly, her paternal grandfather, Donald Montgomery, was a talented storyteller, but the Macneills were strict disciplinarians. Montgomery was unhappy, except during visits to a cousin's farm (the model for Green Gables). She attended the local school (the model for Avonlea School), where she competed for top honors with Nate Lockhart (a possible model for her character Gilbert Blythe).

After Hugh settled in Saskatchewan and remarried, Montgomery, now fifteen, went to live with his new family. Although her comments about her father were always positive, emphasizing his loving treatment of her, she seemed to feel that her stepmother treated her as a servant, making her miss school to babysit her young siblings. She also was homesick for Prince Edward Island, so after a year she returned to live with the Macneills.

A positive result of Montgomery's homesickness was her poem "On Cape LeForce," published in the Daily Patriot, a newspaper in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, when she was sixteen. She published several additional poems in other regional newspapers, and her career as a writer was launched, though success as a novelist would come much later.

Montgomery first became a schoolteacher. She attended Prince of Wales College in Charlottetown, completing the two-year teacher certification course in one year. The next year she studied literature at Dalhousie University in Halifax. During Montgomery's first teaching job, in a fishing village, she was briefly engaged to someone she later said she respected but did not love. The next year she taught in a farming community, boarding with the Leard family. Montgomery fell in love with their son, Herman, but considered the match unsuitable. Herman's death from influenza two years later may have inspired the account of Anne's despair when Gilbert nearly dies of influenza in Anne of the Island (1915).

Montgomery returned to Cavendish after her grandfather's death in 1898. When a cousin agreed to live with her grandmother, however, Montgomery moved to Halifax and worked for the Echo, the evening edition of the Chronicle, from 1901 to 1902.

Although she enjoyed newspaper work, she eventually returned to Cavendish to care for her ailing grandmother, remaining there until her grandmother died.

In Cavendish, Montgomery met the local Presbyterian minister, Ewen MacDonald, to whom she became engaged in 1906. They did not marry until 1911 because Montgomery refused to leave her grandmother. Shortly after their marriage, MacDonald accepted a post at Leaskdale Manse in Uxbridge, Ontario where their three children were born: Chester Cameron in 1912; Hugh Alexander, stillborn in 1914; and Ewan Stuart in 1915. The family remained at Leaskdale Manse until 1926. Ewen MacDonald began suffering from depression and left the ministry in 1935. The couple then settled in Toronto in a house Montgomery called Journey's End.

Montgomery received many honors. She was the first Canadian woman to join the British Royal Society of Arts, she was a fellow of the Literary and Artistic Institute of France, and in 1935 she became an Officer of the Order of the British Empire. In 1937, Canada honored her by creating the Green Gables Heritage Site at the Prince Edward Island National Park.

Despite Montgomery's publishing success, her later life was difficult. Like many of her contemporaries, she was deeply disturbed by World War I, but more significant were her copyright battles with the L. C. Page Company and her husband's continuing mental problems. On April 24, 1942, she died of congestive heart failure. In 1943, Canada declared Montgomery a person of historic significance.

ANALYSIS

Montgomery's strength is her ability to create female characters, especially preadolescent females. Generations of readers have recognized themselves and their acquaintances in Anne and her friends: ladylike Diana, flirtatious Jane, malicious Josie, and the loyal Gilbert. Most appealing, though, is Anne, whose concerns are those common to young girls. Anne wants to be pretty but realizes that Diana, with dark hair and dimples, more nearly resembles the ideal beauties in romantic novels. Anne considers her red hair and freckles a liability, though she believes the shape of her nose to be an asset. In Anne of the Island, Anne, now in her twenties, finally learns that there are several types of beauty, and her lively personality and slender figure make people forget that she is not conventionally beautiful.

Anne also resembles Montgomery's young readers in her desire to be accepted at Avonlea. Initially, Anne cannot remember when she was not a lonely outsider; she has developed a vivid imagination to fill her surroundings with companionship and compensate for her feeling of not belonging. She talks incessantly to fill awkward silences and win friends.

Until the Cuthberts adopt Anne, no one has tried to teach her manners, and she has spent little time in school. Thus, she seems almost a child of nature, acting and speaking impulsively, then apologizing profusely for her mistakes. Because adults and classmates realize that she is good-hearted, she makes friends quickly; her successes become models for Montgomery's young readers.

Anne's most modern characteristic is her ambition, especially her drive to gain an education. Determined to be at the head of her class, she works hard to achieve her goals, winning prestigious scholarships and teaching to earn money for her degree. The adult females whom Anne knows are less fully developed characters. Many are somewhat stereotypical or essentially passive until Anne enters their lives. For example, Marilla is a conventional reticent spinster; though her affection for Anne grows quickly, she has difficulty expressing emotion or laughing. Rachel Lynde initially is the typical neighborhood busybody, but acquaintance with Anne helps her develop a sense of humor.

Anne's schoolmates also generally are less complex personalities than she. In childhood, Diana follows Anne's lead, but almost immediately Anne realizes their adult lives will take different paths. Diana will always be loyal, but she lacks Anne's imagination or ambition. In contrast, Philippa, Anne's college friend, also possesses imagination and intellectual ambition; in fact, she may be the model for the protagonists of other Montgomery series.

Montgomery's male characters also are relatively conventional. Davy Keith is the typical mischievous small boy, and Paul Irving, the most fully developed of Montgomery's young boys, seems little more than Anne's masculine alter ego. Even Gilbert Blythe, Anne's patient schoolmate and suitor, demonstrates little character complexity. Because Anne does not see him clearly, the reader also does not, and he remains more or less one-dimensional.

Montgomery portrays three father surrogates in some detail. Matthew Cuthbert in Anne of Green Gables (1908) becomes Anne's confidant, though he does not always understand her imaginative flights and fancy rhetoric; until his death, he is her most loyal advocate. In Anne of Avonlea (1909), Mr. Harrison occupies a similar paternal role, advising Anne about her writing, teaching, and civic improvement projects. Perhaps the most appealing of these characters, though, is Captain Jim in Anne's House of Dreams (1917), who not only entertains with tales of maritime adventures but also helps Anne deal with the loss of her first child.

For Montgomery's preadolescent readers, however, the series' real appeal is the ongoing romantic theme. Like most young girls, Anne and Diana fantasize about ideal romantic suitors, but Diana is content to marry their childhood chum. Likewise, instead of the rich, handsome husband she envisioned, Philippa marries a poor, ugly clergyman. Even Anne, whose romantic dreams appear to come true, realizes that extravagant romantic gestures are less important than compatibility in personality and goals. Especially throughout the Anne novels, Montgomery implicitly comments on how a young woman should choose an appropriate husband.

If youthful readers see Anne as someone they would like to know or become, adult readers are drawn to Montgomery's lyrical descriptions of the Avonlea landscape, and each year many readers travel to Prince Edward Island. From Anne's special apple tree to the echoes at Echo Cottage, Montgomery gives readers mental pictures of the natural environment Anne loves, and Anne's imaginative language adds to readers' appreciation of trees, brooks, and even a pond. The more mature Anne no longer names each landscape feature, but she still appreciates quaint little cottages and the gardens surrounding them. In Anne's House of Dreams, Montgomery describes in detail Anne's view of the seascape at different times of day and in different weather. Anne gains peace viewing the sea, the rocks along the shoreline, and Captain Jim's lighthouse. In her novels, Montgomery only sketchily describes cities, even towns; like Anne, she seems to find contentment in the physical landscape, perhaps because she shares Anne's love of nature.

ANNE OF GREEN GABLES

First published: 1908

Type of work: Novel

Anne of Green Gables chronicles the six years between Anne's arrival in Avonlea as an outsider and her completion of her first-class teaching license.

Montgomery's journal for 1904 contains the germ for her first published novel, Anne of Green Gables: An elderly couple intend to adopt a young boy, but the orphanage sends a young girl instead. Spinster Marilla Cuthbert and her brother Matthew decide to adopt an orphan boy to help Matthew with chores. Complications occur when Matthew, a shy bachelor, is completely overwhelmed by the imaginative girl waiting at the train station. Anne talks all the way to Green Gables, explaining how imagination helps her cope with the unpleasantness of life as an orphan; she creates personalities for trees, brooks, ponds, even a geranium at the doorstep, giving each an imaginative name. This love of nature seems excessive to many in Avonlea, but Matthew is charmed, insisting that she remain. Anne declares Matthew the first "kindred spirit" she encounters in Avonlea.

Eventually, Marilla decides Providence sent Anne to Green Gables. She never completely understands Anne, and she has difficulty expressing affection, but Marilla's pride in and love for Anne grow throughout the novel. Seeing her role as disciplinarian, Marilla allows Matthew to spoil Anne, while she tries to inculcate religious principles, etiquette, and a degree of practicality, but she too insists that Anne have the best life the Cuthberts can afford.

Impetuous and quick-tempered, Anne must learn tact, restraint, and etiquette before she moves from outsider to part of the community. Her hasty words and rash actions offend adults like Mrs. Lynde and Josephine Barry, Diana's rich, elderly aunt, but Anne's profuse, heartfelt apologies charm the injured parties.

Anne also learns that problems can result from carelessness. The special cake she bakes for the new pastor and his wife is seasoned with anodyne liniment instead of vanilla because Anne has not checked the bottle's contents. In a similar mix-up, she serves Diana currant wine instead of raspberry cordial; though neither girl recognizes what is happening, Diana becomes drunk, and only Anne's dramatic rescue of Diana's younger sister reconciles Mrs. Barry to their continued friendship.

Anne considers Diana a kindred spirit but recognizes her "bosom friend's" more limited imagination. It is Anne who tells stories of the Haunted Wood, making both of them scared to walk there alone after dark. Anne also nearly drowns when she decides to dramatize the story of Elaine, the lily maid, using a flatboat on the creek. Fortunately, Gilbert rescues her.

Anne's relationship with Gilbert is a continuing plot line. Her pride prevents acceptance of his attempts at friendship, and his pride will not allow him to continue trying. Their classmates believe they will eventually reconcile and marry; Marilla secretly hopes that the son of her one-time beau will someday marry her adopted daughter. For Anne, though, the presence of Gilbert spurs her ambition, making her determined to win the highest academic honors and give the most effective dramatic readings. The two become friends only at the novel's end, when Gilbert gives up the Avonlea school so Anne can teach there and help Marilla save Green Gables.

Despite Matthew's death and Marilla's failing eyesight, the novel ends on an upbeat note as Anne renounces her scholarship to Redmond College, taking the teaching job in Avonlea. Anne says she is staying because she loves Green Gables; in fact, she also loves Marilla and feels responsibility toward her. Realizing Gilbert's sacrifice, Anne approaches him and apologizes for her stubbornness. The two agree to study together to prepare for Redmond.

ANNE OF AVONLEA

First published: 1909

Type of work: Novel

Anne of Avonlea chronicles Anne's two years teaching in Avonlea, helping Marilla, raising the orphaned Keith twins, and founding the Avonlea Village Improvement Society.

Returning to Avonlea, Anne immediately finds herself at odds with a neighbor, Mr. Harrison, because her cow repeatedly breaks into his fields. Harrison, one of Montgomery's eccentric older men, is soon charmed by Anne, becoming a trusted friend and adviser. He is also helpful in Anne's efforts to curb the boyhood pranks of Davy Keith.

Marilla agrees to keep her friend's six-year-old twins until their uncle returns. Davy and Dora Keith repeat the pattern of Anne and Diana. Davy is impetuous, as Anne was, and quite a bit more mischievous, locking Dora in a toolshed, ruining pies Anne has made for an important luncheon, and breaking Miss Barry's willowware platter; periodically he insists that he simply cannot behave, and he pesters Anne with dozens of outlandish questions. In contrast, Dora is pretty, neat, and so well-behaved that even Marilla finds her monotonous.

Davy's nemesis is Paul Irving, Anne's favorite student and an imaginative kindred spirit whose mother is dead. His father lives in Boston, so Paul is living with his grandmother. When Anne introduces him to Miss Lavendar Lewis of Echo Lodge, the two become friends immediately.

Miss Lavendar is the first of Montgomery's middle-aged brides who eventually reconcile with the beau of their youth. She lives alone in a charming cottage in the woods; her only companions are the echoes when she rings a dinner bell and a succession of servant girls respond, all of whom she calls Charlotta. After Paul writes his father about her, Stephen Irving returns to be reunited with his boyhood sweetheart. Their marriage is this novel's climax. Paul rings the bell, the echoes become wedding bells, and Paul has the "new" mother he has wanted.

Now good friends, Anne and Gilbert Blythe work together to form the Avonlea Village Improvement Society and make Avonlea more beautiful. As a practical joke, they publish predictions in the newspaper. Amazingly, their predictions come true. A new resident is married, though actually Harrison (the new resident) is already married and simply reconciles with his estranged wife. Another item mocks Uncle Abe's prophecies of severe thunderstorms. Uncle Abe has never been right before, but this time a storm destroys Avonlea's crops.

Anne's friendship with Diana continues, although Diana becomes engaged and Anne feels somewhat left out. Anne's misadventures likewise continue. Her town hall improvement project results in the building being painted a vivid blue; she inadvertently dyes her nose red when she meets a famous writer she admires; and searching for a replacement for Miss Barry's platter, she winds up falling through the roof of a virtual stranger's duck house. Anne has grown up, but her impetuous nature still gets her into trouble.

As the novel ends, Montgomery prepares for a sequel. Rachel Lynde's husband dies, so she moves in with Marilla. Richard Keith dies, leaving money for the twins' care. Anne has saved enough money for one year of college, and Marilla offers money for a second. Gilbert tries to tell Anne of his love, but Anne refuses to be more than friends; thus, the suspense involving their relationship continues.

ANNE OF THE ISLAND

First published: 1915

Type of work: Novel

Anne of the Island chronicles Anne's four years of personal and academic success at Redmond College and her various marriage proposals.

As Anne of the Island begins, Anne half-reluctantly leaves Avonlea. Fortunately, Priscilla Grant and Gilbert Blythe are also traveling to Redmond. Anne and Priscilla soon meet Philippa Gordon, whose major personality trait is inability to decide anything. These three and Stella, a friend from Queen's College, decide the next year they will rent a house with Stella's Aunt Jamesina as their housekeeper and chaperone. Anne notices a "To Let" sign on Patty's Place, a quaint cottage in an exclusive neighborhood. When the girls inquire, Anne's impetuous declaration that she "loves" the house causes Miss Patty to rent it to them at a reduced price, and Anne happily heads for Avonlea.

In Avonlea, though, Anne no longer feels completely at home. After all her romantic dreams about her first marriage proposal, she is astounded when a childhood friend proposes for her brother. Courtship and marriage are a key theme in this novel. Over the next three years, several other proposals follow, including one from Gilbert, but Anne rejects them all. When she meets Roy Gardner, she thinks he is her romantic ideal, and she anticipates accepting his proposal. At that moment, however, she suddenly realizes the superficiality of her girlhood fantasies, so she rejects Roy also.

Meanwhile, Anne succeeds academically, winning a scholarship that funds a year of college. An inheritance from Miss Josephine pays for the remainder. As usual, Anne's primary competition is Gilbert, but Philippa is also at the head of the class. At year's end, Philippa finally chooses her husband—a poor clergyman. She acknowledges he does not fit her preconceived ideas, but significantly her answer to Anne's teasing is that Anne does not know what true love is. For the second time, Anne is a bridesmaid.

Much of the humor in this novel comes from the letters of Davy and Rachel Lynde. Davy continues to ask dozens of outlandish questions, and Mrs. Lynde describes incidents, such as the time the new minister, coming to the back door, is knocked down by a stray hog.

Anne's writing career begins when she submits a romantic story from her student days in Avonlea. After several rejections, she decides to quit writing, but Diana secretly submits Anne's story to a contest sponsored by a baking powder company. Anne is humiliated when her story wins first prize and wide publicity; Diana cannot understand Anne's attitude, especially since she won twenty-five dollars. Later, heeding Harrison's advice, Anne submits a sketch about falling through the duck house roof. The editor accepts it, asking to see more of her work.

The middle-aged romance in this novel involves Janet Sweet, Anne's landlady during her summer teaching. Anne recognizes the true love between Janet and John Douglas, her beau of twenty years. Despite Anne's meddling, John finally proposes, and Janet accepts.

As the novel concludes, Anne feels isolated from her childhood friends: Jane marries a millionaire and Diana gives birth to a son. Then hearing that Gilbert is dying, Anne suddenly realizes she has always loved him. When she learns that he is recovering, she fears that he no longer loves her, but taking her to their special childhood haunt, he proposes. She accepts, agreeing to postpone marriage until he completes his medical education in three years.

SUMMARY

L. M. Montgomery published more than thirty novels for children and adults, an autobiography, more than four hundred individual poems, and more than five hundred short stories, in addition to other works. Montgomery's favorite books were her novels The Story Girl (1911) and Emily of New Moon (1923), but readers are better acquainted with the Anne novels, which were the subject of a Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) television musical in the 1950's, a popular play in the 1970's, a widely distributed film released in 1985, and a television series that aired in 2000.

For generations of preadolescent girls, Anne has been a role model, embodying characteristics Montgomery wanted readers to emulate. Montgomery also seems to have been drawn to Anne, repeating many elements of Anne's personality in the protagonists of both her adult and young adult novels, and in the last novel published during her lifetime, Anne of Ingleside (1939), she returned to Anne and her children.

Charmaine Allmon Mosby

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

CHILDREN'S/YOUNG ADULT LITERATURE:

- Anne of Green Gables*, 1908
- Anne of Avonlea*, 1909
- Kilmeny of the Orchard*, 1910
- The Story Girl*, 1911
- Chronicles of Avonlea*, 1912
- The Golden Road*, 1913
- Anne of the Island*, 1915
- Anne's House of Dreams*, 1917
- Rainbow Valley*, 1919
- Further Chronicles of Avonlea*, 1920
- Rilla of Ingleside*, 1921
- Emily of New Moon*, 1923
- Emily Climbs*, 1925
- Emily's Quest*, 1927
- Magic for Marigold*, 1927
- Pat of Silverbush*, 1933
- Mistress Pat*, 1935
- Anne of Windy Poptars*, 1936

L. M. Montgomery

Jane of Lantern Hill, 1937

Anne of Ingleside, 1939

The Road to Yesterday, 1974

The Doctor's Sweetheart, and Other Stories, 1979

Akin to Anne: Tales of Other Orphans, 1988 (Rea Wilmhurst, editor)

Along the Shore: Tales by the Sea, 1989 (Wilmhurst, editor)

Among the Shadows: Tales from the Darker Side, 1990 (Wilmhurst, editor)

After Many Days: Tales of Time Passed, 1991 (Wilmhurst, editor)

Against the Odds: Tales of Achievement, 1993 (Wilmhurst, editor)

At the Altar: Matrimonial Tales, 1994 (Wilmhurst, editor)

Across the Miles: Tales of Correspondence, 1995 (Wilmhurst, editor)

Christmas with Anne, and Other Holiday Stories, 1995 (Wilmhurst, editor)

LONG FICTION:

The Blue Castle, 1926

A Tangled Web, 1931

POETRY:

The Watchman, and Other Poems, 1916

The Poetry of Lucy Maud Montgomery, 1987 (John Ferns and Kevin McCabe, editors)

NONFICTION:

The Alpine Path: The Story of My Career, 1917 (serial), 1974 (book)

The Green Gables Letters from L. M. Montgomery to Ephraim Weber, 1905-1909, 1960 (Wilfred Eggleston, editor)

My Dear Mr. M.: Letters to G. B. MacMillan, 1980 (Francis W. P. Bolger and Elizabeth Epperly, editors)

Selected Journals of L. M. Montgomery, Vol. I: 1889-1910, 1985 (Mary Rubio and Elizabeth Waterston, editors)

Selected Journals of L. M. Montgomery, Vol. II: 1910-1921, 1987 (Rubio and Waterston, editors)

Selected Journals of L. M. Montgomery, Vol. III: 1921-1929, 1992 (Rubio and Waterston, editors)

Selected Journals of L. M. Montgomery, Vol. IV: 1929-1942, 1997 (Rubio and Waterston, editors)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- The Anne series by L. M. Montgomery traces the relationship between Anne and Gilbert, from their initial childhood meeting through their education to their eventual marriage. At the same time, Anne repeatedly hears stories of women who have quarreled with fiancés and allowed pride to ruin their lives. How are these stories similar to, and different from, Anne's story?
- Although conforming to conventional social rules of the early twentieth century, Anne seems surprisingly modern, especially in her independence and ambition. Illustrate these personality traits with examples from the series.
- When Anne's impulsiveness gets her into awkward situations, she usually can extricate herself using her verbal skills and ability to gauge other people's personalities. How do these talents help her gain community acceptance, win respect from her students, and achieve other goals?
- Anne's imagination usually improves her circumstances, but occasionally she carries it a bit too far. Cite examples of both the positive and negative results of Anne's imagination.
- In Anne of Avonlea, Anne is teaching in the village school. How are her students like her schoolmates in the first novel? How are they different? Specifically, how do Marilla's foster children, Davy and Dora, resemble Anne and Diana?
- The Anne series chronicles several of Anne's life stages. How does Anne change, and how does she remain the same, at the various stages? In what ways does her life resemble Montgomery's?

About the Author

Beyond Green Gables: The Life of Lucy Maud Montgomery http://archives.cbc.ca/IDD-1-68-1630/arts\_entertainment/lucy\_maud\_montgomery/.

Bruce, Harry. Maud: The Early Years of L. M. Montgomery. Halifax, N.S.: Nimbus, 2003.

Gammel, Irene, ed. The Intimate Life of L. M. Montgomery. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2005.

_____. Making Avonlea: L. M. Montgomery and Popular Culture. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2002.

Gammel, Irene, and Elizabeth Epperly, eds. L. M. Montgomery and Canadian Culture. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2006.

Heilbron, Alexandra. Remembering Lucy Maud Montgomery. Toronto: Dundurn Press, 2001.

Reimer, Mavis, ed. Such a Simple Little Tale: Critical Responses to L. M. Montgomery's "Anne of Green Gables." Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 2003.

Wiggins, Genevieve. L. M. Montgomery. Twayne: New York, 1992.

JOHN MORTIMER

Born: London, England
April 21, 1923

In novels, short stories, and plays for the stage, television, and radio, Mortimer creates characters and plots that deftly combine humor, mystery, and social commentary.

BIOGRAPHY

John Clifford Mortimer was born in London, England, on April 21, 1923, the only child of Kathleen May Smith Mortimer and Clifford Mortimer, a barrister. Reared in London and at his parents' country home in Oxfordshire, young Mortimer was educated at the Dragon School in Oxford, Harrow in Middlesex, and Brasenose College, Oxford. His weak eyesight exempted him from military service during World War II. Instead, he worked as an assistant director and scriptwriter with the Crown Film Unit, which made documentaries and training films. His first novel, Charade (1947), is based on this wartime experience.

In 1948, he began practicing law in London as a barrister in divorce cases. The following year he married novelist Penelope Fletcher. When they were divorced in 1972, he wed Penelope Gollop. He had two children from each marriage, and in 2004 acknowledged a son, raised as Ross Bentley, by actress Wendy Craig. After becoming Queen's Counsel in 1966, he dealt mainly in criminal law, often arguing for the defense in censorship cases, and partly through his efforts the Lord Chamberlain's authority to censor plays was abolished by the Theatre Act of 1968. Made master of the bench, Inner Temple, London, in 1975, Mortimer pursued two careers, one in law and the other in literature, until he retired from the former in 1986 to write full time.

Having written five novels by 1954, the next year he turned to a different genre, the radio play, adapting his novel Like Men Betrayed (1953). Mortimer's first original drama for radio, The Dock Brief (1957), won the Italia Prize in 1958, the same year he debuted as a stage dramatist with a double bill consisting of a revised version of The Dock Brief (pb. 1958) and What Shall We Tell Caroline? (pb.

1958), the first play he wrote specifically for the theater. Over the next two decades, he not only wrote radio plays but also created original scripts and adaptations for motion pictures and television. He did his most important work, however, for the stage, primarily comedies of manners and sex farces, a number of them one-act plays in the manner of Anton Chekhov. The autobiographical A Voyage Round My Father (pr. 1963, radio play, 1970, staged, pb. 1971) is his major play, and he adapted it for television in 1982. A year earlier, his multi-episode television version of Evelyn Waugh's novel Brideshead Revisited (1945, 1959) was acclaimed on both sides of the Atlantic; later, however, it was revealed that though he was credited as writer, his scripts were not used.

By the 1980's, Mortimer had for the most part stopped writing original works for the stage, though he continued to do translations and adaptations, including A Little Hotel on the Side (pr. 1984, pb. 1985), a farce by Georges Feydeau and Maurice Desvalliers; the opera Die Fledermaus (pb. 1989, pr. 1990); and Charles Dickens's A Christmas Carol (pr. 1994, pb. 1995). In 2001, however, he returned to writing original stage plays with Naked Justice (pr., pb. 2001), about inadequacies in the judicial system, and Hock and Soda Water (pr., pb. 2001), a nostalgic reverie on old age. He also interviewed public figures for The Sunday Times of London and published two collections of these pieces, In Character (1983) and Character Parts (1986). In addition, he wrote four memoirs, Clinging to the Wreckage: A Part of Life (1982), Murderers and Other Friends: Another Part of Life (1994), The Summer of a Dormouse (2000), and Where There's a Will (2003; published in the United States as Where There's a Will: Thoughts on the Good Life, 2005).

In the mid-1970's, Mortimer began a series of witty detective stories about barrister Horace Rumpole, which he adapted for television. Partly due to actor Leo McKern's characterization, the series and the stories became widely popular. Mortimer also created Under the Hammer (1993), a television series featuring two employees of an art auction house who become part-time sleuths; it, too, was written both as short stories and teleplays, but had limited success. After a break of almost thirty years, Mortimer resumed writing serious novels, the first of which was Paradise Postponed (1985). Mortimer wrote this novel after Thames Television asked him to write a teleplay about post-World War II England. Rather than adapt someone else's book, Mortimer decided to write his own novel and then adapt it; the result was Paradise Postponed. Both the novel and teleplay were favorably received by British and American readers and viewers and led to a sequel, Titmuss Regained (1990), again written as a novel and television miniseries. As in Mortimer's early novels, the plots of these Rapstone Chronicles include mysteries and detection.

Such is also the case in the non-Rumpole fiction he has written since the mid-1980's. Summer's Lease (1988) is about an English family that rents an Italian villa and becomes involved in the strange circumstances surrounding the absent owners. (Mortimer wrote a four-part television adaptation of this novel in 1989.) Though some events in Dunster (1992) also occur in Italy, it takes place primarily in familiar Mortimer milieus: a corporate board room, an English country house, and a London law court. Felix in the Underworld (1997) is about a novelist who joins the ranks of the homeless to escape a woman who claims he fathered her illegitimate son, though Felix's publicist thinks news of a former mistress and illegitimate son would help book sales. In The Sound of Trumpets (1998), Mortimer returned for the third time to Leslie Titmuss, now in his fifties and a peer officially retired from politics, but still meddling and as unscrupulous as always.

Beyond his work as barrister, playwright, novelist, screenwriter, memoirist, and journalist, Mortimer has served on the National Theatre Board and the boards of the Royal Shakespeare Company and Royal Court Theatre. He was knighted in 1998; that and a painting in the National Portrait Gallery in London are official recognition of his achievements as a literary and cultural figure.

ANALYSIS

Although John Mortimer self-deprecatingly has said that a writer "can only work within that narrow seam which penetrates to the depths of [his] past" and that his own choice of subject matter "was dictated by myself, my childhood, and such education as I was able to gather," his considerable work in several genres reveals an impressively versatile talent. Common thematic strains run through his work: a social conscience that is sometimes iconoclastic, but less interested in destroying institutions than in reforming them; sympathy for the underdog or outcast, among the aristocracy as well as the criminal class; the intrusion of the past upon the present; the conflict between business and traditional social attitudes; and a concern with what he has called "the tottering course of British middle-class attitudes in decline." Further, in almost everything, he tempers seriousness with humor, believing that "this despairing world . . . is far too serious to be described in terms that give us no opportunity to laugh." In this regard, he echoes such acknowledged mentors as Charles Dickens, Anthony Trollope, and P. G. Wodehouse.

Despite his beliefs and activities regarding stage censorship, Mortimer's own plays do not test prevailing boundaries of propriety. He has not boldly experimented with form and style; he is a traditionalist rather than an innovator. This makes him unlike many of his contemporaries in the theater. He often is in step, however, with his peers as far as theme and language are concerned: His atypical social conscience focuses upon people's inability to communicate with each other.

He also has demonstrated the artistic and commercial viability of the one-act comedy, of which he has been a diligent practitioner. Some of his short plays, such as the sex farces Mill Hill (pr. 1970, pb. 1971) and Marble Arch (pr. 1970, pb. 1971), are mere whimsies, but others are more substantive, including The Fear of Heaven (pr. 1976, pb. 1978), about two Englishmen dying in an Italian hospital; What Shall We Tell Caroline?; and The Dock Brief. The last two, presented as a 1958 double bill, are sensitive character studies that exemplify Mortimer's practice of celebrating those who are isolated or failures, and he has likened both plays to the surrealist drama of Eugène Ionesco. In What Shall We Tell Caroline?, an overprotected eighteen-year-old girl stoically observes her parents' domestic sparring, but at the end announces her departure for London, where she will live and work, away from the “tormenting, blank silence” of her home. The Dock Brief is about an unsuccessful old barrister randomly selected to defend an accused murderer. After carefully rehearsing trial strategy with his client, he becomes tongue-tied in the courtroom and loses the case. When the judge frees the convicted man because of the barrister’s incompetence, the two misfits take refuge in the rationalization that the counsel’s “dumb tactics” have won the day. Though Mortimer would not begin to think about Rumpole of the Bailey for another fifteen years, this early play foreshadows his later stories and television series, which often show the predatory quality and ineptitude of lawyers, who have, according to Mortimer, “an almost pathetic dependence on the criminal classes, without whom [they] would be unemployed.”

In two full-length plays from the same period, Mortimer also focuses upon the law, both times unfavorably. Two Stars for Comfort (pr., pb. 1962) has as its central character a solicitor turned publican who seduces young girls. The Judge (pr., pb. 1967) is about a jurist whose reputation for severity masks the guilt he suffers for abandoning a presumably pregnant girl years earlier. Returning to his hometown for a last assize before retirement, he asks to be judged rather than to judge. The play is an interesting (though not wholly successful) study of obsession and a disturbing look at the unpredictability of the legal system. Mortimer deals with similar characters and situations in the Rumpole tales, but more lightly, mixing satire and other humorous devices with his mysteries.

His major play is the full-length A Voyage Round My Father, an autobiographical drama that began as a radio play produced in 1963. Aside from its intrinsic merits, it is a landmark work because introspective memory plays are uncommon on the English stage. Having been regularly produced on West End stages, Mortimer was so familiar to English theatergoers that a critic said his “world is consistently and instantly knowable.” However, none of his previous plays had prepared audiences for A Voyage Round My Father, which was first presented at the Greenwich Theatre in 1970 and then, slightly revised, at London’s Haymarket Theatre on August 4, 1971.

When he resumed writing novels after a thirty-year hiatus, Mortimer also produced a family chronicle developed largely through flashbacks. Paradise Postponed and its sequels, Titmuss Regained and The Sound of Trumpets, are social histories that combine the expansive form of the Victorian novel with the mordant satire of Evelyn Waugh. While they reveal their author’s liberal bias, both portray flawed people at all points of the political and social spectrums. Supported by their false myths, even the author’s favorites lie, embrace futile causes, and are self-serving, but Mortimer is a benevolent judge of his saints and sinners, except for Leslie Titmuss, whose deceit and unscrupulous ambition make tolerance and forgiveness impossible. Mortimer’s stance in this regard has been consistent over the decades.

A VOYAGE ROUND MY FATHER

First produced: 1963 (radio play), 1970
(stage play)

Type of work: Play

Through flashbacks focusing on his father, a son creates an affectionate, moving, and funny tribute.

A Voyage Round My Father is an autobiographical memory play comprised of chronological episodes spanning two decades. A reflective narrator links past and present and is a unifying force, participating in the action (as man and boy) and stepping out of it to address the audience. The narrator reveals a symbiotic yet strangely distant and unemotional relationship between the son and his father, a blind barrister. As the title suggests, the son never gets as close to his father as he desired, partly as a result of the blindness, but also because the older man regarded life as a game and built an impenetrable emotional barrier between himself and everyone else, even the wife upon whom he totally depended. Despite his father’s coldness and self-absorption, Mortimer intends A Voyage Round My Father as a loving tribute.

The play starts with the old man having his adult son describe the family garden. After the son as narrator gives the audience some background, the action reverts to the past, with youthful initiation episodes at home and school. When the son must decide upon a profession, the old barrister, who regards the law contemptuously, encourages his boy to choose it, primarily because it will give him spare time for writing. In the second act, the young man is working in a wartime propaganda film unit in lieu of military service; there he falls in love with a married woman. After her divorce, by which time he is a barrister, they marry, but since his income from divorce cases is inadequate, he works part-time for a legal aid society and starts writing plays.

Having been instructed by his father on the nuances of cross-examinations, the son finally wins a major domestic case, though the victor did not deserve to prevail. The son thinks he has become like his father, of whom he says: "He had no message. I think he had no belief. He was the advocate who can take the side that comes to him first and always discover words to anger his opponent." In the last scene, the garden deteriorates as the father dies, and the play concludes with the narrator telling the audience: "I'd been told of all the things you're meant to feel. Sudden freedom, growing up, the end of dependence, the step into the sunlight when no one is taller than you and you're in no one else's shadow. I know what I felt. Lonely." In his 1982 memoir, Mortimer says that after he wrote the play, "a man who had filled so much of my life seemed to have left me and become someone for other people to read about and perform."

Many American memory plays are products of their authors' imaginations, with autobiographical elements presented in highly stylized ways, and Oedipal or other psychological concerns the thematic centerpieces. Mortimer's play, in contrast, is largely reportorial, a kind of personal essay in dramatic form. Further, while he has altered some details, situations and events faithfully represent the past. An atypical work for him in subject matter, its form also departs from the traditional pattern of his other stage works. A Voyage Round My Father, which unequivocally demonstrates his mastery of the full-length serious play, was a critical success, had a 1971 London run of 501 performances, was adapted for television in 1982, and has been subsequently revived.

PARADISE POSTPONED

First published: 1985

Type of work: Novel

The book is a family chronicle, set in post-World War II England, in which a rector disinherits his family and his sons try to learn why.

Paradise Postponed, which Mortimer wrote as a novel and television miniseries, is both a family chronicle and social commentary on England in the decades following World War II. Its conventional form (aside from flashbacks) and some of its plot (such as the prospect of lengthy litigation over a will) bring to mind novels by Dickens and Trollope. Like his nineteenth century predecessors, Mortimer tempers a sometimes poignant story of malaise with wit. Propelling the plot is a mystery that is not unraveled until the end, at which time the full significance of the title becomes clear. The earthly paradise that the main characters strive to achieve remains elusive, even to the one person who seemed to have it within grasp.

The main setting is a seemingly idyllic village, Rapstone Fanner. Rector Simeon Simcox, a socialist whose family owns the local brewery, devotes more time to ban-the-bomb marches and other political works than to his ecclesiastical duties. His wife is patient and indulgent. His older son is a novelist whose idealism Hollywood corrupts. His younger son is a self-effacing idealist, a country doctor who plays with a local jazz combo. The two brothers become involved with the same woman, who becomes pregnant by the younger, marries the older, eventually divorces him, and later rekindles the flame with the younger.

Intertwined with this Simcox saga is that of Leslie Titmuss, whose father is a brewery worker and whose mother was a maid at the local nobleman's home. An amoral social climber, young Titmuss sets his sights on a seat in Parliament and proceeds with guile to attain his goal by surreptitiously engineering the defeat of the incumbent Conservative and setting the stage for his own candidacy in the next election, when he beats the Labourite. He abets his social and political rise by a loveless marriage to homely Charlotte, the nobleman's daughter, which produces a son, Nicky. A few years later, Charlotte is accidentally killed by a police vehicle during a women's demonstration against military weapons.

When the Reverend Simeon Simcox leaves his estate to Titmuss, his sons attempt to learn what motivated a socially conscious leftist to leave everything to a money-hungry Conservative. They believe their father had gone mad, until their mother reveals that Charlotte was Simeon's illegitimate child, and by leaving his estate to Titmuss, grandson Nicky eventually would benefit. A final ironic shock is the revelation that the inherited brewery stock is worthless.

Titmuss, whose ambition leads him to renounce his working-class origins, epitomizes what Mortimer believed was wrong with the United Kingdom that Margaret Thatcher led into the 1980's. The government and Titmuss lacked moral purpose and compassion for the country's poor. Using his political base, Titmuss orchestrates business takeovers and land grabs that destroy others' careers and fortunes, and though styling himself Conservative, his political and financial activities ignore traditional values. At novel's end, he and his kind are in control. In the sequel Titmuss Regained, having moved higher in the government, Titmuss seems to get his comeuppance, but in a third novel in the chronicle, The Sound of Trumpets, he rises again.

RUMPOLE À LA CARTE

First published: 1990

Type of work: Short stories

London barrister Horace Rumpole demonstrates his deductive and legal talents in six comic detective tales, most of whose characters are present in other Rumpole stories.

Mortimer has written numerous comic detective tales featuring defense barrister Horace Rumpole; Rumpole à la Carte is one of the many collections of these stories. Although Rumpole has not become a Queen's Counsel and handles mainly Old Bailey crime cases that his colleagues shun, he is satisfied with his lot, possibly because he almost always bests nominal superiors, including judges and the boorish head of his chambers.

The Rumpole stories, which Mortimer also adapted for television, have at least two complementary plots, courtroom and personal, the latter either a domestic crisis between Rumpole and his wife Hilda ("She Who Must Be Obeyed") or a problem involving the courts or the aging barrister's colleagues. These subplots not only entertain but also further characterize the unlikely hero, who sometimes selflessly rescues the reputations and careers of ambitious younger barristers, and whose insights and slyness enable him to shape people and situations to his own purposes.

In an early story, Rumpole confesses that although he only feels "truly alive and happy in Law Courts, [he has] a singular distaste for the law." Indeed, his advocacy on behalf of mainly worthless clients does not rely as much upon his knowledge of the law as upon his detective skills and ability to judge character, talents that link him to Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's Sherlock Holmes, from whom Rumpole often quotes. Many of the stories, in fact, follow the Sherlockian pattern, which is no surprise, since Mortimer as a child listened to his father recite Holmes's adventures from memory.

The stories in this collection include familiar details from other adventures, such as Rumpole's rejuvenating visits to Pommeroy's Wine Bar, his love for steak and kidney pudding, and his speechifying on behalf of an accused. Several of the tales, though, place the crusty hero in unfamiliar milieus. In the title story, for instance, he confronts "the terrible curse of nouvelle cuisine" in a three-star restaurant to which Hilda's expatriate cousin takes them. Later, the owner-chef, whose food and establishment Rumpole had roundly insulted, hires the barrister to defend him. In "Rumpole at Sea," Hilda books the couple on a two-week cruise over her husband's objections, and among the passengers is one of Rumpole's high court nemeses, Mr. "Miscarriage of Justice" Graves. The adversaries become involved in a shipboard mystery that Graves bungles but Rumpole solves. In "Rumpole for the Prosecution," as the title reveals, he becomes, for the first time in his career, a prosecuting attorney, but even in this murder case his shrewd instincts prevail, and he ends up securing an acquittal for the accused.

Within a format of mystery mixed with humor, Mortimer also presents his insider's view of England's legal system, with its hypocritical barristers and biased, even ignorant, judges. Rumpole, an iconoclast fighting the establishment, sometimes is a nonconformist who upholds his own interests, but more often he struggles on behalf of a kindred soul, also an outsider of some sort.

RUMPOLE AND THE REIGN OF TERROR

First published: 2006

Type of work: Novel

To defend a Pakistani doctor detained as an Al Qaeda operative, Rumpole must overcome new antiterrorism laws, as well as his usual judicial adversaries.

Having written dozens of Rumpole stories, Mortimer in 2004 published his first novel featuring the Old Bailey advocate, Rumpole and the Penge Bungalow Murders, which recalls the early case that made his reputation and incidentally led to marriage with Hilda. Rumpole and the Reign of Terror also is a novel, with Hilda as conarrator and aspiring memoirist. Notwithstanding this new narrative approach, there is much that is familiar from earlier entries in the Rumpole saga: his antiestablishment attitude, especially toward the judiciary; his sympathy for society's outsiders; his almost paternalistic attitude toward the Timsons, the clan of petty thieves who are his frequent clients; and multiple story lines. In addition, recurring characters make cameo appearances: "Soapy Sam" Ballard, Q. C., hapless head of chambers and Rumpole's nominal superior; Claude Erskine-Brown, an ineffectual colleague whose wife's legal career puts his to shame; Ferdinand Ian Gilmour Newton, also known as Fig Newton, Rumpole's private investigator, who always has a cold; and Dodo Mackintosh, Hilda's old school friend and occasional guest, whose dislike of Rumpole is matched by his antipathy toward her.

While defending a Timson client, Rumpole is engaged by another family member, Tiffany Timson Khan, but not to finesse a burglary charge. Rather, her husband, a London physician whose family had emigrated from Pakistan in the 1970's, was arrested as a terrorist and faces indefinite imprisonment. Because of new antiterrorism statutes, the government can withhold information about the case, even potentially exculpatory evidence; thus stymied, Rumpole resorts to unconventional means to develop his defense. Thanks to a fortuitous coincidence, the Old Bailey hack learns potentially embarrassing information about the home secretary, whom he pressures (indeed, blackmails) to remove some of the new legal obstacles in this instance. Thus unfettered, Rumpole embarks upon a vintage courtroom performance and exonerates his wrongly accused client.

Meanwhile, the presiding judge, an erstwhile Rumpole rival, Leonard Bullingham (dubbed "The Mad Bull" by court denizens), who has become Hilda's afternoon bridge partner, starts to woo her and suggests marriage. Domestic subplots, standard in the Rumpole canon, are more than gratuitous diversions. Here, Mortimer reduces a high court judge, Rumpole's present courtroom nemesis, to a would-be seducer of a married woman. Flattered though she is by Bullingham's attention, Hilda's commitment to Rumpole is unwavering; she is as loyal and selfless a spouse as Tiffany and quite the opposite of manipulative and ambitious Benazir Whiteside.

The Hilda narrative also provides a contrasting view of the government's tampering with legal traditions, for Hilda supports actions against the United Kingdom's immigrant population, whom she distrusts. Dr. Khan is a "ghastly terrorist," properly imprisoned, she says, and believes that "most sensible people" agree with her. When Rumpole confronts her with allusions to the Magna Carta and the Bill of Rights, she responds that "there were no suicide bombers and no Al Qaeda when King John signed up to the charter on the island of Runnymede." This contrast between the Rumpoles focuses reader attention upon Mortimer's deeply held belief in liberty and freedom of speech for all.

Having prevailed once again for his clients over hypocrisy and the more powerful, and in this instance over questionable laws, Rumpole the liberal iconoclast looks ahead to more closing speeches and cross-examinations, troubled only by the prospect of Hilda publishing her memoirs.

SUMMARY

During a time of revolution in English drama, John Mortimer was more a traditionalist than an innovator. Nevertheless, he made two enduring contributions to the stage: Demonstrating the artistic and commercial viability of the one-act comedy and writing a memory play that stands as a landmark work of the period. As a novelist, he wrote family chronicles in the Victorian manner for late twentieth century readers. Further, inspired by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, he created in Horace Rumpole a detective whose international popularity rivals that of Sherlock Holmes. Finally, his television scripts have enhanced the stature of the genre.

Gerald H. Strauss

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- John Mortimer's major fictional creations are Horace Rumpole and Leslie Titmuss. Is it correct to say that they are total opposites?
- How does Mortimer attain freshness and variety in the Rumpole stories, even though they are formulaic narratives?
- What is the role of the British class system in Mortimer's drama and fiction?
- What is the source of Rumpole's "singular distaste for the law," and how does it affect his work as a barrister?
- How does Mortimer fuse the comic and tragic, optimism and pessimism, in his fiction?
- Why is A Voyage Round My Father, an autobiographical play, enduringly popular? Does it have a universality to which audiences respond?

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Charade, 1947
Rumming Park, 1948
Answer Yes or No, 1950
Like Men Betrayed, 1953
The Narrowing Stream, 1954
Three Winters, 1956
Will Shakespeare, 1977
Summer's Lease, 1988
Dunster, 1992
Under the Hammer, 1994
Felix in the Underworld, 1997
Where There's a Will, 2003
Quite Honestly, 2005

LONG FICTION (RAPSTONE CHRONICLES):

Paradise Postponed, 1985
Titmuss Regained, 1990
The Sound of Trumpets, 1998

LONG FICTION (RUMPOLE SERIES):

Rumpole and the Penge Bungalow Murders, 2004
Rumpole and the Reign of Terror, 2006
Rumpole Misbehaves, 2007

SHORT FICTION (RUMPOLE SERIES):

Rumpole of the Bailey, 1978
The Trials of Rumpole, 1979
Rumpole's Return, 1980
Rumpole for the Defense, 1981
Regina Rumpole, 1981
Rumpole and the Golden Thread, 1983
The First Rumpole Omnibus, 1983
The Second Rumpole Omnibus, 1987
Rumpole and the Age of Miracles, 1988
Rumpole's Last Case, 1988
Rumpole à la Carte, 1990
Rumpole on Trial, 1992
The Best of Rumpole, 1993
Rumpole and the Angel of Death, 1995
The Third Rumpole Omnibus, 1997
Rumpole Rests His Case, 2001
Rumpole and the Primrose Path, 2002

DRAMA:

The Dock Brief, pr. 1957 (radio play and televised), pr. 1958 (staged), pb. 1958 (one act)
I Spy, pr. 1957 (radio play), pr. 1958 (televised), pb. 1958, pr. 1959 (staged)
What Shall We Tell Caroline?, pr., pb. 1958 (one act)
Call Me a Liar, pr. 1958 (radio play and televised), pb. 1960, pr. 1968 (staged)
Lunch Hour, pr., pb. 1960 (one act)
Lunch Hour, and Other Plays, pb. 1960 (includes Collect Your Hand Baggage, David and Broccoli, and Call Me a Liar)
The Wrong Side of the Park, pr., pb. 1960
Collect Your Hand Baggage, pb. 1960, pr. 1963 (one act)
Two Stars for Comfort, pr., pb. 1962
A Voyage Round My Father, pr. 1963 (radio play), pr. 1970 (staged), pb. 1971
A Flea in Her Ear, pr. 1966, pb. 1967 (adaptation of Georges Feydeau's play)
The Judge, pr., pb. 1967
Cat Among the Pigeons, pr. 1969, pb. 1970 (adaptation of Feydeau's play)
Five Plays, pb. 1970 (includes The Dock Brief, What Shall We Tell Caroline?, I Spy, Lunch Hour, and Collect Your Hand Baggage)
Come as You Are: Four Short Plays, pr. 1970, pb. 1971 (includes Mill Hill, Bermondsey, Gloucester Road, and Marble Arch)
The Captain of Köpenick, pr., pb. 1971 (adaptation of Carl Zuckmayer's play)
I, Claudius, pr. 1972 (adaptation of Robert Graves's novels I, Claudius and Claudius the God)
Collaborators, pr., pb. 1973
Heaven and Hell, pr. 1976, pb. 1978 (2 one-act plays; The Fear of Heaven and The Prince of Darkness)
The Bells of Hell, pr. 1976, pb. 1978 (revision of The Prince of Darkness)
The Lady from Maxim's, pr., pb. 1977 (adaptation of Feydeau's play)
John Mortimer's Casebook, pr. 1982 (includes The Dock Brief, The Prince of Darkness, and Interlude)
When That I Was, pr. 1982

John Mortimer

Edwin, pr. 1982 (radio play), pr. 1984 (televised), pb. 1984 (stage version)

Edwin, and Other Plays, pb. 1984

A Little Hotel on the Side, pr. 1984, pb. 1985 (adaptation of Feydeau and Maurice Desvalliers's play)

Three Boulevard Farces, pb. 1985

Charles Dickens' A Christmas Carol, pr. 1994, pb. 1995 (adaptation of Charles Dickens's novel)

Hock and Soda Water, pr., pb. 2001

Naked Justice, pr., pb. 2001

RADIO PLAYS:

No Hero, 1955

Like Men Betrayed, 1955

Three Winters, 1958

Personality Split, 1964

Education of an Englishman, 1964

Mr. Luby's Fear of Heaven, 1976

SCREENPLAYS:

Ferry to Hong Kong, 1959 (with Lewis Gilbert and Vernon Harris)

The Innocents, 1961 (with Truman Capote and William Archibald)

Lunch Hour, 1962 (adaptation of his play)

I Thank a Fool, 1962 (with others)

Guns of Darkness, 1962

The Running Man, 1963

Bunny Lake Is Missing, 1964 (with Penelope Mortimer)

A Flea in Her Ear, 1967 (adaptation of his play)

John and Mary, 1969

Tea with Mussolini, 1999

TELEPLAYS:

David and Broccoli, 1960

The Exploding Azalea, 1966

The Head Waiter, 1966

The Other Side, 1967

Desmond, 1968

Rumpole of the Bailey, 1975, 1978, 1979

Rumpole's Return, 1980

Brideshead Revisited, 1981 (adaptation of Evelyn Waugh's novel)

A Voyage Round My Father, 1982

The Ebony Tower, 1984 (adaptation of John Fowles's story)

Paradise Postponed, 1986 (adaptation of his novel)

Summer's Lease, 1989 (adaptation of his novel)

Die Fledermaus: Or, The Bat's Revenge (pb. 1989, pr. 1990; translation of libretto by Carl Haffner and Richard Genée)

Titmuss Regained, 1991 (adaptation of his novel)

Under the Hammer, 1993

Cider with Rosie, 1998

Don Quixote, 2000 (adaptation of Miguel de Cervantes's novel)

NONFICTION:

No Moaning at the Bar, 1957 (as Geoffrey Lincoln)

With Love and Lizards, 1957 (with Penelope Mortimer)

Clinging to the Wreckage: A Part of Life, 1982

In Character, 1983

Character Parts, 1986

Murderers and Other Friends: Another Part of Life, 1994

The Summer of a Dormouse, 2000

Where There's a Will, 2003 (pb. in U.S. as Where There's a Will: Thoughts on the Good Life, 2005)

About the Author

Billington, Michael. "Voyage Round My Father Sails On." The New York Times, April 15, 1984, p. A27.

Grove, Valerie. A Voyage Round John Mortimer. New York: Viking, 2007.

Gussow, Mel. "The Man Who Put Horace Rumpole on the Case." The New York Times, April 12, 1995, p. C16.

Hayman, Ronald. British Theatre Since 1955: A Reassessment. New York: Oxford University Press, 1979.

Herbert, Rosemary. "John Mortimer: The Art of Fiction CVI." Paris Review 30 (Winter, 1988): 96-128.

Lord, Graham. John Mortimer: The Devil's Advocate, the Unauthorized Biography. London: Orion, 2005.

Miller, Lucasta. "Murder by Decree." The Armchair Detective 29 (Fall, 1987): 340-349.

_____. "The Old Devil." The Guardian, October 7, 2006, p. 11.

Rusinko, Susan. British Drama, 1950 to the Present: A Critical History. Boston: Twayne, 1989.

Courtesy, Author

FARLEY MOWAT

Born: Belleville, Ontario, Canada
May 12, 1921

One of Canada's foremost authors, Mowat is primarily concerned with nature, environmental issues, the ethics of modern life, and governments that seemingly have no regard for tradition.

BIOGRAPHY

Farley McGill Mowat (MOH-aht) was born in Belleville, Ontario, Canada, on May 12, 1921, to Angus and Helen Thomson Mowat. After completing his public school education in Ontario, he joined the Canadian army in 1939, rising to the rank of captain in the infantry and serving overseas during World War II. In 1945, Mowat returned to Canada and received his B.A. from the University of Toronto in 1949. That year, he married Frances Elizabeth Thornhill, with whom he had two children, Robert Alexander and David Peter; the marriage ended in divorce, and Mowat married Claire Angel Wheeler in 1961. He and his wife settled in Port Hope, Ontario, during the winter and in Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, during the summer.

The author of more than thirty books ranging from autobiography to children's literature, Mowat began his writing career as a result of his conflict with his employer, the Canadian government. After returning from military service, he accepted a job as a biological researcher for the Dominion Wildlife Service in the Barren Grounds Nature Reserve in northern Canada to observe what effects the wolves had on the caribou herds. While there, Mowat became friends with a small Eskimo tribe, the Ihalmiut, who called themselves the People of the Deer because the caribou provided them with food, clothing, and shelter. In response to what Mowat perceived as the Canadian government's negligent attitude toward these people, he began a crusade to help them preserve their heritage, a campaign that not only failed but also cost him his job. Mowat's first book, People of the Deer (1952; revised, 1975), chronicles his experiences, and its sequel, The Desperate People (1959; revised, 1975), describes the Ihalmiut's defeat. Both books were later revised and reissued to temper what some critics saw as misrepresentations of natural and social history. In 1954, People of the Deer won the Anisfield-Wolfe Award for its contribution to interracial relations.

People of the Deer begins Mowat's career-long engagement with issues relating to the far north country of Canada; he views himself as more of a storyteller than a naturalist, despite what he considers to be misguided attempts to categorize him as such. Mowat seeks to explore the complicated relationships between species: wolf and humankind, caribou and Eskimo, and the hunter and the hunted.

A summer spent in Churchill, Manitoba, with his uncle, western Canadian ornithologist Frank Farley, first introduced the author to the beauties of the Canadian north country; this tundra world is a place to which Mowat returns again and again in his writing. Besides People of the Deer and The Desperate People, Mowat pursues this interest in Ordeal by Ice (1960), The Polar Passion (1967), Tundra (1973), Walking on the Land (2000), High Latitudes: An Arctic Journey (2002; also known as High Latitudes: A Northern Journey, 2002), and No Man's River (2004). In Canada North (1967), Mowat wrote the text for the photographic volume that was published in conjunction with the Canadian Centennial project.

Sibir: My Discovery of Siberia (1970; published in the United States as The Siberians, 1970) recounts Mowat's experiences on his 1966 and 1969 visits to Siberian communities in the Soviet Union. The Snow Walker (1975) contains short stories and sketches of the people of the north country as they fight a harsh natural environment and the encroachments of modern technology.

Mowat lived for many years in Newfoundland, and his work reflects his connectedness to that region. In the 1950's, Mowat worked on two books about the maritime salvage industry: The Grey Seas Under (1959) and The Serpent's Coil (1961), both of which look at people in contact and often in conflict with their natural surroundings. Yet in 1967 he left his home at Burgeo, Newfoundland, after becoming embroiled in a bitter and unsuccessful fight with local residents and government bureaucrats to save a trapped whale; his experiences resulted in A Whale for the Killing (1972).

While much of Mowat's work reflects his personal interests broadened to include a more global perspective, a fair amount of his writing is also autobiographical: Never Cry Wolf (1963) tells of his first job as a wildlife researcher; The Boat Who Wouldn't Float (1968), which won the Leacock Medal and was named to L'Étoile de la Mer's honors list, describes his 1967 adventures sailing along the Newfoundland and Maritime Provinces' coastlines; The Dog Who Wouldn't Be (1957), which won the Canadian Women's Clubs Award, and Owls in the Family (1961), which won both the Hans Christian Andersen International Award and the Boys' Clubs of America Junior Book Award, tell of pets that he had as a child; And No Birds Sang (1979) describes his experience of what he labels "The Worm That Never Dies," the terror of war; and My Discovery of America (1985) recounts his exclusion from the United States in 1984 as a result of being labeled an undesirable. (Besides Mowat's leftist political beliefs, his Federal Bureau of Investigation file contained a copy of the March 22, 1968, issue of the Ottawa Citizen that reported that he once tried to shoot down a United States Air Force bomber that flew over his house in Burgeo.)

Mowat's work in the 1980's received high praise as well as popular attention. Sea of Slaughter (1984) is his account of the decimation of the wildlife populations off the northeastern coast of North America; Woman in the Mists: The Story of Dian Fossey and the Mountain Gorillas of Africa (1987) is Mowat's biography of the American naturalist murdered in 1985 after her vigorous attempts to preserve the wild gorillas in Rwanda, Africa. Three of Mowat's books have been made into films: a television production of A Whale for the Killing in 1981, the movie version of Never Cry Wolf, released in 1983, and Gorillas in the Mist, the film version of Woman in the Mists, released in 1988.

In the 1990's and the twenty-first century, Mowat returned to some themes he had explored in earlier books: autobiography in My Father's Son (1992) and Born Naked (1993), the environment in Rescue the Earth! Conversations with the Green Crusaders (1990), and his travels in Aftermath: Travels in a Post-War World (1995) and Bay of Sprits: A Love Story (2006).

Mowat has received many honors, including the President's Medal, University of Western Ontario, 1952, for best Canadian short story of 1952; the National Association of Independent Schools Award for juvenile books, 1963; the Hans Christian Andersen Honors List for juvenile books, 1965; the Canadian Centennial Medal, 1967; doctor of literature from Laurentian University, 1970, the University of Victoria, 1982, and Lakehead University, 1986; Vicky Metcalf Award, 1970; Mark Twain Award, 1971; doctor of law from Lethbridge University, 1973, the University of Toronto, 1973, and the University of Prince Edward Island, 1979; Curran Award, 1977, for "contributions to understanding wolves"; Queen Elizabeth II Jubilee Medal, 1978; Knight of Mark Twain, 1980; and officer, Order of Canada. The Sea Shepherd Conservation Society named a ship and the Ottawa school system a school in his honor.

ANALYSIS

In a 1987 interview, Mowat characterized himself as someone interested in writing about wildlife, but that's secondary. I am basically a storyteller. . . . [I]t's my life. . . . [M]ore and more I'm being categorized as a nature writer. That's nonsense. I'm not a nature writer. I write about life on this planet, and that includes human life and nonhuman life. I'm concerned about what's happening to all forms of life.

For Mowat, nature provides the arena in which to explore the interconnectedness of all life and to assert the legitimacy of the many ways of living on this planet. The primary targets of his work are bureaucracy, technology, and cultural imperialism and the ways in which industrialized societies have arrogantly ignored the needs and rights of the other inhabitants of the globe, including those inhabitants that are not human.

Mowat's strong personality reverberates throughout his work, a style that has been labeled "subjective nonfiction" by one of his critics. He does not shrink from confrontation or from assigning blame where he thinks it lies, as in the case of the Canadian government in People of the Deer. This pugnaciousness often earns him criticism, or, as in the case of the events that prompted him to write about the Ithalmiuts, the loss of his job. Pleasing the powers that be has never been one of Mowat's concerns, however; he instead is determined to make his views known and, by doing so, to raise public awareness and effect change.

The Canadian north country and the tundra provide Mowat with ample opportunity to accomplish both goals. The Siberians, for example, is his account of two trips that he made to the Soviet Union, visiting remote settlements where people lead a self-contained and self-respecting way of life. In the case of both the Siberians and the Ithalmiut Eskimo in People of the Deer, Mowat finds people who tread softly on the earth, who are in tune with rather than up in arms against nature. These people do not destroy for the sake of the hunt; rather, he says, "they kill to eat, to keep themselves going, but they don't kill for fun, they don't kill for greed, they don't kill from any of the motivations that we have." Mowat repeatedly looks at the Canadian wilderness and sees it as a staging ground for exploitation and neglect, for human arrogance and greed, and for disregard for a more widely focused ecological balance and harmony. His examination of the early polar explorers in Ordeal by Ice and The Polar Passion clearly demonstrates the futility of battling against nature, which always wins.

Mowat's angry reverence for nature and his accusatory stance against arrogant technological aggression on the part of the Canadian government may be seen in such books as Never Cry Wolf and A Whale for the Killing. He and others have pointed out the irony in the Canadian government's disregard of his findings concerning the tundra wolves. In A Whale for the Killing, Mowat could not convince his neighbors that a trapped whale had a right to be freed rather than tortured, and he used the creature's story to explore the wholesale slaughter of sea creatures and the negligence of the Canadian government. Sea of Slaughter represents a broader consideration of the issues that Mowat raised in the previous two books and clearly demonstrates his anger at the senseless injuries that people inflict on other species. Mowat makes a strong case against the exploitation of both the land- and the sea-dwelling animals along the Atlantic seaboard from Cape Cod to Labrador. To strengthen the impact of Sea of Slaughter, he offers a historical account of the area beginning in the sixteenth century, clearly demonstrating the frightening and unnecessary changes that humans have caused as they pillaged both land and sea: pollution, overhunting, destruction of habitat and food sources, poaching, and government-sanctioned cullings of seal and other animals.

Mowat sees himself as a rebel and seems to relish the opportunity that his confrontations with government, academia, and other representatives of the establishment, such as business and industry, afford him for driving his message home. He sometimes uses wry humor to make his points, as in My Discovery of America, in which he describes his attempts to discover why he had been denied permission to enter the United States for a speaking tour in 1984. Mowat speculates that he had been accused of anti-American sentiments; his pugnacious attitude surfaced in his refusal to come to the United States despite that country's Immigration and Naturalization Service having belatedly granted him admission, refusing because the United States' government had yet to apologize for its mistake.

NEVER CRY WOLF

First published: 1963

Type of work: Natural history and autobiography

The wolves of the Arctic wilderness are not the fierce predators that their detractors have accused them of being.

Never Cry Wolf recounts Mowat's experiences as a biologist and naturalist sent by the Canadian government to study a group of wolves in the Canadian tundra of the far north. It had always been assumed that the wolves were a threat to other wildlife populations and, by extension, to domestic herds because they needlessly destroyed large numbers of animals. Mowat's experiences living in the midst of the tundra, the wolves, and the caribou herd stand in direct contradiction to the Canadian government's assumption that the wolves were to blame for the decline in those caribou populations. As Mowat was to discover, however, his findings were not information that government bureaucrats wanted to hear. Unlike the Canadian government, which did nothing to alter its negative treatment of the wolves, when Never Cry Wolf was translated into Russian, the Soviet government banned the slaughter of wolves, animals that it had previously considered dangerous predators.

Never Cry Wolf is as much about the way in which humans misperceive the behavior of other species as it is about the true behavior of the wolves that Mowat observed. The story brings the social dynamics of this wolf population to light; Mowat describes wolves as animals representing a complex family network, one making little impact on the ecosystem in which it lives. As well as these two issues, Mowat gives readers a humorous and revealing look at himself as he changes his mind about the "threats" that these animals pose, not only to the greater population but also to himself as the lone observer living in close proximity to them on the tundra. The book achieves its power because it is both a global treatment of what might be called species imperialism and shortsightedness on the part of humans and a "local" portrait of one wolf group and the one human who must live in and adapt to their world, a place that is oftentimes harsh and unpredictable.

In order to see his wolves, whom he names George and Angeline, Mowat clearly had to learn to think like a wolf, to see the world as wolves see it, to hear what they hear, and to respond to what matters to them. Sometimes the results are comical, as when Mowat resorts to marking out his territory in the same way as George had done, with urine. The book describes wolves, and their observer, going about the day-to-day business of surviving, and it is this act of making do in a stubbornly hostile environment that gives the book its power and allows Mowat to invest the wolves with great dignity. He concludes that wolves take from nature only what they need—principally field mice and a few ailing caribou; the lesson that his observations teach is obvious, but one that the Canadian government did not heed: The wolves have as much right to be where they are and do what they are doing as any other species.

Never Cry Wolf was adapted into a successful motion picture of the same name starring Charles Martin Smith and released in 1983.

A WHALE FOR THE KILLING

First published: 1972

Type of work: Natural history and autobiography

A man stands up to the people of his hometown in an attempt to save a stranded fin whale.

A Whale for the Killing presents a time when Mowat was forced to stand up to the people among whom he had chosen to live, people whom he had admired for their rugged individualism, their tenacity in the face of nature's harshness, and their refusal to give in to adversity. In his attempts to force the townspeople of Burgeo, Newfoundland, to rescue a stranded eighty-ton fin whale, he learns that not everyone has the same reverence for nature as he and his wife and that the Canadian government is less concerned about protecting its natural heritage than it is about public relations.

This autobiographical narrative goes beyond recounting the erosion of the friendships that Mowat and his wife had established over many years in Burgeo; it also becomes a means by which Mowat can offer insight into the destruction brought about over time by the whaling industry. Interwoven in his account of the whale's inhumane treatment and slow death are sections that explore the decimation of the North American North Atlantic fishing grounds and that give vivid accounts of the slaughter of whales, animals that in earlier times ranged the ocean in vast pods. The behavior of the people of Burgeo—tormenting the whale with speedboats and shooting endless rounds of ammunition into its body, inflicting wounds that would eventually make it prey to infection and great suffering—parallels the rapacious nature of the whaling industry. Mowat's book thus works on two levels: as a local story and as an account of humankind's wanton destruction of anything and everything for its own use, without giving thought to the balances that might be upset in the process.

A Whale for the Killing presents what Mowat perceives to be a direct relationship between the destruction of the normal natural balance in nature and the rise of technologically "superior" industrial cultures. The connection that once existed between humankind and the rest of the animal kingdom is broken; the reverence once felt for other beasts is replaced by vicious sport and selfish destruction. Yet while Mowat blames the villagers of Burgeo, he accuses the Canadian government and the global scientific community for failing to come to the aid of the whale, an animal that could have been saved. The tensions that he depicts between the people doing what they please and a greater "good" are interesting because these people have been predisposed by their culture to behave as they do toward the fin whale. Thus, Mowat's demanding that they cease their behavior is, in effect, asking that they deny the culture in which they have managed to live. His ultimate response to the incidents—the torture and death of the whale and Mowat's neighbors' growing hostility and denunciation—is to leave the place that he had formerly considered the embodiment of rugged virtue.

THE FARFARERS: BEFORE THE NORSE

First published: 1998

Type of work: Nonfiction

Mowat argues that North America was discovered and colonized by the pre-Celtic inhabitants of the British Isles and northern Europe.

In The Farfarers: Before the Norse, Mowat revisits a theme he previously discussed in Westwiking: The Ancient Norse in Greenland and North America (1965) and The Curse of the Viking Grave (1966): the pre-Columbian exploration and settlement of North America. He begins with the Celtic invasion of northern Europe in the seventh century B.C.E., when the Celts killed, drove out, or enslaved the people who were already there. Mowat names these earlier people the "Albans" and cites as examples the Aquitainians, the Picts, and the builders of Stonehenge. He speculates that the Albans eventually fled to the Orkney and Shetland islands off northern Scotland. He further theorizes that they developed a maritime culture that used advanced oceangoing fishing boats with hulls made of hides, rather than wood. Mowat calls these boats "farfarers," which, he says, enabled the Albans to sail to and eventually colonize Greenland, Iceland, Newfoundland, and Labrador.

Mowat observes that Iceland appears on ancient maps centuries before it was discovered and settled by the Norse. He argues that the Albans got there first because they were following the walrus herds to harvest their ivory. His sources include the Norse historians, who mention that the Norse found people on Iceland, and the Greek explorer Pytheas, who sailed from the Mediterranean to Iceland around 330 B.C.E. Mowat argues that the Norse eventually drove out the Albans, who drifted to Greenland. A few generations later, the Norse followed them to Greenland and from there to North America. Unfortunately, the Albans could not roam further west because the aggressive Thule people, a Native American nation who were the ancestors of the modern Inuit, were moving into the area as well.

On an expedition to northern Canada in 1966, Mowat saw low stone walls in northern Quebec, which, after a visit to the Orkney Islands, he concluded provided a foundation for upturned boats to be used as winter dwellings on the beaches there. While in the Orkneys, he had observed such structures still in use. He also cites the similarity of stone structures found in North America and the British Isles. He then argues that the Albans settled Newfoundland after they were pushed out of Labrador by the Thule and the Norse. Finally, Mowat speculates that the Albans were gradually driven into the interior of Newfoundland by the English and French in the seventeenth century and that a group of Newfoundlanders known as the Jakatars, thought to be a mixture of French and Native American ancestry, might actually be the last genetically distinct Albans. Otherwise, the Albans disappeared into the gene pools of other peoples.

Some scholars dismissed Mowat's theory, charging that the book was highly provisional and that Mowat drew radical conclusions from limited evidence. Some people also disqualified the book as a scholarly work because Mowat included fictional passages to describe the Albans. For his part, Mowat acknowledged that his book made "no pretence at being history in the academic sense" but he believed it to be a "true story" of a "vanished people."

SUMMARY

Farley Mowat maintains a deep interest in the interrelationship between the human species and the other creatures with whom it shares the earth. His interests range from correct use for the land to appropriate interactions between humans and other species to bureaucratic, academic, and technological arrogance. Sometimes Mowat makes his point through what some people categorize as children's fiction—stories about animals; other times, he does so by interweaving current events and natural and social history.

In his work, Mowat demands that readers view themselves from the perspective of the global village, a setting that includes all species and the rights of all animals and all peoples. Although he denies that he writes natural history, his work is certainly natural history in its broadest context: considerations of the interconnectedness of events, peoples, and creatures. He asks that his readers look critically at the many dangerous ways in which industrial, technological cultures are changing and damaging the complex balance of lives on the earth. Although Mowat characteristically focuses much of his attention on the far northern regions of his native Canada, his work carries many more far-reaching implications.

Melissa E. Barth; updated by Thomas R. Feller

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

NONFICTION:

People of the Deer, 1952 (revised 1975; sociology and autobiography)

The Dog Who Wouldn't Be, 1957 (autobiography)

The Desperate People, 1959 (revised 1975, sequel to People of the Deer; sociology and autobiography)

The Grey Seas Under, 1959

The Top of the World trilogy, 1960-1973 (natural history; includes Ordeal by Ice, 1960; The Polar Passion, 1967; and Tundra, 1973)

The Serpent's Coil, 1961

Owls in the Family, 1961 (autobiography)

Never Cry Wolf, 1963 (natural history and autobiography)

Westviking: The Ancient Norse in Greenland and North America, 1965 (maps and drawings by Claire Wheeler)

The Curse of the Viking Grave, 1966 (illustrated by Charles Geer)

Canada North, 1967

The Boat Who Wouldn't Float, 1968 (natural history and autobiography)

Sibir: My Discovery of Siberia, 1970 (natural history and autobiography; pb. in U.S. as The Siberians, 1970)

A Whale for the Killing, 1972

The Snow Walker, 1975

Canada North Now: The Great Betrayal, 1976

And No Birds Sang, 1979 (autobiography)

Sea of Slaughter, 1984 (natural history)

My Discovery of America, 1985 (autobiography)

Virunga: The Passion of Dian Fossey and the Mountain Gorillas of Africa, 1987

Woman in the Mists: The Story of Dian Fossey and the Mountain Gorillas of Africa, 1987 (natural history and biography)

Rescue the Earth! Conversations with the Green Crusaders, 1990

My Father's Son, 1992 (autobiography)

Born Naked, 1993 (autobiography)

Aftermath: Travels in a Post-War World, 1995

The Farfarers: Before the Norse, 1998

Walking on the Land, 2000

High Latitudes: An Arctic Journey, 2002 (also known as High Latitudes: A Northern Journey, 2002)

No Man's River, 2004

Bay of Spirits: A Love Story, 2006

About the Author

Goddard, John. "A Real Whopper." Saturday Night 111, no. 4 (May, 1996): 46-54, 64.

King, James. Farley: The Life of Farley Mowat. South Royalton, Vt.: Steerforth Press, 2002.

Lawrence, Keith. "Farley Mowat: Overview." In Twentieth Century Adult Writers, edited by Laura Standley Berger. Detroit: St. James Press, 1994.

Lucas, Alec. Farley Mowat. Toronto: Oxford University Press, 1976.

Moss, John. "Imagining the Arctic: From Frankenstein to Farley Mowat, Words Turn the Arctic Landscape into Unreality." Arctic Circle 1, no. 5 (March/April, 1991): 32-40.

Mowat, Claire. Travels with Farley: A Memoir. Toronto: Key Porter, 2005.

Orange, John. Writing the Squib: A Biography of Farley Mowat. Toronto: ECW Press, 1993.

Patterson, Eric. "Farley Mowat: Overview." In Contemporary Popular Writers, edited by Dave Mote. Detroit: St. James Press, 1997.

Shepstone, Joe. "Farley Mowat: On Writing Fiction, Non-Fiction, and Autobiography." CM Magazine 20, no. 6 (November, 1992): 290-292.

Thompson, Eric. "Farley Mowat." In Canadian Writers, 1920-1959, edited by W. H. New. Vol. 68 in Dictionary of Literary Biography. Detroit: Gale Research, 1988.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What is Farley Mowat's attitude toward civilization and its expansion into wilderness areas?
- How does Mowat view Native Americans?
- Mowat admires rugged individuals. How did his attitude toward the inhabitants of Burgeo, Newfoundland, change?
- Never Cry Wolf and A Whale for the Killing are about humanity's relationships with animals. What is the proper relationship between humans and wolves? Humans and whales? Between the Inuit and the caribou? Between the hunters and the hunted?
- The Farfarers discusses the slaughter of walrus for their ivory. What part do images of animal slaughter play in other books by Mowat?
- Mowat has the reputation of not allowing the facts to get in the way of a good story. How does this help and/or hinder him in his arguments?

MULTATULI

Born: Amsterdam, the Netherlands
March 2, 1820

Died: Nieder-Ingelheim, Germany
February 19, 1887

With the power of a single novel, Max Havelaar, a searing indictment of corrupt Dutch colonial government in Indonesia, Multatuli redefined the direction of Dutch narrative literature by his audacious experimentation with formal techniques that anticipated European modernism by nearly a half century.

BIOGRAPHY

Multatuli (muhl-tuh-TEW-lee) was the pseudonym of Eduard Douwes Dekker, who was born to modest circumstances in Amsterdam on March 2, 1820. His father, a sea captain, had spent his life on the open seas, but he wanted his son to pursue a less adventurous career as an accountant. Young Eduard, however, thought being an accountant would be a dull job; before he completed the equivalent of a high school education, he went to work as a clerk in a textile factory. After three years, however, he was bored and sailed with his father for the East Indies, where the Dutch maintained a significant colonial presence.

Over the next several years, Dekker maintained a number of posts until in 1842 he was awarded an administrative appointment in Sumatra in the Dutch East Indies (now Indonesia), where he was virtually the entire civic government for the lonely jungle outpost. Initially Dekker was appalled at the conditions under which the local natives were managed and further incensed over evidence of colonial corruption and bureaucratic insensitivity.

It was there that he made his first writing efforts, an unpublished novel “Losse bladen uit het dagboek van een oude man” (loose pages from an old man’s diary), which relates the tragic story of a young boy whose earnest altruism ends up costing him his life, when he dies trying to save his brother from drowning. Importantly, the work tells the story of the doomed young boy from the perspective of an older man who is unable to understand entirely the impetus for the boy’s courageous generosity, a frame narrative that anticipates Dekker’s later formal experiments.

After a brief suspension from his job from 1843 to 1844, when his bookkeeping irregularities were exposed, Dekker was reinstated and in 1857 was given a plum appointment as deputy commissioner at Lebak on Java, where the sugar and coffee plantations made it one of the most important trading posts in the Dutch East Indies archipelago. Within six weeks of his appointment, however, Dekker raised a public outrage over the exploitation of the Javanese people who lived in abject poverty and were subjected to the cruel practices of vicious tribal regents, whose power was assured by the Dutch occupational government. Indeed, Dekker went public with his indictment when he feared his predecessor, who had also threatened to expose the corruption, had been poisoned. This was to prove his downfall; his charges were dismissed by the colonial administration as precipitous, and Dekker was compelled to resign.

Dekker returned to the Netherlands, determined to expose the colonial system, and he did so in a series of newspaper editorials and scathing pamphlets. It was the publication of his novel Max Havelaar: Of, De koffij-veilingen der Nederlandsche handelsmaatschappij (1860; Max Havelaar: Or, The Coffee Auctions of the Dutch Trading Company, 1868), however, that catapulted him into international prominence. The novel was written under the pseudonym Multatuli, which Dekker had taken from a Latin phrase in Horace’s Ars poetica (c. 17 B.C.E.; The Art of Poetry, 1567) that translates as “I have suffered much." A polemic that has since been compared to Uncle Tom's Cabin (1852) and The Grapes of Wrath (1939), the novel, written in a single month, triggered government investigations into colonial administration. Max Havelaar would influence a generation of strident anticolonial writers, most prominently Joseph Conrad.

Dekker himself, however, would struggle to match the success of his first work. Minnebrieven (love letters), published in 1861, is an inventive epistolary narrative that features a three-way correspondence between the writer-persona Multatuli; his long-suffering, if unimaginative wife; and Fancy, the muse who demands nothing less than the revelation of truth. The work turns quickly into a bitter, often satiric look at the ironic fate of a radical visionary and seer, who must, nevertheless, sell books to the very middle class he despises. The work found little audience.

For nearly fifteen years, beginning in 1862, Dekker published a massive seven-volume series, known collectively as Ideën (ideas), that put forward a revolutionary agenda reflecting his free-spirited sense of inquiry. In it, he favored women's rights, deplored the lingering control of the Catholic Church, dismissed as inefficient the centuries-old monarchical system, and advocated a range of controversial, provocative ideas from atheism to free love. (Dekker himself pursued numerous public liaisons with a series of mistresses.) Ideën contained the story "Wouterje Pieterse," which retold the Faust legend, using a precocious child who grows up with the quixotic desire to understand nothing less than love itself. The story was later published as a novel, De geschiedenis van Woutertje Pieterse (the history of Woutertje Pieterse), published posthumously in 1890.

Disgusted by his lack of market success in the Netherlands and frustrated by the government's lack of real reform in Indonesia, Dekker moved to Mainz, Germany, to live openly with his mistress while his wife moved to Italy. He attempted to write for the stage, but he lacked a compelling sense of scene and character, using the form, as Henrik Ibsen and August Strindberg would with much greater success, to espouse social reform. After briefly returning to the Netherlands after his wife's death, Dekker returned to Germany and took up residence in Wiesbaden in the Rhineland. For most of the last ten years of his life, Dekker published nothing, and he died in relative obscurity on February 19, 1887, at Nieder-Ingelheim.

It was only much later, when, with the rise of narrative experimentation in the early twentieth century, novelists as diverse as D. H. Lawrence and James Joyce found in Max Havelaar's complex design a fascinating early example of upending the novel's form. Within a generation, that single work positioned Multatuli as the Netherlands' premier novelist of the nineteenth century, a man who brought to a national literature that lacked any real novel tradition a sensibility that merged the social activism of Charles Dickens, the caustic satiric vision of Daniel Defoe, and the narrative intricacy of Joyce. In June, 2002, the Society for Dutch Literature hailed Multatuli as the greatest Dutch writer of all time.

ANALYSIS

Long before he turned to literature, Multatuli was shaped by his admiration for the altruism of Christ, although he disdained institutional Christianity, and the outspokenness of Socrates. Their influences, coupled with Multatuli's fascination for the bold egocentrism of Napoleon I, shaped his literary sensibility. During an era of tectonic cultural, political, and social upheaval across Europe, Multatuli was possessed of a heroic imagination that conceived of literature as a force for broad change, a way to confront convention, challenge complacency, and reform the status quo. Because he came to literature after nearly twenty years in public service, Multatuli, with the crusading zeal of a self-appointed prophet, targeted not only what he perceived as the corruption of colonial administrative protocols but also, on a far wider scale, what he perceived as the moral bankruptcy and casual hypocrisy of the complacent Dutch middle class. Much like his contemporaries Dickens, Honoré de Balzac, and Mark Twain, Multatuli was a compassionate, if scathing, social realist. After all, long before he turned to literature, his life was grounded in the immediate: He was raised during one of the Netherlands' frequent economic depressions; minimally educated, he was trained as a bookkeeper and worked at a factory; and he was a career civil servant.

To read the works of Multatuli, however, is to be aware of how galvanized he was by the Romantic vision. His social realism is charged by his conception of himself as a heroic outcast, a Byronic misfit, a truth-sayer whose thorny vision and uncompromising dedication to the truth made him an unsettling presence and more than justified, in his mind, the obscurity in which he lived most of his later years. Like the Romantic heroes whom he admired, he was given to extreme passions: He maintained numerous public romances while he was married; he was a gambling addict whose legendary runs of bad luck at casinos damned him to penury; and he was noted for a trigger temper and a penchant for picking fights. In merging social realism and Romantic individualism, Multatuli's writings are both compelled by idealism and compassion and undercut by a mocking bitterness that perceived the collective culture as too blind to realize any significant change. Long abandoning the idea of a controlling deity because he found such notions superstitious, Multatuli conceived of the material universe as driven by a kind of necessity, a heartbreaking certainty that the arrogance and intolerance of the small-minded, the entrenched status quo, inevitably rejected daring change. Paradoxically hopeful and despairing, he tirelessly championed truth as the goal of the writer. Forsaking the chic fin-de-siècle fascination with beauty and the aesthetic appeal of a literary form, Multatuli sought truths that he perceived came not from the intellect but from the gut, a conception of truth as an intuitive sensibility.

Although neither social realism nor Romantic idealism had found specific expression in Dutch national literature before Multatuli, his sensibility and his philosophy were nevertheless part of the European mind-set of his era. What is not so clear about Multatuli's writing, however, is the impetus for his formal experimentation, his avant-garde sense of challenging inherited conventions of narrative technique itself. Although certainly his social advocacy and his idealism would encourage him to reject inherited notions of literary expression, his writings anticipate a revolution in structural techniques that was still more than a half century away. Ironically, Multatuli's stinging social criticism and his incendiary reform ideas gave him whatever celebrity he realized in his lifetime, while his narrative techniques were largely ignored, or, as was most often the case, dismissed as the careless work of an undisciplined civil servant turned scrivener.

Today, of course, the opposite holds true: Whereas his themes are period-bound and often dated, his formal techniques are audacious and even shocking and place him among the precursors of the most innovative literary modernists. Although often unacknowledged, as his works have not been extensively translated, Multatuli is a direct ancestor of writers, including Joyce, D. H. Lawrence, Ernest Hemingway, and William Faulkner, who in the years surrounding World War I broadly experimented with how to tell a story. Among the techniques that Multatuli's writings exhibit that would become staples of modernism include experimenting with framing narratives, specifically stories-within-stories; deploying unreliable narrators as thematic devices; shattering conventional plot into recursive nonlinearity; splicing different genres and multiple tones within the same work; manipulating the premise of metafictional self-reflexivity by using an authorial presence often through both direct and indirect intrusion into the work; indulging an unapologetic sense of excess and a relish for hyperbole as a way to create and manipulate irony; and introducing into a narrative excessive supplemental materials—asides, epigraphs, footnotes, annotations, and digressions—as a way to create an awareness of the text as a written thing and to satirize the busy pointlessness of academics.

Contemporary readers coming to Multatuli face challenges. His reputation rests largely on a single groundbreaking work—even his most ardent apologists find his other works lesser productions. In addition, although Max Havelaar has been translated into more than forty languages, the vast majority of Multatuli's work still awaits translation into English. Much of his social philosophy gathered in the encyclopedic Ideën can seem dated. Of course, his harsh criticism of colonial imperialism and his passionate defense of a native people exploited by economic occupation gave him cachet among anti-colonial literary movements of the second half of the twentieth century, most notably the literatures of the Indian subcontinent and the Caribbean basin. However, Multatuli's signature tone—that tender faith in the possibility of reform leavened by a querulous sense of denunciation and a bitter hopelessness—and the intricate architecture of his most accomplished works have secured his place in nineteenth century European letters.

MAX HAVELAAR

First published: Max Havelaar: Of, De koffij-veilingen der Nederlandsche handelsmaatschappij, 1860 (English translation, 1868)

Type of work: Novel

An idealistic Dutch colonial administrator in Java unsuccessfully tries to correct bureaucratic corruption and improve the abhorrent conditions imposed on native workers.

Max Havelaar: Or, The Coffee Auctions of the Dutch Trading Company is a contested narrative—a narrative within a narrative within yet another narrative in which the framing stories underscore the social and cultural problems revealed by the central imbedded story of the quixotic civil servant, Max Havelaar, who does not even enter the story for nearly sixty pages. Multatuli's agenda is clear: alert the indifferent and complacent middle-class Dutch back home of the system they had imposed on the peoples of the East Indies. For more than two centuries, the Dutch had maintained a considerable empire in the East Indies. At the time Multatuli wrote this novel, the government, rather than private trading companies, controlled the colonies and had imposed harsh production quotas for the islands' chief exports, primarily coffee and sugar. This policy, coupled with crippling taxation imposed on local farmers, created a system rife with corruption and brutality.

The narrative actually begins with a parcel of manuscripts. A successful middle-aged coffee broker, Batavus Droogstoppel, is accosted on the streets of Amsterdam by an impoverished figure he identifies only as Sjaalman, or the Scarfman, because of the ragged scarf he wears against the cold. The man, a struggling writer who is an old school chum of Droogstoppel and who once saved him from a beating by bullies, thrusts a parcel at the coffee broker, manuscripts he had written, in the hopes that his friend might help him get the works published. Droogstoppel, who has little regard for literature, reluctantly agrees. When he reviews the contents, he is interested only in one essay on Javanese coffee plantations. That, he decides, would be worth pursuing, as his entire life is about coffee.

He assigns a young German clerk named Stern (or "star") to oversee the compilation of the manuscript into something publishable. Stern agrees on two conditions: that his boss agree not to alter anything he writes and that the struggling writer, Sjaalman, be given a ream of paper and ink and pens. It is only then that the story of Max Havelaar commences—we are to assume it is a text arranged by Stern to be written by Sjaalman, who is most likely Havelaar himself, returned from the disastrous appointment in Java. That narrative in turn will be interrupted midway, when Droogstoppel, who has apparently listened to Stern read the manuscript he has prepared, feels obliged to insert his objections to the story, praising Dutch colonial administration and suggesting that whatever discipline the Dutch apply to the locals was justified, as they were not Christian.

As the story of Havelaar unfolds, the newly appointed colonial administrator at Lebak quickly discovers the depth of the abuses routinely inflicted on the natives at the hands of local regents whose hereditary power (and brutalities) had been buttressed by the Dutch, who are interested only in maintaining a system that guaranteed the uninterrupted flow of spices, coffee, and sugar back to lucrative European markets. In one particularly heartrending story, Havelaar meets a young local, Saïdyah, whose father had lost all his property to the extortions of the local regent and whose betrothed is then brutally murdered by Dutch occupational troops when she attempts to join the revolutionary Javanese underground. Driven by desperation, Saïdyah himself attacks some soldiers and is impaled by bayonets.

Havelaar accumulates considerable evidence of such wrongdoings, and, suspicious that the previous administrator had been poisoned, attempts to file a report with his superiors. He is roundly dismissed and cautioned not to pursue his allegations—indeed others within the post are aware of the injustices but refuse to stand up to them for fear of losing their positions. Havelaar, however, refuses to abandon his crusade and maneuvers to have the local regents imprisoned. Ultimately Dutch authorities quash Havelaar's efforts and reassign him to an obscure outpost on the island. Havelaar, understanding that the same conditions would await him there, resigns after one last futile attempt to secure an audience with the island's governor-general. He returns to the Netherlands, bitter, angry, and out of work.

It is at this point, as the novel closes, that Multatuli introduces yet a third narrative frame; his own persona, identified as Multatuli, interrupts the story, laments his own clumsy writing skills, dismisses Stern and Droogstoppel's work as ineffectual fictions, and vehemently denounces the coffee broker as sanctimonious and hypocritical. Multatuli proclaims his own profound disgust with the subjugation of thirty million Javanese people within the exploitative Dutch colonial system. He closes by appealing to no less than the Dutch king, William III, to address the conditions in the islands. It is that outrage, the authorial persona claims, he wants his readers to share.

Within two years of the publication of Max Havelaar, government investigations had found Multatuli's indictment substantially valid, although the colonial presence in the East Indies would remain well into the twentieth century. What is more fascinating, however, is Multatuli's decision to contain that considerable outrage within a complex narrative frame, essentially deploying three narrators: the coffee broker, the clerk, and the writer-persona. Clearly, the arrogant and complacent Droogstoppel satirizes what Multatuli thought was a far more insidious problem than the conditions in the colonial outposts: specifically, the indifference of the Catholic Christian Dutch themselves to a colonial system that had built them a commercial empire. The young German, Stern, locked into a dreary apprenticeship with the narrow-minded philistine coffee merchant, represents the idealistic impulse in Multatuli; inspired by the German Romantics, such as Johann Wolfgang von Goethe and Friedrich Schiller, Stern seeks to have the courageous idealism of Havelaar promulgated as an exemplar of the crusade for truth and justice. Finally, Multatuli introduces his own writing persona into the narrative, promptly shatters any illusion of the fictional construct, and closes the narrative with a direct appeal to the Dutch people. That narrative experimentation sustains Max Havelaar beyond a period piece or a historic artifact.

SUMMARY

Positioned within a European culture that challenged centuries-old institutions—among them the Catholic Church, the aristocracy, and the monarchy—in the name of freedom and equality, the works of Multatuli confronted with uncompromising honesty the social, political, and economic problems he perceived the Dutch were facing. In so doing, he endorsed literature's privilege to inspire, outrage, and challenge a culture to authentic change. Grounded in the controversial liberal ideas of the late Romantic era, Multatuli struggled with the nagging fear that literature, finally, could do little but raise awareness. Although Multatuli was criticized at the time for what appears to be the raw and chaotic construction of his work, readers much later came to recognize how intricately Multatuli manipulated multiple narrators and multiple genres to create an avant-garde originality to his works, an artistic vitality that is finally the ultimate expression of his fervent belief in freedom.

Joseph Dewey

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Max Havelaar: Of, De koffij-veilingen der Nederlandsche handelsmaatschappij, 1860 (Max Havelaar: Or, The Coffee Auctions of the Dutch Trading Company, 1868)

Minnebrieven, 1861 (satire)

De geschiedenis van Woutertje Pieterse, 1890

DRAMA:

Vorstenschool, pb. 1875 (School for Sovereigns, 1970)

NONFICTION:

Ideën, eerste bundel, 1862

Ideën, tweede bundel, 1864-1865

Ideën, derde bundel, 1870-1871

Ideën, vierde bundel, 1872

Ideën, vijfde bundel, 1873

Ideën, zesde bundel, 1873

Ideën, zevende bundel, 1874-1877

About the Author

Dekker, Eduard Douwes. The Oyster and the Eagle: Selected Aphorisms and Parables of Multatuli. Edited by E. M. Beckman. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1974.

Feenberg, Anne-Marie. "Max Havelaar: An Anti-Imperialist Novel." Modern Language Notes 112, no. 5 (1997): 817-835.

Hammerton, J. A. Classics in Scandinavian and Dutch Literature. New Delhi, India: Deep and Deep, 2002.

King, Peter. Multatuli. New York: Twayne, 1972.

Lawrence, D. H. Introduction to Max Havelaar: Or, The Coffee Auctions of the Dutch Trading Company, by Multatuli. 1927. Reprint. London: Heinemann, 1967.

Meijer, Reinder P. Literature of the Low Countries: A Short History of Dutch Literature in the Netherlands and Belgium. Santa Cruz, Calif.: Irvington, 1978.

Nieuwenhuys, Rob. Mirror of the Indies: A History of Dutch Colonial Literature. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1982.

Toer, Pramoedya Ananta. "The Book That Killed Colonialism." The New York Times Magazine, April 18, 1999, pp. 112-114.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Critics have suggested that Multatuli satirizes the coffee merchant, Droogstoppel, by simply letting him speak. Cite moments when the broker inadvertently reveals negative aspects of his character.
- How does Multatuli use the secondary character of Mr. Verbrugge to underscore Max Havelaar's heroism?
- Critics have argued that the oppression of the Javanese people was a joint enterprise by both the Dutch and the indigenous leaders. What is particularly despicable about the character Radhen Adhipatti?
- What is the emotional impact of the story of Saïdyah?
- What are the implications of the translation of the Latin phrase "Multatuli" that Eduard Douwes Dekker used for his pseudonym?
- Max Havelaar, despite its grim subject matter, has been described as a funny book. Do you agree or disagree with that characterization, and why?
- Does the narrative experimentation in Max Havelaar interfere with the story? In what way is the experimentation part of the book's larger theme of freedom from oppression?

© Jerry Bauer

ALICE MUNRO

Born: Wingham, Ontario, Canada
July 10, 1931

Munro, with her sharply detailed settings and her fully realized characters, contributed to the resurgence of the short story's popularity.

BIOGRAPHY

Born on July 10, 1931, in rural southwest Ontario, Canada, in the region east of Lake Huron, Alice Munro and her younger brother and sister were the children of Robert Eric Laidlaw, a farmer, and Anne Chamney Laidlaw, a former elementary school teacher turned homemaker. The family always seemed to be struggling financially. With the failure of his fox-farming business in 1948, Munro's father became a night watchman in a local foundry and began raising turkeys in 1952. In 1943, when Munro was twelve, her mother began a long decline because of Parkinson's disease, which led to her death sixteen years later.

Although her mother hoped that her daughter would escape their hometown of Wingham, Ontario, Munro's future was expected to be that of a farmer's wife. From the age of nine, however, she wanted to be an author. At fifteen she started writing, spending her school lunch hour composing stories while her classmates, who lived closer to the school, went home to eat. She finished a novel—a romantic, gothic work that later was stored in her father's basement and eventually thrown out by her stepmother.

In 1949, she received a scholarship that enabled her to attend the University of Western Ontario in London, Ontario, where she majored in journalism, a more explainable choice, she thought, than writing. While an undergraduate, she published her first story, "The Dimensions of a Shadow," in a university journal and sold another to Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) Radio. On December 29, 1951, she married James Munro, a bookseller, left the university, and moved to Vancouver, British Columbia. During the twelve years the couple lived in Vancouver, she cared for the family house and tended to the needs of her two daughters, Sheila, born in 1953, and Jenny, born in 1957. Another daughter, Catherine, was born in 1955 and died shortly after her birth. Writing but discarding much of what she wrote, Munro did sell a few stories each year to small journals, such as the Canadian Forum, Mayfair, Montrealer, and Queen's Quarterly. In 1963, the family moved to Victoria, British Columbia, where Munro and her husband opened a bookstore, Munro's Books. Another daughter, Andrea, was born in 1966.

In 1968, at age thirty-seven, Munro published her first collection of short stories, Dance of the Happy Shades. For these stories, Munro drew on the familiar. The characters share traits with her, her family, and her neighbors. The setting—the small towns of southwest Ontario—was the landscape of her childhood. For this volume she received the Governor-General's Award in 1969, the most prestigious literary prize in Canada. The book's publication in the United States in 1973 brought her a wider audience.

Munro's next book was a novel, Lives of Girls and Women (1971), set in the fictional Ontario town of Jubilee. This book follows the development of Del Jordan as she comes to terms with her parents, sex, and her desire to become a writer. The somewhat autobiographical work received the Canadian Booksellers Association International Book Year Award in 1972 and was chosen as an alternate Book of-the-Month Club selection in Canada and in the United States. In 1973, one section of the book was adapted for the television series CBC Performance, with Munro's seventeen-year-old daughter Jenny playing the lead.

In 1972, with her marriage over, Munro returned to London, Ontario, with her two youngest daughters, intending to make writing her career. In 1974, she accepted a one-year position as writer-in-residence at the University of Western Ontario. This position was one she would fill over the years in numerous universities, including one in Queensland, Australia. In 1976, with her divorce final, she married Gerald Fremlin, a geographer and retired cartographer. They settled in the house of his birth in Clinton, Ontario, a small town twenty miles from Wingham.

In 1974, Munro published Something I've Been Meaning to Tell You: Thirteen Stories. Unlike her first two books, which are about the experience of growing up, this collection focuses on the problems of adulthood. In 1978, she published Who Do You Think You Are?, which was retitled The Beggar Maid: Stories of Flo and Rose (1979) for publication in the United States. This collection, a series of linked stories focused on the protagonist Rose, resembles a novel. As the collection went to press, Munro insisted on and paid for substantial changes. She deleted three stories that were later published in The Moons of Jupiter: Stories (1982), rewrote three others, and added one so that the entire volume concentrated on Rose.

In the 1970's, Munro was gaining recognition as a major writer. In 1978, she was awarded the Canada-Australia Literary Prize, was a runner-up for the United Kingdom's Man Booker Prize, and was awarded her second Governor-General's Award for Who Do You Think You Are? Her scripts were being accepted by the CBC. Her stories were appearing in major magazines, including The New Yorker, The Atlantic Monthly, Ms., McCall's, The Canadian Forum: A Monthly Journal of Opinion and the Arts, and Redbook.

Consistent with her practice of publishing a collection of short stories every three or four years, The Moons of Jupiter appeared in 1982, The Progress of Love in 1986, which earned Munro her third Governor-General's Award, and Friend of My Youth: Stories in 1990. Her later stories, while bleaker and darker than the earlier ones, nevertheless portray characters, usually middle-aged women, who are survivors and who approach the future with hope. In 1994, she published Open Secrets: Stories, winning the W. H. Smith Award in Britain. The stories in this collection for the most part investigate sexual tensions. The collection The Love of a Good Woman: Stories (1998), winner of the W. H. Smith Award and the Gillen Award, focuses on the hidden secrets of the residents of a small town in Ontario. Hateship, Friendship, Courtship, Loveship, Marriage (2001) explores some of the darker realities of life, death, aging, and infidelity. In 2001, she received the Rea Award for lifetime achievement in the short story. Her collection Runaway: Stories (2004) won her a second Gillen Award. In 2006, Carried Away: A Selection of Short Stories, her second collection of selected stories (the first was in 1996), and The View from Castle Rock were published; the latter is based on Munro's family history reaching back to eighteenth century Scotland and continuing to their descendants' experiences in Canada.

ANALYSIS

Munro is one of Canada's major writers and one of the best short-story writers anywhere. While she tried writing a novel with Lives of Girls and Women, her preferred form is the short story. She argues that a novel implies a continuity that is not mirrored in the lives of real people, who seem to move disjointedly from one experience to another. With the short story she can focus on the "intense . . . moments of experience" that constitute a life. With the exception of one novel, all of her published works have been collections of short stories.

The majority of Munro's stories are set in Canada, often in southwest Ontario, now sometimes called "Munro Country," the region of her childhood. Her hometown of Wingham, Ontario, becomes Hanratty in Who Do You Think You Are?, Dalgleish in The Moons of Jupiter, or Jubilee in Lives of Girls and Women. The rural countryside, the poverty-stricken small towns, the farms, and the salt mines are well documented, as is the Canadian climate, which can be bleak, dark, and foreboding with its bitter cold, its snowstorms, and its ice. Even though some stories might be set in Victoria or Toronto, generally the protagonist has moved to the city and still retains some provincialism. Similarly with the stories set in Australia or Scotland, the protagonist is Canadian and comes into these new environments with Canadian eyes. In all of Munro's stories, the reader gets a clear sense of place, whether the story is set in the Canada of today, of a hundred years ago, or of somewhere in between. In many cases the past and the present are juxtaposed so that there is a sense in which the past, though distant, is always present.

Just as Munro writes of the places that she knows, she also writes of familiar people. Her works, like those of many other writers, are autobiographically based, so much so that her hometown paper, the Wingham Advance-Times, once complained: "Sadly enough Wingham people have never had a chance to enjoy the excellence of her writing ability because we have repeatedly been made the butt of soured and cruel introspection on the part of a gifted writer." Munro would deny the accusation. On the copyright page of her most autobiographical book, Lives of Girls and Women, she included, "This novel is autobiographical in form but not in fact. My family, neighbors and friends did not serve as models." Yet there is no mistaking the similarities of characters and events in her stories with those in her life. Her mother died from a slow, debilitating disease, as does the narrator's mother in "Ottawa Valley," the last story in Something I've Been Meaning to Tell You. Her father's turkey farm serves as the setting for "Turkey Season" in The Moons of Jupiter. She and her first husband had many of the same differences in background as the protagonist and her husband in the stories in Who Do You Think You Are? Much of her life finds its way into her fiction, but that does not mean the fiction should be read as a documentary. Instead, Munro takes these experiences and rearranges them, filtering them through her imagination and forging them into stories of sensitivity.

The majority of Munro's stories feature either girls or adult women as the central figures. The young girls, such as Rose in Who Do You Think You Are?, are slated to escape their impoverished beginnings primarily because they are sensitive and observant. Other stories chronicle the lives of ordinary, lower-middle-class women who have married young, have realized that life should be more than accommodating a husband and caring for children, and have left the safety of their homes to explore life's possibilities. They go back to school, find a career, and form new relationships. The stories focus on moments in their lives in which the past has been discarded, the present is being confronted, and the future is uncertain. These women, though faced with strong evidence of the fragility of male-female relationships, seek lovers. As the narrator in "Hard Luck Stories" in The Moons of Jupiter explains, "There's the intelligent sort of love that makes an intelligent choice. That's the kind you're supposed to get married on. Then there's the kind that's anything but intelligent, that's like a possession. And that's the one, that's the one, everybody really values. That's the one nobody wants to have missed out on." Munro's women willingly take risks in order to find that second type of love. The relationships might not last, but the women survive, wounded, perhaps, but intact.

Munro explores the intricacy of personal relationships, examining the ties that bind people together. She does not interpret the lives of her characters as much as involve the reader in the complexity of their lives, creating an unsentimental drama out of the personal experiences of her ordinary characters. As she suggests, "A story is a spell, rather than a narrative." She examines the mother-daughter relationship from the perspective of the daughter in the stories of Who Do You Think You Are?, which range from the daughter being punished as a child in "Royal Beatings" to her committing her old, and increasingly senile, stepmother to the county home in "Spelling." In "Moons of Jupiter" in the collection of the same name, the narrator is both parent and daughter. She is parent to her adult daughters, who have dismissed her from their lives, and is daughter to her hospitalized father, who has a serious, and soon fatal, heart condition. There are stories about the relationships of friends, such as that of Georgia and Maya in "Differently" from the collection Friend of My Youth, who share confidences about their marriages and their dreams; the sharing of a lover shatters their friendship. There are also stories about husbands and wives and lovers. Margot in "Wigtime," also in Friend of My Youth, deals with her husband's affair with a teenage girl by extracting from him a promise of a new house in exchange for her silence. The stories are about the hopes, dreams, disappointments, and betrayals that constitute personal relationships. Munro explores what the narrator in “The Stone in the Field” in The Moons of Jupiter calls “the pain of human contact.”

For Munro the truth can be suggested but never known completely. She relates her stories as though she and her reader are slowly discovering, or at least nearing, the truth. Her stories offer conflicting or multiple interpretations of the same situation. Sometimes the different versions result from the passage of time. Her stories, shifting effortlessly between the past and the present, suggest not only that the past influences the present but also that the present colors the interpretation of the past. Sometimes the same event might be viewed differently by several characters. For example, in the title story of Friend of My Youth, the narrator’s mother believes that the life of Flora, who had twice been denied the love of the same man, was one of noble self-sacrifice, but as the narrator says, “I had my own ideas about Flora’s story. . . . My Flora would be as black as hers was white. . . . What made Flora evil in my story was just what made her admirable in my mother’s—her turning away from sex.” In a Munro story, certainty is approachable but never reached.

Munro is praised for her craft in fashioning her stories. Realistic details and a few carefully chosen words create precise images and often suggest an entire life. She has been compared to Anton Chekhov for her understanding of the human psyche. Her characters are recognizable as the people one meets at work, at a party, or in a store. Her structuring of the narrative suggests the texture of real life with all of its doubts and uncertainties. She is a highly skilled writer whose stories are thought-provoking as well as entertaining. With the 1984 film adaptation of her story “Boys and Girls” and the 2007 adaptation of “The Bear Came over the Mountain” as the film Away from Her, Munro is reaching a larger audience.

“HALF A GRAPEFRUIT”

First published: 1978 (collected in The Beggar Maid: Stories of Rose and Flo, 1979)

Type of work: Short story

This work portrays a young girl who experiences self-discovery and comes to terms with her stepmother and her dying father.

“Half a Grapefruit” was first published in Redbook, then in the collection Who Do You Think You Are? in Canada, and the following year in the United States, with the volume being retitled The Beggar Maid: Stories of Flo and Rose. It was thought that readers in the United States would not be familiar with the implication of the title’s question: a criticism of aiming above one’s origins. That is precisely one of the issues that “Half a Grapefruit” explores.

Even though the stories in Who Do You Think You Are? are each complete and self-contained, they can be read as a bildungsroman, chronicling the development of Rose as she grows up in poverty; spends a few years at a university; experiences marriage, rearing a family, and divorce; and finally reaches a measure of success as an actress and university professor. The stories are arranged chronologically, but each story is a blend of the past and the present. Thus, even though “Half a Grapefruit” focuses on Rose’s high school days, it concludes with a reference to Rose coming back to her hometown to make arrangements at a nursing home for her stepmother.

Rose, on her way to her high school, crosses the bridge that marks the boundary between her impoverished side of town, West Hanratty, and the more prosperous Hanratty. The only one from her West Hanratty grade-school class to attend high school, she keenly feels the difference between herself and the students from Hanratty. When the students are asked about their breakfasts, Rose lies, responding with “half a grapefruit” rather than “tea and porridge”—which would have marked her as a country girl. Her presumption is recognized, however, and for weeks, and even years, she hears, or imagines, people calling softly after her, “half a grapefruit.” It is the schoolmate’s equivalent of “Who do you think you are?”

Just who is Rose? She is not like her crass stepmother, Flo, who encourages the tales Rose brings home from school about lost Kotex or about one girl's sexual encounters under a dark porch. Rose does not tell Flo about her own uncertainties or her dreams. Flo responds with tales about herself working in a glove factory at the age of fourteen. Nor is Rose entirely like her father. They share a love of books, but she lacks his discipline and ability to work with his hands. Worse, she is a "disgrace" to him because her bookish tendency does not correspond to her gender; in his eyes a woman "should be naïve intellectually, childlike, contemptuous of maps and long words and anything in books, full of charming jumbled notions, superstitions, traditional beliefs. Women's minds are different," he tells Rose.

Rose will eventually leave this harsh life but will have to endure the taunts and insults of her classmates, her stepmother, her father, and the townspeople to do so. Insulating herself, she becomes an observer and a limited participant. She watches the decline of her father's health with the detachment of a stranger; she is able to verbalize the word "cancer" when no other family member can. Yet she can never entirely leave her childhood behind. Before her father's final trip to the hospital, "[S]he understood that he would never be with her more than at the present moment. The surprise to come was that he wouldn't be with her less." The past is always part of the present.

"BARDON BUS"

First published: 1982 (collected in The Moons of Jupiter: Stories, 1982)

Type of work: Short story

The narrator, a middle-aged woman, is struggling to loosen herself from the grip of a broken love affair.

"Bardon Bus" appears in The Moons of Jupiter (1982), a collection of eleven stories, all of which focus on "intense . . . moments" in the lives of the female protagonists, most of them middle-aged. The opening of the story sets the tone for what follows. Had the narrator been an old maid in another generation, she would have perhaps saved a letter and dreamed about an affair while continuing to milk the cows and scour the tin pails. She would have fantasized about surrendering herself completely to a lover who perhaps was a soldier, or "a farmer down the road with a rough-tongued wife and a crowd of children," or a preacher. Yet though she is of a later generation, and though her actions reflect that, her obsessions are the same.

The narrator, writing a book on the history of a wealthy family, is staying in Toronto at a friend's apartment. As part of her research on the family, she recently spent a few weeks in Australia, where she met an anthropologist whom she had known slightly in Vancouver when she was a married college student. She, now divorced, and he, traveling without his third wife, embark on an affair that, because of the imposed brevity, seems perfect. On returning to Canada, however, she becomes obsessed with him, with the same intensity as the old maid of an earlier generation.

The narrator, like other middle-aged women populating Munro's stories, is moderately successful in her career but is still rather fumbling in managing her relationships. The men in the story are no more adept at love, but their options are more varied. As Dennis, the anthropologist's friend, points out, men can choose young women and start a new life with a new family. Older women, faced with wrinkles and menopause, cannot deny their mortality as easily as a man with a young wife can. The narrator, reacting to the inevitability of the aging process, chooses new clothes and gets a haircut but realizes that "you have to watch out for the point at which the splendor collapses into absurdity. . . . Even the buttercup woman I saw a few days ago on the streetcar, the little, stout, sixtyish woman in a frilly yellow dress well above the knees, a straw hat with yellow ribbons, yellow pumps dyed-to-match on her little fat feet—even she doesn't aim for comedy." The narrator is a survivor and wills herself free of her obsession and depression: "At the same time I'm thinking that I have to let go. . . . There is a limit to the amount of misery and disarray you will put up with, for love, just as there is a limit to the amount of mess you can stand around a house. You can't know the limit beforehand, but you will know it when you've reached it." The narrator is ready, and able, to move on.

“THE BEAR CAME OVER THE MOUNTAIN”

First published: 1999 (collected in Hateship, Friendship, Courtship, Loveship, Marriage, 2001)

Type of work: Short story

After almost fifty years of marriage, Fiona enters an assisted-living facility, where she forms a close relationship with a resident to the extent of ignoring her husband on his visits.

In “The Bear Came over the Mountain,” Munro explores how individuals react to their own aging or to the aging of their companions. The story opens with a scene of a young, vivacious Fiona proposing marriage to Grant. This incident is followed by another with Fiona, now seventy, preparing to enter Meadowlake, a new assisted-living facility. Grant and Fiona have been married for almost fifty years when she begins displaying signs of dementia. At first it is amusing; she leaves notes about her daily schedule, but then the notes start identifying the contents of the kitchen drawers. Soon she cannot find her way home. Fortunately they can afford Meadowlake.

Munro juxtaposes scenes from the past with the present, so the reader sees a saucy Fiona contrasted with a Fiona who seems not to recognize her husband. In a Munro story, ambiguity rules. Perhaps Fiona, in her actions, is now extracting vengeance for Grant’s earlier erasure of her in his numerous affairs.

The story also explores how people negotiate long-term commitments and how they rationalize their failure to uphold these commitments. Using flashbacks, Munro presents Grant’s earlier years as a professor who may have received his position because of Fiona’s father’s largesse to the university. Grant seduces his students; some are married women but some are identified as girls. Rationalizing his behavior, he argues that the times promoted free sex or that the older women longed for some excitement. He rationalizes his betrayal of Fiona by countering that he, unlike some of his colleagues, stayed in the marriage.

Although there is no suggestion that Fiona is aware of his infidelity, her behavior in Meadowlake can be explained by it. There she carries on a flirtation with Aubrey, a wheelchair-bound patient who was placed there by his wife, Marion, while she took a much-needed Florida vacation. When Aubrey leaves, Fiona, inconsolable, starts to deteriorate so much that a move to a more restrictive floor is contemplated.

Grant, desperate, visits Marion to suggest that her husband visit Fiona. Marion’s reaction is unexpected. She is not jealous but instead is concerned about the inconvenience of the visits and with protecting her financial security. She fears that Aubrey might prefer to live in the expensive facility. However, Marion is lonely and soon calls Grant, inviting him to a Legion dance. Although Marion is very different from the cultured and beautiful Fiona, Grant realizes that he can barter sex and a little companionship in exchange for Aubrey’s visiting his wife. When Grant sees Fiona again, he brings Aubrey. She is much improved, reading in a chair and not weeping in bed, playing a silly word game with him, and seeming to recognize him.

The story ends ambiguously, as many of Munro’s stories do. The reader is uncertain what causes Fiona’s improvement. The reader also wonders about Grant. Does he enter into an affair with Marion because of his concern for Fiona or is that just another of his rationalizations? Munro does not moralize; she presents her characters, leaving the readers to draw their own conclusions.

SUMMARY

Alice Munro, writing about ordinary people in ordinary situations, creates a portrait of life in all of its complexities. In her richly textured stories, she explores the nuances of relationships, the depths of emotions, and the influence that one’s past has on the present. With a few details, she is able to evoke someone’s personality or an entire geographical region. She is a master at creating a short story that is as fully developed as a novel.

Barbara Wiedemann

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

SHORT FICTION:

- Dance of the Happy Shades*, 1968
Something I've Been Meaning to Tell You: Thirteen Stories, 1974
Who Do You Think You Are?, 1978 (pb. in U.S. as The Beggar Maid: Stories of Flo and Rose, 1979)
The Moons of Jupiter: Stories, 1982
The Progress of Love, 1986
Friend of My Youth: Stories, 1990
Open Secrets: Stories, 1994
Selected Stories, 1996
The Love of a Good Woman: Stories, 1998
Hateship, Friendship, Courtship, Loveship, Marriage, 2001
No Love Lost, 2003
Runaway: Stories, 2004
Vintage Munro, 2004
Carried Away: A Selection of Short Stories, 2006
The View from Castle Rock, 2006

LONG FICTION:

- Lives of Girls and Women*, 1971

About the Author

- Blodgett, E. D. Alice Munro. Boston: Twayne, 1988.
 Carscallen, James. The Other Country: Patterns in the Writing of Alice Munro. Toronto: ECW Press, 1993.
 Heble, Ajay. The Tumble of Reason: Alice Munro's Discourse of Absence. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1994.
 "Munro, Alice." In Canadian Writers Since 1960, First Series, edited by W. H. New. Volume 53 in Dictionary of Literary Biography. Detroit: Gale, 1986.
 Rasporich, Beverly Jean. Dance of the Sexes: Art and Gender in the Fiction of Alice Munro. Edmonton: University of Alberta Press, 1990.
 Thacker, Robert. The Rest of the Story: Critical Essays on Alice Munro. Toronto: ECW Press, 1999.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Many of Alice Munro's characters grow up in a small town. How does the provincial culture influence their adult lives?
- How do Munro's characters face the problems associated with their aging and accept the inevitability of their mortality?
- In Munro's stories, relationships between men and women, especially between husbands and wives, are examined. What seems to be the primary difficulties encountered in these relationships?
- In Munro's stories, do women have a harder time achieving autonomy than do men? Explain why this would be so.
- Munro does not pass judgment on her characters. She suggests that the truth can never be known with any certainty. As seen in some of her stories, what are some of the obstacles to discovering the truth?

HARUKI MURAKAMI

Born: Kyōto, Japan
January 12, 1949

Arguably the most popular Japanese writer of his time, Murakami has been acclaimed for his postmodern approach to fiction.

BIOGRAPHY

Haruki Murakami (mur-ah-kah-mee) was born on January 12, 1949, in Kyōto, Japan. The family moved two years later to Ashiya, a suburb of the port city Kōbe, where his parents taught Japanese literature. An only child, Murakami was rebellious, an attitude that led to his estrangement from his parents when he was twenty. Considering Japanese literature boring, young Murakami became obsessed with American popular culture. He studied English in school and eagerly bought American paperbacks that Kōbe's used book stores acquired from servicemen. He was especially fond of the hard-boiled mysteries of Raymond Chandler and Ed McBain, drawn to the lonely but independent lives of their antiheroes.

Murakami studied film and drama at Tokyo's Waseda University beginning in 1968. Because of disruptions created by the student protests of the era and financial difficulties, Murakami did not graduate until 1975, writing his thesis on the journey motif in American films.

Murakami had hoped to become a writer but felt he did not have the necessary life experiences. Instead, he and his wife, Yoko Takahashi, a fellow student he married in 1971, opened the Peter Cat, a café during the day and a jazz club at night, located on the outskirts of Tokyo. Murakami made sandwiches and served drinks while live or recorded music played. He became a devotee of American jazz after he was given a ticket to a concert by Art Blakey and the Jazz Messengers as a fifteenth birthday present.

While attending a 1978 baseball game between the Yakult Swallows and the Hiroshima Carp, Murakami had an epiphany when American player Dave Hilton doubled, and Murakami decided to try writing again. Kaze no uta o kike (1979; Hear the Wind Sing, 1987), a coming-of-age novel named for a Truman Capote story, won the Gunzo Prize and sold 150,000 copies. Murakami brought back his protagonists for 1973: Nen no pinbōru (1980; Pinball, 1973, 1985). While the success of these books allowed him to sell his jazz club and become a full-time writer, Murakami has disavowed them as immature and considers Hitsuji o meguru bōken (1982; A Wild Sheep Chase, 1989), in which some of the same characters appear, his first true novel.

He and Yoko lived on a Greek island, the setting of Supātōniku no koibito (1999; Sputnik Sweetheart, 2001), from 1986 until 1989, followed by sojourns in Athens and Rome. Murakami has said that he did not develop an interest in Japanese literature and history until he came to the United States, first as a visiting fellow in East Asian studies at Princeton University from 1991 to 1993, and then as writer-in-residence at Tufts University from 1993 to 1995.

In addition to his prolific production of fiction, Murakami has also translated the works of many American writers, including Capote, Raymond Carver, F. Scott Fitzgerald, John Irving, Tim O'Brien, Paul Theroux, and Kurt Vonnegut, each of whose fiction has some similarity to his own.

ANALYSIS

Murakami slowly gravitated from pulp fiction to such authors as Franz Kafka and Fyodor Dostoevski, whom he has identified as major influences. While such writers focus on alienation and the powerlessness of humans caught up in an indifferent universe, Murakami's approach to these themes is less dark. He offers a more benign alienation, to which his characters respond not with rage but shrugs. While violence occurs occasionally, for the most part his characters sit around talking about whatever pops into their heads. Given his concern with loss and meaninglessness, his fiction is surprisingly sweet-natured.

Early in his career, Murakami was attacked by older Japanese writers for not writing in the accepted style. He has striven to write in a more relaxed, colloquial style, resulting in complaints about his use of slang. While his predecessors focus on society as a whole, Murakami is interested in the individual. He has pointed out that the word “identity” has no Japanese equivalent. Family is of consummate importance to earlier Japanese writers, but Murakami’s fiction is full of broken marriages and strained relations between parents and children. His protagonists are typically divorced men in their mid-thirties with missing wives, girlfriends, and cats. There are frequent subtle musings on the nature of Japanese society, including its predilections for conformity and consumerism.

Murakami has described his fiction as post-modern, and he is often deliberately self-conscious, including stories within stories and lengthy digressions, inspired by the improvisational nature of jazz. His protagonists often feel they are characters in stories being controlled by others.

Music, literature, and films are extremely important in his work. The narrator of Sekai no owari to hāodoboirudo wandārando (1985; Hard-Boiled Wonderland and the End of the World, 1991) describes having a drink in bed while reading and listening to music as being a precious experience. The novels the characters read, the music they listen to, and the films they watch are frequently reflections of their emotional and physical states. Feeling almost like a captive in his apartment, the narrator of Hard-Boiled Wonderland and the End of the World watches John Huston’s hostage drama Key Largo (1948). He compares his lover’s walking away as resembling the end of the film The Third Man (1949). In Nejimaki-dori kuronikuru (1994-1995; The Wind-Up Bird Chronicle, 1997), Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart’s Die Zauberflöte (1791; The Magic Flute) becomes a metaphor for a husband’s longing for his missing wife, and Gioacchino Rossini’s La gazza ladra (1817; The Thieving Magpie) acts as a motif, almost like music on a film soundtrack.

Murakami has said that The Wind-Up Bird Chronicle was influenced by David Lynch’s television series Twin Peaks (1990-1991), and the novel features nightmare sequences reminiscent of Lynch’s off-beat style. In Sputnik Sweetheart, the protagonist’s girlfriend disappears on a Mediterranean island, as in Michelangelo Antonioni’s film L’avventura (1960). The confused adolescent protagonist of Umibe no Kafuka (2002; Kafka on the Shore, 2005) resembles the hero of J. D. Salinger’s The Catcher in the Rye (1951), which Murakami has translated. Noruei no mori (1987; Norwegian Wood, 2000) takes its title from a Beatles’ song and Dansu dansu dansu (1988; Dance Dance Dance, 1994) from a tune by the Dells.

Murakami’s books have been best sellers in Japan, with Norwegian Wood, his most conventional novel, selling more than two million copies. With such contemporaries as Kyoji Kobayashi, Ryu Murakami (no relation), and Banana Yoshimoto, Murakami is said to have led a thematic and stylistic revolution in Japanese literature.

A WILD SHEEP CHASE

First published: Hitsuji o meguru bōken, 1982
(English translation, 1989)

Type of work: Novel

The postcard image of a sheep leads an advertising executive on a quest.

In A Wild Sheep Chase, Murakami’s first novel to attract international attention, the nameless narrator has been abandoned by his wife, who has run away with his friend. Bored with his job as an advertising copywriter, he thinks of himself as utterly mediocre. A lyric from Irving Caesar’s 1929 song “Just a Gigolo” describes his life: “The world goes on without me.”

His placid existence begins to unravel when a mysterious man threatens to shut down the advertising business because of a picture of sheep grazing that was published in an insurance company newsletter. Because the threat comes from a representative of a powerful right-wing manipulator known as the Boss, it must be taken seriously. The protagonist copied the photograph from a postcard sent by a friend in Hokkaido, the northernmost island of Japan.

En route the narrator meets an old acquaint-tance, J, a bar owner who has never had a drop of liquor, a typical bit of Murakami whimsical paradox. J encourages the narrator to accept that there are no rules that say things have to follow a certain pattern. Acceptance of the unexpected, of the randomness of events, is a major Murakami theme.

The protagonist learns he is seeking a single sheep, one with a star-shaped birthmark, the same symbol representing the Boss's organization. He learns how the Boss gained his power and the mysterious part played by this particular sheep. Arriving in Hokkaido, the narrator stays at the Dolphin Hotel. Once the Hokkaido Ovine Hall, it retains a sheep reference room, one of many libraries where Murakami's characters seek guidance. He meets the hotel owner's father, known as the Sheep Professor, into whose consciousness the star-marked sheep entered in 1935. In telling about this sheep, the professor sees sheep as a metaphor for Japanese society, which he criticizes for learning little from other Asian cultures. The sheep, which plans to transform humanity, left the professor for the Boss, who is dying because the animal's spirit has abandoned him.

One of the reasons so many Murakami characters do not have names is their tenuous grasp on reality and their identities. The narrator confesses to his girlfriend that he is not convinced of the usefulness of names. When the Boss's chauffeur names his nameless cat Kipper, the narrator is surprised to recall that he has a name, too. The identity theme is also represented by the Sheep Professor's uncertainty over how much of himself is him and how much is the sheep's shadow. The narrator's quest is as much for a better sense of himself as it is for the sheep.

From the professor, the narrator learns about the site in the photograph. Accompanied by his girlfriend, he makes his way to a mountain villa belonging to the Rat's father. There he meets the Sheep Man, a diminutive gentleman dressed in a sheep costume. The narrator realizes he is on a quest for his identity, the adventure of the search providing a respite from the meaninglessness of his life. He discovers that the Rat and the Sheep Man are the same person. Psychological doubles occur frequently in Murakami's fiction. A conversation with the spirit of the Rat, who has committed suicide, brings matters to a resolution of sorts. The narrator becomes reconciled to his existence; no matter how boring or mediocre it may seem, it still has value. The narrator's girlfriend disappears, and his search for her is only one of several quests in Dance Dance Dance, the sequel to A Wild Sheep Chase.

HARD-BOILED WONDERLAND AND THE END OF THE WORLD

First published: Sekai no owari to hāodoboirudo wandārando, 1985 (English translation, 1991)

Type of work: Novel

Separate stories of a young man pursued by thugs and another reading dreams in a walled town eventually converge.

Hard-Boiled Wonderland and the End of the World tells two separate but related stories in quite different styles. The "Hard-Boiled Wonderland" chapters resemble the style of American hard-boiled detective fiction, though in a science-fiction setting. The narrator finds himself caught up in a conflict between the Calcutechs, who work for the quasi-governmental System, and the Semiotecs, criminals who work for the Factory. Calcutechs provide and protect information, while the Semiotecs, many of whom are discredited Calcutechs, steal data and sell it on the black market. The narrator works for a Calcutech scientist and becomes friends with the scientist's assistant, his adolescent granddaughter. His job is to recode numbers by passing them from his right brain to his left brain.

The protagonist of the "End of the World" chapters finds himself in "the Town," which is surrounded by an ominous forest. These allegorical chapters have a denser, more formal prose, offering more descriptive writing than elsewhere in Murakami's fiction. With the help of the Librarian, whom he thinks he recognizes, he reads dreams from the skulls of unicorns and becomes the Dreamreader. His counterpart in “Hard-Boiled Wonderland” also has what seems to be a unicorn skull, as well as a relationship with the helpful reference librarian from his local library. This librarian describes libraries as paradises where information is free and no one fights over it. Murakami provides numerous other parallels between the narrators as both halves of his novel seem to be commenting on each other, exploring the same themes from different perspectives.

The scientist wants to prevent the world from falling apart, a prospect the narrator finds difficult to grasp. He considers the events he is caught up in so fantastic that he would not believe them in a novel. The librarian brings him El libro de los seres imaginarios (1967; The Book of Imaginary Beings, 1969) by Jorge Luis Borges. The Magical Realism of Latin American fiction is a major influence on Murakami, never more so than here. Hard-Boiled Wonderland and the End of the World is less science fiction or fantasy than reality pushed to its limits, resembling the paranoid world depicted in Franz Kafka’s fiction.

Matters for the narrator become more uneasy with a visit from two thugs he calls Junior and Big Boy. Big Boy is a quiet hulk, while the diminutive Junior is a fast talker, just like stereotyped hoodlums in American gangster films. The narrator initially sees them as jokes before taking their threats more seriously after they cut his abdomen and reveal they work for the System.

Like the hero of A Wild Sheep Chase, the Calcutec decides that his life is meaningless, that he has accomplished nothing. His dream of retreating to a mountain cabin to read, listen to music, and watch films is a mere fantasy of escape from the inevitable. His “End of the World” counterpart sees the library as a refuge, an escape from the advance of time outside.

The girl tells the Calcutec that her grandfather has been researching him for two years and that he is the only survivor among twenty-six subjects. The others died of some vague brain malfunction resulting from the scientist’s experiment. A former film editor, he has attempted to visualize and manipulate the consciousnesses of his subjects. He found the Calcutec’s consciousness to be the most satisfactory, with the coherence and logic of a novel or a film.

The narrator learns his consciousness is that displayed in the “End of the World.” The walled town is his brain. Murakami is not exploring alternative realities in a true science-fiction sense but using the narrator’s divided selves as a metaphor. In the real world, he lives an aimless, pointless existence. In the Town, he strives for meaning, even if he does not truly understand what the dreams of the skulls are all about. Reclaiming one world inside another, he longs for a more active life beyond the passive acceptance of the real-world side of himself. Murakami constantly shows options for his often lackadaisical characters without being judgmental about their choices. The narrator is not certain whether his version of eternal life is reward or punishment but wants to risk all by returning to his original world.

THE WIND-UP BIRD CHRONICLE

First published: Nejimaki-dori kuronikuru, 1994-1995, 3 volumes (English translation, 1997)

Type of work: Novel

A search for a missing cat leads a man into encounters with fascinating people.

The Wind-Up Bird Chronicle has a studied, leisurely pace, even for a Murakami novel. Toru Okada is thirty, lives in a Tokyo suburb, and is unemployed. His cat, named for his brother-in-law, Noboru Wataya, goes missing. While searching for the cat, Toru’s wife, Kumiko, also disappears. Toru is another Murakami protagonist who loves music, literature, and films. The best thing about being unemployed is that he can read whatever he wants whenever he wants. Without ambition, he is content to drift through life.

The novel’s title is supplied by May Kasahara, a teenage neighbor Toru meets while searching for the cat. He tells her about hearing every morning a bird that sounds like it is winding a spring, so she calls him Mr. Wind-Up Bird. Because they do not know what kind of bird it is and do not even see it, the name suggests the unknowable, ineffable qualities of life. Life and art overlap when Toru hears “Bird as Prophet,” one of Robert Schumann’s Waldszenen (1851; Forest Scenes). A radio announcer explains that the piece is about a mysterious bird who foretells the future.

Because Toru's life is in a bit more turmoil each time he hears the bird, he begins to associate it with chaos. A mysterious mark that appears on his face also suggests that his life is out of kilter.

The cat is named for the brother-in-law, even though both Toru and Kumiko despise him, an academic whose first book is hailed as a new perspective on economics, leading to his becoming a media celebrity with political potential. Toru and Kumiko see him as overbearing and arrogant and his popularity as an indication of how the public is susceptible to false impressions through the media.

As Toru searches for the cat and meets more people, he senses they are taking over the flow of his life, leading him into unexpected directions. He enlists the aid of Malta Kano, a psychic. Creta, her younger sister and assistant, was once raped by Noboru. Toru dreams of having sex with Creta, who resembles Kumiko. Creta calls herself a prostitute of the mind.

Creta tells Toru her life story, as does Lieutenant Mamiya, a World War II veteran who arrives with a keepsake, actually an empty box, bestowed by Toru's former landlord. Mamiya's war stories include the atrocities inflicted upon Japanese soldiers by Soviet troops in Manchuria. The graphic violence of these accounts is unusual for Murakami, who has said he feels an obligation to keep the memory of this side of World War II alive.

Toru creates an artificial solitude within his loneliness by spending hours at the bottom of an empty well near his home. When the cat returns after a year away, Toru takes his reappearance as a sign that things will finally change for the better, that life need not always be chaotic and meaningless. Toru begins the healing process by renaming the cat Mackerel. The cat was named Noboru Wataya as a joke, but life is no joke. Giving him a more personal identity might lead Toru to solidifying his own.

Nutmeg Akasaka is not the real name of the woman who, attracted by the mark on his face, hires Toru to work for her fashion design firm. Cinnamon, her son and assistant, chooses not to speak, communicating through hand signals. Nutmeg, whose father knew Mamiya, recounts a massacre of zoo animals witnessed by her veterinarian father in Manchuria during the war. Cinnamon gives Toru a computer containing sixteen stories under the title "The Wind-Up Bird Chronicle." Storytelling becomes a metaphor for the attempt to make sense of life, of imposing order on its chaos.

The Wind-Up Bird Chronicle ends, like most of Murakami's novels, with muted ambiguity. Except for the return of Mackerel, few of its story lines and themes are resolved. Murakami always leaves his characters awaiting the next unexpected disruption of their passive calm.

KAFKA ON THE SHORE

First published: Umibe no Kafuka, 2002
(English translation, 2005)

Type of work: Novel

A teenager and an elderly man conduct separate searches for their destinies.

Fifteen-year-old Kafka Tamura has a bad relationship with Koichi, his sculptor father, and his mother left with his sister when he was four. The insensitive Koichi has told the boy that one day he will have sex with both his mother and sister, a prophecy tainting his desire to find them. Kafka runs away from home, and Murakami alternates his story with that of Satoru Nakata, an elderly man from the same Tokyo neighborhood. Nakata has lost his memory and the ability to read and write following a mysterious accident when he was a schoolboy in 1944. He lives on a government subsidy and the money he makes from finding lost cats, with which he can communicate much better than with humans. Nakata is an extreme example of Murakami's patented passive protagonists. He simply accepts what life offers, enjoying its simple pleasures.

Kafka makes his way to Takamutsu on the island of Shikoku and to the Komura Memorial Library, where a wealthy man's collection resides. He meets Oshima, a library assistant, and Miss Saeki, the library director. She was once famous for composing and singing a popular song, "Kafka on the Shore," but retreated from the world following the death of her lover, the son of the Komura family. Kafka becomes Oshima's assistant in exchange for room and board and finds himself visited by the spirit of the younger Miss Saeki, whom he suspects may be his mother. He also meets Sakura, a young hairdresser, and is torn between wanting to have sex with her and wanting her to be his lost sister. Kafka and Oshima discuss the Oedipal nature of his quandary.

Nakata flees Tokyo after a psychopath calling himself Johnnie Walker, actually Kafka's father, forces the old man to kill him. Nakata makes his way to Takamutsu, site of his accident, with the help of Hoshino, a young truck driver. There, his and Kafka's destinies overlap. The characters are similar in their reliance upon daily routines to give the impression of order in a disorderly world.

Kafka on the Shore is another of Murakami's quest novels, with neither protagonist truly understanding what they are seeking. Kafka, Nakata, Oshima, Miss Saeki, and Hoshino resemble each other in being incomplete. The sexually ambiguous Oshima tells Kafka about the Greek belief that all people are searching for their missing halves. Murakami uses quests to explore such themes as individual freedom and the individual's responsibility to a larger good.

Kafka on the Shore is one of Murakami's most whimsical novels, with several talking cats—or at least cats who talk to Nakata. Hoshino meets a metaphysical construct taking the form of Colonel Sanders, the Kentucky Fried Chicken symbol, and battles a creature out of a science-fiction film. Nakata, who has the power to make fish rain from the sky, discovers he is seeking an entrance stone mentioned in Miss Saeki's song. As with Latin American Magical Realism, these fairy-tale elements seem logical within the context of the novel.

More important, Murakami uses whimsy to delineate character and reveal themes.

The usual frequent references to Western arts appear throughout Kafka on the Shore. Kafka listens to such popular music acts as Radiohead to maintain his sanity. Kafka renames himself because of his admiration for Franz Kafka's short story "In der Strafkolonie" (1919; "In the Penal Colony," 1941). The novel's fantastical qualities resemble those in Sir Richard Francis Burton's Arabian Nights (1850), a rare edition of which Kafka reads at the library. Murakami departs from his usual practice by having Kafka read and discuss Japanese literature: Kof (1908; The Miner, 1988) by Soseki Natsume. The magic powers of the arts are illustrated when Hoshino, a bit of a slacker, is transformed by hearing Ludwig van Beethoven's Archduke Trio (1810-1811) in a coffee bar.

With its allusions, libraries, librarians, and cats, Kafka on the Shore recalls other Murakami novels. Additional similarities include Kafka's retreating to a mountain cabin, as in A Wild Sheep Chase. In this solitude, Kafka begins to find himself. Understanding the difference between letting things happen and exerting some control over his destiny, Kafka makes progress toward discovering his identity.

SUMMARY

Haruki Murakami stands out not just among Japanese novelists but all fiction writers of the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries for his distinctive, highly accessible, contemplative style, with a rhythm similar to music. Surrealistic passages help give his fiction a dreamlike quality. As with the narrator in his well in The Wind-Up Bird Chronicle, Murakami's characters confront the chaos of contemporary life not by panicking but by ruminating over its vicissitudes. If they wait calmly, a solution to their dominant problem may arise. If no such resolution appears, they simply go on. Murakami puts a nonjudgmental, postmodern spin on the quiet desperation of ordinary lives.

Michael Adams

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- Kaze no uta o kike*, 1979 (Hear the Wind Sing, 1987)
1973: Nen no pinbōru, 1980 (Pinball, 1973, 1985)
Hitsuji o meguru bōken, 1982 (A Wild Sheep Chase, 1989)
Sekai no owari to hāodoboirudo wandārando, 1985
(Hard-Boiled Wonderland and the End of the World, 1991)
Noruei no mori, 1987 (Norwegian Wood, 2000)
Dansu dansu dansu, 1988 (Dance, Dance, Dance, 1993)
Kokkyō no minami, taiyō no nishi, 1992 (South of the Border, West of the Sun, 1999)
Nejimaki-dori kuronikuru, 1994-1995 (3 volumes; The Wind-Up Bird Chronicle, 1997)
Supūtoniku no koibito, 1999 (Sputnik Sweetheart, 2001)
Umibe no Kafuka, 2002 (Kafka on the Shore, 2005)
Afutādāku, 2004 (After Dark, 2007)

SHORT FICTION:

- The Elephant Vanishes*, 1993
Kami no kodomotachi wa mina odoru, 2000 (After the Quake: Stories, 2002)
Blind Willow, Sleeping Woman, 2006

NONFICTION:

- Andaguraundo*, 1997 (Underground: The Tokyo Gas Attack and the Japanese Psyche, 2000)
Hashiru koto ni tsuite kataru toki ni boku no kataru koto, 2007 (What I Talk About When I Talk About Running: A Memoir, 2008)

About the Author

- Amitrano, Giorgio. The New Japanese Novel: Popular Culture and Literary Tradition in the Work of Murakami Haruki and Yoshimoto Banana. Kyōto, Japan: Istituto Italiano di Cultura, Scuola di Studi sull'Asia Orientale, 1996.
- Cassegård, Carl. Shock and Naturalization in Contemporary Japanese Literature. Folkestone, England: Global Oriental, 2007.
- Gabriel, J. Philip. Spirit Matters: The Transcendent in Modern Japanese Literature. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 2006.
- Lai, Amy Ty. "Memory, Hybridity, and Creative Alliance in Haruki Murakami's Fiction." Mosaic: A Journal for the Interdisciplinary Study of Literature 40, no. 1 (March, 2007): 163-179.
- McInerney, Jay. "Roll Over, Basho: Who Is Japan Reading, and Why." The New York Times Book Review, September 27, 1992, p. 1.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Teenagers appear in several of Haruki Murakami's novels. What does he seem to be saying about growing up?
- Compare the protagonist of Kafka on the Shore to Holden Caulfield in J. D. Salinger's The Catcher in the Rye (1951).
- Compare the identity theme in two or more of Murakami's novels.
- Murakami's fiction is said to resemble the works of American writers. Beyond the references to American films, literature, music, and products, what is especially American about Murakami?
- Animals play central roles in several of Murakami's works. Explain how he uses animals to develop his themes in one novel or short story.
- Many Murakami protagonists live alone and have little contact with friends or relatives. What does he seem to be saying about loneliness, or is it fair to call the condition of these characters loneliness?
- Explain how one or more Murakami works have musical qualities beyond simple references to music.
- Is Hard-Boiled Wonderland and the End of the World a parody of or a tribute to detective stories and science fiction?

- Murakami, Fuminobu. Postmodern, Feminist, and Postcolonial Currents in Contemporary Japanese Culture: A Reading of Murakami Haruki, Yoshimoto Banana, Yoshimoto Takaai, and Karatani Kojin. New York: Routledge, 2006.
- Rubin, Jay. Haruki Murakami and the Music of Words. London: Harvill Press, 2002.
- Seats, Michael. Murakami Haruki: The Simulacrum in Contemporary Japanese Culture. Lanham, Md.: Lexington, 2006.
- Strecher, Matthew. Dances with Sheep: The Quest for Identity in the Fiction of Murakami Haruki. Ann Arbor: Center for Japanese Studies, University of Michigan, 2002.
- _____. Haruki Murakami's "The Wind-Up Bird Chronicle": A Reader's Guide. New York: Continuum, 2002.
- Wray, John. "Haruki Murakami: The Art of Fiction CLXXXII." Paris Review 170 (Summer, 2004): 115-151.

MURASAKI SHIKIBU

Born: Kyōto, Japan
c. 978

Died: Kyōto, Japan
c. 1030

*Murasaki is renowned as the author of The Tale of Genji, the world's first novel and generally acknowledged to be Japan's most important literary work.*

BIOGRAPHY

Murasaki Shikibu (mur-ah-sah-kee shee-kee-bo) was born in Kyōto, Japan, in or about 978. Little is known for certain about her life. The name by which she is known today was probably not her name while she lived. “Shikibu” means “Bureau of Ceremonies,” a court position that her father, Fujiwara no Tametoki, once held, and “Murasaki” is a nickname derived from one of the main female characters in her novel, Genji monogatari (c. 1004; The Tale of Genji, 1925-1933). Her family belonged to a minor branch of the powerful Fujiwara clan that dominated Japanese politics during the Heian period (794-1160). Her father was a respected Confucian scholar who wrote poetry in both Japanese and Chinese. Her mother, Fujiwara no Tamenobu, was a member of another minor branch of this large clan. She died when Murasaki was an infant, and her death may account for some of the most poignant passages in The Tale of Genji. Genji, the central character, and the Murasaki of the novel, as well as other characters, suffer this early loss. Many people on both sides of her family were known for their literary talents, and her brother, Nobunori, became a well-known poet.

Of her early life, evidence indicates that in 996 Murasaki accompanied her father to a province north of Kyōto (Japan's capital at that time and the setting for The Tale of Genji), to which he had been appointed governor. Records show that by 998 she had returned to the capital to marry Fujiwara no Nobutaka, a man considerably older than her and who had a number of other wives. At that time, Japanese aristocrats and officials practiced polygamy, and romantic liaisons outside marriage were also common and to a certain extent condoned, which a reading of The Tale of Genji makes clear. Tradition has it that Murasaki's marriage was a happy one, although it did not last long. Her husband died in an epidemic only three years after their marriage and a year after the birth of their only child, a daughter.

After her husband's death, Murasaki was called to serve as a lady-in-waiting to Akiko, a daughter of Fujiwara no Michinaga (the most powerful of the Fujiwaras) and a consort of the Emperor Ichigo. Then, as now, the Japanese emperor was the spiritual and social head of Japan but wielded little real political power. At court, the fine education that Murasaki had received from her learned father was useful. She could read Chinese and was familiar with the Chinese classics, and of course she practiced the traditional arts of Japan—painting, calligraphy, poetry, and probably music. With the exception of her knowledge of Chinese (which many courtiers considered inappropriate for women), these accomplishments were expected and appreciated in court circles.

Most accounts of Murasaki's life date the beginning of her work on The Tale of Genji from the five- or six-year-period following the death of her husband and before she entered service at court. Certainly by 1008, portions of it had been widely circulated, and her fame as a writer seemed fairly well established by the time that she was made lady-in-waiting to the emperor's consort. A short diary that Murasaki kept for about a year and a half describes both the pleasure she took from the respect that her writing received, as well as the jealousies that this respect provoked. Many of Murasaki's fictional characters suffer the jealous hatreds that trail in the wake of their accomplishments, especially if their court ranks are not high.

Murasaki continued in Akiko's entourage even after the death of Emperor Ichigo in 1011. The last definite mention of her at court is in 1013. She died in or about 1030 in Kyōto. Yet The Tale of Genji has continued to live. When changes evolved in the Japanese language, eventually making the original text difficult for all but scholars to read, it was translated into current Japanese. Its episodes have been dramatized on the stage, and Japanese poetry has drawn allusions from it from Murasaki's time to the present. It has also served as a model for many other works of Japanese fiction. Through her novel, Murasaki has joined the immortals.

ANALYSIS

The Tale of Genji seems to invite analysis, and more than a thousand books interpreting it have been written in Japan. Since it has been translated into a number of Western languages, interpretive books and essays have appeared, and continue to appear, around the world. Probably nothing in the twentieth century has contributed more to its status as a world masterpiece than its translation into English by Arthur Waley, completed in 1933. Some scholars have criticized the freedoms that Waley took with Murasaki's text, but they all acknowledge that his translation is itself a classic of English prose. In 1977, Edward Seidensticker produced a more accurate translation, and English readers are fortunate in having both versions in print. For readers intimidated by such a long novel—The Tale of Genji is nearly twice as long as Leo Tolstoy's War and Peace (1865-1869; War and Peace, 1886)—abridged versions of both translations have been published.

Analyses of The Tale of Genji usually deal with the cultural breadth of its three-generational narrative and the psychological depths of its characterizations. Western commentators have admired Murasaki's romantic idealism, especially as it is combined with keenly observed social detail. In Japan, it has been especially admired for its expression of classic aristocratic values, values that continue to be reflected as major themes in Japanese literature.

Its most prominent themes are an intensely melancholic sense of life's beauty that grows from an awareness of its impermanence (mono no aware), the pain of unrequited love and the resignation of those bereft of love through separation or death, the impact of the passage of time on character, and the harmonizing of human moods and feelings with the seasons and other manifestations of the natural world. Other notable themes deal with social disillusionment, the limits to personal realization set by social circumstances, and the ultimate triumph of fate over desires and aspiration. For Buddhist Murasaki, fate reflects the working out of karma—the belief that behavior in successive phases of a person's existence has consequences in this life. Genji frequently blames his bad fortune on his misdeeds in former lives.

Because The Tale of Genji is so long, Murasaki is able to dramatize the themes of her novel under various circumstances and over long stretches of time. The novel's three-generation time span makes backward glances to better or more promising days almost irresistible and manifestations of cultural decline, as well as personal loss, inevitable. The first third of the novel deals with the young prince Genji's triumphs and misfortunes as he contends for position in court and fulfillment in love. Although his father is the emperor, his mother is a relatively low-ranking concubine, and that makes Genji's court position shaky. This fact, and some indiscretions in his many amorous adventures, force him into self-exile when the emperor dies and his son by his principal wife ascends the throne. Genji's triumphant return to Kyōto and the great love of his life, Murasaki, when he is nearing his thirtieth year, is perhaps the high point of his life. Murasaki's languishing death in the fortieth chapter (two-thirds of the way through the novel) sends Genji into seclusion. Two chapters later, he is dead, and the final twelve chapters, which take place eight years after Genji's death, deal with his world in decline. The main setting for these last chapters has shifted from the capital, with its dazzling pageantry, to a gloomy rural district on the Uji river several miles from Kyōto.

The love themes of The Tale of Genji have probably attracted more attention through the ages than those of social and personal disillusionment, although they are closely related. The patterns of courtship and love in the Heian court were every bit as elaborate and intense as those depicted in the medieval romances of Europe. Love affairs in the Heian court, like those in King Arthur's court, involve impassioned correspondence, seduction, adultery, and other forms of betrayal.

Yet unlike European medieval courts, which idealized the fealty and sacrifices of the chivalric lover, the Heian court tolerated a good deal of what Westerners would consider promiscuous behavior. As the people in traditional East Asian cultures did not find it difficult to embrace more than a single religious view (a Heian aristocrat was at once a Buddhist, Shintoist, and Confucian), they saw nothing unnatural about being in love with more than a single person. In the West, men who seek many romantic adventures are usually considered shallow “Don Juans,” but in classical Japan, if the feelings are sincere and the emotional commitments real, such behavior is not considered superficial. Genji, who was created as an ideal courtly lover, does not “love them and leave them.” He does not fall out of love, and to the best of his ability he fulfills his emotional commitments and maintains his relationships throughout all of his life.

THE TALE OF GENJI

First published: Genji monogatari, c. 1004
(English translation, 1925-1933)

Type of work: Novel

At the height of Japan's aristocratic Heian period, Prince Genji and his successors strive for personal and social fulfillment through love affairs, friendships, rivalries, and political intrigue.

Except for a short diary, The Tale of Genji is Murasaki's only literary work, but it is generally considered Japan's most important literary achievement. While it is difficult to summarize its eleven hundred tightly printed but loosely plotted pages or to consider the nearly one hundred characters that move through this vast novel in a brief discussion, one can say that it focuses mostly on the life of its introspective hero, Prince Genji. The novel traces rather obliquely his rise, as the son of a minor consort of the emperor, to a position in society second in importance only to the emperor. It deals much more directly, however, with Genji's life as an adventurous exploration, even a quest, for the ultimate possibilities that can be realized in the cultivation of personal relationships—wisdom, excitement, love, friendship, rivalry, and the private and shared experience of beauty and joy, triumph and tragedy. Somehow, to the extent that one person can be fulfilled as a human being living by the values of the Heian court, Genji succeeds.

Genji's career consumes more than two thirds of the novel, during which he struggles to establish and maintain his position in court. Probably more significant to him, as well as more interesting for the reader, however, are his intimacies with a number of women. While still an adolescent, he falls in love with Fujitsubo, his stepmother and the emperor's consort. Their very secret affair results in the birth of a boy who, because he is presumed to be the emperor's son, eventually becomes an emperor himself. At about the same time that Genji is attracted to Fujitsubo, a marriage is arranged for him to the sister of his best friend, To no Chujo. Genji's relationship with his wife, Princess Aoi, is probably the least satisfactory in his long experience with women. Aoi dies shortly after giving birth to their son, Yugiri, when Genji is about twenty-three years old. After Aoi's death, Genji's most important relationship, and the main focus of his affection for the rest of his life, is Murasaki, the young niece of Fujitsubo. Since the Heian aristocracy was not only exclusive but also small, each character in the novel is related in one way or another to every other character.

Despite his abiding affection for Murasaki, Genji is intimate with many other women throughout his life. His most important liaisons are with Yugao (the mistress of his friend To no Chujo), Lady Rokujo (an imperious aristocrat whose jealousy results in the death of both Yugao and Aoi), and the secluded Lady of Akashi. Genji's daughter by Lady Akashi later marries an emperor, and their son, Niou, becomes a central character in the last section of the novel.

Toward the end of Genji's life (he dies during his fifty-first year), he is betrothed to Nyosan, the daughter of an emperor who wishes to see her well married before he retires. It was customary at that time for emperors to retire soon after they had reared an adolescent son. Nyosan deceives Genji by taking a lover, Kashiwagi, the son of Genji's friend To no Chujo. The child of this illicit relationship is Kaoru, another of the central characters of the last section of the novel. The Kashiwagi-Nyosan affair echoes Genji's affair with his stepmother and is viewed by him as a kind of karmic retribution for his own transgressions. Many such relational echoes occur over the three generations of characters who inhabit The Tale of Genji.

After Genji's death, eight years pass before the narrative resumes. The main setting has shifted from the capital, with its dazzling pageantry, to a gloomy rural district near the Uji river, about ten miles from Kyōto. This last section, which for most readers is also the most compelling part of the novel, is integrated with the main section by having the spirit that ennobled Prince Genji continue to live, albeit divided and denatured, in the characters of his amorous grandson, Niou, and his son (or, more accurately, his wife's son by her lover), Kaoru. The creative tension generated in these sections by the hero's amorous impulses, on the one hand, and his concern for the properties of Heian society, on the other, is transformed into an unbalanced rivalry between the impetuous Niou and the sensitive but indecisive Kaoru. Still, with Genji gone, much of the life-enhancing spirit of romance has dissipated from court life, and with it respect for social forms also degenerates. While courtship retains its elaborate pattern and society its traditional form, these social structures grow ever emptier. Niou is no ideal courtier and lover but a dashing Don Juan bent on conquest for its own sake. The combination of Niou's unerring successes in court and in bedchambers, together with Kaoru's inability to exert his sensitive nature in any way that advances his own or anyone else's life, bears dramatic witness to a civilization's decline.

The novel ends inconclusively with the woman whom Niou and Kaoru have courted for more than a hundred pages, Ukifune, contemplating the taking of holy vows and entering a Buddhist nunnery. The social and emotional stress of their courtship has so harassed her that she desires only to escape the complications of courtship and society for the simplicity of temple routines. That, too, recalls Prince Genji, who frequently contemplated “leaving the world” for Buddhist retirement. Only his responsibilities for others prevented him from following this path, the one followed by many Heian emperors and high officials. By Ukifune's time, Murasaki's tale suggests, there is even more reason to consider this retreat.

SUMMARY

For the Japanese, The Tale of Genji depicts an ideal aristocratic society whose inhabitants loved elegance and were themselves paragons of grace, culture, and artistic skill. In barely a hundred years after it was written, Murasaki Shikibu's novel had become almost an object of religious veneration—an ideal representation of better days to which, following the collapse of Heian civilization and the civil unrest that followed, the Japanese people looked back nostalgically.

Since the novel's translation into English, Western readers have experienced similar responses. It is universally admired not only for the insight that it offers on a fascinating civilization but also for its intrinsic psychological interest, the beauty and intensity of its great scenes, and the artistry and penetration of its characterizations. Most particularly, it is admired for its profound expression of perennial human themes, not least of which is its celebration of human affection and emotional tenderness, feelings that make the pain of existence not only bearable but also meaningful for people in times and places far removed from the story's exotic civilization.

Dan McLeod

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Genji monogatari, c. 1004 (The Tale of Genji, 1925-1933)

POETRY:

Murasaki shikibu-shū, eleventh century (Murasaki Shikibu: Her Diary and Poetic Memoirs, 1982; includes poetry and nonfiction)

NONFICTION:

Murasaki Shikibu nikki, eleventh century (Murasaki Shikibu: Her Diary and Poetic Memoirs, 1982; includes poetry and nonfiction)

About the Author

Bowring, Richard. Murasaki Shikibu: The Tale of Genji. 2d ed. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

Caddeau, Patrick W. Appraising Genji: Literary Criticism and Cultural Anxiety in the Age of the Last Samurai. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2006.

Field, Norma. The Splendor of Longing in "The Tale of Genji". Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1987. Reprint. Ann Arbor: Center for Japanese Studies, University of Michigan, 2001.

Morris, Ivan. The World of the Shining Prince. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1964.

Pekarik, Andrew, ed. Ukifune: Love in "The Tale of Genji". New York: Columbia University Press, 1982.

Puette, William. Guide to "The Tale of Genji". Rutland, Vt.: Charles E. Tuttle, 1983.

Shirane, Haruo. The Bridge of Dreams: A Poetics of "The Tale of Genji". Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1987.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Except for a few scattered works, literary productions now called “novels” do not seem to exist before the eighteenth century. How can one account for a Japanese novel by Murasaki Shikibu that is a thousand years old?
- Lovers of the type Murasaki presents have had a bad reputation in Western literature. Has that situation changed? Can readers today accept lovers who are intimate with many partners?
- Does the conclusion of The Tale of Genji suggest that women could not accept courtly lovers like Genji?
- What can The Tale of Genji tell the modern reader about friendship?
- Why would modern Japanese people continue to admire a work like The Tale of Genji, which in so many ways reflects an unfamiliar way of life?

Thomas Victor

IRIS MURDOCH

Born: Dublin, Ireland

July 15, 1919

Died: Oxford, England

February 8, 1999

Widely recognized as the most prolific and influential British novelist of her generation, Murdoch also emerged as an important and original theorist of fiction.

BIOGRAPHY

Jean Iris Murdoch (MUR-dok) was born in Dublin, Ireland, on July 15, 1919, the only child of Anglo-Irish parents. Her mother, Irene Alice Richardson, came from a Dublin family. She had a beautiful soprano voice and had trained to be an opera singer, but she gave up her ambitions when she married a man of County Down sheep-farming people, Wills John Hughes Murdoch. It proved to be a successful marriage. Iris Murdoch was reared in London from the age of nine but returned to Ireland on holidays during a childhood that she often described as happy. In her latter years, she expressed a somewhat different view of her childhood: "I feel as I grow older that we were wanderers, and I've only recently realized that I'm a kind of exile, a displaced person. I identify with exiles."

Murdoch attended the Froebel Institute, the progressive Badminton School in Bristol, and later entered Somerville College, Oxford. She read widely in ancient history and philosophy at Oxford and earned a degree in classics. There, along with many young intellectuals of the 1930's, she joined the Communist Party but later left it in disillusion.

Upon leaving Oxford, Murdoch followed in her father's footsteps and joined the civil service, entering the British Treasury in 1942. During this period she began to write novels; one was submitted to the British publishing house Faber but was rejected. In 1944, Murdoch left the Treasury and joined the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration in order to take a more active part in World War II. She worked in a camp for refugees in Austria, where she saw a "total breakdown of human society." Murdoch found it instructive; the experience provided her with models for the refugees and the homeless who appear frequently in her novels.

She also worked in Belgium at this time, and there she met Jean-Paul Sartre, the French philosopher, novelist, and dramatist. His theories became the subject of her first published book, Sartre: Romantic Rationalist, which appeared in 1953, almost a decade after she had met him. The book explores Sartre's investigations into existentialism and his view of the novel as an important mode of human inquiry. Sartre's existentialist concern for freedom in human action is a theme in many of Murdoch's novels.

After she left the United Nations in 1946, Murdoch spent an unsettled period reading and thinking in London and other cities in Europe. From 1947 to 1948 she studied philosophy at Newnham College, Cambridge, becoming particularly interested in the work of the Viennese-born British philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein. During this time, she collected material for her book on Sartre and continued to write fiction.

Murdoch returned to Oxford in 1948 as fellow and tutor in philosophy at St. Anne's College and kept this position until she gave up full-time teaching in 1963. Her first published novel, Under the Net, appeared in 1954 and earned warm acclaim from critics and the public. Two years later Murdoch married John Bayley, a literary critic and scholar who also wrote novels and poetry. He was appointed Thomas Wharton Professor of English Literature at Oxford. For many years the couple lived in Steeple Aston, a village near Oxfordshire. Their union became one of the most fruitful literary partnerships of the twentieth century. In 1986, they moved into a house in North Oxford.

From the mid-1950's onward, Murdoch's steady flow of fiction attracted more consistent attention than the work of any other postwar novelist. By 1965, critics were beginning to recognize the importance of her work. In that year, the critic A. S. Byatt's Degrees of Freedom: The Novels of Iris Murdoch appeared, an important study of Murdoch's early novels. By the late 1960's, Murdoch's novels grew longer and changed in tone but continued to appear almost annually.

After 1963, although she was a successful and widely read novelist, Murdoch continued to teach philosophy part-time at the Royal College of Art in London. Although she subsequently found it impossible to continue with a regular teaching post, she remained in close contact with the academic world through philosophical publications and well-attended lecture tours.

The Irish Academy elected Murdoch a member in 1970, heralding a decade in which she received much public recognition. She became an honorary member of the American Academy of Arts and Letters in 1975 and was appointed honorary fellow of her former college, Somerville, in 1977. She was named Commander, Order of the British Empire, in 1976 and Dame of the British Empire in 1987.

Murdoch's individual novels similarly won acclaim. In 1973, The Black Prince appeared and won the James Tait Black Memorial Prize; The Sacred and Profane Love Machine, published in 1974, earned the Whitbread Award. With her international readership already established, Murdoch was awarded Britain's most prestigious literary award, the Man Booker Prize, for The Sea, the Sea in 1978.

In addition to writing more than two dozen novels, several plays and dramatic adaptations of her novels, and a volume of poetry in less than forty years, Murdoch continued to publish technical papers in her academic specialty, moral philosophy. She wrote much about the Greek philosopher Plato, whose ideas often inform her fiction. She also published less technical papers linking aesthetics to moral and political concerns. One of the best known of these first appeared in Encounter in January, 1961. Originally titled "Against Dryness: A Polemical Sketch," the essay has been reprinted many times under the title "Against Dryness." In it, Murdoch illustrates her belief in the connection between art and morality, a key concept in understanding her work. Murdoch's work was an important presence on the British intellectual scene to a degree unusual among writers.

Murdoch was diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease in 1994, and she died in 1999 at the age of seventy-nine. After her death, her husband, John Bayley, published Elegy to Iris (1999), in which he recounted the couple's forty-year relationship and his brilliant wife's descent into dementia. The book was adapted as a film, Iris (2001), which starred Kate Winslet as a young Murdoch and Judi Dench as the author in her old age.

ANALYSIS

In her essay "Against Dryness," Murdoch writes:

The connection between art and the moral life has languished because we are losing our sense of form and structure in the moral world itself. . . . [W]hat we require is a renewed sense of the difficulty and complexity of the moral life and the opacity of persons.

In novel after novel, Murdoch addresses the problems of living a moral life, as her characters strive painfully to seek the Good. In a series of Gifford lectures delivered in 1982, Murdoch speaks about Plato's allegory of the cave and the sun. The soul, traveling through four stages of enlightenment, continues to discover that what it considered realities are only shadows of something else. Thus moral change may be considered a progressive discarding of the false "good," of images and shadows that are eventually recognized as false.

Central to this concept of moral change is the idea of Eros, or love. Sexual love and transformed sexual energy are a major motif in Murdoch's novels, particularly in A Severed Head (1961), The Italian Girl (1964), The Black Prince, and The Sea, the Sea. In novel after novel, love both blinds the characters and allows them a clearer vision of reality in a typical Murdoch dichotomy. Maturity is often achieved by falling "out of love." No other writer does a better job of evoking the changed consciousness that love brings.

Yet for all of their philosophical underpinnings, her novels provide a brilliant and satisfying entertainment. Murdoch said that she sought to write in the realistic tradition of nineteenth century English and European fiction. Prominent features of her plots include such time-honored novelistic devices as unexpected meetings, lost or found letters, forgotten keys, coincidence, and accidents. All of them testify to the role of chance in human affairs.

Although critics have carped that her novels are “over plotted” and uneven, she has a gift for intricate double plots. This dual patterning is one of the characteristics of her fiction; the characters are frequently paired with one another symmetrically, such as the pairing of Martin and Antonia with Anderson and his half sister, Honor Klein, in A Severed Head. The action itself is often repeated with slight variations, as in The Bell (1958) and A Word Child (1975).

As to the characters themselves, Murdoch tends to create upper-middle-class worlds peopled with certain types who reappear from novel to novel. Young, cunning women who are fierce in their pursuit of older men are often present. The older men are usually self-centered charmers who are weak, self-indulgent, and skeptical. They are often found out as adulterers and practice petty deceptions as long as they can. Her male characters are not of the conventionally firm, masculine kind, but they usually change during the novel.

Some of the most interesting of Murdoch’s creations are power figures, whom Murdoch once called “alien gods.” These are frequently men (although Honor Klein, in A Severed Head, falls into this category), and they are mostly Middle European refugees—rootless, suffering types. Sometimes Jewish, these figures are often demonic in their effects on others; when they do not function this way, they are simply mute, passive sufferers. Murdoch always keeps such characters at a distance, and the reader is never afforded an inner view of their nature.

The women in her novels cannot be classified as easily, although the vague, artsy “mistress” type does appear often. Murdoch’s women are difficult to discuss because of their great variety. Although critics have remarked that her characters sometimes become subordinated to the plot of the story, at her best she lavishes a kind of love on the persons she depicts.

Murdoch had an intense, visual imagination and could describe people, places, houses, clothes, and even dogs with a luminous accuracy. London is a real presence in her novels; this tendency is most apparent in her first novel, Under the Net, in Bruno’s Dream (1969), and in A Fairly Honourable Defeat (1970). Because of her precise depiction of the city, including almost daily reports of the weather, she is considered the most important heir to the tradition of Charles Dickens.

One of Murdoch’s most distinctive traits as a novelist might be called “transcendent realism.” Her novels open with all the accepted realistic conventions of character, setting, and plot. Then within a set scene something outrageous, quirky, or fantastic will happen that seems far removed from the premise of the novel. Much of the humor of her novels flows from her characters’ very British reserve in the face of the wildly fantastic. This intrusion of the unexpected is, for Murdoch, a testament to the richness of reality.

Murdoch’s intense descriptive powers are not limited to the visual. She also excels at evoking the inner world of fantasies, projections, demonic illusions, and altered consciousness. She resembles no other contemporary novelist, partly because she is a religious fabulist whose fables are submerged in the conventional techniques of the novel.

UNDER THE NET

First published: 1954

Type of work: Novel

The protagonist, Jake Donaghue, is asked to leave his residence and sets out on a lonely and confused journey, seeking love as well as free digs among his old friends in London’s City district and Paris’s Left Bank.

Murdoch’s first novel and the only one that is clearly derivative, Under the Net was strongly influenced by French writer Raymond Queneau, to whom the book is dedicated, and author Samuel Beckett. The book is a combination of a picaresque novel and a philosophical enquiry. Although the work is not as tightly plotted and lacks the integration of her later novels, Under the Net exhibits many of the qualities that would become hallmarks of her style: a fast-moving story; precise, detailed descriptions of settings; strong use of contingency as a plot device; and philosophical deliberations about truth, love, and freedom.

Jake is a failed writer who earns money translating the works of a French writer. He is in love with Anna Quentin, a singer, and enormously influenced by Hugo Belfounder, a successful entrepreneur whom he meets at a clinic. There, they have serious dialogues about art and truth. When Jake is banished from his rooms, he tries to get in touch with Anna again. Through intricate and sometimes hilarious plot twists, he finds that Anna is in love with Hugo, and that Anna's actress sister, Sadie, is in love with Jake. To complicate the plot further, Hugo is in love with Sadie.

This cast of main characters is rounded out by several minor characters who exhibit Murdoch's remarkable inventiveness: Finn, Jake's man Friday who eventually returns to Ireland; Lefty, a socialist organizer to whom Hugo donates a great deal of his wealth; Sammy Starfield, a self-made millionaire who used to be a bookie; and Mrs. Tinkham, the keeper of a dusty, dirty, corner newspaper shop where she sells ice cream, reads the merchandise, and offers a haven to drifters like Jake.

Jake starts out at the beginning of the book seeing everyone in relationship to himself. At the end, however, when he accepts that Anna will never be his, Anna exists for him as a separate being for the first time. He realizes that this, too, is a guise of love.

A SEVERED HEAD

First published: 1961

Type of work: Novel

A vain wine merchant's wife leaves him for his best friend, after which he learns some hard truths about his own capacity for self-delusion.

A Severed Head, Murdoch's fifth published novel, is considered the best of the comedies of manners that Murdoch was writing early in her career. The cast of characters is largely restricted to the wealthy bourgeoisie; the decadent atmosphere is evoked by careful descriptions of richly decorated rooms, heavy drinking, and romantic misconceptions. The characters suffer frequently from languor and fatigue. Yet the structure of A Severed Head is Murdoch's own: A bumbling male protagonist lives through a series of events that destroy his complacency and teach him to recognize the separate reality of other people.

The protagonist, Martin Lynch-Gibbon, tells his own story. He is happily married to Antonia, a society beauty five years his senior. Martin's easy complacency is shattered when Antonia declares she is going to leave him for her psychiatrist, Palmer Anderson, who is Martin's close friend. Although Martin is repelled by Antonia's suggestion that he remain rational about the affair, he allows Antonia to live with Palmer and remains friendly with them both.

Unknown to both Antonia and Palmer, Martin has long kept a mistress, a young teacher named Georgia Hands. Although Martin professes to love Georgia, he has denied her the trip to New York on which her heart was set and encouraged her to have an abortion. After Antonia's revelation, Martin finds that he is extremely ambivalent toward his own mistress.

Events suddenly become more complicated when Antonia asks Martin to pick up Palmer's half sister at Liverpool Station. In a scene both comic and portentous, Martin meets the dour Honor Klein on a rainy night that smells like "sulphur and brimstone." As they drive toward Palmer's house in dense fog, Martin almost collides with a truck. When Honor hangs her head out the window to see, Martin first apprehends her as a headless body.

Honor Klein falls into a category of the power figures that act as agents of change in many of Murdoch's novels. Loved and feared like the gods they mimic, they engender complications that, when finally resolved, leave other characters in closer touch with reality. Yet Honor is no caricature; she is entirely individualized. She is Jewish and has dark, almost oriental eyes and a cap of shiny black hair. She has devoted her life to the study of anthropology. Other characters recognize that she has mystical knowledge, perhaps gained from breaking the taboo of incest. She is the "severed head" of the title, an object of awe and veneration.

Although Murdoch carefully forecasts Honor's strange relationship with her half brother, Palmer, Martin is too preoccupied with his own entanglements to notice. Indeed, he notices so little about Honor that when he discovers he has fallen desperately in love with her, he imagines that she is free of other ties and may even be a virgin. When he arrives without warning at her house in Cambridge to declare his love, he finds her in bed with Palmer. At this crucial point in the book, Martin realizes that his perception of Honor has been based on his own fantasies and has nothing to do with the real person.

The balance of power now shifts to Martin, since he knows Palmer's guilty secret. Antonia, sensing a change in Palmer, returns to Martin, who is still hopelessly in love with Honor. A short time later he is confronted with another confession: Antonia has had a long-standing love affair with Martin's brother Alexander. This final revelation shakes Martin to the core. He now realizes that his whole adult life has been based on self-delusion and an inability to see the truth about anyone else. Although he suffers great emotional pain, he also feels more sure about himself. Martin has grown up.

The end of A Severed Head is a fine example of Murdoch's device of pairing. In the last scene, Honor leaves Palmer and returns to Martin to accept his love or at least to take a chance on it. Georgia Hands, once Martin's mistress, goes to the United States with Palmer Anderson; Antonia is traveling in Europe with Martin's brother.

The theme of the novel is love, power, and the relationship between them. The plot resembles Restoration comedy not only for its series of appalling revelations but also in the way it reveals love as war and power play.

A Severed Head was adapted as a play produced in London in 1963, the script a collaboration between Murdoch and the popular British novelist and playwright J. B. Priestley. The play proved so popular that it was later made into a film in 1971.

THE NICE AND THE GOOD

First published: 1968

Type of work: Novel

An investigation into a suicide at London's Whitehall affects the life of a group of friends on the Dorset coast.

In an interview, Murdoch referred to The Nice and the Good as the most open novel she had yet written. This "openness" appears to refer to a looser plot structure and to more separate and free characters. The plot is really two equal subplots; one line follows John Ducane's investigation of an apparent suicide in the government offices at Whitehall in London, while the other follows a group of friends on a Dorset estate named Trescombe as they struggle toward an ideal of love.

Connecting the London plot and the Dorset plot are Octavian Gray, John Ducane's superior at Whitehall, who owns Trescombe and spends much of his time there with his wife Kate, and Ducane himself, who lives in London but is a frequent guest at Trescombe. Ducane is in love with Kate Gray, who encourages him yet confesses every secret kiss to Octavian.

In addition to Kate and Octavian, some of the characters at Trescombe are Mary Clothier, a widow; Mary's fifteen-year-old son, Pierce; Paula Biranne, a divorcé and schoolteacher; Paula's nine-year-old twins, who have "great souls"; Barbara, spoiled teenage daughter of Kate and Octavian; and Willie Kost, a refugee who has survived the Dachau concentration camp.

In his London life, Ducane is involved with Jessica Bird, his occasional mistress, and manipulated by Gavin Fivey, his manservant. In the course of his investigation, Ducane also becomes entangled with Richard Biranne, Paula's former husband; Peter McGrath, office messenger and blackmailer; and McGrath's wife Judy, a beautiful woman of dubious character.

Ducane, a legal adviser, is one of Murdoch's flawed, culpable male protagonists, smart and successful but smug, who needs to think of himself as a good man. In addition to his investigation of the suicide and his quest for "the good," Ducane acts as confessor and adviser to the large group of "free" characters who live at Trescombe as friends of the Grays.

Much of the book is seen through Ducane's eyes. He is elevated to godlike status by many of those with whom he comes in contact, largely because of his ability to elicit confidence. Yet his predicament is complicated by a lack of personal decisiveness. He is appalled by his own muddled involvement with Jessica Bird and Kate Gray and is strongly attracted to Judy McGrath. Eventually, the surrounding characters come to perceive him as an ordinary mortal after all.

There are many motifs in the book, among them roundness. On the beach Ducane muses that "Everything in Dorset is round. . . . The little hills are round, these bricks are round . . . the crowns of the acacia, the pebbles on the beach. . . . Everything in Dorset is just the right size. This thought gave him immense satisfaction and sent out through the other layers and compartments of his mind a stream of warm and soothing particles." Octavian is described as round, and the cat, which is a striped cube, has the singular talent of being able to make its hair stand on end and become a fluffy sphere. Roundness indicates contentment, fulfillment, and proper proportion.

The theme of the novel is the search for a perfect proportion of the nice and the good in order to attain a rounded life, "nice" representing the claims of the body and "good" representing the spirit. Each of the adult characters except Kate and Octavian have guilty pasts because of the harm they have done to others. In every case, the harm was done by a failure of love. Mary Clothier regrets the death of her husband, who rushed out of the house after a marital spat and was hit by a car. Paula Biranne wrestles with a broken marriage and a love affair that led to her husband's mutilating her lover. Willy let two people die in Dachau through inattention.

Kate and Octavian live entirely in the flesh and are the hedonists of the group. Not only are they happy, but they make the people around them happy, too. This depiction does not diminish the distance between pleasure and virtue; it only suggests that life is not as simple as an allegory.

The ending of The Nice and the Good involves a carnival of reconciliation that resembles Shakespearean romantic comedy. When Ducane unravels the tangled causes of suicide and discovers that Richard Biranne was involved, he decides to dispense "private justice" and uses his knowledge to reconcile Biranne with his former wife, Paula. Ducane and Mary fall in love, teenaged Barbara returns Pierce's affection, Jessica pursues Willy, and even the dog and cat finally share a basket. As John learns when he and Mary discover they are in love, "it is the nature of love to discern good, and the best love is, in some part at any rate, a love of what is good."

THE BLACK PRINCE

First published: 1973

Type of work: Novel

A fifty-eight-year-old author develops a ruinous obsession for the twenty-year-old daughter of his best friend and protégé.

In The Black Prince, Murdoch returns to her preoccupation with love, exposing the sometimes horrifying face of the love god, Eros. Although Bradley Pearson, a novelist and the narrator, describes this work as "a simple love story," it is really his competitive friendship with successful writer Arnold Baffin that creates the tension at the core of the work.

What distinguishes Bradley from others in the novel is his sense of guilt and his prudishness. He insists that morality is a simple affair and is shown trying to live by these simplicities. Bradley is wrapped in self-righteousness, although it does not prevent him from acting badly. His friend Arnold, on the other hand, accepts life as it is and does not try to be perfect. He enjoys the self-satisfaction that Murdoch often uses as a second-best virtue.

The tension between the two men arises from their respective erotic entanglements and their different attitudes toward art. Aesthetically, Bradley believes in concentration and patience to achieve high art; he has published only three books. He believes that art is connected to the quest for a good life. Arnold writes prolifically, sells very well, and considers his work fun. Their erotic life echoes their professional rivalry. Bradley has a very brief liaison with Rachel, Arnold's wife, then later becomes involved with Arnold's daughter Julian. At the same time, Arnold is engaged in an affair with Christian, Bradley's former wife. Yet both men are doomed. At the end of the novel, Arnold is murdered by his wife, and Bradley, who is wrongly convicted of the crime, dies of cancer in prison.

The erotic and aesthetic themes mesh in Bradley's belief that a great love will induce him to produce a great book. His obsessive love for young Julian results in his writing The Black Prince, which he claims is the fruit of his passion. Readers must judge for themselves whether Eros has fertilized Bradley's muse. This realistic love story, however, is not all the reader has to consider. There are two forewords and six afterwords added to the narration; four of the afterwords are by characters involved in the story who feel the need to vindicate themselves and correct Bradley's narration. The enclosure of Bradley's tale by forewords and afterwords forces the reader into a world of multiple, sometimes conflicting, points of view. The resulting irony is the primary literary device in the framed structure of The Black Prince, yet the multiple viewpoints reveal more than Bradley's ironic delusion. Irony is used to expose the ultimate duality of the human condition—the highly developed comic sense alongside the inevitable pain of human existence.

The experience of a violent passion is described in great detail in The Black Prince—the various phases of the passion, the transformation of the lover in the eyes of his friends, the delusions caused by the passion, and the moral consequences of such obsession. Although these moral consequences are serious enough to cause a suicide and a violent murder, one of the richest ironies is that the passion does result in a work of literary art.

William Shakespeare's Hamlet, Prince of Denmark (c. 1600-1601, pb. 1603) provides a touchstone for Murdoch in The Black Prince, but it, too, is touched with irony. Bradley and Julian's first innocent meeting is a discussion of the meaning of Hamlet. Quotations and allusions to the play run throughout the novel. Bradley's erotic energies are suddenly focused on Julian when she mentions that she once played Hamlet, thus identifying herself with the play's ambiguities. After several failures, Bradley manages to make love to Julian when she is fancifully dressed as Hamlet. Julian's interest in the play forces Bradley to think it through again, and in so doing he understands the pain of tragedy for the first time. Later, on his deathbed, Bradley realizes that his affair with Julian was not tragic after all, but ironic.

The black prince of the novel's title clearly refers to Hamlet and to Julian when she is dressed as Hamlet; "B. P." are Bradley Pearson's initials, as well. Yet there is evidence that the black Eros, a dark god who is constantly evoked in the book, is the real black prince. As Bradley sees it, the catalyst that the talented creator needs, the god whom he awaits, is the mythic Eros. Eros rules not only the erotic life of all human beings but also the creation of art. Bradley thinks that after he encounters this god he will create a great work. Yet as the plot progresses it becomes apparent that Bradley completely misunderstands this god.

Many of Murdoch's readers consider The Black Prince her finest work. In the way it challenges its own conclusions in the afterwords and speculates on what fiction is, it is Murdoch's greatest departure from the realistic nineteenth century novel.

A WORD CHILD

First published: 1975

Type of work: Novel

Hilary Burde, the narrator, attempts to atone for a horrible mistake in his past but only repeats it.

A Word Child is a stylish novel in the gothic tradition of the nineteenth century that develops a brooding atmosphere of gloom and deals with aberrant psychological states. Murdoch's use of gothic conventions is an exploration of the tensions between the interior world of the mind and the outer world of reality. The narrator of A Word

Child, Hilary Burde, haunts himself with fantasies of power, possession, and betrayal. The narrative is divided into the days of a diary, reflecting Hilary's rigid approach to life.

Hilary is a prostitute's child who starts life as an illiterate orphan. After a schoolmaster discovers his linguistic gifts, he achieves a certain success at the University of Oxford under the patronage of don Gunnar Jopling and his wife, Anne, who also show unusual kindness to Hilary's half sister, Crystal. Hilary is obsessed with Crystal and, although he loves her, wields absolute power over her life. She is indeed a Crystal Burde in a less than gilded cage.

The relationship between Hilary and Gunnar is central to the narrative. While teaching at Oxford, Hilary falls in love with Anne Jopling and tries to persuade her to leave Gunnar and her young son. Anne, panicked by her recent discovery that she is again pregnant, provokes Hilary to crash his car in an accident that proves fatal to her. The Oxford careers of both men are ruined, and after a year of debilitation Hilary goes on to a dull civil service job in London.

After twenty years of self-inflicted suffering (and inflicting a certain discomfort on all who know him), Hilary finds that Gunnar has just been installed as head of the government department in which Hilary works. An unexpected chance for expiation of guilt arrives when Gunnar's second wife, Lady Kitty, approaches Hilary and tells him of Gunnar's similar preoccupation with the past. She suggests the two men get together to resolve their obsessions. Hilary, again infatuated, continues to meet Lady Kitty secretly. Murdoch skillfully distinguishes here between Hilary's fantasies about Lady Kitty's goodness and the reader's ability to see the foolishness of her behavior, particularly her suggestion that Hilary should provide her with a child. Gunnar surprises Hilary and Lady Kitty in the midst of a secret meeting, and in the scuffle that follows Lady Kitty is knocked off a jetty into the Thames River and dies of overexposure. Hilary's struggle to atone for the death of Gunnar's first wife, Anne, leads instead to a doubling of his guilt.

Yet Hilary, despite the fact that he has nothing to show for his ordeal, has a changed perception of his own role in the order of things. At the end of the novel he realizes that a large part of everyone's life is ruled by chance. He is finally able to recognize that his involvement with the Joplings is not a tragedy in the Shakespearean sense, since tragedy imposes too great an importance on his own part in the universe. Chance, rather than will, rules people's lives. With this realization comes a hint that Hilary will, perhaps sometime in the future, be able to forgive himself.

A Word Child is a fine example of Murdoch's gift for intricate double plots, as well as an exploration of her concern with moral freedom.

THE SEA, THE SEA

First published: 1978

Type of work: Novel

Charles Arrowby, a famous director and playwright, has retired in his sixties to a remote seaside house where his goal is to enlarge his spirit in the pursuit of truth and goodness.

Told in the form of a diary/memoir, Charles first records his impressions of his new home and then reviews his past life largely through memories of a series of love affairs with various actresses. He also delineates his relationship with his one living relative, his cousin James, a soldier and a Buddhist, by whom Charles always felt overshadowed. Charles receives a friendly letter from James when he is ensconced in his new home, Shruff End, indicating James's desire to get together. Yet more important than all of these affairs is a schoolboy romance he had with a girl named Mary Hartley Smith, which was unconsummated yet lives in his mind as the most important relationship he ever had. Before Charles was twenty, Hartley (as he calls her) disappeared from Charles's life and married another man. Charles believes he has never married because Hartley was the only pure, true love he ever encountered.

Although Charles does not get along with the townspeople and in fact becomes a figure of fun to them, he is isolated for only a short time before he is deluged with a series of visits from former friends, rivals, and lovers, which lead to several dramatic scenes and mysterious phenomena. These tangled relationships, however, leave Charles indifferent once he discovers that Hartley, now called by her married name Mary Fitch, lives with her husband, Ben, in the nearby village. His initial encounter with Mary rekindles his desire for her, although Mary is now about sixty years old, wrinkled, and faded. Overwhelmed by what he considers his consecrated, holy love for Mary, he engages in a series of ploys and ambushes to win back her heart. He convinces himself she is unhappily married and, with the help of her adopted son, Titus, he kidnaps her and keeps her locked in an upstairs room in his house, thereby reducing her to a frightened, whimpering, helpless woman.

Charles's assembled cousin, friends, and old lovers understand the absurdity of the situation while Charles cannot, and they convince Charles to let Mary return to her home and her husband. Yet this is not a return to reality for Charles, for he develops an intense hatred for Ben Fitch. Charles believes that Ben is trying to kill him by pushing him into a blowhole below his property, where the waves are lethal. To complicate the mystery, Charles is pulled from the blowhole in what seems to him a strange miracle. Although these plotlines are tied up by the end of the novel, Charles does not give up his fantasy of reuniting with Mary until, snooping around her house one day, he is surprised by a neighbor who shows him a happy postcard that Mary sent from Australia, where she and Ben have suddenly immigrated.

Told in the first person by Charles, the novel depends upon the quality of the narrative voice, and

Charles writes grandly most of the time. Murdoch is a stylist who never disappoints, and she cleverly has Charles reveal himself as a supreme egotist, blinded by self-delusion, in his own voice. One of the central ironies of the novel is that although the reader and the characters surrounding Charles see through him, he is lacking in self-knowledge despite his endless self-examination. Another of the ironies is that of all the characters, only Mary and Charles's cousin James are really "good" people, a goal Charles set for himself on the way to becoming a monster.

SUMMARY

The novels of Iris Murdoch comprise a rich chronicle of the manners of the mid- and late twentieth century British upper-middle classes. Although considered a realistic writer, she is not afraid to take risks. In the carefully ordered, stable worlds she creates, the unpredictability of her characters stands out in bold relief. Saints and sinners, martyrs and mystics, villains and holy fools stumble toward an ideal of love in a modern age of terrors. Murdoch employs extremes of arbitrary coincidence, melodramatic manipulation of plot, and temporal compression to depict characters struggling for a vision of goodness in a secular world.

Sheila Golburgh Johnson

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- Under the Net*, 1954
- The Flight from the Enchanter*, 1956
- The Sandcastle*, 1957
- The Bell*, 1958
- A Severed Head*, 1961
- An Unofficial Rose*, 1962
- The Unicorn*, 1963
- The Italian Girl*, 1964
- The Red and the Green*, 1965
- The Time of the Angels*, 1966
- The Nice and the Good*, 1968
- Bruno's Dream*, 1969
- A Fairly Honourable Defeat*, 1970

Iris Murdoch

An Accidental Man, 1971
The Black Prince, 1973
The Sacred and Profane Love Machine, 1974
A Word Child, 1975
Henry and Cato, 1976
The Sea, the Sea, 1978
Nuns and Soldiers, 1980
The Philosopher's Pupil, 1983
The Good Apprentice, 1985
The Book and the Brotherhood, 1987
The Message to the Planet, 1989
The Green Knight, 1993
Jackson's Dilemma, 1995

SHORT FICTION:

Something Special: A Story, wr. 1955, pb. 1999

POETRY:

A Year of Birds: Poems, 1978, limited ed., 1984 (engravings by Reynolds Stone)

DRAMA:

A Severed Head, pr. 1963, pb. 1964 (with J. B. Priestley)
The Italian Girl, pr. 1967 (with James Saunders)
The Servants and the Snow, pr. 1970, pb. 1973
The Three Arrows, pr. 1972, pb. 1973
Art and Eros, pr. 1980
The Black Prince, pr. 1989
Joanna Joanna, pb. 1994
The One Alone, pb. 1995

NONFICTION:

Sartre: Romantic Rationalist, 1953
The Sovereignty of Good, 1970
The Fire and the Sun: Why Plato Banished the Artists, 1977
Acastos: Two Platonic Dialogues, 1986
Metaphysics as a Guide to Morals, 1992
Existentialists and Mystics: Writings on Philosophy and Literature, 1997 (Peter Conradi, editor)

About the Author

Baldanza, Frank. Iris Murdoch. New York: Twayne, 1974.
Bayley, John. Elegy for Iris. New York: Picador, 1999.
Byatt, A. S. Iris Murdoch. London: Longman, 1976.
Conradi, Peter. Iris Murdoch: A Life. New York: Norton, 2001.
Dipple, Elizabeth. Iris Murdoch: Work for the Spirit. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982.
Johnson, Deborah. Iris Murdoch. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987.
Todd, Richard. Iris Murdoch. New York: Methuen, 1984.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Why are Iris Murdoch's novels often called realistic?
- What are the various symbols the sea suggests in The Nice and the Good and The Sea, the Sea?
- How does Murdoch's training in philosophy influence her novels?
- What use does Murdoch make of the subconscious in her novels?
- One of Murdoch's hallmarks is the detailed description of food, clothes, and room interiors. What function do these descriptions serve in her novels?

ROBERT MUSIL

Born: Klagenfurt, Austria

November 6, 1880

Died: Geneva, Switzerland

April 15, 1942

Musil is a writer of major high modernist works in German, especially novels on par with the foremost achievements of world literature, such as novels by James Joyce in English and Marcel Proust in French.

BIOGRAPHY

Robert Musil (MEW-zihl) was born in the Austrian town of Klagenfurt in 1880. His father, Alfred, an engineer, was elevated to nobility in 1917, but Robert chose not to use the family's aristocratic title "Edler von." His mother, Hermine, was involved with another man, somewhat openly, a situation even tolerated by her husband. This not only alienated Musil from both his parents but also was reflected in his literary treatment of erotic themes. In addition, it has been speculated that the death of Musil's sister before the author's own birth created an image of the "lost sister" as "an unobtainable unity and wholeness" according to critic Roger Kimball, which was later embodied in Agathe in Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften (1930-1943; The Man Without Qualities, 1953-1960).

Following his father's wishes, Musil attended military boarding schools in Eisenstadt (from 1892) and Mährisch-Weiskirchen (from 1894). His experiences of these settings, especially of the latter school, provided the background of his first novel, Die Verwirrungen des Zöglings Törless (1906; Young Törless, 1955). In 1897, Musil enrolled in the Technical Military Academy in Vienna but dropped out in 1898, when he began studying mechanical engineering. After completing his studies and finishing his military year in 1901, Musil worked at the Technical University at Stuttgart in 1902 and 1903, then moved to Berlin, where he studied philosophy, mathematics, and physics. In 1908, he was awarded his doctorate for a dissertation on the philosopher and physicist Ernst Mach.

In 1911, Musil moved back to Vienna and married Martha Marcovaldi. That year, he published a collection with two stories, Vereinigungen, 1911 (partial translation as Unions, 1965). He worked as a librarian at the Technical University of Vienna until 1914, when he first took a job as newspaper editor and then joined the military as an officer during World War I, during which he was decorated several times. After the war, he returned to Vienna, where he was employed as a civil servant from 1919 to 1922. From 1922 on, Musil was a freelance writer. Although his work was critically acclaimed, he suffered from never-ending financial troubles and failing health.

Musil's drama Die Schwärmer (pb. 1921, pr. 1929; The Enthusiasts, 1983) was published in 1921 (although not performed until 1929) and awarded the prestigious Kleist Prize in 1923, the year in which his next drama, the farce Vinzenz und die Freundin bedeutender Männer (Vincent and the girlfriend of important men), was first performed. This was followed in 1924 with his collection of stories Drei Frauen (Tonka, and Other Stories, 1965). Musil began work on his monumental novel The Man Without Qualities in the 1920's, although early plans for it go back as far as 1905. The novel's first two volumes were published in 1930 and 1933, respectively, and Musil, a heavy rewriter, spent the rest of his life trying to complete this work, which, although it remains unfinished, is one of the most important high modernist novels.

In 1933, the publisher was no longer willing to pay advances to Musil, who then returned with his wife to Vienna from Berlin, to where they had just moved in 1931. From 1934 to 1938, he received financial support from a private society named after him. In 1936, a Swiss publisher published a collection containing Musil's newspaper articles. Now under Nazi control, Musil's German publishing house stopped all payments to him in 1938. Also in 1938, Musil and his wife emigrated via Italy to Switzerland, where they first lived in Zurich and then (from 1939 on) in Geneva. Musil died from a cerebral hemorrhage on April 15, 1942. His ashes were scattered in a forest near Geneva.

ANALYSIS

Musil is a major modernist writer. Modernism was the literary response to the type of modernity that emerged from roughly 1890 to 1910. As mass communication and transportation, such as telephones and cars, revolutionized daily life, people shared the widespread realization that their world had become complex in an unprecedented way, which they experienced as a loss—that is, the loss of their moral “center,” or faith in once agreed-upon values. The modernists responded with complex art to represent the complex world and a search for a new center, typically a new style or a new myth (or, as in Musil's case, both).

Musil's work is prototypically modernist in its complexity, style, and exploration of myth. The complexity is a matter not just of Musil's style but also of his worldview: He saw life as a fusion of opposites—such as reason and emotion, the real and the unreal, the material and the spiritual—that had been typically treated separately prior to modernism. Young Törless takes a glimpse at this “two-world” condition, which takes center stage in Musil's The Man Without Qualities in the conflict between the senses of reality and of possibility.

Musil's style closely traces his complex worldview. This is evident from Young Törless, whose protagonist struggles to comprehend his confusing experiences, as well as from the essayistic style of The Man Without Qualities. Taking its name from the French verb for “to attempt” (essayer), a literary essay tries to approach the world tentatively without any preconceptions. Musil fictionalizes his essayism so that it appears as a literary character's reaction to events or as part of a dialogue. “Essayism” even describes the lifestyle of Musil's alter ego Ulrich.

At the same time, essayism leads to an ironic style because nothing ever can be said with certainty; consequently, as so many modern novels do, The Man Without Qualities narrates and reflects upon its own difficulties of narrating. The result is not a crisis, as often claimed, but instead a triumph of the novel as a form. After all, modernist novels proved that they were still able to narrate the world at a time when storytelling was considered difficult, although they may no longer follow conventional plots. What is more, these novels incorporated this very difficulty into their form. Musil's contribution to the novel genre was his essayistic and tentative style.

Musil's tentative style matched his search for a myth, to which his teleological and erotic themes added subtle ironies. Musil's term for the goal for the search was “the other condition” (“der andere Zustand”), which he understood as the experience of mystical oneness. These elements work in Musil's novels because it is more important that the search, rather than the myth, resonate with the readers. While Törless glimpses the existence of the “other condition,” Ulrich in The Man Without Qualities experiments with his version of the brother/sister myth to achieve “the other condition.”

In addition, Musil's work had a political component. Young Törless looks at sadism as a force that turns some individuals into oppressors and others into victims; this has been understood as an uncanny foreshadowing of the rise of Nazism as such a sadistic political force. The Man Without Qualities presents people who are absorbed either in their own private desires or in grandiose, yet irrelevant, political dreams; that is, the novel evokes a “spiritual vacancy” (Kimball) that was readily filled in real life by Nazism.

YOUNG TÖRLESS

First published: Die Verwirrungen des Zöglings Törless, 1906 (English translation, 1955)

Type of work: Novel

An adolescent boy develops an adult sense of self by confronting the sadistic treatment of a fellow student in a military boarding school.

The German title, translated more literally as “the confusions of the schoolboy Törless,” both situates the story in a school setting and introduces the novel's main theme. The school is a military boarding school, similar to those of Musil's own experience; however, rather than realistically described, the novel's setting and atmosphere reflect the confusions of young Törless's adolescent growing pains.

The surface plot focuses on a small group of four students. As money is stolen from Beineberg and other students, the student Reiting figures out that only Basini, one of their fellow students, could be the thief. Reiting and Beineberg take it upon themselves to punish Basini during secret and sadistic nighttime meetings. Törless is drawn into these meetings but tries to keep his distance. His dual attraction to and repulsion from the sadism, as well as homosexual acts in which Basini engages separately with his punishers, show Törless struggling with his confusions.

Over just a few weeks, Törless matures and learns to form his own opinion and stand up for it. As Reiting and Beineberg increase their mental torture by planning to expose Basini in front of the school, Törless convinces Basini to turn himself in to the headmaster. The school officials attempt to keep the ensuing scandal as small as possible; however, although Törless succeeds in obscuring the full extent of his involvement, he is implicated in the events and, at the close of the investigation, is told to leave the school—a decision that is imposed on him but, at the same time, reflects his inner growth: He is ready to leave this school.

This novel—Musil's only great success during his lifetime—touches upon several major themes. First, the sadistic and sexual elements take on a symbolic function representing power and its abuse in general. Because the school's rigid structure reproduces the rigid structure of Austrian society at the end of the nineteenth century, the school metonymically stands for that society. The group dynamic among the students not only copies social structures but also warns of the dangers of unchecked power as Reiting's and Beineberg's sadism ignores Basini's humanity. Later critics have praised this aspect as Musil's astute prediction of what rigid social structures may lead to: political sadism in the form of Nazism and its crimes against humanity.

Second, the psychological confusions are embedded in a profound crisis that defined modernism itself: understanding the world anew as a fusion of the rational and the irrational. Musil presents this artistic struggle in terms of Törless's adolescent experiences, when Törless perceives another level of reality behind normal reality. This other level seems irrational and unfathomable. Although Törless cannot fully express his insight into the duality of the world, his emotional maturity is evident in his intuition that this insight will remain part of his life.

Third, Young Törless is a perceptive and subtle study of the psychological struggles of adolescents. Törless has learned to tell right from wrong; therefore, he stands up against his schoolmates' sadism. He has learned to accept the duality of the world; therefore, he stands up for his insight when he tries to explain it during the investigation, although he expects that the investigation board will not understand. The novel ends with Törless's adult sexual gaze, with which he is now also able to see his mother when she arrives at the school to take him home. This final metaphor emphasizes his successful individuation. The acceptance of life's contradictions is a sign of maturity; as a result, Törless was confused by challenging experiences, but in the end he proved to be strong enough to learn from them and to mature.

THE MAN WITHOUT QUALITIES

First published: Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften, 1930-1943 (English translation, 1953-1960)

Type of work: Novel

A man in his early thirties searches for life's potential, rather than life's realities, in a grandiose patriotic project and in an intimate relationship with his sister.

In a typically modernist "plot" line, in which the plot itself is less important than the main character's reflections on life, the main character, Ulrich, in The Man Without Qualities is drawn into planning the great patriotic celebration of the seventieth anniversary of Francis Joseph as Austrian emperor in the year 1918, called the Parallel Campaign in competition with celebrations for the German emperor. This project provides some degree of action and considerable, intended irony and satire in the novel's two-part first book. Started in the mid-1920's, the novel clearly implies that the Parallel Campaign, which Ulrich joins at the beginning of the novel in 1913, was doomed because the emperor was dead in 1916 and by 1918 his empire lay torn to pieces by World War I.

The second book opens with the appearance of Agathe, Ulrich's long-lost sister. As brother and sister get reacquainted, they experiment with new ways of belonging. The experiment becomes the novel's new center, while the Parallel Campaign continues. Although Ulrich is five years older than his sister, they are so close that they consider each other not only twins but conjoined twins and even refer to the myth of the androgynous being, retold in Plato's Symposium (399-390 B.C.E.; Symposium, 1701). Human beings were double—that is, they had two heads, four arms, and so on—but the gods cut them in half. From that time each “half” has been looking for his or her original other half. In this sense, Agathe emerges as Ulrich's “other.” The mention of ancient myths, such as that of Isis and Osiris, extends the possibility of the brother/sister relationship to include sexuality.

The actual transgression of incest is part of a manuscript chapter, “Die Reise ins Paradies” (“The Journey into Paradise”), not published until 1952. It may be understood in the context of three observations. First, the Ulrich/Agathe experiment is set up in terms of both mythology and the novel's sense of possibility. It may be a provocative act or merely a provocative possibility to bring about the “other condition,” that is, not simply a different lifestyle but a truly higher level of experience—something that is beyond the conventional morality of good and evil. Second, the experiment itself fails because any transcendent “other condition” cannot have real permanence. This type of literary “reality check” is akin to Romantic irony, when a goal cannot be reached because there is always another obstacle that emerges. Third, Musil wrote the focal chapter of the Ulrich/Agathe story in the mid-1920's, when he started working on the novel, which had the working title “The Twin Sister.” Over time, Musil may have increasingly doubted the validity and even morality of the brother/sister plot, which, in turn, made it impossible for him to complete the novel. This explanation, however, remains speculation because the mid-1920's focal chapter already concluded with the failure of the Ulrich/Agathe plot.

Even unfinished, The Man Without Qualities is a major modernist achievement because it exhibits the modernist search for a new style and myth. Since plot never was the main function but mostly a vehicle for Musil's (and his protagonist Ulrich's) essayism—that is, for observation, reflection, irony, and experiment—readers may enjoy the novel's main quality: that it does not have “qualities,” that it always leaves room for doubt and speculation. What readers may enjoy, then, are the fluctuations of life itself. In this respect, each reader is like Ulrich.

It turns out that Ulrich, the novel's man without qualities, whose last name is never mentioned, possesses certain qualities. The readers first meet Ulrich on a fine summer day in Vienna in August, 1913, only after they have read the narrator's speculations of whether the person in the street might be somebody else. Ulrich is thirty-two years old, single but quite popular with women although somewhat shallow in his relationships. As a result, readers may fluctuate between finding Ulrich a likable character for some of his qualities yet not likable for others. In a similar way, Ulrich cannot make up his mind about his own life. So far, he has tried different careers (the same ones as Musil): first, military officer; then, engineer; finally, mathematician. Although not undistinguished, he was unfulfilled in each career for not becoming a person of importance. Taken aback by the description of a race horse as having “genius,” he decides early in the novel to take a year off from all obligations and to make sense of his life. The novel follows Ulrich on his personal search.

A man without qualities, however, may mean “modern” man in general. The term may indicate nihilism; consequently, Ulrich may be understood as a man without values. This may be seen negatively as a statement about a world without values. A neutral understanding could imply that human beings are simply dependent on impulses from the outside (a concept from Ernst Mach's philosophy, about which Musil wrote his dissertation); hence, Ulrich appears primarily passive, observing and responding to what goes on around him. In a positive interpretation, “no qualities” may refer to the standards set by old values, yet Ulrich is looking for new values. Musil seems to favor the last option by contrasting the sense of reality with the sense of possibility. Possibility is perhaps reality, that is, that part of reality that has been filtered out by cognitive economy when human consciousness constructs “reality” (another concept from Mach). Finally, German mystic tradition suggests that only a pure soul, that is, the individual purged of all accidental and temporal qualities, is capable of a mystical union with God—which corresponds to Musil’s utopian “other condition.”

The novel’s characters come together through Ulrich in one way or another. On one hand, this can be seen as a characteristic of the “lyric” novel, a novel whose content is filtered through the protagonist’s consciousness so that reality becomes difficult to distinguish from the character’s projections. On the other hand, the characters seem to vary Musil’s theme of Plato’s androgynous myth; that is, every character in the novel is incomplete and looking for fulfillment by relating to others, above all to Ulrich. Among the novel’s many characters, the most important ones are Ulrich’s sister, his friends, and the members of the Parallel Campaign. Some of the characters gain an additional dimension because they are patterned after actual people.

Ulrich’s friends Walter and Clarisse, who are in an unhappy marriage, are based on friends of Musil. To an extent, Walter provides a foil to Ulrich as another man who showed promise but has settled for mediocrity, leaving Clarisse, who wants to be married to a great man, deeply frustrated. The serial sex murderer Moosbrugger is a further illustration of fluctuating judgment: For one expert witness, Moosbrugger is competent to stand trial for his crimes; for another, Moosbrugger is insane. Ulrich contemplates the possible consequences, and Clarisse, herself slowly going mad, feels drawn to Moosbrugger.

A group of influential Austrian citizens is engaged in planning the Parallel Campaign. Ulrich’s father wants his son finally to accomplish something, so he arranges for Ulrich to meet with a female cousin whom Ulrich has not met before. This cousin, nicknamed Diotima by Ulrich, has established a salon in her house that becomes the center of the Parallel Campaign. The immensely rich German Dr. Arnheim (based on the politician Walter Rathenau) joins the group. Like others in the novel, Diotima and Arnheim represent the discrepancy between true motives and appearance.

SUMMARY

Living in the age of modernity, whose dizzying speed was often experienced as deeply disconcerting decline and insanity, Robert Musil was searching for what he called the “other condition,” an embodiment of utopian hope for society. The Man Without Qualities explores individual insanity (Moosbrugger, Clarisse) and collective stupidity (the Parallel Campaign) in Kakania (Musil’s ironic term for Austria), while the utopian element of the brother/sister plot is delayed, although the author had planned its failure from the beginning. Musil’s other novel, the earlier Young Törless, made the author famous with its psychological study of a schoolboy who has to deal with, among other experiences, confusing visions of the “other condition” before he can achieve an adult sense of selfhood. Törless’s attempts at finding clarity are related to Ulrich’s difficulties defining his middle-aged self.

Ingo R. Stoehr

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Die Verwirrungen des Zöglings Törless, 1906 (Young Törless, 1955)

Der Mann ohne Eigenschaften, 1930-1943 (unfinished, 3 volumes; The Man Without Qualities, 1953-1960 [3 volumes], 1995 [2 volumes])

SHORT FICTION:

Vereinigungen, 1911 (partial translation as Unions, 1965)

Drei Frauen, 1924 (Tonka, and Other Stories, 1965)

Five Women, 1966 (includes stories from Vereinigungen and Drei Frauen)

DRAMA:

Die Schwärmer, pb. 1921, pr. 1929 (The Enthusiasts, 1983)

Vinzenz und die Freundin bedeutender Männer, pr. 1923

NONFICTION:

Beitrag zur Beurteilung der Lehren Machs, 1908 (On Mach's Theories, 1982)

Das hilflose Europa, 1922

Nachlass zu Lebzeiten, 1936 (Posthumous Papers of a Living Author, 1987)

Theater: Kritisches und Theoretisches, 1965

Der deutsche Mensch als Symptom, 1967

Tagebücher, 1976 (2 volumes; partial translation as Diaries, 1899-1941, 1998)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Gesammelte Werke in Einzelausgaben, 1952-1957 (3 volumes)

Gesammelte Werke, 1978-1981 (9 volumes; volumes 8 and 9 translated as Precision and Soul: Essays and Addresses, 1990)

Selected Writings, 1986 (Burton Pike, editor)

About the Author

Bangerter, Lowell A. Robert Musil. New York: Continuum, 1988.

Kimball, Roger. "The Qualities of Robert Musil." The New Criterion 14, no. 6 (February, 1996): 10. Available online at <http://newcriterion.com:81/archive/14/feb96?musil.htm>

Luft, David S. Robert Musil and the Crisis of European Culture, 1880-1942. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1980.

Pike, Burton. Robert Musil: An Introduction to His Work. Port Washington, N.Y.: Kennikat Press, 1972.

Stoehr, Ingo R. German Literature of the Twentieth Century: From Aestheticism to Postmodernism. Rochester, N.Y.: Camden House, 2001.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What are the modernist elements of Robert Musil's novels?
- How do the rational and irrational, the material and the spiritual, relate to each other in Musil's novels?
- What is the role of sexuality in Musil's work? Is it gratuitous, motivated, meaningful, and/or appropriate?
- What types of irony are there? Which ones does Musil use in The Man Without Qualities?
- What is a "man without qualities"? Is it something one can choose to be?
- What is more important—the sense of reality or the sense of possibility?

Library of Congress

VLADIMIR NABOKOV

Born: St. Petersburg, Russia
April 23, 1899

Died: Montreux, Switzerland
July 2, 1977

Nabokov, a novelist, short-story writer, poet, playwright, scholar-critic, translator, lepidopterist, and chess problemist, was a pre-eminent figure in twentieth century English and Russian literature.

BIOGRAPHY

Vladimir Vladimirovich Nabokov (NAB-uh-kawf) was born on April 23, 1899, in St. Petersburg, Russia. He was the eldest son of Vladimir Dmitrievich Nabokov, a prominent liberal politician and Anglophile aristocrat, and Elena Rukavishnikov, a member of a prominent family of industrialists. Young Vladimir, the favorite child, grew up amid great wealth and cultural privilege. Trilingual from childhood, he had live-in tutors and attended a private school. From his idolized father he inherited a love of nature, especially butterflies, and of chess; from his mother he acquired a passion for the visual arts, particularly painting, and for the marvels of memory and commemoration. His early life was divided between the family's elegant town house in the imperial capital of St. Petersburg and summers on its nearby country estate.

The family's gracious existence ended when it was forced into exile following the Russian Revolution of 1917. However, the cultural bounty acquired during those early years sustained Nabokov for the remaining sixty years of his life.

Although his family settled in Berlin, the young Nabokov was sent to England's University of Cambridge, where he spent the years from 1919 to 1923. He then returned to Berlin, where he was to live until 1938. Tragedy struck when his father, now a newspaper publisher, was assassinated by right-wing Russian monarchists in 1922.

Nabokov had published his first volume of poetry in 1916, and he soon followed it with another collection. Adopting the pen name V. Sirin, he now published two additional volumes of poetry while contributing stories, poems, chess problems, the first Russian crossword puzzles, and reviews to the émigré Russian press. In addition to his journalistic endeavors, he supported himself by giving language and tennis lessons, working as a film extra, writing cabaret skits and plays, and translating.

Nabokov married Vera Slonim in 1925, and he shortly began work on his first novel, Mashenka (1926; Mary, 1970). Between 1925 and 1940 he established himself as the leading new writer of the Russian emigration with a string of novels, stories, and poems. After Mary came the novels Korol', dama, valet (1928; King, Queen, Knave, 1968), Zashchita Luzhina (serial, 1929, book, 1930; The Defense, 1964), Soglyadatay (serial, 1930, book, 1938; The Eye, 1965), Podvig (1932; Glory, 1971), Kamera obskura (1932; Camera Obscura, 1936, revised as Laughter in the Dark, 1938), and Otchayanie (serial, 1934, book, 1936; Despair, 1937, revised, 1966). The best of the Russian novels were the last two: Priglasenie na kazn' (serial, 1935-1936, book, 1938; Invitation to a Beheading, 1959) and Dar (serial, 1937-1938, book, 1952; The Gift, 1963).

With the rise of Adolf Hitler, life in Germany became increasingly difficult, and in 1938 the Nabokovs and their four-year-old son, Dmitri, immigrated to France. Nabokov sensed that his old European life was ending and now undertook his first English-language novel, The Real Life of Sebastian Knight (1941). The Nabokovs were to spend only two years in France before fleeing once again just as the German forces were invading.

The Nabokov family arrived in New York in May, 1940, but Nabokov's hard-won reputation as a Russian writer was meaningless in the United States. At forty-one he started anew, this time as an American writer. First, however, he had to provide for his wife and son. During the early years, he taught at Wellesley College and worked as a lepidopterist at the Harvard Museum of Comparative Zoology. He became an American citizen in 1945.

Nabokov's responsibilities left him little time for writing, but by 1947 he had completed his first "American" novel, Bend Sinister, a dark modernist fantasy about a philosopher who vainly tries to stand aside from political tyranny. More important for his American reputation were the autobiographical vignettes that appeared in The New Yorker in the late 1940's and early 1950's. Revised and collected as Conclusive Evidence: A Memoir (1951) and Drugie berega (1954), then revised once again as Speak, Memory: An Autobiography Revisited (1966), the pieces constitute an intensely artistic exploration of the writer's first forty years.

In 1948, Nabokov accepted a position as a professor of European literature at Cornell University, in Ithaca, New York, where he would spend the next decade. He taught in the winters, went on butterfly-collecting expeditions throughout the American West each summer, and continued his writing. Much of his time was devoted to the translation of Russian classics into English. The short novel Invitation of a Small Guest (1957) was also written during the Cornell years, as was Nabokov's most famous work, Lolita (1955).

The story of a young American girl and her perverted stepfather, Lolita was rejected by several American publishers before Nabokov's agent offered it to Maurice Girodias of the Paris-based Olympia Press. Apparently neither author nor agent knew that besides publishing avant-garde literature, Girodias also dealt in outright pornography. Upon its publication in the United States in 1958, Lolita became a best seller, but only gradually did it emerge from the ensuing scandal that Nabokov had written an American masterpiece. Suddenly the wealth that he had lost thirty years before in the Russian Revolution was restored to him.

He resigned his teaching post and returned to Europe for what was intended to be a visit.

As time passed, however, the Nabokovs realized that a grand hotel in Switzerland would be their permanent home. At sixty, Nabokov was an international literary superstar. From his hotel suite in Montreux, there emerged a stream of books that would assure his place as one of the masters of twentieth century world literature: Pale Fire (1962), a display of literary pyrotechnics taking the form of a long poem and a deluded commentary upon it; Invitation of a Small Guest (1969), a richly embroidered fantasy of brother-sister incest that gained for its author a cover story in Time; the ghost story Transparent Things (1972); and Look at the Harlequins! (1974). As Nabokov's stature as an English author grew, interest reawakened in his Russian work, which now began to appear in English and many other languages.

Nabokov died on July 2, 1977, in Montreux, leaving instructions that the novel he had been unable to complete, "The Original of Laura," be destroyed. In 2008, however, his son Dmitri announced that he would allow the manuscript to be published.

ANALYSIS

Nabokov was often praised as a master of language and style but criticized for a perceived absence of general ideas, social relevance, and even morality in his novels. Russian literature has always had a strong moral, social, and political orientation. At times, this didactic tendency has overshadowed and even displaced the artistic element. First in his novel The Gift and later in a collection of interviews, Strong Opinions (1973), Nabokov argued for the independence of art. This is not to say that Nabokov did not incorporate serious ideas and moral considerations in his art, but rather that they are secondary to artistic considerations. Such themes are deeply woven into the texture of his works so that only the careful reader will recognize their presence.

It was only after Nabokov's death that his widow pointed to the presence of a master theme throughout her husband's work, a theme that she called "the hereafter." Is death really the end of everything? If not, does personal consciousness survive? Nabokov's novels rarely address these questions directly. Close examination shows that Nabokov kov's novels contain not one but two (or more) worlds. One of these is, within the framework of the novel, regarded by the characters as the one and only world. A chosen few of Nabokov's heroes, however, notice inexplicable coincidences and patterns, which lead them to suspect the presence of a controlling mind that has created them and their universe. This creator lives on another world. When these favored characters face death, either their own or that of a loved one, they become obsessed with the possibility of the hereafter, another world, that of their creator, with its promise of immortality and reunion with their loved ones. Intimations of a higher world are strongest in dreams and madness, but the real answer can come only at the moment of death. In some of the novels, such as Bend Sinister, the controlling presence of the author reaches into his created world and rescues his hero. The character dies and returns to the mind of his author-creator and in doing so acquires the wider consciousness of his author. All the secret coincidences of the previous "fictional" universe are now explained. Implicit in this scheme is the idea of the artist as god. It is an art-centered view of the meaning of life, an extension of the relationship between the creator and his character to the realm of a personal philosophy.

Readers of Speak, Memory cannot help being struck by Nabokov's incredibly detailed recall of the minutiae of the past and his ability to bring it to life by the verbal precision of his writing. The theme of memory gains its greatest importance in connection with Nabokov's master theme of another, parallel world. The ability of Nabokov's heroes to detect signs and symbols hinting at the existence of another world depends upon the power and precision of their memories. Without memory, everything happens as if for the first time and is meaningless. Most of Nabokov's fictional characters fail to recognize these signs of a master hand. In a sense, readers of Nabokov's novels are in the same position as his characters. They must recall the scattered details that constitute the patterns and coincidences signaling the other world.

Nabokov has remarked that the real history of a writer is the story of his style. Nabokov is indisputably one of the greatest masters of both Russian and English. Yet style is also what makes him a difficult writer for many readers. His novels are filled with word games and hidden allusions that sometimes hint at the presence of the other world or that add new dimensions of meaning. In the ghost story "The Vane Sisters" (1959), the doubting narrator's skepticism about the hereafter is undermined in his last sentence by an acrostic that he himself fails to notice. The acrostic is a message from the dead sisters of the story. More often, hints of the other world come in the form of allusions. In Bend Sinister, the presence of the other world is signaled by the recurrence of a footprint-shaped puddle that is the point of transition between the worlds of the author and his character. In Ada or Ardor, the secret brother-sister relationship of heroine and hero is hinted by allusions to English poet Lord Byron and French writer François-René Chateaubriand, both of whom were rumored to have had incestuous relationships with their sisters. To appreciate fully Nabokov's novels, the reader should have a good grasp of Russian, French, and English literary history and, ideally, a knowledge of these languages.

Nabokov was a difficult, modernist writer who basically wrote for an elite audience. Such writers, although admired by literary specialists, are rarely read outside the classroom. The most amazing aspect of Nabokov's literary career is that he became a best-selling author, his name a household word. This development occurred in large part because of the scandal surrounding Lolita. His continued popularity, however, arose from literary qualities rare in a "writer's writer." Nabokov's novels have strong, interesting plots and are marked by an elegant if often Rabelaisian sense of humor. They are enjoyed by a wide audience, as well as by literary specialists.

MARY

First published: Mashenka, 1926 (English translation, 1970)

Type of work: Novel

A young Russian émigré learns that he must break with the past and seek his happiness elsewhere.

Mary, Nabokov's first novel, is set in the large colony of Russian émigrés who had fled the Russian Revolution for Berlin. The novel's events take place during the first week of April, 1924, in a boardinghouse whose residents, once well-off but now poor, live in a state of suspension. They feel that their real lives were left behind in the Russia of their dreams and desperately hope to return. Meanwhile they wait in a cold, alien city and dream of the past.

Ganin, the hero, is a former White army officer who fought against the victorious Reds before escaping. Although of sterner fortitude than his fellow lodgers, he too has fallen into an irritable malaise. He wishes to move on, perhaps to France, but lacks the resolve to break off a dreary love affair and go. The novel opens in a setting symbolic of the plight of its characters. Ganin and a new lodger named Alfyorov find themselves temporarily trapped in the dark between floors on an elevator. Alfyorov, an effusively cheerful vulgarian, tells the taciturn Ganin that his (Alfyorov's) wife, Mary, from whom he was separated by the revolution, will at last be rejoining him. Later in his room, he shows Ganin her picture. Ganin leaves without a word.

The girl in the picture is Mary, Ganin's first love. For the next few days Ganin walks the streets of Berlin in a trance, reconstructing scene by scene, the entire story of their affair, the happiest time of his life. Ganin's memories reinvigorate him. He abruptly stops seeing his mistress and prepares to leave Berlin. At a party the night before Mary's arrival, Alfyorov, with Ganin's help, becomes very drunk and is put to bed. Mary's train is to arrive at eight o'clock in the morning, but Ganin sets Alfyorov's alarm for eleven. Early in the morning, Ganin sets off with his bags to meet Mary at the train station. The world once again seems new, full of possibilities. As he walks, Ganin comes to a sudden realization, whereupon he catches a taxi to a different train station and sets off alone to begin a new life.

Mary's theme is simple. Mary, Ganin's first love, is identified with his Russian homeland. His reawakened love for her is intertwined with his debilitating nostalgia for his lost past. Only after reliving that love can he put the past behind him and start anew. Like many first novels, Mary has a strong autobiographical element. As Nabokov indicates both in his introduction to the novel and in his autobiography, Speak, Memory, Mary is based on his own first love affair and even incorporates passages from letters that he received from Mary's prototype.

THE DEFENSE

First published: Zashchita Luzhina, 1929, serial; 1930, book (English translation, 1964)

Type of work: Novel

Luzhin, a Russian émigré and International Grand Master, engages in a losing chess game with madness and death.

The Defense, Nabokov's third novel, established him as the leading new writer of the Russian emigration. As the novel opens, Luzhin, a gloomy, friendless lad, learns that he must start public school in St. Petersburg. The boy soon begins cutting school to visit the home of his vivacious aunt, where he learns to play chess. When his father learns of his secretive son's gift, he launches the boy's career as a chess prodigy. Under the strain, Luzhin eventually falls ill and is taken to a German spa to recuperate. As it happens, a major international chess tournament is in progress there, and the boy becomes an international star.

Sixteen years pass before the reader again meets an unkempt, thirty-year-old Luzhin, who finds himself once again at this same resort. A homeless international wanderer who can barely cope with life's ordinary demands, Luzhin has returned to the resort to prepare for a major chess tournament in Berlin. At the resort the boorish, inarticulate Luzhin meets a young woman who is not put off by his eccentricities. After a bizarre courtship, Luzhin leaves for Berlin. For the first time in many years, he plays brilliantly, moving toward a play-off with his nemesis Turati, who has previously defeated him. Luzhin has even prepared a special defense against his opponent. At length, the final game begins, but Turati does not make the expected opening attack. When the game is adjourned for the night, the exhausted Luzhin vaguely hears a voice saying, "Go home." As he makes his way back to his hotel, he collapses.

Luzhin awakens in a rustic mental hospital, where a psychiatrist, together with the patient's fiancé, tells him that he must give up chess if he is to save his sanity. Out of his asylum window, Luzhin sees a scene reminiscent of the Russian countryside of his youth and thinks, "Evidently, I got home." Soon released, Luzhin marries and settles down with his new bride. He seems to have put chess out of his mind. All is well until Luzhin encounters a former schoolmate who remembers him as a former chess prodigy. Luzhin denies his past, but that night he is plagued by a feeling that a secret attack is unfolding against him. Suddenly, he realizes that each stage of his new, chess-free life is subtly replaying one of the stages in his childhood that led to his initial encounter with chess and, ultimately, to his breakdown. He tries to devise a defense, but his every move is anticipated and thwarted by his unseen opponent. Recognizing his inevitable defeat, Luzhin resigns the hopeless game by leaping through a window to his death.

Nabokov often pointed to the similarities of the composition of chess problems and literary works. The Defense illustrates these similarities in many ways, most prominently in its intricate plotting. The technical problem is to insert each of the subtly disguised repetitions of the key events leading to Luzhin's final breakdown in such a way that their essential similarity to a previous event is not immediately evident. This covert patterning sometimes extends to the smallest details. The careful reader must be superior to Luzhin in recognizing the presence and implications of these patterns. Luzhin mistakenly believes himself to be a player in a chess game against madness and death. In reality, he is merely a pawn in a chess problem designed by his author.

INVITATION TO A BEHEADING

First published: Priglasenie na kazn', 1935-1936, serial; 1938, book (English translation, 1959)

Type of work: Novel

Condemned to death in a mythic totalitarian society, the young hero struggles to attain the free world flickering in his imagination.

Invitation to a Beheading was Nabokov's next-to-last Russian novel. Cincinnatus, the hero, is a quiet rebel against the stifling mediocrity of imagination and consciousness of his world. He has an intuition of another world, one in which imagination is king and there are other people like him. Cincinnatus has been condemned to death for the crime of "gnostical turpitude," which seems to refer to his unique sense of unknown, unnamed things in a world where all things are already named and known to everyone.

The events of Invitation to a Beheading take place in a mythic country, with no indication of temporal or geographic setting, although the characters speak Russian. The story covers the last three weeks in the life of Cincinnatus, a youthful teacher of defective children. On the novel's opening day, Cincinnatus hears his death sentence pronounced and is remanded to the hilltop prison fortress, where he is to await the fall of the ax. At first, Cincinnatus is the only prisoner in the fortress, where he is attended by his bluff jailer, Rodion; the unctuous, frock-coated director Rodrig; and his lawyer, Roman, who beleaguers him with inane legal formalities. The careful reader soon realizes that the three characters, like actors, sometimes exchange costumes and roles.

Cincinnatus wishes only two things from his jailers: the date of his execution and a last visit from his callous, unfaithful wife, Marthe, and their two deformed children. Nothing can be learned on either score. Cincinnatus is soon joined by a new inmate, the plump, complaisant Pierre, who intimates that he has tried to help Cincinnatus escape. A cheerful vulgarian who seems to enjoy odd privileges for a prisoner, Pierre forces his friendship upon Cincinnatus, who wishes only to be left alone to explore his thoughts.

Cincinnatus devotes himself to keeping a prison diary in which he explores his sense of his differentness from all others in his society and his intimations of another, better world: "I am the one among you who is alive—Not only are my eyes different, and my hearing, and my sense of taste—not only is my sense of smell like a deer's, my sense of touch like a bat's—but most important, I have the capacity to conjoin all of this in one point." This point is that he knows "a paramount thing that no one here knows." He has come to believe that the world in which he is imprisoned is an illusion. While still fearing the executioner's ax, Cincinnatus suspects that death is a doorway between this wretched, delusional world and another, brighter, real one. Through some ghastly mistake, he has been born into the "wrong" world, and only death will rectify the error.

The day of Cincinnatus's public beheading arrives, and he is escorted from the prison by Pierre, who proves to be the executioner. Strangely, Cincinnatus's cell starts to disintegrate and as they move toward the fatal square, statues and buildings begin to crumble like decrepit stage sets. As Cincinnatus ascends the scaffold, the crowd starts to fade into transparency. The ax falls, and "amidst the dust, and the falling things, and the flapping scenery, Cincinnatus made his way in that direction where, to judge by the voices, stood beings akin to him."

The intuitions of Cincinnatus, the quiet loner and heretic, have been confirmed. He has been trapped in a false, nightmare universe in which he is the only "real" person. His imagination and awareness, which make him a criminal in the eyes of his fellow citizens, also give him his intuition of a better world, to which he, with the help of his author-creator, gains entrance at the moment of his beheading. His death in the evil world is his birth into the ideal world fashioned by his creator.

Invitation to a Beheading, composed in a matter of weeks during 1934, is Nabokov's most poetic, artifice-saturated, and technically sophisticated novel. There is no pretense of realism in Nabokov's most overt venture into high modernism. There is no attempt to create rounded, believable characters, nor would they be appropriate to what is patently a false, antihuman fictional universe. The plot revolves around the relative reality of Cincinnatus's two universes—his prison world and the free world suggested by his imagination. Nabokov has interposed these two worlds into his dystopian novel in a subtle and ingenious way that is more evident in the Russian original than in the English translation. The presence of the two worlds is almost subliminally woven into the text through the use of the words "here" and "there" signifying the false and the real worlds. Cincinnatus's creator, Nabokov, has structured his story around these contrasting terms, affirming what his character can only suspect. Stylistically, Invitation to a Beheading is Nabokov's most brilliant novel.

THE GIFT

First published: Dax, 1937-1938, serial; 1952, book (English translation, 1963)

Type of work: Novel

A young Russian émigré writer gradually masters his art and finds love in the Berlin of the 1920's.

The Gift, Nabokov's last and greatest Russian novel, is set in Russian émigré Berlin in the late 1920's. The hero, Fyodor Godunov-Cherdyntsev, is a young poet and writer seeking to find his own voice and place in the Russian literary tradition. The former aristocrat, forever barred from his homeland, leads a pleasantly precarious existence giving lessons, doing translations, and selling an occasional poem. The Gift has a dual plot line: the evolution of Fyodor's art, and the course of his love affair with fellow émigré Zina Mertz.

As the novel opens, Fyodor, who just published his first book of poems, is settling in at a new rooming house. That evening he visits Alexander and Alexandra Chernyshevski, who have befriended the young poet after the suicide of their son. Exercising his artistic imagination, Fyodor tries to enter the mind of each of the people present. Alexander Chernyshevski is on the verge of madness, and through Alexander's eyes Fyodor sees the shadowy figure of his dead son, Yasha, among the guests.

A few months pass, and Fyodor receives a visit from his mother, who lives in Paris. They reminisce about their idyllic family life in Russia before the revolution. Their greatest concern, however, is the fate of Fyodor's father, a famous explorer who disappeared while returning from Tibet. Although he is presumed dead, both mother and son still hope for his return. An austere scientist as well as a man of action, Fyodor's father possessed an aura of secret knowledge that set him apart from others. Fyodor, who idolizes his father, decides to write his biography. After many months, he abandons the project, feeling that he is unable to capture his father's mysterious essence. Fyodor has not yet mastered the themes and techniques that will mark him as a great artist.

The young writer must once again change his lodgings, and he takes a room in the apartment of a Russian family named Shchyogolev. Zina, Mrs. Shchyogolev's daughter from an earlier marriage, proves to be a longtime admirer of Fyodor's poetry, and the young people are drawn together. Meanwhile Fyodor, an accomplished composer of chess problems, has come across an excerpt from the diary of Nikolai Chernyshevski in a Soviet chess magazine. Nikolai Chernyshevski (who is not to be confused with the novel's other Chernyshevskis) was a radical nineteenth century Russian literary and political journalist exiled by the czar. The inept Chernyshevski became a political martyr revered by the liberal Russian intelligentsia. So respected was he that his primitive, social utilitarian aesthetic views came to dominate much of Russia's cultural development for more than a century. Fyodor, the young aesthete, sees Nikolai Chernyshevski as the bad seed of Russian cultural and political history and decides to write a book about him. The slight volume, which constitutes chapter 4 of The Gift, outrages almost all segments of the reading public and gains for Fyodor a certain notoriety.

Zina has served as Fyodor's muse throughout the writing of the Chernyshevski biography. The lovers, although living under the same roof, are never alone together. Their problem is unexpectedly solved when Shchyogolev obtains a job abroad and sublets the family apartment. Until the new tenants arrive, Zina and Fyodor can stay. The young lovers, whose relationship has remained unknown to the Shchyogolevs, see them off at the train station. As they spend their last money on dinner in a sidewalk café, Fyodor outlines the plan of his major novel, which proves to be The Gift.

The Gift is especially rich in themes. The most prominent is that of the artist's creative process. Fyodor's artistic development is illustrated through four stages: the early poems, the aborted biography of his father, the witty and elegant biography of Chernyshevski, and The Gift itself. In each case, the actual development of Fyodor's creative process is followed from its tiny, inconsequential beginnings to the finished work, for Nabokov's novel is a biographical study of the creative gift from which the novel draws its title. The second major theme is Nabokov's radical reassessment of Russian cultural history and literature. The theme is associated with Fyodor's withering biography of Nikolai Chernyshevski and with his relationship with a character named Koncheyev, a poet and literary critic. It is in Fyodor's conversations with Koncheyev (all of which are imaginary) that Nabokov advances his own aesthetically based reevaluation of Russian literature. The third major theme is the hereafter. This theme centers upon Alexander Chernyshevski and, to a lesser extent, upon Fyodor and his father. The demented Chernyshevski at times believes that he is in touch with the spirit world, but at other times he rejects the idea. As he lies dying, listening to water drumming outside his curtained window, he murmurs, "What nonsense. Of course there is nothing afterwards. . . . It is as clear as the fact that it is raining." In fact, the sun is shining, and a neighbor is watering her plants. The theme surfaces again near the end of the book when Fyodor receives a night summons to come meet his returned father. The sequence proves to be a dream, but other clues throughout the novel suggest the ghostly presence of Fyodor's father.

The Gift, the most complex of Nabokov's Russian novels, is also the most deeply rooted in Russian history and culture. Beyond that, what at first seems to be a traditional realistic Russian novel in fact proves to be another example of Nabokov's artistic ingeniousness, for his novel is plotted on the model of a chess problem composed by Fyodor in the course of the book. Both a loving tribute to and a parody of the traditional Russian realistic novel, The Gift is a fitting climax to Nabokov's career as a Russian writer.

"SIGNS AND SYMBOLS"

First published: 1948 (collected in The Stories of Vladimir Nabokov, 1995)

Type of work: Short story

An elderly couple visit their son in a sanitarium and subsequently receive a series of unsettling telephone calls.

Originally published in The New Yorker in 1948, "Signs and Symbols" illustrates Nabokov's talent for enfolding closely observed details of everyday life into a larger conceptual framework.

An aging Russian immigrant couple are making a difficult trip by subway and bus to their son's sanitarium to give him his twentieth birthday present, a selection of jellies in a basket. The young man is suffering from “referential mania” and imagines that every object and event has something to do with him. Upon arriving, however, the parents learn that their son has once again tried to commit suicide and should not be disturbed. The weary couple return home with the basket, but cannot sleep. They decide that despite the difficulty involved, they must bring their son home to care for him.

As they work out the details of their decision, the telephone rings, and the wife answers it with trepidation, for it is now past midnight. When a voice she does not recognize asks for “Charlie,” she explains with relief that the caller has the wrong number. Moments later the phone rings again, and the same young girl asks for Charlie again. The wife explains that the caller is still misdialing, after which the couple return to the simple pleasures of their late-night tea. The telephone rings a third time, at which point the story ends.

Although Nabokov describes the aging couple and their travails in homely detail, most readers’ initial reactions to “Signs and Symbols” focus on the telephone calls that end the story. Given the condition of the young man and the late hour, it is natural that readers share the couple’s trepidation over the calls, for the sanitarium may be trying to inform them that their son has finally succeeded in killing himself. It is at this point that careful readers may think back on the condition from which the son suffers—a mania in which he believes that everything relates to and revolves around him. In their response to the telephone calls, his parents share a version of the same mania, as do the story’s readers, who not unnaturally assume that every detail of the work before them must somehow relate to its “meaning.” Nabokov seemingly leaves the issue unresolved, yet the lack of a resolution merely heightens the impulse to find a pattern where there may not be one.

LOLITA

First published: 1955

Type of work: Novel

Humbert Humbert marries a widow in order to be close to her daughter, and he embarks upon an affair with the girl after her mother’s death.

Generally regarded as Nabokov’s most important work, Lolita opens with a foreword, ostensibly written by a psychiatrist, reporting that the narrator of Lolita, Humbert Humbert, died while awaiting trial. Several other characters treated in the text, including Mrs. Richard F. Schiller, have also died.

Humbert Humbert proves to be an elusive and ambiguous narrator, apologizing for yet celebrating his love for the underage Lolita. He describes his early years in Europe; his love for Annabel Leigh, who died soon after he met her, instilling in him an attraction to “nymphets”; and his immigration to the United States after World War II. In New England he rents a room from widowed Charlotte Haze after laying eyes on her twelve-year-old daughter Lolita. Humbert eventually marries Haze in order to remain near Lolita, and then he plots to kill his new wife—an act he is prevented from carrying out when she dies by accident. Humbert removes Lolita from her summer camp and takes her to a hotel named The Enchanted Hunters. In an ironic twist, the young woman seduces the older man.

There follows a description of Humbert and Lolita’s long journey across the United States by automobile, a trip in which the girl is essentially Humbert’s willing prisoner. After a year the pair return to New England, where Humbert places his stepdaughter in a private boarding school. After taking the lead in a play called The Enchanted Hunters, however, Lolita expresses a desire to travel again, but on this trip Humbert senses, correctly, that they are being followed. Lolita is abducted and eventually abandoned by another man, although Humbert does not learn the details until Lolita writes him some years later. Now married to a veteran named Schiller, she reluctantly reveals the identity of her abductor, an old family friend named Clare Quilty. Humbert then tracks Quilty down and kills him.

A brief plot summary does Lolita little justice, for the novel is densely textured and exceedingly complex. It is replete with literary allusions to such writers as Edgar Allan Poe, who married his thirteen-year-old niece and wrote a poem about love and early death entitled “Annabel Lee” (1849). The coincidences in which the novel seems to abound are evidence of larger if elusive patterns. For example, Humbert finds it pleasant that the play Lolita participates in shares the name of the hotel in which he and she became lovers. Yet it eventually becomes clear that Quilty was at the hotel that night, that he immediately grasped Humbert's involvement with Lolita, and that he actually wrote the play. In effect, Quilty and Humbert are both “hunters” who find themselves “enchanted” by Lolita. Lolita also admits that Quilty was the only man she had ever loved.

Lolita is frequently lauded as a comic masterpiece, but despite its ribald wordplay it is a somber work, and not only because it deals with pedophilia. Humbert Humbert announces at the end of his manuscript that it is to be published only when Lolita is no longer alive, but it comes as a shock to realize that the “Mrs. Richard F. Schiller” referred to briefly in the work's foreword is after all Lolita, and that she died shortly after Humbert Humbert himself, giving birth to a stillborn daughter. Thus Humbert Humbert's last words, in which he praises the “refuge of art,” are particularly pertinent: “And this is the only immortality you and I may share, my Lolita.”

PALE FIRE

First published: 1962

Type of work: Novel

A demented critic detects hidden meanings in a colleague's final work.

Pale Fire is undoubtedly Nabokov's most challenging novel. It opens with a self-indulgent “Foreword” by one Charles Kinbote and continues with a long poem (also entitled “Pale Fire”) by his late friend and colleague John Shade, a professor at a northeastern college and a poet somewhat in the mold of Robert Frost. A wayward, extended “Commentary” and a brief “Index,” both by Kinbote, conclude the novel.

Shade's poem is written in 999 lines and divided into four cantos. An autobiographical rumination on death and the possibility of life after death, it reaches a poignant apogee in describing the suicide of Shade's beloved but ungainly daughter Hazel. In his “Foreword,” however, Kinbote argues that the poem is actually “about” something else, and encourages readers to consult his “Commentary” before studying the poem. Kinbote has been regaling his patient friend with absurd stories involving the exiled king of Zembla, Charles the Beloved. Although there is an arctic island called Nova Zembla, there is no country called Zembla outside Kinbote's imagination. Yet Kinbote is convinced that Shade has incorporated Kinbote's stories into his poem, and proves it, at least to his own satisfaction, in his bizarre notes.

It may seem obvious that Kinbote is mad, although it is possible to determine from his remarks the general course of events and the particulars of his friend's fate.

Having finished (or nearly finished) “Pale Fire,” Shade visits Kinbote and, mistaken for the judge from whom Kinbote rents his house, is shot and killed by an escaped criminal named Jack Grey. Believing that Kinbote has heroically tried to save her husband's life, Shade's widow Sybil gives Kinbote permission to edit and publish her husband's last poem.

The levels of possible interpretation of Pale Fire are multitudinous and extend far beyond the subject matter of Shade's poem. Charles the Beloved may well be Kinbote's alter ego, but on the other hand Kinbote may actually be the Russian-American scholar V. Botkin mentioned in the "Index." In addition, the mysterious Zemblan revolutionary Jakob Gradus discussed in Kinbote's "Commentary" may be Jack Grey.

Pale Fire takes its title from William Shakespeare's play Timon of Athens (pr. c. 1607-1608, pb. 1623): "The moon's an arrant thief,/ And her pale fire she snatches from the sun." Nabokov's treatment of stolen identity (and thus stolen meaning) is audacious, although the success of Pale Fire is open to question. Some critics greeted Pale Fire with extravagant praise, but many readers have found Kinbote, who occupies center stage throughout most of the novel, insubstantial and unsympathetic—a monomaniac defined entirely by his obsession.

SUMMARY

The critic George Steiner suggested that many of the writers who have left lasting marks in twentieth century literature share a characteristic that he termed "extraterritoriality." In the past, writers were closely bound to their own countries and cultures. Their settings and their points of view were restricted to their own background. Vladimir Nabokov, like James Joyce, Samuel Beckett, and Jorge Luis Borges, lived in a multilingual, multicultural world. By drawing on his multicultural heritage, Nabokov revitalized the novel, creating master works for a new international audience.

D. Barton Johnson; updated by Grove Koger

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Mashenka, 1926 (Mary, 1970)
Korol', dama, valet, 1928 (King, Queen, Knave, 1968)
Zashchita Luzhina, 1929, serial; 1930, book (The Defense, 1964)
Soglyadatay, 1930, serial; 1938, book (The Eye, 1965)
Kamera obskura, 1932 (Camera Obscura, 1936; revised as Laughter in the Dark, 1938)
Podvig, 1932 (Glory, 1971)
Otchayanie, 1934, serial; 1936, book (Despair, 1937; revised 1966)
Priglasenie na kazn', 1935-1936, serial; 1938, book (Invitation to a Beheading, 1959)
Dar, 1937-1938, serial; 1952, book (The Gift, 1963)
The Real Life of Sebastian Knight, 1941
Bend Sinister, 1947
Lolita, 1955
Pnin, 1957
Pale Fire, 1962
Ada or Ardor: A Family Chronicle, 1969
Transparent Things, 1972
Look at the Harlequins!, 1974

SHORT FICTION:

Vozrashchenie Chorba, 1930
Soglyadatay, 1938
Nine Stories, 1947
Vesna v Fialte i drugie rasskazy, 1956

Nabokov's Dozen: A Collection of Thirteen Stories, 1958
Nabokov's Quartet, 1966
A Russian Beauty, and Other Stories, 1973
Tyrants Destroyed, and Other Stories, 1975
Details of a Sunset, and Other Stories, 1976
The Stories of Vladimir Nabokov, 1995

POETRY:

Stikhi, 1916
Dva puti, 1918
Grozd', 1923
Gorny put, 1923
Stikhotvorenia, 1929-1951, 1952
Poems, 1959
Poems and Problems, 1970

DRAMA:

Dedushka, pb. 1923
Smert', pb. 1923
Tragediya gospodina Morna, pb. 1924
Polius, pb. 1924
Chelovek iz SSSR, pb. 1927
Izobretenie Val'sa, pb. 1938 (The Waltz Invention, 1966)
Sobytiye, pr., pb. 1938

SCREENPLAY:

Lolita, 1962 (adaptation of his novel)

NONFICTION:

Nikolai Gogol, 1944
Conclusive Evidence: A Memoir, 1951
Drugie berega, 1954
Speak, Memory: An Autobiography Revisited, 1966 (revision of Conclusive Evidence and Drugie berega)
Strong Opinions, 1973
The Nabokov-Wilson Letters, 1940-1971, 1979
Lectures on Literature, 1980
Lectures on Russian Literature, 1981
Lectures on Don Quixote, 1983
Vladimir Nabokov: Selected Letters, 1940-1977, 1989

TRANSLATIONS:

Anya v strane chudes, 1923 (of Lewis Carroll's novel Alice's Adventures in Wonderland)
Three Russian Poets: Translations of Pushkin, Lermontov, and Tiutchev, 1944 (with Dmitri Nabokov)
A Hero of Our Time, 1958 (of Mikhail Lermontov's novel; with Dmitri Nabokov)
The Song of Igor's Campaign, 1960 (of the twelfth century epic Slovo o polki Igoreve)
Eugene Onegin, 1964 (of Alexander Pushkin's novel)

About the Author

Alexandrov, Vladimir E. Nabokov's Otherworld. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1991.
 Boyd, Brian. Vladimir Nabokov: The Russian Years. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1990.
 _____. Vladimir Nabokov: The American Years. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1991.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What is Vladimir Nabokov's attitude toward memory?
- How does Nabokov treat moral concerns in his works?
- How does Nabokov suggest the possibility of an afterlife?
- How does Nabokov utilize the game of chess in his works?
- What are the characteristics of Nabokov's style?
- Many of Nabokov's narrators are unreliable. How can readers determine the validity of what they have to say?

- Connolly, Julian W., ed. The Cambridge Companion to Nabokov. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
- De la Durantaye, Leland. Style Is Matter: The Moral Art of Vladimir Nabokov. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2007.
- Lee, L. L. Vladimir Nabokov. Boston: Twayne, 1976.
- Page, Norman, ed. Nabokov: The Critical Heritage. London: Routledge and Kegan Paul, 1982.
- Pifer, Ellen. Nabokov and the Novel. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1980.
- Proffer, Ellendea. Vladimir Nabokov: A Pictorial Biography. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Ardis, 1991.
- Rampton, David. Vladimir Nabokov: A Critical Study of the Novels. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1984.

Thomas Victor

V. S. NAIPAUL

Born: Chaguanas, Trinidad and Tobago
August 17, 1932

Described by many as England's greatest living writer, Naipaul explores the postcolonial world in his novels and nonfiction.

BIOGRAPHY

Vidiadhar Surajprasad Naipaul (NI-pawl) was born in Chaguanas, Trinidad and Tobago, on August 17, 1932, of Hindu parents whose forebears had emigrated from India. Vidiadhar's father, Seepersad Naipaul, was reared in poverty because of the early death of his own father. After completing his education, however, Seepersad married into a large, powerful Brahman family. At the time of Vidiadhar's birth, Seepersad was staff correspondent for the Trinidad Guardian, reporting on events in the small town of Chaguanas. There he and his wife lived, along with dozens of relatives, all crowded into the large family home and dominated by his wife's mother. Two years after Vidiadhar's birth, when the crusading managing editor of the Trinidad Guardian lost his job, Seepersad was reduced to a position as stringer, or occasional writer. Lacking privacy or respect at home and deprived of the vocation that had given his life order and meaning, Seepersad had a nervous breakdown. For some years he moved from one odd job to another and from one place to another, while his wife and children remained in the big house in Chaguanas.

Although his father was to be a major influence on his career, V. S. Naipaul said he did not come to know him until 1938, when Seepersad was hired by the Trinidad Guardian to cover Port of Spain and moved his wife and five children to the city, where for two years they were finally able to live by themselves. During that period, which he calls the happiest in his life, the boy started reading his father's old press clippings, which gave him an insight into life in Chaguanas, as well as an interest in writing.

Later, the Naipaul family was again absorbed by relatives, living first in the country and then, when World War II broke out, back in Port of Spain in a house crowded with family members who had come to the city to work. Because conditions at home were so chaotic during most of his childhood, Naipaul was developing a need for order, which he found at school and, interestingly, in reading draft after draft of the stories that his father was writing for his own pleasure. In this process, he came to share his father's conviction that writing was the noblest vocation of all because it enabled one to work toward a just order in a chaotic and unjust world. By the time he was eleven, even though he himself had done no writing, Naipaul knew that he was to be a writer.

By the time Seepersad could finally buy a house for his family, V. S. Naipaul was fourteen years old. At eighteen, he left home. Having completed his studies at Queen's Royal College, he won a scholarship from the government of Trinidad, and in 1950 he left for Oxford, planning to study English in preparation for his career as a writer. Unfortunately, his father did not live to see his son's success. In 1953, at the age of forty-seven, Seepersad Naipaul died.

When he left Oxford a year after his father's death, Naipaul stayed in London, living meagerly on the income from a part-time position with the British Broadcasting Corporation's Caribbean service. In his "Prologue to an Autobiography," published in Finding the Center: Two Narratives (1984), Naipaul dates his writing career as beginning late one afternoon in the office where he worked, when, for no particular reason, he typed a sentence about someone named Hat shouting to his neighbor Bogart back in Port of Spain. Naipaul's imagination was fired. He kept writing, and in time he had finished a book. Although it was to be four years later, in 1959, that Miguel Street would be published, from the moment that Naipaul pecked out that sentence, with which the novel begins, he had begun to fulfill his father's dream. When he decided to remain in England after leaving Oxford, Naipaul was in effect choosing his lifetime home.

In 1955, he married a British woman, Patricia Ann Hale, with whom he would live in historic Salisbury, near Stonehenge. Despite his long residence there and the acclaim that he has received from English readers, however, Naipaul always describes himself as an exile in England, in the same way that he would have been an outsider in Trinidad.

For his first four novels, however, Naipaul drew on the experiences of his childhood. The Mystic Masseur (1957), The Suffrage of Elvira (1958), Miguel Street (1959), and A House for Mr. Biswas (1961) are all set in Trinidad and all have obvious autobiographical elements. A House for Mr. Biswas, for example, is the story of a poor man, much like Naipaul's father, who is doomed to live with his wife's relatives but determined to get a house of his own.

In 1962, Naipaul published his first nonfiction work, The Middle Passage: Impressions of Five Societies—British, French, and Dutch—in the West Indies and South America, which concentrates on the status of societies that, like the West Indies, are still influenced by their colonial heritage. During that decade, Naipaul wrote a variety of works, for example, the novels Mr. Stone and the Knights Companion (1963), set in England, and The Mimic Men (1967), about a West Indian expatriate in London, as well as short stories and other nonfiction books.

In the years that followed, Naipaul further broadened his scope, publishing novels set in Africa and nonfiction about India. A Turn in the South (1989), a travel book about the American South, illustrates Naipaul's continuing curiosity and flexibility. His increasing concern about the spread of Islamic fundamentalism is reflected in his 1981 work Among the Believers: An Islamic Journey and in the even more controversial book Beyond Belief: Islamic Excursions Among the Converted Peoples (1998). In 2001, his novel Half a Life appeared, and the sequel, Magic Seeds, was published three years later. Naipaul also published two important essay collections, The Writer and the World (2002) and Literary Occasions (2003). Naipaul's achievement as a writer won him many awards and honors, among them, a knighthood in 1990 and the Nobel Prize in Literature in 2001.

ANALYSIS

Although his works vary widely in subject, in form, and in tone, Naipaul's primary interest throughout his literary career has been the relationship of the individual to society. He is unlike such twentieth century authors as Eudora Welty of Mississippi or R. K. Narayan of India, who wrote about the traditional societies in which they were reared. Naipaul does not deal with a static society, whose rules an individual must accept or defy, but with multicultural societies in which the various cultures themselves are changing because of the breakdown of old traditions, old beliefs, or the old, often colonial, governments that gave them stability.

Even a relatively peaceful society, such as that described in Naipaul's Trinidad novels, can be extremely complex. There are the white, Christian residents, the old governing class of the colonial period. There is a black majority, with its own customs, even its own language. Finally, there is the Indian minority, most of whom are descended from immigrants who worked out their passage as indentured servants but who are now far from homogeneous. Some are rich, others are poor. Some are Hindus, some are Muslims. Some are religiously orthodox, others are not. As Naipaul indicates in "Prologue to an Autobiography," however, they do have one common quality: Most of them, even if they have abandoned their religious practices, still retain ties to an India that many of them have never seen. This fact is reflected in Naipaul's account of his grandfather, who after spending his life in Trinidad, returned to India to die. The persistence of social prejudices brought from the older society is revealed in the conversation of Naipaul's elderly aunt, who remembers her cruel and miserly father with pride because by inheritance he was of high caste. Yet, as Naipaul points out in the same essay, those very Indians who endured their exile in Trinidad by thinking of India as their real home often discovered that they were cherishing an illusion. He describes vividly the terror of the Indians who, ecstatic to be docking in Calcutta, were almost trampled by people who had been repatriated on the last boat and were now desperate to return to Trinidad.

Like these immigrants, Naipaul's characters are often caught between two worlds. His protagonist in The Mimic Men, for example, feels ill at ease in London, but when he returns home he is just as much out of place as he was in England. One reason for his alienation is, of course, the fact that while he has been absent, both he and his childhood home have changed. Certainly, this kind of experience is a universal phenomenon. The Indians who returned to an India they remembered, however, encountered not only the differences that the passage of time brings to any society but also the dizzyingly accelerated change resulting from the death of colonialism and the painful birth of a new society.

Much to the distress of some of his readers, Naipaul is not optimistic about attempts at democracy in formerly colonial countries. The Suffrage of Elvira is a comic treatment of the coming of democracy, defined as corruption; a West Indian island is the setting in Guerrillas (1975), a grim novel about the horrors of revolution. In his works about newly liberated African countries, Middle Eastern Islamic countries, or about India itself, Naipaul stresses his own perception that twentieth and twenty-first century change does not seem to be resulting in progress and peace but in disruption, violence, and the willful destruction of all that earlier generations have built.

Deprived of the support of traditional societies and stable governments, Naipaul's characters, like Naipaul himself, yearn for order in the midst of chaos. In some cases, like Man-man of Miguel Street, who decides to be crucified in order to prove his holiness, they are eccentric or mad enough to be doomed to failure, even in the most traditional society. In other cases, like that of Naipaul's own father and the protagonist of A House for Mr. Biswas, their problems seem to be the result of a number of factors, including chance, their own weakness or gullibility, and an encounter with particularly clever and vicious predators. In some of his works, however, such as In a Free State (1971), the fate of the characters is a direct result of a breakdown of society. Such characters are totally isolated, separated from their native countries, from their cultural traditions, and from one another. This vision of alienated characters in a society that has lost its structure may well be Naipaul's prophecy of the future.

Given the bleakness of his viewpoint, it would seem that Naipaul's works would hardly be rewarding reading. Yet although most of the characters in the early novels set in Trinidad are destined to fail, Naipaul's comic treatment of their problems and his satire of the social relationships with which they are so obsessed prevent his readers from taking either the characters or their entanglements very seriously. Not until A House for Mr. Biswas is there any hint of the tragicomic, or even tragic, tone of Naipaul's later novels. Even works such as In a Free State, however, whose vision of the future is extremely depressing, are compelling because of Naipaul's skill in constructing exciting plots, as well as his genius in creating fascinating, vital characters.

Naipaul's nonfiction works have much in common with his fiction. In both, there is brief, precise, and evocative description and a heavy reliance on accurately rendered dialogue. Whether his people are the fictional residents of Miguel Street or the real residents of the Deep South, Naipaul lets them speak for themselves. In the novels, dramatic dialogue keeps the plot in motion; in the nonfiction works, it just as effectively propels the reader forward to the next chapter, where there is sure to be an opposing viewpoint, or at least a marked variation in interpretation.

All of his technical virtuosity would be of little value if Naipaul did not have such valuable insights. Obviously, he believes that no efforts to produce a just order in society can succeed if they are based on illusions either about the past or about the present. If some misread Naipaul as yearning sentimentally for nineteenth century colonial society, they are ignoring the fact that he satirizes that world and those who are nostalgic for it, just as clearly as he satirizes the simple-minded idealists who have underestimated the difficulty of creating new orders and who, in their foolish optimism, have permitted the rapacious and the vicious to take control of societies in which there is now neither order nor justice. Some critics feel that Naipaul is basically a misogynist, so trapped in his own rage that he cannot feel compassion even for the fictional characters he has created; others insist that he should be classified as a satirist, who believes that by telling the truth he can make reform possible.

THE SUFFRAGE OF ELVIRA

First published: 1958

Type of work: Novel

In a new West Indian democracy, a candidate for office struggles to win, and to buy, the votes necessary for his election.

The Suffrage of Elvira, Naipaul's second published novel, has been described as a comedy of manners. Certainly, as the first chapter demonstrates, it is comic in tone. On one hand, Naipaul is dramatizing the desperate anxiety of Mr. Surujpat Harbans, as he drives his old truck up Elvira Hill on the way to arrange support for his election to the legislative council. On the other hand, the omens that so terrify Harbans seem hardly to justify his fears. Two American women stop their bicycles so unexpectedly that Harbans cannot help sliding into them, and he later hits and slightly injures a black dog, which is wandering about in the middle of the road with about as much sense as the women.

The fact that both the women and the dog do indeed prove to be recurring obstacles in Harbans's attempt to win the election not only unifies the plot but also points out the failure of democracy, that is, universal suffrage for adults, just four years after it was so nobly declared. Indeed, at the beginning of the second chapter, Naipaul defines what democracy has meant to the islanders: put simply, new possibilities for profit.

As a candidate, Harbans must try to win the election without spending so much money that the post will be unprofitable. As his backers, the Muslim leader, a tailor, and the Hindu leader, a goldsmith, try to spend as little of their own money as possible, while using the election to consolidate their power and, if possible, to get some immediate cash benefits. By rights, Harbans thinks, it should be a simple matter of paying these leaders a reasonable sum to deliver the votes. That is the way democracy should work.

Unfortunately, Harbans's opponent very nearly outwits him by benefiting from human irrationality. For example, the women on bicycles, who are Jehovah's Witnesses, persuade the Spanish voters, who were committed to Harbans, that God does not wish them to vote, since the end of the world is imminent. The dog, too, causes trouble. One of her puppies, which keeps appearing and disappearing, is seen variously as a curse and a blessing; to offset the harm that this puppy has done to the campaign, the dead puppies in the litter must be publicly displayed so as to discredit the Jehovah's Witnesses and send the Spanish voters on their way to the polling place.

Although The Suffrage of Elvira does not deal with courtly aristocrats as traditional comedy of manners does, it resembles that form in being both dramatic and satirical. Many of the passages consist of colorful dialogue, which has the quality of a scene from a play. Furthermore, the targets of satire are not only individuals but also universal types, such as the Muslim leader's haphazard son, whose schemes and slogans alike very nearly cost Harbans his victory.

Like audiences at comedies of manners, Naipaul's readers begin by laughing at foolish, ignorant people in a fictitious place; however, they should end by realizing that these characters actually exaggerate their own flaws. If no democracy has managed to exclude citizens who see that form of government merely as a means of enriching themselves, it is equally true that even the most principled electorate finds itself influenced by slogans, rumors, sexual scandals, calculated character assassination, appeals to religious convictions, and even free drinks and parades. There is typical Naipaulian irony in the comment made about Elvira voters and intended to be the highest praise: Once they are bought, they stay bought. One wonders if that is the most that can be expected of a democracy, whether in the Third World or in the former colonial powers.

A HOUSE FOR MR. BISWAS

First published: 1961

Type of work: Novel

A poor man spends his life in the quest for self-respect, financial security, and, above all, a house of his own.

A House for Mr. Biswas, the fourth and last of the early novels, is important to the study of Naipaul for several reasons. Although it resembles its predecessors in that it is set in Trinidad, in this work for the first time the comic tone becomes more nearly tragicomic. While Naipaul still treats many of the characters satirically, his protagonist, Mohun Biswas, is likable, even admirable, in his struggle to gain self-respect and the respect of others and to make enough money to buy his own house. A House for Mr. Biswas is also important because it is Naipaul's most autobiographical work, reflecting closely his father's life and his own childhood. For this reason, the author comments in his foreword to the 1984 Vintage Books edition of the work that, of all of his books, this is the one that means the most to him. Naipaul's critics also place a high value on the novel. Many of them consider it to be his masterpiece.

Naipaul's initial chapters generally indicate the theme and the major motifs of his novels. The prologue to A House for Mr. Biswas is really the end of the story, describing as it does the disastrous ending of Mr. Biswas's life, when, at forty-six, the father of four children, penniless, debt-ridden, and ill, he is fired from his job and lies waiting to die in the ill-constructed house that was his life's goal.

In the first chapter of A House for Mr. Biswas, as in the prologue to The Suffrage of Elvira, Naipaul uses what seem like trivial events to set the pattern of the novel. Mohun's being born backward and having a sixth finger should not be blamed for his later troubles. It is soon evident, however, that the boy cannot keep his mind on his business, and through an improbable chain of events, his forgetting to watch a calf indirectly causes his father's death, which in turn sentences the family to poverty. As a poor young man, then, Mohun Biswas later becomes fair game for the predatory Tulsi family, which is always on the lookout for malleable sons-in-law.

The rest of Mr. Biswas's short life is spent in search of employment, prosperity, and a home of his own, where his wife and his children will treat him like the head of the house. Yet he fails in one job after another, and he also fails to make a home for his family. When he leaves the Tulsis, his wife refuses to go with him; when he stays with them, he is no more than a shadowy presence, who can assert himself only by sarcasm. The only relief that Mr. Biswas has from his despair comes in the developing love and loyalty of his son Anand, and even that is not enough to prevent his ultimate nervous breakdown. Like Seepersad Naipaul, Mr. Biswas eventually becomes a journalist in Port of Spain. He has, however, no real security. During his brief residence in the house that he knows is rickety, he looks back on his life, attempting to explain to himself every disastrous choice that he has made.

The story is tragic, but as the final paragraphs of A House for Mr. Biswas illustrate, Naipaul is writing now with a new complexity of tone. First, he treats the death of Mr.

Biswas with appropriate compassion. Then, when the Tulsis, his favorite comic characters, invade the house at the time of the funeral, threatening its immediate collapse, the mood becomes farcical. Yet there is irony in the comedy; one realizes that the survival of the house, despite the Tulsis, is a symbolic triumph for the deceased. Finally, when Naipaul describes the return of the family to the empty house, the note is tragic. Naipaul was never again to write a purely comic novel; instead, he incorporated the comedy as merely one of a number of viewpoints from which his situations and his characters are to be seen.

A BEND IN THE RIVER

First published: 1979

Type of work: Novel

Old residents try to prosper, or even to survive, in a newly liberated African state.

In A Bend in the River, as in all of his later works, Naipaul's dominant theme is alienation. The characters in this novel are not simply outsiders, such as Mr. Biswas among the Tulsis, but bewildered individuals attempting to survive in a rapidly changing society, where the rules are changed daily. The setting is a state in central Africa that has recently undergone a revolution and a civil war. The new government is under the control of a president, actually a dictator, who rules his country with the use of informers, youth squads, disappearances, and executions.

Into this reign of terror comes the protagonist, Salim, an East African Indian who has left the coastal area where his family has lived and traded for generations and bought a shop in an isolated village located on a bend in the river, which he believes should make it an ideal trading place. On his drive across Africa, as he bribes his way through road blocks, at times Salim questions his own sanity. He reaches his destination and settles down in the partially deserted village, hoping for peace and profit, but secure in the fact that he does have a home to which he can return. Unfortunately, he soon learns that his coastal village has been destroyed in a revolution and his family has dispersed. Now Salim is truly marooned.

One of the points that Naipaul makes in A Bend in the River is that one does not have to be alone to be isolated. Salim is not alone. There are a number of expatriates in the village, Belgians, Greeks, Asians, and Indians, many of whom have remained through the turmoil, who now are waiting for life to stabilize. Every family, however, is preoccupied with itself and its own survival; though there is civility, there is no sense of community. Even his best friends, an elderly Indian couple, Shoba and Mahesh, are so preoccupied with themselves that they ignore the people and the country around them, seemingly convincing themselves that they are really living in India. When Salim visits them, there is no conversation; it is as if by ignoring the world outside their door, they can be safe from it. It is this kind of isolation that prevents the villagers from expressing outrage when the highly respected scholar and priest, Father Huismans, is murdered and mutilated, evidently because he had collected ritual masks and therefore seemed to be mocking the native religion. Many of the expatriates seem to see his death as an object lesson: this is what happens when one ventures forward, when one attempts to develop a community among peoples so different from one another.

For a time, the optimism of Father Huismans seems to be justified. Mahesh emerges from his isolation to acquire the Bigburger franchise. The president begins to construct a model town, the Domain, on the site of the old colonial suburb. Salesmen and consultants arrive from Europe, and Salim's childhood friend, the university-educated Indar, appears, a guest of the government, to work at the university turned polytechnic, whose chief function now is to train young men to be members of the president's staff. Salim's life becomes even more interesting when he has an affair with the wife of the president's white adviser. When he recognizes that he is beginning to believe the president's pronouncements, however, Salim feels the need to get some perspective and takes a trip to London.

When he returns to Africa, Salim finds that the promise of progress was an illusion. Caught between the oppressive president and his trigger-happy troops and a newly formed liberation army, everyone is terrified. Salim's business is nationalized, he loses most of his savings in the difficult process of getting money out of the country, and, finally, he is jailed, warned, and forced to flee the country.

The situation in A Bend in the River is what Naipaul finds characteristic of the Third World: For all the talk about a master plan, the leaders of these new countries have no real direction in mind. They cannot decide whether to destroy the vestiges of Europe or to mimic it, as the president did with his Domain, and they cannot seem to develop an orderly, progressive society. The only perceivable pattern is the survival of the vicious. As Salim says, to someone who does not live in these countries, their governments appear comic, and certainly there are many comic scenes in A Bend in the River. Yet, as Salim realizes, one who does choose to stay in the postcolonial chaos can lose everything, including one's life.

THE ENIGMA OF ARRIVAL

First published: 1987

Type of work: Novel

In rural England, an expatriate discovers that traditional societies are as susceptible to change as the Third World country from which he came.

In The Enigma of Arrival, Naipaul turns to the situation of the expatriate who lives as an alien in a traditional society. The narrator, a writer from Trinidad, has come to settle in the English countryside. From his cottage near Salisbury, he ventures forth to look at remnants of the past, prehistoric Stonehenge, deserted farm cottages, and rusting reminders of World War II, and to discover that even this seemingly unchanging landscape and the people who inhabit it are not exempt from change.

The structure of The Enigma of Arrival is more like that of an extremely digressive travel book than a work of fiction. One idea leads to another in the mind of the narrator, who is so close to Naipaul himself as to make it difficult to remember the distinction, and one anecdote suggests another. The connection is thematic and psychological, not chronological. Thus, in the second part of the book, the narrator moves from a journey to England that he has recently completed to his first journey out of Trinidad eighteen years before, while revealing his first impressions of airplane travel, of New York, and of London.

Although there is a great deal of lyrical description of nature in The Enigma of Arrival, Naipaul also tells the stories of people whom he has met along the way, such as Angela, an older, more worldly Italian girl at his London boardinghouse who became one of his closest friends. Late in his Salisbury stay, the narrator receives a letter from Angela, whom he has not seen for thirty years. Outside his window the aspens sway, and he thinks of watching them grow, seeing two of them fall; inside, he sees the variations in Angela's handwriting as she relates the events of her life, and he is acutely conscious of the fact that though one circles in life, sometimes returning, everything is in constant flux.

In the third segment of The Enigma of Arrival, symbolically entitled "Ivy," the narrator focuses on the people who have clung for decades to the area where he is living, especially on those associated with the manor, such as the gardener Pitton, his elderly father, and the car-hire man, all of whom can describe what it was like on the estate when there were sixteen gardeners instead of only one. Then the reclusive landlord emerges from his seclusion and takes an interest in the world around him. The narrator gets to know the landlord's cousin, a personable man who calls himself a writer. There is a brief season when everyone seems to be happy.

Naipaul, however, always points out that the only thing on which one can rely is the certainty of change. The gardener is fired; the landlord returns to his isolation; the would-be writer becomes an alcoholic and commits suicide; the caretaker dies; his wife remarries; the little children's house on the estate is closed off with barbed wire; and the narrator knows that it is time for him to leave. In his epilogue, "The Ceremony of Farewell," he explains the new insights that came during his stay in Salisbury, involving primarily a new acceptance of the mystery of life itself.

HALF A LIFE

First published: 2001

Type of work: Novel

An Indian of mixed ancestry seeks a sense of his own identity first in England and then in Africa.

Half a Life is another of Naipaul's stories of alienation. In this case, however, the central character is not merely frustrated in his efforts to attain a particular goal; when the book ends, he has reached middle age without finding a purpose for his life.

The book begins with a seemingly simple question. Willie Chandran, the protagonist, asks his father why his middle name is "Somerset." At this point, the author turns the narrative over to Willie's father. His explanation begins in the 1890's, when Willie's great-grandfather, a priest, left his impoverished temple for the court of the maharaja, thus beginning his family's movement up the social ladder. Willie's father was meant to attend a professional school and to marry the daughter of his college principal. However, he decided to rebel against his Brahman family by taking up with a black, low-caste girl. Since he did not love or even like the woman he had chosen, his home life was miserable. Realizing that their two mixed-race children, Willie and Sarojini, had no future in India, the elder Chandran tried to obtain a college scholarship for his son by contacting English visitors to India with whom he had become casually acquainted, including the writer W. Somerset Maugham, for whom Willie was named. However, either his pleas were ignored or, as in Maugham's case, received a perfunctory response.

The author now takes control of the story. Willie's father has obtained a scholarship for him at a mediocre college in London. There Willie finds he can invent himself, glamorizing his lineage by making his mother a member of an ancient Christian sect and calling his father one of the maharajah's courtiers. Willie becomes a member of a bohemian immigrant group, writes a radio script for the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC), and produces twenty-six short stories, which are published in book form. He even gains some badly needed sexual expertise. However, a visit from his sister Sarojini shakes his growing self-confidence. As Sarojini points out, Willie's scholarship will soon expire, and he still has no plans for the future. An encounter with Ana, a girl from Portuguese East Africa who also has a mixed racial background, seems providential. They fall in love, and Willie decides to go home with her. The narrative now jumps ahead eighteen years. Willie tells Ana that he wants a divorce. He is leaving because, as he says, he can no longer live her life.

The final section of the book is Willie's account of those eighteen years in Mozambique, told to his sister Sarojini at her home in Berlin, Germany. Willie and Ana had both assumed that he would make himself useful on her estate. However, he spends his time socializing with the local landowners, most of them of mixed racial backgrounds, all of them boastful and pretentious. When violence erupts and it becomes clear that the colonial empire is doomed, they begin to flee, and Willie leaves, too, evidently still searching for his identity and for the purpose of his existence so he can live more than "half a life."

SUMMARY

Although he must be admired for his skill in plotting and characterization and for the beauty of his language, V. S. Naipaul is perhaps most important because he addresses the most difficult problem of modern humanity—the sense of alienation. Even in the early comic novels, Naipaul suggests how deeply his characters fear being expelled from the cultural groups that give them a sense of identity. Most of his later works take a grimly realistic look at the Third World, where political and social change has deprived people of their identities, leaving them isolated in chaotic, corrupt societies, where desperation too often leads them into fanaticism and mindless violence. In Magic Seeds (2004), the sequel to Half a Life, Naipaul seems to have abandoned hope for humanity. However, taken as a whole, his works provide such valuable insights into postcolonial societies that they may well make constructive change possible.

Rosemary M. Canfield Reisman

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

The Mystic Masseur, 1957

The Suffrage of Elvira, 1958

Miguel Street, 1959

A House for Mr. Biswas, 1961
Mr. Stone and the Knights Companion, 1963
The Mimic Men, 1967
In a Free State, 1971
Guerrillas, 1975
A Bend in the River, 1979
The Enigma of Arrival, 1987
A Way in the World, 1994
Half a Life, 2001
Magic Seeds, 2004

SHORT FICTION:

A Flag on the Island, 1967

NONFICTION:

The Middle Passage: Impressions of Five Societies—British, French, and Dutch—in the West Indies and South America, 1962
An Area of Darkness: An Experience of India, 1964
The Loss of El Dorado: A History, 1969
The Overcrowded Barracoon, and Other Articles, 1972
India: A Wounded Civilization, 1977
"The Return of Eva Perón" with "The Killings in Trinidad," 1980
Among the Believers: An Islamic Journey, 1981
Finding the Center: Two Narratives, 1984
A Turn in the South, 1989
India: A Million Mutinies Now, 1990
Beyond Belief: Islamic Excursions Among the Converted Peoples, 1998
Between Father and Son: Family Letters, Selected Correspondence of V. S. Naipaul and His Family, 1949-1953, 2000 (pb. in England as Letters Between a Father and Son, 1999)
Reading and Writing: A Personal Account, 2000
The Writer and the World: Essays, 2002 (Pankaj Mishra, editor)
Literary Occasions: Essays, 2003 (Mishra, editor)
A Writer's People: Ways of Looking and Feeling, 2007

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Nightwatchman's Occurrence Book, and Other Comic Inventions, 2002

About the Author

Dooley, Gillian. V. S. Naipaul, Man and Writer. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2006.
 Feder, Lillian. Naipaul's Truth: The Making of a Writer. Lanham, Md.: Rowman & Littlefield, 2001.
 Gorra, Michael Edward. After Empire: Scott, Naipaul, Rushdie. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
 Hayward, Helen. The Enigma of V. S. Naipaul: Sources and Contexts. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2002.
 King, Bruce Alvin. V. S. Naipaul. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1993.
 Nixon, Rob. London Calling: V. S. Naipaul, Postcolonial Mandarin. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
 Theroux, Paul. Sir Vidia's Shadow: A Friendship Across Five Continents. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1998.
 Weiss, Timothy. On the Margins: The Art of Exile in V. S. Naipaul. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1992.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How is the influence of colonialism reflected in V. S. Naipaul's novels?
- Some characters in Naipaul's novels feel they have no real homes. Why do they feel that way?
- What elements in British culture make it difficult for Third World immigrants to fit in?
- How important are family ties to Naipaul's characters?
- How do Naipaul's Indian characters view sexual relationships? What is their attitude toward marriage?
- What is Naipaul's assessment of Islamic fundamentalism? Why does he think it appeals to so many Muslims?
- How does Guerillas dramatize the problems in postcolonial African countries?
- What does Naipaul see as the major problems in India, his ancestral home? How do his views change from one book about India to the next?

Library of Congress

R. K. NARAYAN

Born: Madras, India
October 10, 1906

Died: Madras, India
May 13, 2001

Through his novels set in the fictional South Indian town of Malgudi, Narayan made ordinary and spiritual life in India come alive for readers around the world.

BIOGRAPHY

A teacher's son, Rasipuram Krishnaswami Narayan (nah-RAH-yan) was born in Madras, a major South Indian city, where he attended Lutheran Mission School and Christian College High School. In the early 1920's, the family moved to another South Indian city, Mysore, where Narayan's father served as headmaster at Maharajah's College High School. Taking advantage of the library privileges granted by his father, the young Narayan read voraciously, mainly in the English classics.

In 1926, Narayan entered Maharajah's College in Mysore. After graduating in 1930, he took a teaching position but soon gave that up. He started to write, determined to become an English-language novelist. Marrying in 1933, he then worked as a reporter in Mysore for The Justice, a Madras newspaper. Narayan recalled in his autobiography, My Days (1974), how this experience brought him into "close contact with a variety of men and their activities" and gave him material that he was to use in his future fiction.

His first novel, Swami and Friends, appeared in 1935. Rejected by several English publishers, the manuscript eventually came to the attention of Graham Greene, the British novelist, who was immensely impressed by Narayan's narrative technique and the way he had recorded South Indian life. Greene lent his prestige to finding a publisher for the young Indian's first novel.

Once Swami and Friends—a story about boyhood in South India—was published, Narayan stopped working for The Justice and began contributing articles to various magazines to make a living. In 1938, Narayan's daughter, Hema, was born and his third novel, The Dark Room, appeared. During that year he also received a grant from the Indian state of Karnataka, an undertaking that offered him the opportunity to travel in all parts of the large and varied region. While traveling, he gathered an abundance of material that would not only fulfill his governmental assignment but would also serve as sources for his later work.

In 1939, Narayan began his long association with The Hindu, a Madras newspaper, to which he would through the years contribute hundreds of stories and sketches. In June of that year his young wife died of typhoid.

Firmly established as a leading Indian writer in English, Narayan published novel after novel, as well as collections of short stories and shortened prose translations of the Indian classics the Ramayana and the Mahabharata. Even though he published many collections of his short stories, including Malgudi Days (1941) and A Horse and Two Goats, and Other Stories (1970), Narayan is most widely known for his novels.

He received numerous awards and grants, including the National Prize of the Indian Literary Academy, the Padma Bhushan Award in India, the English-Speaking Union Book Award, and a Rockefeller Foundation grant for travel in the United States in 1956. He later visited the United States several times, serving residences at Vassar College in 1983 and at the University of Texas at Austin in 1989.

Narayan continued to record daily events in Malgudi, the imaginary city he created through a lifetime of writing. He was always something of a recluse, rarely granting interviews, attending literary gatherings, or commenting on his own work. He died in Madras on May 13, 2001, at the age of ninety-four.

ANALYSIS

Narayan's fiction may be described as an extended experiment in serious comedy, which blends the realism of Western thought with the mythology of traditional India. He accomplished this wedding of two extremes in the following ways. First, he created the imaginary city of Malgudi that is both realistic and mythical in nature. Next, he populated this city with characters who face conflict in their lives and who search for a solution, often finding themselves caught between the realistic and the supernatural. Narayan's world, though, is not a hollow one, not full of despair and defeat, but a place where the characters can and do discover wholeness. This struggle Narayan recorded with narrative simplicity and a sympathetic understanding of human foibles. Such, then, is the basis for approaching any one of Narayan's novels or short stories.

From Narayan's first novel, published in 1935, and through his subsequent work, he constructed the South Indian city of Malgudi, brick by brick, street by street, building by building, neighborhood by neighborhood, until it has become a familiar place to his readers in all corners of the world. Malgudi lies next to a river and has its full share of schools, cafés, temples, street vendors' stands, shops, fine houses, and slums. As a creation of the imagination, Malgudi recalls William Faulkner's Yoknapatawpha County, the fictional Southern region where the American writer set most of his fiction.

By not placing his stories in an actual Indian city like Delhi, Bombay, or Calcutta, Narayan was able to exercise total control over place and to create a world he could manipulate without being bothered by his audience's preconceived notions of reality. To a degree, the bustling city of Malgudi serves as the central character in Narayan's fiction.

Further, Malgudi possesses a static and constant quality, which offers stability amid turmoil. It is largely untouched by the upheavals that have afflicted twentieth century India. Unlike other Indian novelists in English, such as Mulk Raj Anand and Nayantara Sahgal, Narayan did not take up the caste system, poverty, inequality, politics, the treatment of women, and the usual postcolonial concerns of displacement, national identity, and economics. Instead, his world of Malgudi emerges as antihistorical and thereby provides a sense of a permanence in which the essential conflicts of the human condition can be worked out.

Those working out such conflicts come from a wide range of social classes. Consequently, a colorful gallery of Indian characters appeared in Narayan's fiction. The central personage may be a professor at the local college as in The English Teacher (1945; also known as Grateful to Life and Death, 1953), a hustling tour promoter as in The Guide (1958), a money lender as in The Financial Expert (1952), or even a tiger as in A Tiger for Malgudi (1983). Most often a male, this main character is surrounded by varied members of the Malgudi community, ranging from street vendors and shop owners to relatives and friends to priests and mystics. Each character, no matter how minor, finds a voice of his or her own. Sometimes the characters are not named but identified by an outstanding quality. The crowded streets and bulging houses of India, the busy temples and noisy shops and cafés, the human chaos that seems to prevail in an Asian city are all fully realized in the novels.

While the shortcomings of human beings do not miss Narayan's keen eye, he never undercuts his characters or treats them in a condescending manner, no matter how foolishly they may act. Here the seriousness of his comedy comes into the picture. All the novels and short stories focus on a serious problem the major characters face. As the events unfold and the characters work toward a solution to their conflicts, they often become involved in absurd situations and meet any number of ridiculous people. Many times in their thoughts these seekers are altogether self-deprecating, fully aware of their shortcomings and foolishness. Finally, though, they gain the sense of wholeness that they seek. No matter how comic the journey to understanding has been, a seriousness takes over as the less-than-heroic figures realize their duty and attain a balance between the demands of daily life and those of the ever-present supernatural forces that so dominate Indian life. Once this balance between reality and mythology has been gained, the characters reach a sense of completion, and they are ready to take their rightful places in the family and community.

Ignoring the fashions of narrative technique that had developed since he started writing, Narayan told his stories simply, in unadorned prose. The narrative evolves from the characters' actions and reactions as they move through the houses and streets of Malgudi. Events unfold in a natural manner; at times it appears that not much is happening, that the action is static. Yet each event, no matter how trivial, builds to the story's climax, which is often a realization on the part of the troubled characters who inhabit Narayan's fictional world. In Malgudi, the conflicts that the narrative sets into motion are always unraveled to assure an orderly universe, which begins with the individual and extends to the community.

THE ENGLISH TEACHER

First published: 1945

Type of work: Novel

The young and idealistic hero finds a way to cope with grief after his wife's death.

The English Teacher was republished in 1953 under the title Grateful to Life and Death. Gratitude for an understanding of life and death is exactly what the main character, Krishna, gains in the course of the narrative. The fact that he teaches English in an Indian college, while important to the story, is not the novel's central concern, as the new title suggests.

The story is based on Narayan's own loss of his wife to typhoid in 1939. Like Narayan, the bereaved Krishna is left with a young daughter. The author and character also share a thorough knowledge and appreciation of English literature, as well as a distaste for teaching it to uninterested Indian students. It is only a matter of speculation, however, whether or not Krishna's struggle to overcome grief and his handling of his distraught state follow the author's own experience.

As the novel opens, Krishna's wife Susila and baby daughter Leela finally join him after an extended stay with her parents, and Krishna somewhat reluctantly gives up his free life in the faculty quarters. Soon, though, he relishes his role as a householder, but this happy state comes to an abrupt close a few years later when Susila dies. The major portion of the novel recounts the aftermath of Susila's death, which leaves Krishna devastated. At the same time, the event forces him to examine his own life.

He admits that he hates his teaching career. He has always been questioning why Indian students should be studying English literature at all. As Krishna puts it: "This education had reduced us to a nation of morons; we were strangers to our own culture and camp followers of another culture, feeding on leavings and garbage." The conflict between East and West, as expressed in this observation, is a recurrent theme in Narayan's work. Further, Krishna once fancied himself a promising poet, but finally realizes the absurdity of this ambition. Such dissatisfaction with work and the discarding of false hopes lead to the central question in Narayan's fiction: What value do worldly gain and success have in relation to the spiritual side of life?

Once Krishna is forced to contemplate this universal riddle, the novel moves from a realistic mode into a mythical one, then continues to shift from one mode to the other. As time passes and his life falls "into ruts of routine, one day following another," Krishna fails to overcome his grief and finds himself turning into a bitter, hateful, and purposeless man. His salvation comes when he begins to communicate with his dead wife, first through a medium, then by himself. These passages Narayan presents in a matter-of-fact way, as though such contact was not in the least extraordinary. This is a typical handling of such phenomena by Narayan. Krishna finally achieves peace by accepting his wife's presence, not in the physical sense but in the spiritual. This awareness leads him to resign his hated job and become a teacher in an experimental school. The school is run by a mystic; many appear in Narayan's novels.

Solidly set in the altogether authentic city of Malgudi, The English Teacher typifies Narayan's fictional world. The major character finds himself torn between the rigors of reality and the temptation to escape into the spiritual realm. He manages to blend the two courses, so that he may be a productive member of the community while quietly seeking his own inner peace.

A TIGER FOR MALGUDI

First published: 1983

Type of work: Novel

In an unusual autobiography, a tiger relates his life story, which begins in the wilds and ends in a zoo.

When asked in an interview which of his novels he favored, Narayan named A Tiger for Malgudi. The reason for his choice is readily understandable. The book offers an engaging animal story, even as it works out once again Narayan's preoccupation with gaining a balance between the demands of the everyday world and the attractions of the spiritual realm. The novel is also a highly successful experiment in narrative voice. Although Narayan never followed the dictates of fiction slavishly, this book departed more radically from convention than any of his other works.

In the preface, Narayan explains that the idea for the novel came to him after reading about actual Indian holy men whose only companions are tigers, the animals roaming freely from place to place with their human companions. Narayan also notes in the preface how the sannyasi (a person in India who renounces the world in order to go on a spiritual quest) approaches the tiger:

That, deep within, the core of personality is the same in spite of differing appearances and categories, and with the right approach you could expect the same response from a tiger as from any normal human being.

Such is Narayan's approach to the tiger as well, which suggests that he pictures a world far more expansive than one made up only of human beings living out their mundane lives and believing they are the center of the universe.

In fact, humans generally do not fare very well in the tiger's story. During his early days the tiger enjoys an idyllic life in the jungle, but he soon learns that humans are not to be trusted. First, his mate and their cubs fall prey to hunters. Then, left alone, the tiger begins to raid villages and spreads terror among the inhabitants. Unable to get any official help, the villagers finally find a circus owner who is willing to capture what they describe as a man-eating tiger. Narayan takes the opportunity to satirize Indian bureaucracy as the villagers try unsuccessfully to get government assistance in ridding their territory of the tiger.

Once in the circus, the tiger hero undergoes a long period of severe training before becoming the show's star performer. At first he is a model circus animal, but one day in a fit of rage he kills his trainer, escapes from the circus, and ends up hiding in the Malgudi college's main building. After a hilarious scene in which the tiger terrorizes the entire city, a sannyasi arrives and rescues the frightened animal, taking him into the wilderness where they live in perfect contentment and harmony for many years. When the sannyasi realizes the time for his death is nearing, he places the tiger, now aging as well, in the Malgudi zoo to live out his final years. The holy man assures his longtime tiger friend that he will bring happiness to the Malgudi community, especially the children, as an attraction in the zoo.

Through the recounting of these events by the tiger narrator, new aspects of day-to-day activities in Malgudi surface, in particular the colorful details of Indian circus life. The story also develops in a strikingly original way the recurrent themes in Narayan's fiction: the quest for fulfillment, the inevitable separation from loved ones, endurance in the face of misfortune, and the discovery of a place in the community. It is a charming story that embraces the essence of Indian philosophy.

THE WORLD OF NAGARAJ

First published: 1990

Type of work: Novel

A would-be writer who never writes finally sets aside his unfulfilled ambitions and accepts his limitations.

In The World of Nagaraj, the central character fancies himself as a man with a mission. Nagaraj does not fully understand the nature of this mission, even though he expends considerable energy pursuing it. His main purpose, he believes, is to write a biography of the mythological character Narada, who traveled through the human and heavenly worlds telling stories. No ordinary weaver of tales, Narada was a talented gossip whose revelations planted distrust and raised suspicion wherever he went.

In spite of having such excellent material at hand, Nagaraj can never complete his project, only make preparations. Thus the novel may be read on one level as a satiric examination of the would-be writer who talks about his or her plans, yet never settles down to work. Although a dilettante, Nagaraj still emerges as a likable character who comes to understand his own limitations. Perhaps Nagaraj's greatest shortcoming lies in his inability to engage in the life around him, for he fails to grasp that in order to write about life he must immerse himself in the doings of his fellow human beings. Narayan thereby describes the irony that afflicts writers, who must not only observe and participate in the world but must also shut themselves away in order to practice their art.

Despite Nagaraj's faults or pretensions, he emerges, as Narayan's characters always do, as a thoroughly decent man. Altogether uncomplicated, he achieves nothing of significance, only dreams of the grand gesture, and at the end he retires satisfied as the most ordinary of men.

Published in Narayan's eighty-fourth year, The World of Nagaraj could be read as a retrospective examination on the part of Narayan himself, who for more than sixty years told stories, much like the mythological character Narada. What, he might be asking, has he accomplished? Has he fulfilled his mission or, like Nagaraj, did he never fully grasp the nature of the mission? The novel may also be a kind of comic reminiscence of Narayan's own struggles and misgivings in his long career.

In whatever manner The World of Nagaraj might be read—as satire on would-be writers, or as an aging storyteller's reminiscence or self-examination—the novel is fully engaging. The sounds and smells and bustle of Malgudi, as well as those who people it, once more come alive in all their variety. Further, the subplot of family conflict between Nagaraj's nephew and his domineering father suggests that changes are afoot in Malgudi as the youth rebel against traditional family discipline. As far as Nagaraj is concerned, he will simply ignore the noise of human activity around him. For at the end he makes his plans: "I shall also acquire a lot of cotton wool and try and pack it all in my ear so that even a thunderclap may sound like a whisper." It is no small wonder, then, that Nagaraj fails as a writer.

SUMMARY

In more than sixty years of writing fiction, R. K. Narayan created a memorable world whose center was the fictional South Indian town of Malgudi. From that insignificant center, life radiated in all its drabness and fullness, its richness and poverty, its daily tedium, and its rare moments of spiritual discovery. While Narayan consistently revealed men and women in their absurdity, he never condemned them. Instead he probed beneath the layers of human foolishness in search of the admirable spirit that lies within all creatures. He always discovered that spirit and made it evident.

Robert L. Ross

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Swami and Friends, 1935
The Bachelor of Arts, 1937
The Dark Room, 1938
The English Teacher, 1945 (also known as Grateful to Life and Death, 1953)
Mr. Sampath, 1949 (also known as The Printer of Malgudi, 1957)
The Financial Expert, 1952
Waiting for the Mahatma, 1955
The Guide, 1958
The Man-Eater of Malgudi, 1961
The Sweet-Vendor, 1967 (also known as The Vendor of Sweets)
The Painter of Signs, 1976
A Tiger for Malgudi, 1983
Talkative Man: A Novel of Malgudi, 1987
The World of Nagaraj, 1990

SHORT FICTION:

Malgudi Days, 1941, expanded 1982
Dodu, and Other Stories, 1943
Cyclone, and Other Stories, 1944
An Astrologer's Day, and Other Stories, 1947
Lawley Road: Thirty-Two Short Stories, 1956
Gods, Demons, and Others, 1964
A Horse and Two Goats, and Other Stories, 1970
Old and New, 1981
Under the Banyan Tree, and Other Stories, 1985
The Grandmother's Tale and Selected Stories, 1994

NONFICTION:

Mysore, 1944
My Dateless Diary, 1960
Next Sunday: Sketches and Essays, 1960
My Days, 1974
Reluctant Guru, 1974
The Emerald Route, 1977
A Writer's Nightmare: Selected Essays, 1958-1988, 1988
The Writerly Life: Selected Nonfiction, 2001 (includes essays from My Dateless Diary, A Writer's Nightmare, A Story-Teller's World, and Salt and Sawdust; S. Krishnan, editor)

TRANSLATIONS:

The Ramayana: A Shortened Modern Prose Version of the Indian Epic, 1972 (of Vālmīki)
The Mahabharata: A Shortened Prose Version of the Indian Epic, 1978

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- R. K. Narayan has made Malgudi a city both realistic and mythical. Are there any equivalents in Western novels?
- Narayan was educated like a Westerner and sought to be accepted by Western readers, but these factors have not displeased Indians. What does this fact suggest about Indian culture?
- Is The English Teacher autobiographical?
- Is the tiger in A Tiger for Malgudi symbolic? If so, of what?
- Can a novelist like Narayan succeed without immersing himself in other people's activities? Does he sacrifice his perspective by doing so?
- Was Narayan uncritically optimistic about human potentiality?

MISCELLANEOUS:

A Story-Teller's World, 1989 (stories, essays, and sketches)

Salt and Sawdust: Stories and Table Talk, 1993

About the Author

Afzal-Khan, Fawzia. "R. K. Narayan: The Realm of Mythic Realism." In Cultural Imperialism and the Indo-English Novel. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1993.

Jussawalla, Feroza. "When 'Sweet Mangoes' Turn to 'Malt Vinegar.'" In International Literature in English: Essays on the Major Writers, edited by Robert L. Ross. New York: Garland, 1991.

Kain, Geoffrey, ed. R. K. Narayan: Contemporary Critical Essays. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1993.

Kirpal, Viney. "An Analysis of Narayan's Technique." Ariel: A Review of International Literature 14, no. 4 (1983): 16-19.

Mason, Wyatt. "The Master of Malgudi." The New Yorker 82, no. 42 (December 18, 2006): 86-91.

Mishra, Pankrah. "The Great Narayan." The New York Review of Books 48, no. 3 (February 22, 2001): 44.

Olinder, Britta. "R. K. Narayan." In A Readers Companion to the Short Story in English, edited by Erin Fallon et al. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2001.

Sankaran, Chitra. Myth Connections: The Use of Hindu Myths and Philosophies in R. K. Narayan and Raja Rao. 2d rev. and enlarged ed. New York: P. Lang, 2007.

Walsh, William. R. K. Narayan: A Critical Appreciation. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1982.

Library of Congress

PABLO NERUDA

Born: Parral, Chile

July 12, 1904

Died: Santiago, Chile

September 23, 1973

One of the major poets of the twentieth century, Neruda is remembered for his widely influential use of the deep image, or surreal and emotionally accessible metaphor.

BIOGRAPHY

Born Neftalí Ricardo Reyes Basoalto in a small village in central Chile, the poet, at fifteen, changed his name to Pablo Neruda (nay-REW-duh), after the nineteenth century Czech writer Jan Neruda, after winning a national poetry competition in 1919. His mother died of tuberculosis just a month after his birth, but his father, who worked for the railroad, remarried two years later and moved the family, which included a brother and a sister, to the town of Temuco in southern Chile. Neruda's relation with his stepmother was close, and his boyhood in the remote milltown in Chile's rainy forests appears to have been happy.

The headmistress at his school in Temuco was Gabriela Mistral, a poet who was, in 1945, the first Latin American to win the Nobel Prize in Literature. She introduced the sensitive young man to the works of the French symbolists. In 1921, he went to the capital city of Santiago, where he studied French at the University of Chile, wrote for the student newspaper, and continued writing poems.

Neruda's first collection of poems, Crepusculario, appeared in 1923, when he was only nineteen. The year after, his first important book, Veinte poemas de amor y una canción desesperada (1924; Twenty Love Poems and a Song of Despair; 1969), appeared. This small book pleased a wide audience of readers with its lyrical, passionate, and erotic portrayal of romantic love. Immediately successful, the book continues to be read both in Spanish-speaking countries, where for years lovers have memorized its verses, and elsewhere in translation.

In 1927, Neruda traveled to Rangoon, Burma, as honorary consul from Chile, and until 1931, he served in various consular posts. Economic hardship and estrangement from his homeland made these difficult years for him, and his marriage to a Dutch Indonesian woman, Maria Antonieta Hagenaar, was not happy. His only child, a daughter who died in 1942, was born after his return to Chile and his subsequent appointment as consul to Barcelona in 1934.

Neruda was much happier in Spain, where he became friends with the renowned poet Federico García Lorca and where he met his second wife, Delia del Carril, an Argentinean painter. His sojourn in Spain was disrupted by the Spanish Civil War, which brought the fascist government of Francisco Franco to power. The three volumes of poetry published as Residencia en la tierra (1933, 1935, 1947; Residence on Earth, and Other Poems, 1946, 1973) reflect his stay in the Orient (1925-1931), in Spain before the Civil War (1931-1935), and the war and its aftermath (1935-1945). The first-person speaker in these poems is troubled, alienated, and given to reflections on disintegration and death.

In the late 1930's, Neruda's poetry increasingly reflected his growing sense of social and political involvement, and by 1940, when he was posted as consul to Mexico, he was at work on sections of what is considered his foremost achievement, the epic Canto general (1950; Canto General, 1991). This remarkable poem in fifteen parts runs more than four hundred pages in most editions. Neruda had joined the Communist Party in 1945 and was elected to the Chilean senate, but his blistering attack on Chilean president Gonzalez Videla, whom he accused of turning against the people and siding with the wealthy landowners, led to an order for his arrest. He escaped to Argentina in 1948.

In 1955, following a separation from his second wife, Neruda moved to Santiago and married Matilde Urrutia, with whom he had been having an affair for a number of years. The 1950's saw publication of three books of "elemental" or "elementary" odes, simple poems cast in short (often one-word) lines that celebrate the ordinary, common things of life, from socks to scissors, from chairs to artichokes.

By the 1960's, Neruda was beginning to attract attention in the United States, despite his Communist affiliation, and in 1965 he was awarded an honorary doctorate from Oxford University. His later books include Estravagario (1958; Estravagaria, 1972), a collection of love poems, and Memorial de Isla Negra (1964; Isla Negra: A Notebook, 1981).

Neruda had settled at the fishing village of Isla Negra by 1958, in a home overlooking the Pacific, but he continued to be active in politics, running for the presidency of Chile as a Communist in 1969. In 1971, he received the Nobel Prize in Literature. A friend and supporter of President Salvador Allende, Neruda died of cancer in 1973, the year that Allende's government was overthrown and replaced with a military junta. Neruda was one of the most prolific poets of all time; eight books of his poetry have been published posthumously.

ANALYSIS

In 1954, Neruda wrote, "I am the foremost adversary of Nerudism." What makes reading Neruda's poems so entertaining, although sometimes challenging, is that his voice varies in almost every book. He can be passionate lover, visionary mystic, political radical, historian, or naturalist. His voice can be lyrical, conversational, meditative, playful, metaphysical, personal, or satiric. His poems are sometimes rich with imagery and dense with surreal metaphor. At other times his poems are direct and readily accessible.

In Twenty Love Poems and a Song of Despair the twenty-year-old poet writes of love and its absence with great intimacy, but without falling into sentimentality. These poems are rich in imagery, some of it fairly obvious, as when the speaker tells his beloved she is like his soul, "a butterfly of dream," or when he tells her that her silence is "that of a star, remote and candid." Neruda also shows his mastery of surreal metaphor, as in poem 8, in which he writes, "Your breasts seem like white snails./ A butterfly of shadow has come to sleep in your belly." Such metaphors do not need to be understood or analyzed, but to be accepted and enjoyed.

In the process of writing the three cycles of Residence on Earth, and Other Poems, between 1925 and 1945, Neruda's themes and his manner of expressing them changed in various ways. The poems of the first two cycles are introspective and are filled with images of alienation. In one poem, for example, he writes: "I wrench hell's captain from my heart/ and lay down sad, equivocating phrases." In another poem, the speaker sees himself "on some sad coast,/ surrounded by the stuff of the dead day," waiting for someone to come and touch his heart, but the only sound he hears comes from "a shell of shadows" which offers only "shreds of sound" and a "grid of misery . . . by the shores of the solitary ocean."

In his third cycle, however, Neruda shifts to social and political themes and toward a poetry of commitment. Critics have observed an increased tendency throughout the cycle to capture a "spoken voice," a less rhetorical and more realistic use of language. The spoken voice is evident in the third cycle's political poems, for example: "You are going to ask: and where are the lilacs?/ and the poppy-petalled metaphysics?" Neruda decries the Spanish Civil War, in which "bandits with black friars spattering blessings/ came through the sky to kill children." His sometimes strident protests run close to propaganda in places. One poem, for example, ends, "Come and see the blood/ in the streets!" Neruda's social commitment is most pervasive in Canto General, in which he traces the history of Latin America from pre-Columbian times, through the conquest and the liberation, and into the exploitation of its resources and people in the twentieth century. Hernán Cortés, for instance, is described as "a chilling/ thunderbolt, a cold heart clad in armor." Another poem decries Standard Oil, which is run by “obese emperors/ from New York . . . suave/ smiling assassins.” Amid the poems of protest, however, are sublime celebrations of Neruda’s native country’s mountains, deserts, and long coastline. The Canto General is, as its title implies, a sort of encyclopedic poem, covering vast stretches of history and geography.

Just four years after the appearance of the Canto General, Neruda changed his voice, form, and subject matter altogether with the first volume of Odas elementales (1954; The Elemental Odes, 1961). Written for the common man, these short-lined poems deal with the ordinary objects of everyday life. “Oda a las cosas” (“Ode to things”) which consists of 120 lines, begins

I have a crazy, crazy love of things.
I like pliers,
and scissors.
I love cups,
rings,
and bowls—
not to speak, of course, of hats.

In a poem for an artichoke, Neruda describes the vegetable as warlike in its spiky armor, but María buys it and drops it in the pot, and “This is how/ the career/ of the armored vegetable/ we call an artichoke/ comes to a peaceful end.”

Often an individual volume of Neruda’s poems is a collection of several self-contained parts or sequences. Isla Negra: A Notebook, for example, consists of five fairly distinct books, which together form an introspective autobiography. The single collection Extravagaria, noted for its conversational tone, consists of almost seventy poems, one of which runs over ten pages. “It seems I still haven’t learned/ the harsh speech of frogs,” Neruda writes: “If all this is so, how am I a poet?” Pablo Neruda felt the urgent necessity of communicating virtually everything in the world. “So, gentlemen,” he playfully concludes one poem, “I am going/ to converse with a horse; let the poetess excuse me,/ the professor give me leave./ I shall be busy all week,/ I have to listen incessantly./ / What was that cat’s name?”

“WALKING AROUND”

First published: 1935 (collected in Residence on Earth, and Other Poems, 1946)

Type of work: Poem

This poem from the second Residence on Earth cycle depicts a visionary poet, out of tune with his urban surroundings.

“Walking Around” opens casually: “It happens that I am tired of being a man.” The poem’s visionary experience starts with a painful awareness of alienation.

In the first eleven lines, bracketed by the phrase “It happens that I am tired,” the first-person speaker sees himself as “withered” and “impenetrable” like a swan made of felt on a sea of “origins and ashes” when he goes to tailor shops or to cinemas. Both establishments concern appearances instead of realities. The swan afloat on an ocean of ashes implies the rejection of conventional poetic attitudes. The speaker also rejects the pleasant aromas of barbershops, gardens, merchandise, eyeglasses, and elevators, an almost random assortment of nouns associated with various aspects of being human. The speaker even turns against his own feet, fingernails, hair, and shadow.

In the next fourteen lines the speaker pivots: “Yet,” it would be “delightful” to “scare a notary with a cut lily” or to “kill a nun with a jab to the ear.” That is, he could still get some joy from shaking up the bureaucracy (by threatening it with a flower, something antithetical) or by taking on the church (a more demanding task). It would be nice, he says, to “walk down the street with a green knife/ and whooping it up till I die of the shakes.” He insists he does not want to live “like a root in the dark,” as an underground man in a “cellar of corpses,” cold and stiff.

In the next fourteen lines the speaker says Monday burns like oil when it sees his jailbird’s face showing up again. The speaker sees himself as a prisoner of time and routine. The first working day of the week turns against him. “Something,” perhaps time, shoves him into “damp houses” and hospitals “where bones fly out the windows.” In such places sulfur-colored birds loom at doors hung with “horrible intestines.” In this nightmare world dentures are forgotten in a coffee pot and mirrors weep in shame to be reflecting the ugliness of life.

Amid the umbrellas, poisons, and belly buttons, the speaker determines, in the last six lines, to pass on calmly in his “rage and oblivion.” Arguably, however, the speaker cannot simply forget what he sees (if he could, the poem would not exist), for the last image is of “underpants, towels and shirts which weep/ slow dirty tears.” The ordinary things of the human world cry out to him, and despite the speaker’s anger, he cannot help being compassionate.

THE HEIGHTS OF MACCHU PICCHU

First published: Alturas de Macchu Picchu, 1948 (English translation, 1966)

Type of work: Poem

Usually regarded as a single poem, this twelve-part sequence from Canto General is a meditation on time and death.

Neruda wrote The Heights of Macchu Picchu following his visit to the spectacular Incan ruins high in the Peruvian Andes in 1943. The experience affected him deeply and caused him to alter his plans from a projected long poem on Chile to an epic concerning all of Latin America. The ruins testify to the sophistication of pre-Columbian culture. Symbolically in the poem, the ruins represent the junction of the human and the natural, of time and eternity, and of life and death.

In the twelve cantos the first-person speaker undertakes a quest that leads to a conversion of sorts. In the first two cantos he reviews his past life, which he depicts as aimless: “From air to air, like an empty net,/ I went on through streets and thin air.” He sees himself in a descent, wrapped up in the trivial passions of urban life. The soul is pictured sitting “among clothes and smoke, on the broken table,” where “man kills and tortures it with paper and hate,/ stuffs it each day under rugs.”

In cantos 3-5, Neruda surveys the dismal life of contemporary man: “each day a petty death, dust, worm, a lamp/ snuffed out in suburban mud.” The speaker, however, feels drawn by “the mightiest death,” and he sees himself taken “to the iron edge . . . / to the stellar emptiness of the final steps/ and dizzying spiral highway.” This foreshadowing of his eventual ascent of Macchu Picchu is a desire that is frustrated as he roams around “dying of my own death” and suffering from “a cold gust” that passes through “loose gaps in the soul.”

In the pivotal canto 6, the speaker rises from this low point as he climbs Macchu Picchu, where the human and the natural intersect, where “men’s feet rested at night/ next to the eagles’ feet.” Unlike the many petty deaths of the present, Neruda points out in canto 7, the Inca “plummeted as in autumn/ to one sole death,” and instead of urban litter, Macchu Picchu offers “a permanence of stone and word,” “the permanent rose,” “a life of stone after so many lives.” As if aware that these stony symbols of permanence might seem too cold, Neruda opens his canto 8 with an invitation to love: “Come up with me, American love.” “Kiss the secret stones with me,” he says in this, the longest of the cantos, where he begins to question the ruins: “What do your tormented flashings say?”

Canto 9 is a collection of one-line epithets in praise of Macchu Picchu, terse metaphors that constitute, in a way, the missing language of the Incas: “Window on the mist, hardened dove./ Nocturnal plant, statue of thunder./ Root of the cordillera, roof of the sea.” Neruda offers forty-three such lines, which give a voice to Macchu Picchu, ending with “Volcano of hands, dark cataract./ Silver wave, direction of time.” Canto 10, however, poses the crucial question: Where was humanity in all of this? Neruda asks the ruins if they were built “stone upon stone on a base of rags,” constructed, that is, out of human toil and misery. Now it is the missing “hungry people” that he wants to know about, and he ends canto 10 with a question for “buried America”: “did you keep in the deepest part/ of your bitter gut, like an eagle, hunger?”

In canto 11, Neruda appeals to the ruins to forget their “sovereign symmetry” and allow him to “plunge” his hand inside and “let there beat in me, like a bird a thousand years imprisoned,/ the old forgotten human heart!” He now has a vision of “the ancient human, the human slave” whose identity has been lost, and he ends the canto by reciting the supposed names of the slaves and inviting them to “rise to be born with me.” This line also opens the final canto of the poem, which is often considered as part of the jargon of Marxism, Neruda having joined the Communist Party in 1945. Canto 12 does read as a paean to the working class, but whether Neruda’s political affinities mar the ending is debatable. “I come to speak through your dead mouth,” he writes, and in the last line, he implores, “Speak through my words and my blood.”

“THE HUNTER IN THE FOREST”

First published: “El cazador en el bosque,” 1964 (collected in Isla Negra: A Notebook, 1981)

Type of work: Poem

In this poem Neruda reaffirms his connection with the earth and the cycles of nature.

“The Hunter in the Forest” is the opening poem of the fourth section of Isla Negra: A Notebook, Neruda’s deeply introspective autobiography in verse. The section title, “Hunter of Roots,” indicates the necessity for humankind to seek its proper connection with the earth. Only in the natural process of decay and regeneration, Neruda argues, can the fear of death and meaningless disintegration be overcome.

The welcome solitude (as opposed to the earlier sense of alienation) is implicit in the later poems, as the speaker goes into the beloved forests (Neruda grew up in Chile’s woodlands) in order to communicate with the earth, which he finds to be “mute.” The mature poet recognizes that the earth will be silent until he begins to be “dead and living matter.” The earth itself is a vast and secret language that gives birth but that also thrives on death: “Whatever dies, it gathers in/ like an ancient, hungry creature.”

Even the sun “rots/ and the broken gold/ it sheds/ falls into the sack of the jungle” where it is transformed into flour. Although the poet enters the forest “with my roots,” he goes “to look for my roots” in a deeper sense. Parting from the social and political vision of the Canto General, Neruda is alone in this quest for the root that nourishes his blood. In the deep silence that root “creeps on, devouring,” and it drinks water, passing up through the tree the “secret command” of life. The poem ends with the sort of surreal or “deep” image common to the best of Neruda’s writing: “Dark is the work/ that makes the stars green.” The process that makes life, that resurrects and regenerates, is mysterious (dark), but the fact that the stars themselves are green, the color associated with life on earth, suggests that life itself is of the highest value.

SUMMARY

In his long and prolific life as a writer, Pablo Neruda assumed a great variety of masks. He is consistently, however, a poet who sustains the worth of the individual vision, whether that vision be personal, political, or mythic. He is also a poet of the earth and of the common man who resides on it. Concrete images and metaphors from nature predominate in his writing. The character woven into most of his poems is Pablo Neruda himself, a man of passion and compassion who searches into life’s mysteries.

Ron McFarland

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Crepusculario, 1923

Veinte poemas de amor y una canción desesperada, 1924 (Twenty Love Poems and a Song of Despair, 1969)

Tentativa del hombre infinito, 1926

- El hondero entusiasta*, 1933
Residencia en la tierra, 1933, 1935, 1947 (3 volumes; Residence on Earth, and Other Poems, 1946, 1973)
España en el corazón, 1937 (Spain in the Heart, 1946)
Alturas de Macchu Picchu, 1948 (The Heights of Macchu Picchu, 1966)
Canto general, 1950 (partial translation in Let the Rail Splitter Awake, and Other Poems, 1951; full translation as Canto General, 1991)
Los versos del capitán, 1952 (The Captain's Verses, 1972)
Odas elementales, 1954 (The Elemental Odes, 1961)
Las uvas y el viento, 1954
Nuevas odas elementales, 1956
Tercer libro de odas, 1957
Estravagario, 1958 (Extravagaria, 1972)
Cien sonetos de amor, 1959 (One Hundred Love Sonnets, 1986)
Navegaciones y regresos, 1959
Canción de gesta, 1960 (Song of Protest, 1976)
Las piedras de Chile, 1961 (The Stones of Chile, 1986)
Cantos ceremoniales, 1961 (Ceremonial Songs, 1996)
Plenos poderes, 1962 (Fully Empowered, 1975)
Memorial de Isla Negra, 1964 (5 volumes; Isla Negra: A Notebook, 1981)
Arte de pájaros, 1966 (Art of Birds, 1985)
Una casa en la arena, 1966 (The House at Isla Negra: Prose Poems, 1988)
La barcarola, 1967
Las manos del día, 1968
Fin de mundo, 1969
Aún, 1969 (Still Another Day, 1984)
Selected Poems, 1970
Las piedras del cielo, 1970 (Stones of the Sky, 1987)
La espada encendida, 1970
New Poems, 1968-1970, 1972
Geografía infructuosa, 1972
La rosa separada, 1973 (The Separate Rose, 1985)
Incitación al Nixonicidio y alabanza de la revolución chilena, 1973 (Incitement to Nixonicide and Praise of the Chilean Revolution, 1979; also known as A Call for the Destruction of Nixon and Praise for the Chilean Revolution, 1980)
El mar y las campanas, 1973 (The Sea and the Bells, 1988)
2000, 1974 (English translation, 1992)
Libro de las preguntas, 1974 (The Book of Questions, 1991)
Jardín de invierno, 1974 (Winter Garden, 1986)
Pablo Neruda: Five Decades, a Selection (Poems, 1925-1970), 1974
Elegía, 1974 (Elegy, 1983)
El corazón amarillo, 1974 (The Yellow Heart, 1990)
El mal y el malo, 1974
Defectos escogidos, 1974
El río invisible: Poesía y prosa de juventud, 1980
The Poetry of Pablo Neruda, 2003 (Ilan Stavans, editor)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What does Pablo Neruda mean in “Walking Around” that he is “tired of being a man”?
- The Heights of Macchu Picchu contains a number of epic features. How do they enhance the experience of the speaker?
- Trace the woodlands imagery in “The Hunter in the Forest” and in other poems by Neruda.
- Which American poets does Neruda most resemble?
- Compare the imagery of Neruda’s love poems with love images in William Shakespeare’s play Romeo and Juliet (pr. c. 1595-1596, pb. 1597), which Neruda translated into Spanish.

LONG FICTION:

El habitante y su esperanza, 1926

DRAMA:

Romeo y Juliet, pb. 1964 (translation of William Shakespeare)

Fulgor y muerte de Joaquín Murieta, pb. 1967 (Splendor and Death of Joaquín Murieta, 1972)

NONFICTION:

Anillos, 1926 (with Tomás Lago)

Viajes, 1955

Comiendo en Hungría, 1968

Cartas de amor, 1974 (letters)

Confieso que he vivido: Memorias, 1974 (Memoirs, 1977)

Lo mejor de Anatole France, 1976

Cartas a Laura, 1978 (letters)

Para nacer he nacido, 1978 (Passions and Impressions, 1983)

Correspondencia durante "Residencia en la tierra," 1980 (letters; with Héctor Eandi)

About the Author

Agosín, Marjorie. Pablo Neruda. Translated by Lorraine Roses. Boston: Twayne, 1986.

Dawes, Greg. Verses Against the Darkness: Pablo Neruda's Poetry and Politics. Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press, 2006.

De Costa, Rene. The Poetry of Pablo Neruda. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1979.

Duran, Manuel, and Margery Safir. Earth Tones. Bloomington: Indiana University, 1980.

Feinstein, Adam. Pablo Neruda: A Passion for Life. New York: Bloomsbury, 2004.

Felstiner, John. Translating Neruda. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1980.

Handley, George B. New World Poetics: Nature and the Adamic Imagination of Whitman, Neruda, and Walcott. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2007.

Longo, Teresa, ed. Pablo Neruda and the U.S. Culture Industry. New York: Routledge, 2002.

Santi, Enrico Maria. Pablo Neruda: The Poetics of Prophecy. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1982.

Teitelboim, Volodia. Neruda: An Intimate Biography. Translated by Beverly J. DeLong-Tonelli. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1991.

NGUGI WA THIONG'O

Born: Kamiriithu village, near Limuru, Kenya
January 5, 1938

The first East African writer to be published in English, Ngugi is a pioneer in African, especially Kenyan, literature in his role as novelist, dramatist, journalist, and critic.

BIOGRAPHY

Ngugi wa Thiong'o (ehn-GEW-gee wah tee-ONG-goh) is a member of the Gikuyu tribe of Kenya. He was born James Thiong'o Ngugi in Kamiriithu village, near Limuru, Kenya, on January 5, 1938, to Thiong'o wa Nduucu and Wanjika wa Ngugi, the fifth child of the third of his father's four wives. He lived for a while in a household of almost thirty children. His father was a tenant farmer and the family lived in poverty. His parents separated when he was about eight years old; he lived afterward with his mother and six siblings. His family neither converted to Christianity nor practiced the religious rituals of the Gikuyu because of his father's religious skepticism. As a young man, Ngugi practiced Christianity for a while but later turned his back on it.

From 1952 to 1956, the Land and Freedom Army, called the Mau-Mau by colonial settlers, advocated violent resistance to British domination, causing the British government of Kenya to declare a state of emergency. Ngugi's family was affected by these historical events. One of his brothers was a guerrilla fighter, and for this reason his mother was imprisoned for three months and tortured. Coming home from his first term of high school, Ngugi found that his home and village had been reduced to rubble by the colonial government's counterinsurgency forces. Ngugi managed to receive an education in spite of the state of emergency in his country.

Ngugi was educated first in a missionary-run elementary school, where he learned to speak English, and then in a school run by Gikuyu nationalists, where students were taught Kenyan songs, literature, and dance in opposition to colonial culture and religion. When that school was closed, he won a place at the prestigious Alliance High School in Kikuyu which, he was later to say, trained bright African students to serve unquestioningly the British Empire. At the time, school authorities warned him about his outspokenness on political matters. It was at the Alliance that Ngugi's early interest in literature and writing was sharpened.

After high school, Ngugi attended Makerere University in Kampala, Uganda, where he graduated in 1964 with honors in English. While at the university, Ngugi began his career as a writer in a period of dazzling productivity. He wrote two novels, three one-act plays, a full-length play, and several short stories. These were later published, respectively, as Weep Not, Child (1964), The River Between (1965), This Time Tomorrow: Three Plays (pb. 1970), The Black Hermit (pr. 1962, pb. 1968), and Secret Lives, and Other Stories (1975). In 1965, Weep Not, Child won prizes from the Dakar Festival of Negro Arts in Senegal and from the East African Literature Bureau.

After completing his undergraduate education and before beginning graduate work in England, Ngugi was a reporter and columnist on the Nairobi newspaper Daily Nation. At the University of Leeds in Yorkshire, England, while working on a master's degree in Caribbean literature, Ngugi wrote A Grain of Wheat (1967) and avidly read political and economic theory. Returning to Africa in 1967 without having earned the master's degree, Ngugi accepted a post as lecturer in English at University College in Nairobi. While there, he was instrumental in replacing the English department with the departments of African literature and African languages. In 1969, when students staged a strike to protest repressive policies at the university, Ngugi resigned in support of the students and accepted a fellowship at Makerere University. It was at this time that he decided to stop using his Christian name, James Ngugi, because he was no longer a Christian.

After he completed his fellowship at Makerere, Ngugi accepted a position as visiting professor in African literature at Northwestern University in Evanston, Illinois. While at Northwestern, he began writing Petals of Blood (1977). Returning to Kenya in 1971, Ngugi was senior lecturer and then eventually the head of the department of literature at University College in Nairobi. With Micere Githae-Mugo, he wrote the play The Trial of Dedan Kimathi (pr. 1974, pb. 1976).

In 1976, in an effort to share his learning with local people, Ngugi became chairman of the cultural committee of the community education center for the village of Kamiriithu, near his birthplace. It was there that his next play, written in collaboration with Ngugi wa Mirii, was produced in a two-thousand-seat theater built by local villagers. The play, Ngaahika Ndeenda (pr. 1977, pb. 1980; I Will Marry When I Want, 1982), was a highly political attack on postcolonial society and the effects of Christianity in Kenya. Authorities viewed the play as a political threat, and in December, 1977, Ngugi was arrested and locked up in Kamiti Maximum Security Prison, near Nairobi, where he was held for a year as a political prisoner. He was never brought to trial nor given an explanation for his incarceration.

While imprisoned, Ngugi wrote Detained: A Writer's Prison Diary (1981) and the novel Caitani Mũtharaba-Inĩ (1980; Devil on the Cross, 1982); these works, which were confiscated and then returned to him, were written on toilet paper. When he was freed in 1978 in a general amnesty following the death of Premier Jomo Kenyatta, he had lost his job at the university. He seemed, in fact, to have become suddenly unemployable, so he spent the next two years translating Devil on the Cross from Gikuyu into English and writing his second essay collection, Writers in Politics (1981), which elaborates his political, literary, and social ideas. He also remained involved with the Kamiriithu community education center, for which he wrote another play. Although the rehearsals were seen by many, in 1982 the government suppressed the play, banned the drama group, and destroyed the village theater.

In 1982, while Ngugi was in London on business, there was an attempted coup in Kenya. Subsequent government strictures made Ngugi fearful of further reprisals against him and prevented him from returning to his homeland. In 1986, he published Decolonising the Mind: The Politics of Language in African Literature, a collection of his lectures delivered at Auckland University, New Zealand. It was, he said, his final book in English; from that point on, he would write only in his native language. Also, in 1986, he published his second novel written in Gikuyu, Matigari ma Njiruungi (Matigari, 1989), which was confiscated and banned in Kenya. In 1989, the exiled Kenyan author began a three-year teaching appointment at Yale University, and in 1993 he accepted a position at New York University.

In the 1990's and the early twenty-first century, Ngugi continued to produce fiction and to publish his thoughts on the role of the writer. In 1993, he published Moving the Centre: The Struggle for Cultural Freedoms. This was followed by the 1998 publication of Penpoints, Gunpoints, and Dreams: Toward a Critical Theory of the Arts and the State in Africa, based on a series of lectures he presented at Oxford University in 1996. Another novel, Mũrogi wa Kagogo, was published in 2004, with the English translation appearing two years later as Wizard of the Crow.

While on the faculty at New York University as a professor of comparative literature and performance studies, Ngugi founded Mutiiri, a Gikuyu-language journal. He later pursued his vision of cultivating dialogue among languages and language groups as a professor of English and comparative literature and the director of the International Center for Writing and Translation at the University of California, Irvine. His efforts as a writer and social activist won him honors and accolades, including the Zora Neale Hurston-Paul Robeson Award of the Council for Black Studies (1993), an honorary doctorate in humane letters from Albright College (1994), and the Fonlon-Nichols Prize for Artistic Excellence and Human Rights (1996).

In 2004, after twenty-two years of exile, the changing political conditions in Kenya enabled Ngugi to return to his native land for a monthlong visit.

ANALYSIS

The inevitable conflict between the people and tribal ways of Kenya and the imported culture, religion, and politics of the colonists is the subject of most of Ngugi wa Thiong'o's works. The importance of reclaiming the land, which has not only economic but also spiritual value to the natives, is one of his frequent themes. He portrays the devastating consequences of imperialism on a national, local, and personal scale. Some of the most painful effects of the encroachment of white culture are manifested in fractured family relationships and friendships. His novels are often set in small villages that stand symbolically for the whole of Africa in its struggle for independence and identity. Similarly, his broken families and severed friendships are meant to be representative of the breakup of Gikuyu society as a whole. Ngugi's vision is highly political. His early fiction was conservative; it eventually became more liberal and militant, but later in his career he expressed more moderate opinions.

Central to Kenyan consciousness, and therefore to Ngugi's fiction, is the sacredness of the soil. The Creator, Murungu, gave the land to the first man and woman, Gikuyu and Mumbi, and told them to rule it and cultivate it. This myth of the land as an emblem of sacred trust is always in the background, and often in the foreground, of Ngugi's fiction. When foreigners seize the land, Kenyans are not only displaced and financially ruined but also alienated from the deity and their heritage.

Most of Ngugi's characters feel the urgency of reclaiming the land but are unable to agree on how this should be achieved. The older generation cites the prophecy that a leader will arise from the hills someday and lead the people from their bondage, so they are willing to wait for that savior. The younger generation, however, is less patient and more militant. Ngugi portrays the clashes between the generations and the devastating effect their divisiveness has on their resistance to the colonists. This divisiveness also strains families and friendships. In Weep Not, Child, generational conflict is depicted in the tragically broken relations between Ngotho and Boro, father and son. An additional source of conflict comes from those natives, like Joshua in The River Between, who embrace white humanity's religion and customs, shunning their own people and condemning their ways.

The impact of colonialism on traditional ways of life is another key theme in Ngugi's fiction. A conflict between natives devoted to an important tribal custom and Christian missionaries who oppose the practice is at the heart of The River Between. The missionaries do not understand or accept the significance of the circumcision ritual as the means whereby young men and women attain full standing in the tribe and receive secret tribal knowledge. Ngugi opposes this ritual but also opposes the Christians' condemnation of it. He makes it a riveting symbol of the clash of cultures. Ngugi portrays the ways in which the colonists punish the Kenyans when native and Western ideologies conflict; for example, the missionaries in the novel refuse to make education available to the young people who have been circumcised. In Ngugi's early fiction, education is a key to solving Kenya's problems, so depriving the children of schooling is a serious blow, although education provided by the missionaries comes with a liberal dose of religion. Thus, Waiyaki in The River Between is often warned by his father to take the white man's education but eschew his ways and his faith.

The scenario at the missionary school illustrates another of Ngugi's themes, that of the exploitative role of Christianity in Kenya. Ngugi believes that Christianity has served the purpose of colonial expansion and the obliteration of native cultures, and his Christian characters are often depicted as rigid and uncharitable, if not downright unscrupulous. In the play I Will Marry When I Want, Ngugi depicts a wealthy Christian businessman who uses religion and the church to defraud a farmer of his land. In spite of his opposition to the faith, Ngugi often employs Christian symbolism in his fiction because it is a widely known and useful point of reference for readers. Ngugi opposes not only Christianity but also all non-African religions in Kenya, including Islam.

Ngugi's vision is remarkably evenhanded in its treatment of the problems of Kenya. In addition to portraying oppression by the British settlers, he unflinchingly explores those weaknesses of the natives that impede their ability to free themselves from the usurping whites. He portrays tribalism, messianism, self-doubt, and naïveté as among the greatest problems of the people. Tribalism stands in the way of a larger, more politically effective unity. Self-doubt paralyzes those who could be leaders; on the other hand, there are those who have visions of themselves as messiahs. Naïveté is deadly to the leadership of those who would settle on a single issue, like education, as the rallying point of freedom. In Ngugi's fiction, education is effective only when wedded to political action. Even those who take action may create unforeseen consequences; Ngugi, for example, portrays the Mau-Maus as having a destructive effect on family solidarity. Ngugi is also troubled by the oppression of women in Gikuyu society and frequently addresses this topic in his work.

In fact, beginning with Devil on the Cross, subtle but important shifts in the treatment of women, as well as in symbolic representations of the body, perspectives on sources of oppression, and modes of narration emerge in Ngugi's fiction. In addition to featuring female protagonists, Devil on the Cross and Wizard of the Crow both pay sustained attention to social problems, such as battery and sexual exploitation, which plague women. The women are not just depicted as victims, however. In Devil on the Cross, Wariinga is able to act in defense of herself and others. Likewise, in Wizard of the Crow, Nyawira organizes a tribunal of women to address cases of wife battery.

While Ngugi's artistic vision has always promoted the concept of unity, in his later works that collectivism is presented as the antidote to a culture of fear. Challenging this culture of fear is important because it is, in part, what stifles the peoples' dissent. This shift in attention to the corrupt leadership which promotes the culture of fear is reflected in the emphasis on the grotesque and altered bodies of African elites. Whereas in the earlier work it was the settlers' whose corrupt nature was signified by their large sagging bellies, in Devil on the Cross and Wizard of the Crow the enormous belly is associated with the African elite as a sign of their corruption. Additionally, in Wizard of the Crow the theme of self-inflicted bodily alteration introduced in Devil on the Cross is exploited to expose the willful complicity Ngugi associates with this class of Kenyans.

Additionally, in Wizard of the Crow the use of the storyteller figure is centralized. Significant portions of the narrative are filtered through the perspective of the character Arigaigai Gatherer, known primarily as A. G. At the beginning of the narrative A. G. is a constable of the police force, but by the end he earns his living as an itinerant storyteller. His transformation from a representative of the state to a storyteller whose main material celebrates the impact of the Wizard of the Crow illustrates Ngugi's concept of the artist's role in society. Not only does A. G. celebrate the Wizard's triumph over the state, but also throughout the novel he reminds the reader of the value of multiple perspectives on the same events. All of these changes together suggest Ngugi's ongoing commitment to art as a tool to explain, invigorate, and explore the social experiences of those who are marginalized, and thus to enrich human consciousness.

WEEP NOT, CHILD

First published: 1964

Type of work: Novel

A family gets caught up in the forces of upheaval during Kenya's state of emergency in the 1950's.

Weep Not, Child was the second novel Ngugi wrote and his first novel to be published. Set in Kenya in the turbulent 1950's, the novel tells the story of a family and how it is affected by the open antagonisms between natives and colonists. When the novel opens, the family is poor but happy and harmonious; the course of the novel traces the disintegration of the family. The protagonist, Njoroge, is a young boy who wants more than anything to receive an education and is thrilled to attend a missionary school. His father, Ngotho, is a tenant farmer on land owned by Jacobo, a wealthy African farmer. Ngotho works for the British Mr. Howlands on a tea plantation that is Ngotho's ancestral land. He waits patiently for the time when the gods will fulfill the prophecy and deliver his people from their oppression. His older son, Boro, has returned from military service in World War II, bitter, disillusioned, and having learned of the white man's violence.

Boro loathes his father's passivity. In an effort to appease Boro, Ngotho becomes involved with a strike and leads an attack on Jacobo, who attempts to quell the strikers. Consequently, Ngotho loses his job. Boro becomes a guerrilla leader and political activist who ultimately kills both Howlands and Jacobo. Although Boro is arrested and sentenced to be hanged, Ngotho confesses to killing Jacobo and is tortured and killed. Njoroge, who is now about nineteen, is arrested, though innocent, as his father's accomplice. He too is tortured. He is also denied the thing he wants most for himself: further schooling. The novel ends with Njoroge's plan to hang himself, but as he stands under a tree with the rope in his hands, his mother comes looking for him and takes him home.

This novel shows the effects of the Mau-Mau Uprising on ordinary villagers. The main characters of the novel represent the social forces in conflict with each other during the state of emergency in Kenya. The British planter Howlands, in his role as a district officer, is brutal in his repression of the Mau-Mau Uprising. Jacobo is a ruthless collaborator with the colonial government. Boro represents the young generation of Kenyans who do not share the patience and passivity of the older generation (represented by his father), but who rather wish to overthrow the colonial government, using whatever violence is necessary. Ngotho stands for the plight of the landless, disfranchised Gikuyu peasants. Njoroge is representative of the many innocent villagers whose lives are devastated by events over which they have little control. Njoroge has naïve fantasies about himself as a savior in the crisis, remembering David and Goliath. The colonial government is ruthlessly brutal and responsible for the breakup of Ngotho's family and the larger society of which it is a microcosm. The Mau-Mau Uprising is motivated by pure destructiveness and therefore also accountable for some of the suffering of the Gikuyu.

THE RIVER BETWEEN

First published: 1965

Type of work: Novel

A young Gikuyu leader fails to unite his people, who are divided by tribal rivalries.

The River Between was written for a literary contest that Ngugi entered while he was in college; the entry won first prize. Events in the novel take place about twenty-five years earlier than the action of Weep Not, Child. Set in Gikuyu territory, the novel portrays the struggle among natives of the ridges of Kamenno and Makuyu, who have conflicting ideas about the presence of the white man. The two main forces are the traditionalists, led by Kabonyi, and the converts to Christianity and Western ways of thinking, led by Joshua. Finding some merit in both tribal traditions and Western thinking, but not subscribing completely to either, the protagonist Waiyaki is pulled by both sides as he attempts to educate his people. His father, Chege, who believes his son is the prophesied messiah, sends Waiyaki to the mission school to learn all that he can of the wisdom of the white man, but he warns Waiyaki to remain true to his people and their ways.

Waiyaki takes his place as an adult member of the tribe when he participates in the circumcision ceremony. The missionary school vehemently opposes the rites, and when his friend Muthoni dies of an infection after her circumcision, the missionaries refuse to allow the circumcised students to attend further classes at the mission school. Waiyaki returns to the ridges and sets up his own schools. His great enthusiasm for education earns the respect and affection of his people, who see him as their savior against the domination of colonialism.

Waiyaki finds himself in love with Nyambura, the daughter of Joshua, a man who has embraced Christianity and turned his back on the tribal customs of his people, especially the circumcision ritual for women. The dead girl, Muthoni, was Nyambura's sister, greatly conflicted in her desire to be both Christian and Gikuyu. Joshua had forbidden her to participate in the rituals, but she disobeyed him in order to be part of the tribe. Joshua is an unforgiving, unyielding father and leader.

The other political force to be reckoned with is the Kiama, a militant organization devoted to the protection of tribal ways. The Kiama requires an oath of loyalty to uphold tribal purity. Waiyaki is vulnerable to the Kiama because of his political naïveté; he thinks only in terms of education as the key to helping the Gikuyu, not political action. His other point of vulnerability is his love of Nyambura. He is seen with her and will not deny his feelings for her; he and she are turned over to the Kiama for justice. Waiyaki's opponent and the leader of the Kiama is Kabonyi, and he has effectively turned the Kiama against Waiyaki. Presumably Waiyaki and Nyambura will be executed.

The dominant theme of The River Between is the role of education and political activism in the resistance movement. Waiyaki's idealistic response to the needs of the people gives them only part of what they need from him. They need the education he brings to their children, but decisive political action is also called for, and he seems too preoccupied with his schools and with his feelings for Nyambura to be aware that he is ultimately failing the people and placing himself in danger. Like Njoroge in Weep Not, Child, he has a messianic vision of himself but is not able to fulfill it.

WIZARD OF THE CROW

First published: Mũrogi wa Kagogo, 2004
(English translation, 2006)

Type of work: Novel

An ordinary man accidentally becomes the Wizard of the Crow and the unwitting symbol of a people's resistance against a despotic ruler.

The Wizard of the Crow reflects the global political changes which have occurred since Ngugi first began writing. Because it attempts to present a historical account, the novel includes many characters. However, all of the events that take place in the fictional land of the Free Republic of Aburiria relate in some way to four central characters: Kamiti wa Karimiri, the man who will become known as the Wizard of the Crow; Grace Nyawira, the chairperson of the Movement for the Voice of the People; the nation's second independence-era leader, known only as the Ruler; and Titus Tajarika, a businessman, then minister, and, finally successor to the Ruler.

Kamiti and Nyawira find themselves allied in opposition to the Ruler's despotic quest for personal glorification at the expense of the well-being of the nation's citizens. This quest is represented by the Ruler's attempt to secure a loan from the Global Bank to build the world's tallest building, a monument to the Ruler called Marching to Heaven, in a time of mass unemployment. Though Kamiti and Nyawira triumph in the sense that they evade capture, survive the attacks on their lives, and expand the Movement for the Voice of the People, the novel ends with their success as a counterpoint to the beginning of a new cycle of exploitation. The Ruler has been succeeded by Tajarika (now known as Emperor Titus Flavius Vespasianus Whitehead), loans from the Global Bank have been secured, and the plans for Marching to Heaven have been transformed to the construction of a modern coliseum in honor of the emperor.

In this novel, the central themes of Ngugi's early work, such as generational conflict, education as a means of social advancement, and traditional ways of life, recede. Instead, emphasis is placed on describing the centrality of capitalism in contemporary life. In addition, there is a shift from Kenya as the primary locale to a fictionalized locale meant to be representative of postcolonial African nations more generally. The Free Republic of Aburiria is used to illustrate the processes by which many postcolonial nations are incorporated into the global economy. In the novel, this idea is given the name "corporony." Though Ngugi sees the elite's cooperation as seriously compromising the well-being of the nation and the masses of its people, he conveys this criticism humorously. The Ruler's greed, for example, is symbolized by the malady from which he suffers through a great deal of the novel—an inexplicable, proportional, physical inflation that medical specialists name and copyright as "self-induced expansion" (SIE).

In Wizard of the Crow, Ngugi examines a new set of themes. Attention to the dynamics of global exchange, both positive and negative, replaces the emphasis on local identity. The novel identifies capitalist expansion and corrupt governments as obstacles to social equity in many postcolonial nations and emphasizes the importance of challenging authoritarian rule, even when success is qualified.

THE TRIAL OF DEDAN KIMATHI

First produced: 1974 (first published, 1976)

Type of work: Play

The play is an imaginative re-creation of the Mau-Mau leader's trial, interspersed with scenes of his career and Kenyan history.

The Trial of Dedan Kimathi, written in collaboration with Micere Githae-Mugo, is Ngugi's response to colonialist writings about the Mau-Mau movement, which traditionally depicted the movement and its leader, Dedan Kimathi, as mentally unbalanced and vicious. Ngugi and his collaborator choose to counter this image with a portrait of Kimathi as a man of great courage and commitment. This was how he was seen by many of the peasants and laborers of Kenya.

Kimathi was captured and put on trial in 1956. The two playwrights make no attempt to re-create the trial realistically. In place of a tightly woven dramatic narrative, the plot consists of disparate but thematically connected episodes. The scenes in the courtroom are interspersed with others that depict episodes from Kenyan history of the preceding two hundred years, scenes of Kenyan people attempting to help Kimathi escape, scenes of Kimathi's interactions with guerrillas, scenes of Kimathi in prison, and scenes of his torture. The play includes Gikuyu songs and dances, and even mime. Ngugi's portrayal of the Mau-Mau movement, ambivalent in other works, is less so here.

In this play Ngugi looks back at history in an effort to revise it and to expunge deliberately propagated falsehoods. In this way, he attempts to help his country cast off its legacy of oppression.

SUMMARY

Ngugi wa Thiong'o's body of work portrays pre-colonial, colonial, and postindependent Kenya. He movingly depicts the deadly effects of imperialism on an indigenous people, both in the clashes between cultures and the conflict created within the native culture. In Ngugi's fiction, once Kenyans have freed themselves from the domination of the white colonists and have reclaimed their sacred trust—the land—they must then confront the problems that come with independence. There is great struggle and suffering in Ngugi's fiction, and it is not always neatly balanced with hope.

Linda Jordan Tucker; updated by Beauty Bragg

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Weep Not, Child, 1964

The River Between, 1965

A Grain of Wheat, 1967

Secret Lives, 1974

Petals of Blood, 1977

Caitani Mũtharaba-Inĩ, 1980 (Devil on the Cross, 1982)

Matigari ma Njiruungi, 1986 (Matigari, 1989)

Mũrogi wa Kagogo, 2004 (Wizard of the Crow, 2006)

SHORT FICTION:

Secret Lives, and Other Stories, 1975

DRAMA:

- The Black Hermit*, pr. 1962, pb. 1968
This Time Tomorrow: Three Plays, pb. 1970 (includes The Rebels, The Wound in My Heart, and This Time Tomorrow)
The Trial of Dedan Kimathi, pr. 1974, pb. 1976 (with Micere Githae-Mugo)
Ngaahika Ndeenda, pr. 1977, pb. 1980 (with Ngugi wa Mirii; I Will Marry When I Want, 1982)
Maitu Njugira, pb. 1982 (with Ngugi wa Mirii; Mother, Sing for Me, 1986)

NONFICTION:

- Homecoming: Essays on African and Caribbean Literature, Culture, and Politics*, 1972
Detained: A Writer's Prison Diary, 1981
Writers in Politics, 1981, revised and enlarged 1997
Barrel of a Pen: Resistance to Repression in Neo-Colonial Kenya, 1983
Decolonising the Mind: The Politics of Language in African Literature, 1986
Writing Against Neocolonialism, 1986
Moving the Centre: The Struggle for Cultural Freedoms, 1993
Penpoints, Gunpoints, and Dreams: Toward a Critical Theory of the Arts and the State in Africa, 1998

MISCELLANEOUS:

- The World of Ngugi wa Thiong'o*, 1995 (Charles Cantalupo, editor; essays, poems, and interviews)

About the Author

- Balogun, F. Odun. Ngugi and African Postcolonial Narrative: The Novel as Oral Narrative in Multi-genre Performance. St-Hyacinthe, Que.: World Heritage Press, 1997.
 Draper, James P., ed. Black Literature Criticism. Vol. 3. Detroit: Gale Research, 1992.
 Gikandi, Simon. Ngugi wa Thiong'o. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 2000.
 Gurnah, Abdulrazak, ed. Essays on African Writing: A Re-evaluation. London: Heinemann, 1993.
 Harrow, Kenneth W. Thresholds of Change in African Literature: The Emergence of a Tradition. London: Heinemann, 1994.
 Killam, G. D., ed. Critical Perspectives on Ngugi wa Thiong'o. Washington, D.C.: Three Continents Press, 1984.
 Larson, Charles R. The Emergence of African Fiction. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1971.
 Lindfors, Bernth, and Bala Kothandaraman, eds. The Writer as Activist: South Asian Perspectives on Ngugi wa Thiong'o. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World Press, 2001.
 Nazareth, Peter, ed. Critical Essays on Ngugi wa Thiong'o. New York: Twayne, 2000.
 Ogude, James. Ngugi's Novels and African History: Narrating the Nation. Sterling, Va.: Pluto Press, 1999.
 Palmer, Eustace. An Introduction to the African Novel. New York: Africana, 1972.
 Popkin, Michael. Modern Black Writers. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1978.
 Sander, Reinhard, and Bernth Lindfors, eds. Ngugi wa Thiong'o Speaks: Interviews with the Kenyan Writer. Trenton, N.J.: Africa World Press, 2006.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- The representation of women and women's experiences has changed over the body of Ngugi wa Thiong'o's work, as has his depiction of men and men's experiences. What differences do you see between male figures in the early works and male figures in later works?
- In what ways might the experience of the English-speaking reader of Ngugi's translated texts be affected by a lack of familiarity with Gikuyu?
- What are some of the countries with which the characters in Wizard of the Crow have contact? What do these encounters suggest about Ngugi's vision of global exchange?
- Throughout Wizard of the Crow, the Christian soldiers are on the hunt for the devil. What are some things that the devil could symbolize?
- Most of the characters in Wizard of the Crow wish not to be associated with sorcerers or "superstitious" behavior and yet consult the Wizard. How does Ngugi represent the Wizard's practice?

Library of Congress

FRIEDRICH NIETZSCHE

Born: Röcken, Saxony-Anhalt, Prussia (now in Germany)
October 15, 1844

Died: Weimar, Germany
August 25, 1900

Nietzsche, a German philosopher, essayist, and poet, was a highly original thinker who exerted great influence in the fields of rhetoric, literature, and philosophy. Even the harshest critics of his ideas acknowledge his masterful writing style and command of the German language.

BIOGRAPHY

Friedrich Nietzsche (NEE-chuh) was born in 1844 in the small Prussian town of Röcken, near Leipzig. The son of a Lutheran pastor, he was given the name Friedrich Wilhelm in honor of King Frederick William IV, whose birthday was the same as his. He had one sister, Elisabeth, and a brother who died early in childhood. When Nietzsche was just four years old, his father died from a brain injury resulting from a fall. The family then moved to Naumburg, where they lived with his paternal grandmother and his father's two unmarried sisters.

After attending a private elementary school, Nietzsche enrolled at the local gymnasium (classical high school) in Naumburg, where he demonstrated outstanding talents in language and music. In 1858, he was awarded a full scholarship to study at the prestigious boarding school, Pforta, only a few miles from his home. At Pforta, despite migraine headaches and other health ailments, he acquired a strong background in classical philology, the term for the languages and literature of ancient Greece and Rome. In addition to his school work, he spent much of his time writing poetry and just barely made passing grades in mathematics.

While still in secondary school, Nietzsche became convinced that the miracles and other supernatural claims of Christianity were untenable. The development of this skepticism was partly a result of his reading books, such as David Strauss's critical biography of Jesus. The fact that most Germans at the time professed the Christian faith reinforced his condescending attitude toward his fellow citizens. Both his mother and his sister Elisabeth were extremely upset to discover these atheistic convictions, and Elisabeth even tried to give him counterarguments. In his famous response of June 11, 1865, Nietzsche admitted that religious faith often comforted and elevated people, but he insisted that this was the function of any faith, not proof of a religion's "objective reality." He concluded, "Here is the way men divide: if you wish to strive for peace of soul and happiness, then believe; if you wish to be a disciple of truth, then inquire." This revealing letter anticipated his later anti-Christianity, as well as his distinction between the weak-minded majority and courageous elite.

Following graduation in 1864, he entered the University of Bonn, where he specialized in classical philology. Apparently he spent a good deal of time in beer halls, to the extent that he later referred to his time in Bonn as a "lost year." His favorite philology professor was Friedrich Wilhelm Ritschl, whom he followed to the University of Leipzig the next year. While a student in Leipzig, Nietzsche published a few essays and impressed the faculty as a brilliant philologist. In 1869, with Ritschl's help, Nietzsche secured a professorship at the University of Basel in Switzerland. The University of Leipzig awarded him a doctorate without either a thesis or an examination, which was highly unusual. Although the classes he taught at Basel were small, his students considered him to be a very good teacher.

When Nietzsche published his first books, however, the reactions from his professional colleagues were extremely negative. Seeking a wife, he proposed marriage to Mathilde Trampedach in 1876, just a few hours after meeting her, but she turned him down. Increasingly he felt isolated, and his health, which was always precarious, continued to deteriorate. In 1879, he decided to resign his professorship in order to devote all of his energies to writing. During the next nine years, despite his bad health, he would write numerous books and many essays and poems. He lived on his modest pension, while also receiving aid from friends. Attempting to find a climate compatible with his health needs, he moved frequently to a variety of cities in Germany, Switzerland, and Italy. Occasionally visiting his family at Naumburg, he and his sister Elisabeth had cyclical periods of conflict and reconciliation. In 1882, he met and spent the summer with Lou Salomé, but she also declined his proposal for marriage.

Following the breakup with Salomé, he began to write his most famous book, Also sprach Zarathustra: Ein Buch für Alle und Keinen (1883-1885; Thus Spake Zarathustra, 1896), which summarized his mature ideas in the form of a poetic parable. In 1886, he published at his own expense Jenseits von Gut und Böse: Vorspiel einer Philosophie der Zukunft (1886; Beyond Good and Evil, 1907), expanding on his theories about morality and the aesthetic ideal.

During his final years of sanity in the late 1880's, Nietzsche published several major books, including two angry diatribes against Christianity and a strong attack on composer Richard Wagner. During this time, he was further developing his ideas about the will to power, which he intended to expand into a large volume. Early in 1888, his health seemed to improve, but by the end of the year he was showing signs of mental derangement, with symptoms suggesting that he was likely suffering from the later stages of syphilis.

On January 3, 1889, in Turin, Italy, Nietzsche collapsed on the street while reportedly trying to assist a horse that was being abused. After he awoke, he was no longer able to formulate coherent ideas, as demonstrated in the so-called wahnbriefe (madness letters) that he sent to friends and colleagues. Incurably insane for the rest of his life, he died from tuberculosis on August 25, 1900.

ANALYSIS

Nietzsche's writings have elicited a large variety of reactions and interpretations. Often writing in enigmatic aphorisms rather than rational arguments, Nietzsche never attempted to formulate a philosophical system, and he did not hesitate to change his mind about fundamental issues. He had a tendency to make bold generalizations without making necessary qualifications and exceptions. A highly emotional man, he usually wrote rapidly and in a spontaneous style, apparently considering the aesthetics of literary expression more important than precision of thought. Nietzsche's unhappy life, health problems, and loneliness, moreover, probably contributed to the apparent pleasure that he took in shocking bourgeois society.

His writings are commonly divided into three periods. During the early period, 1872-1876, he attacked modern culture as superficial and empty in comparison with that of ancient Greece, attributing most of the blame to the modern emphasis on science rather than on art and myth. During the middle period from 1877 to 1882, he acknowledged the value of science and sought a naturalistic understanding of human life. In his late period, 1883-1888, his writings became more accessible, and he grew increasingly strident in attacking conventional morality and orthodox Christianity. Some scholars, however, reject the three-part schema, arguing that he never freed himself from the Romantic inheritance of the early period and never ceased to engage in metaphysical speculation, despite his assertions to the contrary.

In his early period, Nietzsche was particularly influenced by the music of Richard Wagner and the philosophy of Arthur Schopenhauer. Like many people, he was overwhelmed by Wagner's artistic skill and mythical vision of Germany's heroic past. Schopenhauer's major book, Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung (1819; The World as Will and Idea, 1883-1886), asserted that the essential reality of the universe is an irrational and mindless cosmic force that he called either the "will to live" or simply the "will," which is indifferent to human needs and aspirations. Believing that this ubiquitous force produces evil and suffering, he recommended denial of the will through an ascetic cessation of desire, but he allowed for temporary escape by way of art and aesthetic experiences, especially in music. For several years, Nietzsche appeared to look upon this metaphysical perspective as a key to unlocking the meaning of human life.

The influences of Schopenhauer and Richard Wagner were clearly seen in Nietzsche's first book, Die Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geiste der Musik (1872; The Birth of Tragedy out of the Spirit of Music, 1909). Likewise, his four lengthy meditations, Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen (1873-1876; Thoughts out of Season, 1909), continued to use Schopenhauerian and Wagnerian ideas to criticize modern culture and elevate art over science. In his unpublished essay of 1873, "Über Wahrheit und Lüge im aussermoralischen Sinne" ("On Truth and Lies in a Nonmoral Sense"), which is considered his most important discussion of language and rhetoric, he insisted that all claims of objective truth were illusions based on chains of metaphors. He also asserted his influential theory of perspectivism, emphasizing that a person's perspective profoundly affects the nature of the reality that is observed.

By 1876, Nietzsche was ending his friendship with Wagner, who was now speaking favorably of Christianity, the German Empire, and anti-Semitism, three things that Nietzsche detested. He was also beginning to view Schopenhauer's nonempirical speculations as superfluous, in part a result of his new appreciation for the French Enlightenment and empirical science. His philosophy during this period is best seen in Menschliches, Allzumenschliches: Ein Buch für freie Geister (1878; Human, All Too Human, 1910, 1911).

By the time he wrote Die fröhliche Wissenschaft (1882, 1887; The Joyful Wisdom, 1910), which inaugurated the final period of his writings, Nietzsche had returned to a hostile stance toward rational science, again praising human instincts and advocating an aesthetic perspective of life. This book included the famous aphorism in which a madman proclaimed the death of God, as well as another aphorism which asked readers to reflect on the possibility that their entire lives would recur throughout eternity. Until his breakdown in 1888, Nietzsche continued to emphasize these two themes, which he combined with two others: the coming Übermensch (literally translated as "Superman" or "Overman") and the "will to power."

In using the term Übermensch, Nietzsche was primarily referring to a person of superior aesthetic and intellectual qualities who has overcome the weaknesses of the "common herd" of humans. This Overman was expected to remain apolitical and to sublimate his will into contemplation and artistic creation. In contrast to the Nazis' racist idea of a superior Nordic superrace, he held that the development of the superior type of persons can be found among different racial groups and cultures of the world.

Nietzsche claimed that the "will to power" provided a comprehensive and compelling explanation for human motivation. He wrote, "What is good?—All that heightens the feeling of power, the will to power, power itself in man." By "power," Nietzsche apparently meant the capacity to obtain one's desired goals through any number of means, including persuasion, prestige, money, warfare, artistic ability, or even self-control. He apparently did not consider the possibility that his unqualified glorification of all forms of power could be exploited to justify extreme militarism and aggressive nationalism. In 1906, his sister, Elisabeth Förster-Nietzsche, who later supported Adolf Hitler and the Third Reich, published a controversial selection from his later notes, Der Wille zur Macht (The Will to Power, 1910).

Although there is a general consensus that his sister's choice of aphorisms reflected her own ideology more than his, historians disagree about the extent to which Nietzsche's ideas were compatible with those espoused by the Nazis. Nietzsche's many defenders emphasize that he frequently denounced Otto von Bismarck's aggressive wars of expansion, and that he rarely expressed anti-Semitic views, except in the context of the similarities between Christianity and the Jewish religion. Critics of Nietzsche concede that he opposed German racism and nationalism, but they nevertheless find that his ideas and those of the Nazis shared much in common, particularly his antidemocratic tirades and his defense of exploiting the common people in the interests of the Übermensch.

Nietzsche's idiosyncratic book of autobiographical reflections, Ecce Homo (1908; English translation, 1911), written a few weeks before his mental breakdown, summarized the ideas that he had expressed over the years, but it was not very revealing about the details of his life. One of the unusual aspects of the book is the extent to which Nietzsche boasted about his intelligence and his place in history. He wrote, for example, “My destiny ordained that I would be the first decent human being. . . . I was the first to discover truth. . . . Mankind can begin to have fresh hopes, only now that I have lived.” Nietzsche’s critics interpret such statements as indications of extreme megalomania, while some of his admirers view them more as demonstrations of his sense of humor and irony.

THE BIRTH OF TRAGEDY OUT OF THE SPIRIT OF MUSIC

First published: Die Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geiste der Musik, 1872 (English translation, 1909)

Type of work: Nonfiction

Nietzsche argued that classical Greek drama grew out of religious music, and he championed artistic expression as the noblest task of humanity.

The Birth of Tragedy out of the Spirit of Music, Nietzsche’s first book, defended an aesthetic view of life, which was one of the major themes of all his early writings. Dedicated to Richard Wagner, the book expressed the perspective of the German Romantic movement, glorifying the senses and traditional mythology, with disdain for the Enlightenment tradition’s emphasis on reason and modern science. Asserting that the ancient Greeks were able to endure the horrors of human existence as a result of their art, particularly their drama and music, Nietzsche praised the tragic dramas of Aeschylus and Sophocles, which presumably had emerged out of the dithyrambs (or emotional songs) devoted to Dionysus, the god of intoxication, spontaneity, impulsiveness, and unrestrained life force. While emphasizing the value of the Dionysian principle, Nietzsche argued that Aeschylus and Sophocles balanced their tragedies with the Apollonian principle, which was personified in the god Apollo, who represented order, sobriety, individualism, and rationality.

Nietzsche used Dionysus and Apollo as metaphors for these contradictory aspects of human culture. He asserted that the age of great tragedies had ended because of the elimination of the Dionysian element at the hands of the playwright Euripides, under the pernicious influence of Socrates—a metaphor for modern science. As a result, the Apollonian element had been dominant in Western thought since the time of Socrates, but a renaissance of the Dionysian element could occur by applying two of philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer’s insights: first, that a nonrational “will to exist” underlies human creativity, and second, that humans can escape this destructive force through aesthetic experiences, particularly through music, the most noble of the arts. In addition, Nietzsche argued that German Romanticism (especially the music and drama of Wagner) was destined to bring about a rebirth of Dionysian art, providing for the aesthetic needs of nineteenth century Europeans.

In celebrating the Dionysian aspects of ancient Greece, Nietzsche was rejecting the widespread pro-Enlightenment interpretation of Greek culture held by most German scholars of the period. He was also expressing a Romantic conception of an artist as a genius, with the semideification of the artist as the oracle or priest capable of endowing life with a metaphysical dimension. Naturally this was a viewpoint that Wagner and other artists welcomed. Most scholars of Greek philology, in contrast, dismissed The Birth of Tragedy as a product of unscholarly speculation and Wagnerian propaganda.

In his middle period, as Nietzsche became more sympathetic toward science and reason, he rejected many of the assertions in the book. His revised edition of 1886 included a preface, “An Attempt at Self-Criticism,” in which he wrote that the earlier edition was excessively “pessimistic” and hostile to modern culture. He even described the first edition as “badly written, ponderous, embarrassing, image-mad and image-confused, sentimental . . . [and] without the will to logical cleanliness.” Many of Nietzsche’s admirers, nevertheless, continued to view the book as a masterpiece.

THUS SPAKE ZARATHUSTRA

First published: Also sprach Zarathustra,
1883-1885 (English translation, 1896)

Type of work: Nonfiction

A teacher comes down from his mountainous cave to teach humanity about God's death, eternal recurrence, the will to power, and the future appearance of the "Overman."

Thus Spake Zarathustra, Nietzsche's most popular work, is fundamentally different from his other publications and has been called a parable and a poetic fable. In form it imitates parts of the New Testament and the Platonic dialogues. The style is lighthearted, while the message is ironic, frequently ambiguous, and Dionysian. The book is full of metaphors and humorous allusions to specific philosophers and writers. Nietzsche later wrote that it summarized all the important ideas in his writings.

The teachings of Nietzsche's Zarathustra, of course, have almost nothing in common with those of the Persian prophet who founded the Zoroastrian religion. Nietzsche explained in his autobiography the reason for choosing the name: Zarathustra was considered "the first" to teach the notion of a cosmic conflict between good and evil, and it was therefore appropriate for him to be the first to expose the errors of such a morality and to preach the "gospel of a new humanity."

After contemplating for ten years in a mountainous cave, according to Nietzsche's story, Zarathustra descended from his cave at the age of forty to bring enlightenment to humanity. The narrative is divided into four parts, of which the first three are a unit describing Zarathustra's travels after the multitudes reject his message. Visiting many lands, Zarathustra spends his time arguing, dreaming, and delivering sermons. Finally returning to his cave in the fourth part, he finds eight "higher men," each of a particular type, waiting for him. They hold a blasphemous festival in which they worship an ass as God, after which Zarathustra has discussions with each of them. He explains that these higher men are unable to rise to the exalted status of the Overman because of the influences of a decadent society. In the penultimate chapter, Zarathustra replaces existing religious commandments with exhortations to laugh, to be joyful, and to ridicule everything serious. Finally, the appearance of a lion pleases Zarathustra, because he takes this as a sign that the Overman will soon appear.

Nietzsche's Zarathustra declares that the Overman "shall be the meaning of the earth!" When using the word "man" (or mensch), he appears to primarily refer to an individual of the male gender. He is highly suspicious of female standards of integrity and considers the female intellectual to be dangerous. "When a woman has scholarly inclinations," he declares, "there is usually something wrong with her sexuality." He teaches that men "should be trained for war and women for the recreation of the warrior; all else is folly." Likewise, he approves an old woman's advice: "Are you visiting a woman? Do not forget your whip!"

Zarathustra frequently praises the human will for power. He explains that rulers and government officials exercise this will by commanding obedience and punishing disobedience. Weak persons, in contrast, obey the strong because "the will of the weaker persuades it to serve the stronger; his will wants to be master of those weaker still." Zarathustra accepts the existence of a drive toward self-preservation but interprets it as only an indirect consequence of the will to power. He says that a strong will to do evil is preferable to a weak will to do good; the will of a Cesare Borgia is preferable to that of a Christian saint. Although conceding that the will to power could produce despicable results, Zarathustra insists that the will must be overcome or "sublimated," not destroyed.

Zarathustra also emphasizes the strange doctrine of "eternal recurrence," or the assertion "that all things recur eternally, and we ourselves with them, and that we have already existed an infinite number of times before and all things with us. . . . I shall return eternally to this identical and self-same life." Although such a statement is open to many interpretations, he apparently meant much more than that similar things in history reoccur within cycles. Nietzsche's critics commonly view the doctrine of eternal recurrence as an absurd form of metaphysical speculation. In contrast, some defenders argue that the doctrine was a reasonable deduction from nineteenth century ideas about probability and the indestructibility of matter.

A number of scholars, however, have argued that Zarathustra's assertion of eternal recurrence is only a metaphor, an "as if" fiction, not an assertion about a cosmological reality. According to this view, it was simply a test to judge how people perceive their place in the world. This is suggested in Zarathustra's question: "Can you bring yourself to will the eternal recurrence of everything in your life down to the last detail?" In other words, a person of superior qualities should be able to affirm that there is no future he would prefer to the repetition of the exact life that he was living.

BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL

First published: Jenseits von Gut und Böse, 1886 (English translation, 1907)

Type of work: Nonfiction

Nietzsche argues that noble persons needed a new system of morality based on aristocratic values, including a radical transformation in the conventional criteria for judging what is good or bad.

In using the title Beyond Good and Evil, Nietzsche wanted to emphasize his belief that persons of noble character need an ethical system that is more sophisticated than the rules and principles found in the conventional moralities of both the bourgeoisie and the lower classes. Although sometimes denouncing the very notion of morality, he strongly condemned ethical nihilism, while acknowledging the societal need for standards of "good and bad" in the sense of "noble and despicable." He insisted, however, that many acts and attitudes that were judged to be "evil" or "sinful" in conventional morality were noble according to his aristocratic criteria. There was an urgent need, therefore, for a thoroughgoing "transvaluation of values." Certainly Nietzsche reacted strongly against the rigid mores and folkways of the Victorian age, but this was only part of his complaint.

Glorifying the strong "will to power" of superior humans, he distinguished between the "master morality" and the "slave morality." He viewed the former as an affirmation of life, while the latter was only a grumbling of resentment and weakness. He also described the former as a "life-enhancing" morality and the latter as a "life-denying" morality. One of the reasons for his contempt for Christian morality was his belief that it had evolved out of a slave morality, as epitomized in precepts like "blessed are the meek" and "turn the other cheek." He also asserted that the French Revolution was an expression of the slave morality, even though he viewed Napoleon I as the last great representative of the aristocratic ideal. Writing condescendingly of the slave "whose gaze resents the virtues of the powerful," he was alarmed to observe the growth of democracy with its "morality of the herd animal," which he perceived to be an heir to Christianity.

Although endorsing the aristocratic morality of the slaveholder, Nietzsche did not advocate the re-introduction of slavery in the traditional sense. On the other hand, he never expresses any ethical judgments against the exploitation and suffering of ordinary people. Rather than condemnation, he believed the development of the Overman requires a "healthy aristocracy" in which there are "gradations of rank and differences of worth." The essential thing is that a society should not exist for its own sake but rather as a foundation to make the higher forms of noblemen possible. For the sake of cultivating such men, therefore, society "with a good conscience" must accept "the sacrifice of innumerable men" who would "have to be suppressed and reduced to imperfect men, to slaves and tools." Considering it natural for women to exercise a "secondary role," Nietzsche told his readers that "both good and bad women need the stick."

In order to clarify and expand on the ethical theories of Beyond Good and Evil, Nietzsche wrote a second book, Zur Genealogie der Moral (1887; On the Genealogy of Morals, 1896). Since there are only minor differences in the ideas of the two books, they are frequently considered together. The latter is considered to be somewhat more readable.

SUMMARY

Friedrich Nietzsche praised the values of artistic achievement, intellectual courage, nonconformity, and an affirmation of secular life. A militant opponent of Christianity and conventional morality, he called for a new moral system not based on any religious foundation. In most of his works, he expressed distrust for modern science, and he sometimes, but not always, rejected the existence of objective truth, emphasizing how different intellectual perspectives determine the ways that people perceive reality. His controversial aphorisms about the Overman and the will to power are open to a large variety of interpretations. Although the Nazis exploited these two ideas, most scholars emphasize the great differences between his essentially aesthetic point of view and the goals of Nazi ideology.

Although largely ignored during his lifetime, since his death many writers and literary critics have admired Nietzsche's distinguished writing style, his focus on aesthetics, and his theories on rhetoric and metaphor. Avant-garde artists have particularly been attracted to his glorification of art and the Dionysian approach to life. Theorists of twentieth century existentialism and postmodernism, including Jean-Paul Sartre, Albert Camus, Michel Foucault, and Jacques Derrida, have acknowledged his influence. Likewise, numerous novelists and poets, including Thomas Mann, Hermann Hesse, and Stefan George, have also been inspired by his writings. Many partisans of democracy, the Enlightenment, and empirical science, however, have either ignored Nietzsche or expressed strong disagreement with his doctrines.

Thomas Tandy Lewis

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

NONFICTION:

- Die Geburt der Tragödie aus dem Geiste der Musik*, 1872
(The Birth of Tragedy out of the Spirit of Music, 1909)
- Unzeitgemässe Betrachtungen*, 1873-1876 (4 volumes;
Thoughts Out of Season, 1909, 2 volumes)
- Menschliches, Allzumenschliches: Ein Buch für freie Geister*, 1878 (Human, All Too Human, 1910, 1911)
- Die fröhliche Wissenschaft*, 1882, 1887 (The Joyful Wisdom, 1910)
- Also sprach Zarathustra: Ein Buch für Alle und Keinen*, 1883-1885 (Thus Spake Zarathustra, 1896)
- Jenseits von Gut und Böse: Vorspiel einer Philosophie der Zukunft*, 1886 (Beyond Good and Evil, 1907)
- Zur Genealogie der Moral*, 1887 (On the Genealogy of Morals, 1896)
- Der Fall Wagner*, 1888 (The Case of Wagner, 1896)
- Der Antichrist*, 1895 (The Antichrist, 1896)
- Der Wille zur Macht*, 1901 (The Will to Power, 1910)
- Ecce Homo*, 1908 (English translation, 1911)
- The Complete Works of Friedrich Nietzsche*, 1909-1911 (18 volumes)
- The Pre-Platonic Philosophers*, 2001 (lectures with commentary)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Why has Friedrich Nietzsche had such a widespread influence on writers and literary critics?
- What were Nietzsche's theories about truth and rhetoric?
- What were Nietzsche's beliefs and values in the realm of ethics?
- Should an "Overman," as Nietzsche described him, be admired or condemned?
- Was Nietzsche justified in his contempt for democracy and ordinary people?
- Did Nietzsche have a valid understanding of the morality and values of Christianity?
- Did Nietzsche's insanity have any influence on the content of his ideas?
- In what ways did Nietzsche anticipate the ideas of contemporary existentialism and postmodernism?

About the Author

- Ansell-Pearson, Keith, ed. A Companion to Nietzsche. Malden, Mass.: Blackwell, 2006.
- Emden, Christian. Nietzsche on Language, Consciousness, and the Body. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 2005.
- Hollingdale, Reginald J. Nietzsche: The Man and His Philosophy. Rev. ed. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Kaufmann, Walter. Nietzsche: Philosopher, Psychologist, Antichrist. 4th ed. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1975.
- Lampert, Lawrence. Nietzsche's Teachings: An Introduction to "Thus Spoke Zarathustra." New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1989.
- Nehamas, Alexander. Nietzsche: Life as Literature. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1985.
- Silk, Michael, and J. P. Stern. Nietzsche on Tragedy. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1983.
- Spinks, Lee. Friedrich Nietzsche. London: Routledge, 2003.
- Young, Julian. Nietzsche's Philosophy of Art. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1992.

© Terry O'Neill

EDNA O'BRIEN

Born: Tuamgraney, County Clare, Ireland
December 15, 1930

O'Brien is widely known for her lively fiction detailing the maturation of Irish girls and for her later portrayals of Irish women responding to their changing society.

BIOGRAPHY

The youngest child in a shabby, genteel farm family, which included a brother and two sisters, Josephine Edna O'Brien was born in Tuamgraney, County Clare, Ireland, on December 15, 1930, and grew up in rural western Ireland. If her fictions are to be believed, and in broad outline the facts are substantiated by her on-the-record comments, her father, Michael O'Brien, drank too much, and her mother, Lena, fully assumed the classic martyr's role. O'Brien was educated at the local primary school in Scarriff and at the Convent of Mercy, Loughrea, County Galway. From this repressive, priest-ridden home and rural environment, with its many social and sexual taboos, she "escaped" in the late 1940's to Dublin to study pharmacy in the work-study system then in vogue.

Always a reader, in the city of Dublin she encountered for the first time, and with great delight, the stimulation of venturesome writers, such as fellow Irish national James Joyce, and the realistic stories and plays of the Russian Anton Chekhov. She contributed pieces to the Irish Press newspaper. In 1951, O'Brien married the older, established Czech writer Ernest Gebler. Their sons Carlo (a novelist in his own right) and Sasha (an architect) were born in 1952 and 1954, respectively. In 1959 the family moved to London, where O'Brien established permanent residence.

O'Brien's necessary physical departure from the community where she was raised and eventually from Ireland freed her—as it freed Joyce, Sean O'Casey, and other Irish writers in voluntary exile—to write about her homeland for a lifetime. Her best work, most readers agree, is set among the Irish and involves social and family relationships, searches and conflicts, not unlike O'Brien's own experiences in a vanishing Ireland that she knows and re-creates extremely well.

During her first month in England, O'Brien wrote the very successful novel The Country Girls (1960), which was nevertheless burned in her village and banned throughout Ireland, as were her six subsequent books. She followed this novel with the other books in a trilogy: The Lonely Girl (1962; reprinted in 1964 as Girl with Green Eyes) and Girls in Their Married Bliss (1964). O'Brien and Gebler, who divorced in 1964, have argued in print over how much help he provided with the trilogy; whatever the truth behind their dispute, O'Brien was launched on a successful, jet-set, high-profile career, receiving counseling with the celebrated psychiatrist R. D. Laing, and making frequent television appearances whenever a feisty, auburn-haired spokesperson for Ireland, or for Irishwomen, was called for. The Lonely Girl was made into a film, Girl with Green Eyes (1964), starring Rita Tushingham.

Based in London, successfully rearing her sons on her own, O'Brien had two most prolific decades of work in a variety of genres, although her sexually explicit scenes and criticism of church personnel caused her continuing problems with the Irish censors. The novels accumulated: August Is a Wicked Month (1965); Casualties of Peace (1966); A Pagan Place (1970), her favorite work and chosen by the Yorkshire Post as novel of the year; Johnny, I Hardly Knew You (1977; published in the United States as I Hardly Knew You, 1978); and, after what was for O'Brien a long gap between major publications, The Country Girls Trilogy and Epilogue (1986) and The High Road (1988).

Beginning in 1962, she wrote dozens of short stories on the general themes she also explores in her novels—love, loss, and connection. These stories were published in The New Yorker and other magazines. Some of O'Brien's best short fiction appears in her collections The Love Object (1968), A Scandalous Woman, and Other Stories (1974), Mrs. Reinhardt (1978; better known as A Rose in the Heart), Returning (1982), and Lantern Slides (1990).

Along with her prose fiction, O'Brien involved herself in journalism, writing travel books based on her personal experiences, including the provocative, eccentric Mother Ireland (1976). She edited the anthology Some Irish Loving (1979) and published literary criticism of Joyce's work that would later culminate in a magnificently lyrical biography, James Joyce (1999). O'Brien also continued to pursue her interest in the theater by writing stage plays, teleplays, and screenplays, including A Cheap Bunch of Nice Flowers (pr. 1962); Time Lost and Time Remembered (1966); X, Y, and Zee (1972), a film adaptation of her novel Zee and Co. (1971), which starred Elizabeth Taylor, Michael Caine, and Susannah York; The Gathering (pr. 1974); Virginia (pr. 1980), about Virginia Woolf; Triptych (pr., pb. 2003); and Iphigenia (pr., pb. 2003).

More than many other prolific writers, O'Brien's biography is the avowed raw material for her fiction. In 1984 and 1986, respectively, she published an elegant pair of matched volumes: A Fanatic Heart, a collection of the best of her previously collected stories, and what many consider her best work, a new edition of The Country Girls Trilogy with an entirely new Epilogue. This epilogue's narrator is Baba, the more extroverted of O'Brien's dual heroines; the more introverted Kate, readers are told, is dead. It seemed as if, as O'Brien approached sixty, the well of her previous inspiration was drying up, and she was putting her literary estate in order, or she was about to take a new direction, as represented by the confident "Baba" voice.

In 1988, however, after ten years without publishing a novel, O'Brien published The High Road, to mixed reviews. The High Road is set again in the world of the expatriates' Mediterranean and its multinational cliques, and O'Brien's new direction was denied. In 1990, O'Brien, most secure in her literary reputation in the United States, was back in New York, where she was writer-in-residence at City College. At the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA), she gave a dramatic reading of "Brother," one of the stories from her newly published collection, Lantern Slides; it is a vengeful monologue of an Irish woman contemplating the arrival of her brother's new bride at the farmhouse that the two of them had shared together for many years. Amid a crowd of fans, O'Brien also signed copies of her brief, autobiographical poem, On the Bone (1989).

Like her idol Joyce, O'Brien fled Ireland to avoid stultifying repression, yet she never really left, returning frequently in later years while maintaining a residence in London. O'Brien was named an honorary member of the American Academy of Arts and Letters, and was appointed adjunct professor at University College, Dublin, in 2006.

ANALYSIS

O'Brien's recurring themes, her stylistic experimentation with received forms and narrative stances in the pronouns used, and her success in communicating that an Irish microcosm has a universal significance are all clearly present in Mother Ireland, the most accessible and instructive work with which to make O'Brien's literary acquaintance. This personal response to her dear native land is not at all likely to be promoted by the Irish Tourist Board. Her Irishness, however, is something of which O'Brien is proud: "It's a state of mind," she claims. She is not, however, blind to Ireland's faults, appreciating that there must be something "secretly catastrophic" about a country that so many of its people leave. After an iconoclastic opening chapter on Irish history, with its uncanonized patron saint, Saint Patrick, and its paunchy Firbolgs, Mother Ireland continues with six chapters in which O'Brien sketches her dominant themes: loneliness and the search for love; the longing for adventure (often sexual); the repressive Irish Roman Catholic Church and rural society; the constraints of family ties, particularly as they involve a martyred mother and her daughter; and the courageous hopelessness with which life at best must be lived.

It would be a melancholy prospect indeed for her almost-always female protagonists ("Clara," from her short-story collection A Rose in the Heart, has one of O'Brien's very rare male narrators) if it were not for O'Brien's saving graces of irony, sometimes at her own expense, and of humor. At her best, she skillfully roots her observations in the sensual details of an actual Irish world, now quickly vanishing. The late twentieth century proliferation of television antennae on cottage roofs, the problems of widespread unemployment, and other political issues make no inroads on the consciousnesses of her heroines. Problems of a practical nature (the need for grocery money) or of a provincial or national political nature (the Northern Ireland question) impinge not at all on O'Brien's fictional characters' search for fulfillment. Instead, her people, and her readers through them, inhabit an Ireland now almost gone. All five of their senses are engaged by a world of wet batteries for radios, ink powder to be reconstituted in school by highly favored students, private estate walls with fragments of bottles embedded in their tops to deter trespassers, Fox's Glacier Mints, orange-crate furniture, and lice fine-combed from a child's head onto a newspaper: in other words, the world of the 1940's and 1950's.

From the beginning of her literary career, it appeared as if O'Brien had fallen upon, or decided upon, in whatever mysterious way inspiration works, the mechanism of splitting her heroines into two separate, complementary, personalities. In The Country Girls, the shy and sensitive Caithleen tells her story, and she shares the action with her alter ego, the volatile and sometimes malicious Baba. They inhabit a world divided largely into warring camps—male and female, young and old, church and laity, country and town—where Caithleen's aspirations toward love are doomed to failure. Expelled from their repressive convent school for writing a ribald joke, the girls, in their late teens, come to Dublin. Caithleen's Mr. Gentleman, the first of a long line of largely unsympathetic men in O'Brien's work, disappoints her. With the ebullience and resilience of youth, Caithleen is "almost" certain that she will not sleep again. Yet she does, and in The Lonely Girl her education continues. Caithleen's tutor in this novel is the cultivated snob whom she marries, Eugene Gaillard, whose initials, Grace Eckley noted in her study, Edna O'Brien (1974), are the same as Ernest Gebler's, O'Brien's husband at the time. At the novel's conclusion, Caithleen and Baba are still seeking romantic relationships as they sail on the Hibernia for Liverpool and London.

For the first time, in the third part of their saga, Girls in Their Married Bliss, Baba assumes the first-person narration, alternating with an omniscient voice distancing O'Brien and the reader from Kate's (as Caithleen now wishes to be known) role. The women are now in their mid-twenties, and there is a splendid, blustery, Celtic quality to the scapegrace Baba's style. The subject is still the female search for love in a healthy relationship with a man. In general it may be said, though, that, with few exceptions, the men whom O'Brien provides for her heroines are very poor risks, being either already married or in some other way unable to give themselves fully to any relationship. It is a doomed search on the evidence in Girls in Their Married Bliss, as readers observe Kate's failing marriage. Occasionally, as in the story "The Mouth of the Cave," or in the novels The Love Object and The High Road, O'Brien offers a lesbian connection for her female narrator (not to be confused with the sisterly rapport between Kate and Baba). Still, it remains predominantly in a heterosexual connection that O'Brien's characters' hopes for happiness seem to lie.

In subsequent novels, O'Brien, like her characters, learns and develops her skills. Her protagonists shift back and forth between two poles of experience, two responses to life that are represented by the romantic Kate and the realistic Baba of her earliest works. In August Is a Wicked Month, the narrator, Ellen, is a Kate-like figure whose attempts at self-liberation, largely through her sexual activity, bring her great guilt and pain. The balancing continues in Casualties of Peace, where Willa and Patsy are both victims of male violence. Patsy's love letters are reminiscent of the earliest of those exchanged between James Joyce and his eventual wife, Nora Barnacle, in their correspondence with each other.

After a Pagan Place, in which a young girl is nearly seduced by a priest; in Zee and Co., where Zee is no patsy; and particularly in Night (1972), O'Brien's optimistic Baba-type character is back and on the offensive. The new attitude is best shown in Night's Mary Hooligan, whose aggressive, courageous, nightlong monologue forms the entire substance of the work. Family, community, and marriage settings are again explored. Mary, like Joyce's character Molly Bloom, or indeed Geoffrey Chaucer's Wife of Bath, is indomitable. Such an optimistic focus, however, does not last for O'Brien. With I Hardly Knew You, the narrator, Nora, takes readers back to the violent world first encountered in the earliest works. "I am proud," says Nora, "to have killed one of that breed [men] to whom I owe nothing, but cruelty, deceit and the asp's emission," contradicting O'Brien's oft-stated support for "human decency" and kindness among people of whatever sex.

This ambivalence, or offering of choices, continues in Epilogue, which seems to promise a return of Baba, and The High Road, which revives the old Kate figure in O'Brien's generic, less successful Mediterranean setting. In short, the graph of her fictional split personalities is by no means a straight line. What remains is that O'Brien is a writer from Ireland, whose first thirty years there profoundly influenced her view of the world. The effects are most clearly seen in her depiction of women's relationships.

Moving beyond a world so intensely female, O'Brien's later novels deal more broadly with contemporary Irish life. A second trilogy explores three themes that O'Brien considered vital to Ireland and to herself: political consciousness, sexuality, and the importance of the land itself. In the impressive House of Splendid Isolation (1994), she employs a viewpoint alternating between an Irish Republican Army fugitive and a doughty widow, confronting "the essential problem of Irish history . . . English colonialism." Down by the River (1996) follows a notorious 1992 case in which a young incest victim petitions for an abortion, while Wild Decembers (1999) traces the destructive effects of an ancestral feud over the possession of land. Yet, even though In the Forest (2002) is modeled on an actual murder case in Ireland, The Light of Evening (2006) moves back into familiar territory, probing the uneasy relationship between a daughter and her dying mother who, like O'Brien's own, once traveled to America to work as a domestic.

At her best, O'Brien's ability to re-create settings, particularly in Ireland, and her Joycean zest for language and humor reveal through her characters' poor choices her own support for those who dream of love achieved through kindness and decency and her greater empathy with the human condition.

THE COUNTRY GIRLS TRILOGY AND EPILOGUE

First published: 1986; includes The Country Girls, 1960; The Lonely Girl, 1962 (reprinted as Girl with Green Eyes, 1964); Girls in Their Married Bliss, 1964

Type of work: Novel

Two young girls make their escape from the repressions of western Ireland by going to Dublin and eventually find love and marriage in London.

With The Country Girls Trilogy and Epilogue, Edna O'Brien served notice that there was a new voice on the literary scene. From the detailed, evocative first page, with its shock to the senses of the cold linoleum on bare feet (her bedroom slippers are, on her mother's orders, to be saved for visits to uncles and aunts), the preteen Caithleen Brady arises to the smell of frying bacon. She is anxious; her father has not come home after his night out. Shy and sensitive, she tells her first-person story, and she shares the action with her friend and alter ego, the volatile and sometimes malicious Bridget Brennan (Baba). O'Brien quickly establishes what will be recurrent themes in her fiction: the dysfunctional family, with the drunken, brutal father and the martyred, overprotective mother, the search of her protagonist for a personal identity with which she can be happy, against the splendidly realized world of Ireland in the 1940's and 1950's.

It is a world divided into warring camps, male and female, church and laity, and country and town, where Caithleen's aspirations toward romantic love are doomed to failure. Her mother having drowned, Caithleen spends her mid-teen years boarding in a strict convent school, with its lingering smell of boiled cabbage, from which she and Baba contrive eventually to be expelled for writing a "dirty" note. In their late teens, joyously, they come to Dublin, Baba to take a business course, Caithleen to work as a grocer's assistant until she can take the civil service examinations. Loneliness, however, follows them: Baba contracts tuberculosis; Caithleen's man-friend, Mr. Gentleman (Jacques de Maurier), disappoints her. He is the first in a long line of rotters whom O'Brien's heroines encounter, such as the ugly father, Eugene Gaillard, Herod, and Dr. Flagger. In O'Brien's fictions, such unsavory types far outnumber the few good men with decent inclinations, such as Hickey the servant-man, and, in Casualties of Peace, the black man, Auro.

The Lonely Girl continues the girls' saga; Baba is healthy again. It is, however, largely Caithleen's story, and she is the narrator. The repressive effects of Caithleen's family, her village community, and her convent education are again graphically shown. Caithleen becomes romantically involved with Eugene Gaillard, whose face reminds her of a saint and who is about the same height as her father; he is a cultivated snob and is often cold in bed and in the salon. He begins the further education of his still naïve, prudish "student." At the novel's conclusion, Caithleen, wild and feeling debased "because of some dammed man," is learning and changing. She is, as she says, finding her feet, "and when I'm able to talk I imagine that I won't be alone." Still seeking their connection, she and Baba sail for England and London. They effect their escape (physically, at least) from the constraints of their home environment. This development occurs despite the blandishments of Caithleen's suitor from western Ireland, who declares to her, by way of enticement, "I've a pump in the yard, a bull and a brother a priest. What more could a woman want?" O'Brien's humor and ear for the best of conversational exchanges is a saving grace in an otherwise grim situation.

Girls in Their Married Bliss continues the story of the two women in London, where, for the first time, Baba assumes the first-person narration. She alternates with an omniscient voice, distancing both O'Brien and the reader from the role of Kate. (This is a technique that O'Brien will carry even further in A Pagan Place, where her heroine is removed and distanced to the second-person pronoun, "you.") The women, now about twenty-five years old, have not left all of their Irishness behind with their arrival in England. There is a splendid,

Celtic rush to Baba's style. Kate, too, has her share of one-liners, word associations, epigrams, and zany metaphors. "Self interest," she observes, "was a common crime."

In these early novels, as she shows her heroines learning and developing, O'Brien is polishing and improving her writing skills. In Girls in Their Married Bliss, the topic is still the search for a loving connection, though the plot involves a precisely observed and psychologically sharp account of the disintegration of Kate's marriage to Gaillard. People, in the context of women's roles in society, are shown to rub exquisitely on one another's nerves; in the smaller context of bedroom politics, it is noted, "Men are pure fools." Marriage, at least for the reasons that women enter it in this story, is evidently not a solution to the quest for happiness. Baba makes a calculated move for comfort; Kate sees that her interest in people is generated solely by her own needs. They have both matured to the point where they no longer believe much in romantic plans. In the 1967 Penguin revision, this pessimistic tone is deepened when Kate has herself sterilized. She will not make the same mistake again; she will not have another child who will, in its turn, become a parent.

The 1986 reissue of the complete Country Girls Trilogy contains a brief Epilogue in the form of a monologue delivered by Baba, in which O'Brien takes care of what might have been regarded previously as a split personality. The ebullient Baba brings readers up to date on past events. The despairing Kate is dead; she drowned, and readers are led to think that she might have committed suicide.

The resolution of the split-heroine narrators in O'Brien's fictions however, is not final. In the weak The High Road, readers are thrown back once again into the narration of a "Kate" figure, a London-Irish woman who has gone abroad to try to forget a failed love affair in the company of the jet-setters on the Mediterranean, an environment and group with which O'Brien is, as a whole, less successful than she is with the Ireland and Irish, who particularity and universality she feels and captures much more deftly and convincingly.

NIGHT

First published: 1972

Type of work: Novel

In a solo harangue from her bed in England, Irish Mary Hooligan delivers a spirited, courageous account of her life and loves.

Night is O'Brien's most Joycean of novels, very clearly reminiscent of Molly Bloom's concluding monologue in Ulysses (1922) in its mature female narrator, who is defiantly, and more optimistically than in James Joyce's novel, taking stock of her life and loves. It is indeed an exuberant tour de force in the zany realization of its narrator and in its stream-of-consciousness form.

Over the course of one winter night, which gives the novel its title, Mary Hooligan, approaching middle age, divorced, with a grown son, reviews her life and loves. In the character of Mary, O'Brien succeeds, for the moment, in fusing the spontaneous, activist Baba and the doomed dreamer Kate. For most of the work, however, it is the former voice that predominates. Mary is aggressively courageous in her determination to endure and to enjoy without whining whatever life sends her way. Her joy is manifest in her exuberant use of the English language: "I've had better times of course—the halcyon days, rings, ringlets, ashes of roses . . . chantilly, high teas, drop scones, serge suits, binding attachments, all that."

She weaves time back and forth from the present as she remembers significant people and places in her life. The novel has no plot development in any traditional sense. Foremost in importance to Mary are her mother, Lil, whose specialty is the spittled-on mother's knot; her alcoholic father, Boss; her son, Tutsie, whom she realizes she loves too much; her former husband, the cold, authoritarian Dr. Flaggler, "one of the original princes of darkness"; and her childhood home in the Roman Catholic barony of Coose, in the west of Ireland, rendered in all of its sensory detail of "occidental damp and murk." The arrival of dawn and a telegram announcing the imminent return of the owners of the house brings Mary's reverie to an end. "Moriarity, here I come," she says, projecting a reunion with her stonemason friend, with whom she feels she has a connection rivaling that of any family knot.

All of O'Brien's perennial themes are evident, bound up in Mary Hooligan. At her best, which is often, Mary is a joy. Iconoclastic and frank, her sense of humor rarely fails to elicit sympathy for her blundering search for an enduring and loving relationship with a decent man. Reflecting on Nick Finney, the crooner back in the west of Ireland with whom she first had sexual intercourse, she says, "It was St. Peter and St. Paul's day, and hence a holy day of obligation." Her words and syntax rush along. At her worst—and that side of her personality is but hinted in her exchanges with her pessimistic friend Madge—she, or any woman, or any person, can become depressed and depressing. "Everyone has a grubby fantasy when you get past the bullshit," Madge says; such a person more often than not is a loser, is willing to settle for the possible. For Mary, "the puny possible has always belonged to others." Hers is the philosophy of excess. In her eclectic religion, free from the constraint of the Irish Catholic guilt of so many of O'Brien's heroines, Mary is relatively at peace with herself, her self-image relatively intact.

O'Brien did not easily achieve this positive realization of personality, nor would it last. Yet for the moment and this enduring work, readers can rejoice that her verdict goes to Mary, and her progenitor Baba, of The Country Girls Trilogy. Employing her astonishing, imaginative, dramatic recall of places—particularly Irish places—O'Brien affirms people, their words, and the central importance of genuine self-knowledge and honesty. Such qualities foster hope, which Mary Hooligan only once, very briefly, considers abandoning. She quickly retracts a death wish: "Do I mean it? Apparently not. I am still snooping around, on the lookout for pals . . . cronies of any kind, provided they . . . leave me . . . my winding dirging effluvia." Connection and involvement with others, in Mary's view and in O'Brien's, must be maintained, so that she, and her readers, may carry on.

A FANATIC HEART

First published: 1984

Type of work: Short stories

Drawn largely from her four previously published collections, these stories reveal O'Brien's perennial themes of love and loss, most often narrated by Irishwomen.

The title of A Fanatic Heart is drawn from William Butler Yeats's "Remorse for Intemperate Speech," cited as an epigraph to introduce the volume. Indeed, in these lines are summarized O'Brien's ongoing, dominant themes of Ireland and the women of Ireland in their "maimed" search for loving relationships.

O'Brien continued to write short stories all of her life, and she began publishing in this genre in the early 1960's. "Come into the Drawing Room, Doris" (ironically retitled "Irish Revel" in The Love Object and given the same title in A Fanatic Heart) first appeared in The New Yorker on April 25, 1962. Set in Ireland, this story, very clearly after the manner of James Joyce in "The Dead" in his Dubliners (1914), is an indictment of an entire society. Sprinkled with holy water by her overly protective mother, Mary, the heroine, who is observed by the omniscient narrator, sets off from her farm home on her bicycle to the shabby Commercial Hotel in the village and to her first party.

It turns out to be a miserable work-party for her; the married artist with whom Mary had danced two years before, and about whom she had fantasized, is not there. Only eight locals are present for the roast goose and the liquor. Eithne and Doris are there—brash village girls who complement Mary's innate, refined naïveté; they amuse themselves "wandering from one mirror to the next." "Doris" is the name that the drunken, truculent O'Toole three times calls Mary, having spiked her orange drink, wanting her to come out of the room with him. Doris is an unlikely identity for the discreet Mary, but her image, O'Brien indicates, is in trouble anyhow: Her mother had already converted into a dustpan the sketch of her drawn by the artist whom she had romanticized. The party is a failure.

As the final paragraph indicates, "Mary could see her own little house, like a little white box at the end of the world, waiting to receive her." In this story, the family battle lines are not developed. The omniscient narrator leaves it at that, in a well-crafted tale, rich in the evocative minutiae of daily living and balky bicycles in the west of Ireland in the 1940's. It is a picture rich in its natural descriptions of, for example, the blood-red fuchsia, and rich, too, in its cast of characters, who all have their stories. Some of these characters, such as Hickey, readers have already met (The Country Girls Trilogy), and some will appear later. The themes suggested here—overprotective mothers, the unfortunate search for a companion, and an ignorant, brutal society set among natural beauties—will also recur, as O'Brien increasingly and carefully works and reworks her fictions.

O'Brien's pessimism about much of the female condition shows little alleviation in her short-story collection, A Rose in the Heart, or in the collection Returning, where the external topography in all nine stories is the familiar west of Ireland and the craggy community there. A young girl is present in all of the stories, either as the ostensible narrator or as the subject for more mature reflection on the part of a now-experienced woman. The American novelist Philip Roth isolates this then-and-now tension between the innocence of childhood and the experience of fifty years of living as the spring for these stories' "wounded vigor."

LANTERN SLIDES

First published: 1990

Type of work: Short stories

Winner of the Los Angeles Times Book Prize for fiction, Lantern Slides offers twelve bittersweet glimpses of Irish daily life.

The pages of Lantern Slides are bracketed by two stories that neatly illuminate the book's title. The "lantern" is an old-fashioned magic lantern, an early kind of slide projector that throws images upon a screen, just as these stories are images of the lives that O'Brien displays. The first, "Oft in the Stilly Night," takes its title from a song by Thomas Moore, the nineteenth century Irish poet whose lyrics mourn a romanticized past. The story is virtually plotless, a series of vignettes featuring the inhabitants of an Irish village: the music teacher who keeps hens in her house, a defrocked young priest who lives with his mother, a woman who believes she has been attacked by a lily. These sad eccentrics flicker on and off the screen.

Paying homage to James Joyce with unmistakable allusions to "The Dead" and Ulysses, the title story is the true jewel of this collection as it observes a cross section of Dublin society at an elaborate surprise party for Betty, who has been deserted by her husband. Mr. Conroy, a rather pompous fellow (like Gabriel Conroy of "The Dead"), fleetingly remembers a dead lover as he escorts Miss Lawless, who daydreams of her first seducer. Other guests include the crude Mr. Gogarty (recalling Oliver St. John Gogarty, once Joyce's roommate and the model for Buck Mulligan in Ulysses), an argumentative young woman, and the requisite drunkards. These partygoers are updated, seemingly more successful and cosmopolitan than Joyce's, yet they too are emotionally stunted—gossiping, dissatisfied people waiting for something to happen to change their lives. Like Joyce's characters, they are passive, already "dead," but the wicked humor is entirely O'Brien's.

Between these two lie other stories, centered largely on dysfunctional families or unsatisfactory love affairs. One of the best is "A Demon," the tale of a disaster waiting to happen. Young Meg, the narrator, travels with her parents to fetch her ill sister from her boarding school because the nuns there are worried. They are accompanied by the doctor's wife, whom Meg's mother has attempted to befriend without success. Even though the hired car is late, Meg's quarreling parents become jovial and the doctor's wife thaws, as the mother struggles to please her guest by secretly procuring gin for her. As Meg's sister Nancy, coughing and wrapped in a blanket, is taken home, Meg sees that Nancy's abdomen is swollen and "knew without knowing" that things can only get worse.

In "What a Sky," a daughter returns to Ireland to visit her elderly father and treat him to a little outing, but mutual anger and bitterness thwart their reconciliation. Vicious village gossip in "The Widow" ultimately destroys a good woman, revealing the cruelty of cramped little lives. A sort of resignation exists in these stories, often laced with a strong dose of irony, as if the worst will happen regardless of what anyone does to prevent it. As one character remarks, "You see, everyone is holding on. Just."

SUMMARY

Historically, Irish women writers have been marginalized, but as a rebellious woman and rebellious writer, Edna O'Brien was one of the early few who managed to succeed. At her best, she demonstrates over a long writing career in many genres the gift she has worked hard to perfect: the capacity to transport her readers into the felt situation of her women—whether they are sensitive, romantic losers, or pragmatic, realistic winners. However they may deal with life, her central characters seem uneasily aware of its deficiencies. With the frequent saving grace of her humor, as well as her flair for the vivid use of the English language for what people, at their best, might say, particularly if they are Irish, O'Brien opens for her readers a sympathetic perspective on the gloomy situation to which her heroines and their society both contribute. Critics have pointed out that her later work achieves "new areas of political and social consciousness," making clear "the human aspects of Irish history" and enlarging her perspective to encompass a broader, universal realm.

Archibald E. Irwin; updated by Joanne McCarthy

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

The Country Girls, 1960

The Lonely Girl, 1962 (also known as Girl with Green Eyes, 1964)

Edna O'Brien

Girls in Their Married Bliss, 1964
August Is a Wicked Month, 1965
Casualties of Peace, 1966
A Pagan Place, 1970
Zee and Co., 1971
Night, 1972
Johnny I Hardly Knew You, 1977 (pb. in the U.S. as I Hardly Knew You, 1978)
The Country Girls Trilogy and Epilogue, 1986 (includes The Country Girls, The Lonely Girl, and Girls in Their Married Bliss)
The High Road, 1988
Time and Tide, 1992
An Edna O'Brien Reader, 1994
House of Splendid Isolation, 1994
Down by the River, 1996
Wild Decembers, 1999
In the Forest, 2002
The Light of Evening, 2006

SHORT FICTION:

The Love Object, 1968
A Scandalous Woman, and Other Stories, 1974
Mrs. Reinhardt, 1978 (pb. in the U.S. as A Rose in the Heart, 1979)
Returning, 1982
A Fanatic Heart, 1984
Lantern Slides, 1990

POETRY:

On the Bone, 1989

DRAMA:

A Cheap Bunch of Nice Flowers, pr. 1962
A Pagan Place, pr. 1972 (adaptation of her novel)
The Gathering, pr. 1974
Virginia, pr. 1980
Flesh and Blood, pr. 1985
Iphigenia, pr. 2003, pb. 2003 (adaptation of Euripides' play)
Triptych, pr., pb. 2003

SCREENPLAYS:

Girl with Green Eyes, 1964 (adaptation of her novel)
Time Lost and Time Remembered, 1966 (with Desmond Davis; also known as I Was Happy Here)
Three into Two Won't Go, 1969
X, Y, and Zee, 1972 (also known as Zee and Company; adaptation of her novel)

TELEPLAYS:

The Wedding Dress, 1963
Nothing's Ever Over, 1968
Mrs. Reinhardt, 1981 (adaptation of her short story)
The Country Girls, 1983 (adaptation of her novel)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Critics often comment that Edna O'Brien's work seems more effective when set in Ireland, rather than in other locales with which she is also familiar, such as England or the Mediterranean. Do you agree? Why or why not?
- How does she appeal to the reader's physical senses?
- Find examples of different voices in which O'Brien writes, such as lyrical, ironic, humorous, and even bitter.
- What effects does she create by using a child as her protagonist or narrator?
- Discuss O'Brien's treatment of her male characters as opposed to her female ones. Is there any noticeable shift in her later work?
- Much has been said of O'Brien's typically dysfunctional families, but does she depict any relationships that might be described as functional? Give examples.

NONFICTION:

Mother Ireland, 1976
Arabian Days, 1977
James and Nora: A Portrait of Joyce's Marriage, 1981
Vanishing Ireland, 1986
James Joyce, 1999

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

The Dazzle, 1981
A Christmas Treat, 1982
The Expedition, 1982
The Rescue, 1983
Tales for the Telling: Irish Folk and Fairy Stories, 1986

EDITED TEXT:

Some Irish Loving, 1979

About the Author

Clarity, James F. "At Lunch with Edna O'Brien: Casting a Cold Eye." The New York Times, August 30, 1995, p. C1.
Eckley, Grace. Edna O'Brien. Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press, 1974.
Gonzales, Alexander G., ed. Modern Irish Writers: A Bio-Critical Sourcebook. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1997.
Guppy, Shusha. "Edna O'Brien: The Art of Fiction LXXXII." Paris Review 26 (Summer, 1984): 22-50.
L'Heureux, John. "The Terrorist and the Lady." The New York Times Book Review, June 26, 1994, p. 7.
Moloney, Caitriona, and Helen Thompson. Irish Women Writers Speak Out: Voices from the Field. Syracuse, N.Y.: Syracuse University Press, 2003.
Roth, Philip. "A Conversation with Edna O'Brien." The New York Times Book Review, November 18, 1984, pp. 38-40.

SEAN O'CASEY

Born: Dublin, Ireland
March 30, 1880

Died: Torquay, England
September 18, 1964

An internationally acclaimed dramatist, O'Casey was also a member of the pantheon of writers who established an Irish national literature in the early twentieth century.

BIOGRAPHY

Sean O'Casey was born John Casey in Dublin, Ireland, on March 30, 1880, to Michael and Susan Casey. He was the youngest of thirteen children, eight of whom died in infancy. Dublin at that time was among the most slum-infested cities in Europe, and the visual problems from which O'Casey suffered throughout his life began in this poverty-ridden environment. The family belonged to the least-known social class in the Ireland of the day, the Protestant proletariat. This fact led to the young O'Casey's sense of being an outsider. In addition, the early death of his father increased the family's difficulties, while making Susan Casey the dominant influence in the playwright's life. The interaction between economic difficulty and personal strength was to become a fundamental feature of the mature O'Casey's plays.

Despite the limitations of his background and personal circumstances, O'Casey was already a personage of some note in Dublin political circles before his first success as a playwright at the comparatively late age of forty-three. Although obliged to earn his living as a laborer, he involved himself in the various cultural and political activities of the time. The period in question, from 1891 to the establishment of an independent Irish state in 1921, is one that is distinguished not only by the triumph of Irish nationalism but also by the decisive and original influence of literature on the course of national life. This influence had its most important expression in the foundation of the Abbey Theatre Company, in effect Ireland's national theater, in 1904. An organization that appealed more than the Abbey to the young O'Casey was the Gaelic League. Founded in 1893, this organization was dedicated to the restoration of the Irish language. O'Casey's identification with this aim is preserved by his change of name, first to the Irish Sean O'Cathasaigh, and from that to a hybrid version. Settling finally on the hybrid name may be considered an expression of O'Casey's critical relationship with his times.

For somebody who was almost entirely self-educated, involvement with cultural organizations was instructive and influential. More important than this type of involvement, however, were O'Casey's political commitments. As a member of the working class, he became involved in Dublin labor politics. The rise of labor unions in Ireland was consistent with the general rehabilitation of national identity to which contemporary cultural organizations were dedicated. O'Casey became a prominent member of the most important union, the Irish Transport and General Workers Union. His commitment to the cause of labor found its most significant expression when he became secretary of the Irish Citizen Army, a militia formed to defend workers in the aftermath of the bitter strike and lockout of 1913. During the years immediately before the nationalist rebellion of Easter, 1916, O'Casey was a regular contributor to the organ of the labor movement, The Irish Worker.

Although he was no longer with the Citizen Army by the time of its participation in the Easter Rebellion, O'Casey wrote a brief history of the organization, The Story of the Irish Citizen Army, published in 1919. This work is his first publication of note, but by the time it appeared O'Casey was moving away from journalism and toward writing for the theater. After a number of rejections from the Abbey, his first play, The Shadow of a Gunman (pr. 1923, pb. 1925), was successfully produced there in 1923. There then followed the two other plays upon which O'Casey's reputation is largely based; these, along with The Shadow of a Gunman, constitute the most substantial act of witnessing and the most comprehensive artistic representation that the momentous political and social events in Ireland have received. These plays are Juno and the Paycock (pr. 1924, pb. 1925), produced in 1924, and The Plough and the Stars (pr., pb. 1926), produced in 1926, both Abbey productions.

The latter play irritated nationalist sensitivities in the audience to such an extent that riots plagued its weeklong first run. This reaction tainted O'Casey's reputation as a playwright, a development from which his subsequent career was never entirely free. Although the Abbey management supported O'Casey during The Plough and the Stars hostilities, it rejected his next play, The Silver Tassie (pb. 1928, pr. 1929), a work that was a challenging dramatic and thematic departure from his initial successes and one that is his most important play apart from them. This rejection, which O'Casey brought to the attention of the press, was instrumental in the playwright's decision to settle permanently in England, which he did in 1928. He continued to write plays, but though some of these—Red Roses for Me (pb. 1942, pr. 1943), Cock-a-Doodle Dandy (pr., pb. 1949), and The Drums of Father Ned (pr. 1959, pb. 1960)—are striking for their artistic ambition, O'Casey never regained the strength of his early work. His nearest approach to doing so is to be found in his six-volume autobiography, the first volume of which, I Knock at the Door, appeared in 1939. Having cut himself off from Dublin, the only source of raw material that was of passionate interest to him, O'Casey identified with a naïve and sentimental communism. This ideology did not provide him with an adequate substitute for what he had left behind.

In 1927, O'Casey married Eileen Carey, an actress who had appeared in English productions of his work. They had three children. O'Casey spent his later years in Torquay, England, where he died on September 18, 1964.

ANALYSIS

O'Casey's first three great plays set the tone for the rest of his work. In them, he portrays characters from society's lower levels entangled in conflicts that they cannot control, understand, or accept. Such fundamental conflicts form the basis of his plays.

Two important features make the conflicts in O'Casey's plays urgent and persuasive. One is his selection of character types. O'Casey's characters are generally poorly educated, powerless, and vulnerable. Typically, they are the people whom society considers ignoble and lacking in value. Basing his imaginative concerns on such characters was, at the time O'Casey did it, both artistically daring and culturally provocative. Doing so is an aspect of his contribution both to world drama and to the literature of his own country, whose originality can easily be overlooked. Moreover, while O'Casey was not the first playwright to put such characters on the stage, and not the first Irish playwright to do so, his insightful and vivid delineation of their lives and times gives them a stature that they otherwise have difficulty in attaining.

The second factor that makes the basic, age-old conflicts in O'Casey's work seem more immediate is its clear appeal to twentieth century audiences. The playwright's first three plays were each greeted with varying though undeniable expressions of keen interest. As O'Casey's subsequent career in the theater reveals, however, their appeal is by no means confined to their own time, or even to Irish audiences. The continuing international success of Juno and the Paycock and The Plough and the Stars, in particular, not only confirms the wide appeal of their plots also reminds their audiences of their own historical experiences. The basic drama of these two works concerns what happens when history comes knocking at the door. Modern audiences are especially well qualified to identify with that concern.

The conflicts that O'Casey dramatizes are those between the individual and history, between private need and public duty, and between principles and compromises. These conflicts are always enacted in a specific social context. As his absence from Ireland grew longer, O'Casey was unable to provide the action of his works with much particularity. Yet even his late plays always carry a socially relevant message. O'Casey's consistent social awareness derives partly from his political orientation. It also reveals a debt to his most important theatrical mentor, George Bernard Shaw.

O'Casey's plays do not resolve the conflicts that they present. Rather than being resolved, problems are seen as forces that are impossible to tame. In these works, death often takes the place of peace. In general, the world of O'Casey's plays is not a particularly rational place. Events are brought about by complicated offstage actions. Typically, the plays open at a moment of difficulty. As the play develops, this moment becomes a state of crisis. The plays end when the full severity of this state has been experienced. The endings of O'Casey's plays usually represent conditions as being worse than they were when the action commenced.

Open and unresolved endings are a dramatically effective means of involving the audience in the fate of the characters. Solving the characters' problems would perhaps give the audience an experience of detachment and coziness. O'Casey's intention is to eliminate the artificial, formal barrier between observed and observer. By so doing, he reduces the gap between the audience's privileged social and cultural position and the downtrodden, neglected, and helpless condition of his characters. O'Casey's theater is democratic in spirit. One of the most powerful impacts that his plays make is through the spectacle of that spirit being frustrated or denied.

The social vision of O'Casey's plays is for the most part grim. The conclusion that Captain Boyle reaches at the end of Juno and the Paycock is that "the whole world is in a state o' chassis." The futility of his own career fully supports this point of view. The chaos, or "chassis," to which he refers pervades both the world of the play and the supposedly real, historical world outside the play.

As in many of O'Casey's works, violence and the threat of violence are never far away, and in his most important works, the action revolves around a violent incident and its inescapable repercussions. In O'Casey's view of the world, nobody gets away with anything, or gets away for long. While the depiction of shocking acts of violence is as old as the theater itself, O'Casey's presentation of them is modern in a number of important ways. He reveals violence as an instrument of official policy. Its application is unexpected, irrational, and unreasonable. It is also reckless in its disregard for civilians. By asking his audience to accept the reality of what he represents, O'Casey is also challenging public awareness to examine the implications or consequences of that reality. The note of shock, struck by the violence of O'Casey's work, is followed immediately by a note of interrogation and criticism, aimed, in effect, to stimulate the audience to reject much of what it has been shown.

Yet for every Captain Boyle, O'Casey also presents a Juno. He reveals a dual perspective, each element of which is equally significant. Strength of individual character offsets the world's difficulties and violence. This basic arrangement of forces may be seen in all the playwright's work. The arrangement draws attention not only to the comprehensive nature of O'Casey's vision. It also alerts the audience to the fact that, like many Irish playwrights of his generation, O'Casey's theater is one of character.

All of his plays are well populated, which, in the case of Juno and the Paycock, The Plough and the Stars, and The Shadow of a Gunman, incidentally helps to give a vivid sense of the crowded conditions and absence of privacy typical of tenement life. Despite the fact that virtually all O'Casey's characters come from the same social class, each of them is vividly distinguished from the others, an indication that social status in itself is not enough to stifle vitality. Even when the characters are not particularly admirable, their foibles and failings are treated unsentimentally and with the overall intention of depicting the variety of human nature. O'Casey does his characters the honor of taking them seriously, even when they appear to be caricatures. By doing so, he integrates his characters more plausibly with the serious concerns of his plots. As a result, the playwright also underlines his refusal to dismiss as unworthy of attention characters such as the ones whom he presents.

O'Casey paints his characters in broad strokes. In certain respects, they seem one-dimensional, distinguished by one obvious trait, such as laziness, cowardice, or deviousness. There again, however, he uses a dual approach. He escapes the risk of creating one-dimensional characters by the vivid language that he gives them. O'Casey's characters are dramatically intriguing and appealing as much for what they say as for what they do. O'Casey drew on the speech of the ordinary people among whom he lived. Yet his sense of language is not a matter merely of vocabulary. The violent events that destroy the lives of O'Casey's characters are often the product of something that has been said and cannot be unsaid. The essential artistic ingredient of O'Casey's theater, its language, is the means by which his characters are ensnared in the drama of their existences, and in the elemental conflicts that those dramas represent.

THE SHADOW OF A GUNMAN

First produced: 1923 (first published, 1925)

Type of work: Play

Illusion and reality clash violently and tragically in the Irish War of Independence.

Although it was not the first play that O'Casey wrote, The Shadow of a Gunman was the first play of his produced. It was premiered at the Abbey Theatre, Dublin, on April 12, 1923, and was an immediate success. The reason for its success is its setting, the Irish War of Independence. This war was fought, largely in guerrilla style, between volunteers of the Irish Republican Army and British forces. The nature of the war is very well reflected in the play's use of abrupt and vicious turns of fortune. These are reflected in the play's three central characters.

Donal Davoren, the poet, Seumas Shields, the opportunist, and Minnie Powell, the heroine, represent not only the twists of fate brought about by the action of the play. They may also be considered as an introduction to O'Casey's people. Most of the men in The Shadow of a Gunman are all talk. This quality is evident in O'Casey's decision to make Davoren a naïve, youthful, romantic versifier. Davoren's self-pity and self-involvement make him blind to the realities around him. Poetry, which is often thought of as a diagnosis of life's challenges, is Davoren's means of escape from those challenges. It is not surprising that his poetry is weak and inadequate.

Yet in this portrait of the artistic temperament, O'Casey is not only presenting a character for whom the image and self-deception define his relationship to the world. He is speaking to an audience of contemporaries who knew that many of the leaders of the Easter, 1916, rebellion were poets and dreamers. The violent circumstances of the play draw on the historical reality that was a direct result of that rebellion. In that sense, also, the gunman's shadow lies behind the activity of some of Irish nationalism's purest idealists.

Shields, on the other hand, is a down-to-earth exploiter of the main chance. He is Davoren's opposite, and the somewhat implausible fact of their sharing a room brings their differences into sharp focus. While Davoren does not fully appreciate the danger that his illusions can cause, Shields is fully alive to the perils that pass for normal life in a community at war. Seen in the larger context of the events that inspired the play, Shields may be seen as the unprincipled hanger-on, willing to do anything to survive. Shields never says that he knows there might be something amiss about the bag that Maguire leaves in his care. Although Shields is apparently Davoren's opposite, the result of both men's behavior is the same. Like Davoren, Shields talks about everything except what needs at all costs to be addressed. The magnitude of these costs is revealed when Minnie Powell pays with her life. She is the victim of Davoren's speech and Shields's silence. She is the one character in the play who attempts to take life as she finds it. As the play indicates, the challenge is to find something for which life is worth living, to emerge from the gunman's shadow. O'Casey's awareness of the severity of this challenge is one of the main reasons he subtitled The Shadow of a Gunman a tragedy.

In some respects, The Shadow of a Gunman reveals O'Casey as still something of an apprentice playwright. The plot is thin, and the minor characters sometimes seem to be too great a distraction from the main action. At the same time, however, these characters are necessary to enrich a sense of the play's theme. O'Casey compensates for such deficiencies by the richness of his characterizations and by his use of language. He not only equips his characters with colorful vocabularies but also bases much of the play's costly conflict on what people say and what they do not say and on the moral consequences of the appropriate use of language. O'Casey's relentless exposure of self-deception, hypocrisy, and cowardice, however, enables the play to transcend its immediate context to become a potent reflection on the distorting and destructive effect of historical events on ordinary people.

JUNO AND THE PAYCOCK

First produced: 1924 (first published, 1925)

Type of work: Play

The tragedy of the Boyle family unfolds against the background of the Irish Civil War.

The Abbey Theatre production of Juno and the Paycock had its premiere less than a year after the successful staging of The Shadow of a Gunman, on March 3, 1924. The production consolidated O'Casey's reputation as the leading dramatist to emerge in the immediate aftermath of Irish independence. Juno and the Paycock, however, is far superior to the earlier work in terms of its scope, its ambition, and its tragic impact. Yet the play's opening sequence may strike the reader as a continuation of The Shadow of a Gunman.

The time is two years later, and the historical context is the Irish Civil War, which followed the attainment of Irish independence in 1921. Johnny Boyle initially opposed Irish independence on the terms agreed to with England. He was unable to maintain this position, however, and this led to his betrayal of Robbie Tancred, his former comrade. The fact that Tancred was also a close neighbor brings home graphically the murderous intimacy of the Civil War. Yet it also sets the stage for the bitter domestic strife that consumes the Boyle family. Public and private experience are reflected in each other, as they are in The Shadow of a Gunman, though in a much more elaborate and assured manner.

Not only is Johnny's situation a public version of his family's inner conflicts; it is also reflected in what happens to his sister, Mary. At the beginning of the play, she also is presented as a person of principle. Yet she is unable to uphold her beliefs. The consequences of this failure are not as severe as they are in Johnny's case. At the same time, it is her affair with Bentham that brings about the final rift in the family, a rift that the end of the play does not suggest can be healed. When, at the end, Captain Boyle drunkenly intones that the blinds are down, he is referring to the custom in Ireland of lowering the window shades when there is a death in a household. The death in question is that of the Boyle family.

In The Shadow of a Gunman, O'Casey's emphasis is on the destructive force of political circumstances. In contrast, Juno and the Paycock concentrates on the economic facts of life. Johnny's contribution to the family's crisis is by no means insignificant, but it does not occupy the center of the work. Instead, the force that destroys the Boyles is money—or rather, money is the means by which the Boyles's vanity and vulnerability are exposed and exploited. The exchanges early in the play between the Captain, Joxer Daly, and Juno are often played as comedy, yet what is being presented is a picture of a grim and hopeless state of economic affairs. Moreover, though Juno regards this economic reality in a light that is directly in contrast with the view of Joxer and the Captain, she also suffers economic oppression. That makes her, as a working woman, socially, as well as biologically, related to Mary. Thus, it is fitting that they should be the ones to continue working on their lives at the end of the play.

Such a perspective is necessary in order to understand why the family falls for Bentham. Everything about this character is fraudulent, from his appearance to his so-called education. That a spirited character such as Mary should fall for such a specimen suggests how desperate she is to improve her lot. She does not believe that this improvement can be made by the man from her own class and background, Jerry Devine. It is also because of its persistent experience of poverty that the family spends the money in a hasty and irresponsible way. The tragedy of Juno and the Paycock is based largely on the social and cultural poverty that prevents the Boyles from knowing how to handle the revolution in their private lives.

The only character unaffected by the actions of the play is Joxer. Like Seumas Shields in The Shadow of a Gunman, Joxer is interested merely in his own survival. Such an outlook cannot be maintained by the Boyles. To that extent, they show how human they are. To the extent that they are human, however, they are vulnerable to vanity, gullibility, idealism, and a desire for improvement. The bleakness that results from their vulnerability is what the Captain acknowledges as “chassis,” a world without order or coherence, a world in which hope for tomorrow turns out to be a cruel joke.

THE PLOUGH AND THE STARS

First produced: 1926 (first published, 1926)

Type of work: Play

The human consequences of historical events are depicted in the context of the Irish rebellion of Easter, 1916.

Set in the turbulence of the rebellion of Easter, 1916, The Plough and the Stars is a landmark in O'Casey's career for a number of reasons. First, it is the powerful conclusion of his Troubles Trilogy (the struggle for Irish independence is familiarly known as “the troubles”). It is also a more complex and far-reaching play, both formally and intellectually, than its predecessors. Unlike O'Casey's earlier plays, The Plough and the Stars draws on O'Casey's own personal experience as a member and subsequent critic of the Irish Citizen Army. The Plough and the Stars also gave the playwright his first taste of theatrical controversy in the hostile reaction of the audience to the first production, which was staged at the Abbey Theatre on February 8, 1926.

The play's title refers to the flag of the Irish Citizen Army. In this way, O'Casey identifies his principal characters in terms of their class and their organization. As a result, the social and economic vulnerability that has typically affected the characters of O'Casey's earlier works is less evident here. Nora Clitheroe not only aspires to respectability, which is what Mary Boyle expected Charles Bentham to provide in Juno and the Paycock; she can also afford some of respectability's trappings. This line of thought makes Uncle Peter, who is Nora's uncle, not entirely a figure of fun. Through him, O'Casey introduces the audience to working-class ritual and grandeur, though, in contrast to Jack Clitheroe's uniform, what Uncle Peter's regalia represents is laughably out of date.

These details establish a basis for introducing more important distinctions within the play's community of characters. O'Casey's view of the proletariat is striking in its range. Thus, Bessie Burgess is militantly opposed to the cause of Irish freedom. While Nora can entertain romantic dreams of nest-building, Mollser is dying of consumption virtually alongside her. For all of his ideological speech making about the working man, The Covey lacks the courage of drunken Fluther. The Irish nationalist known as The Figure in the Window has to share his scene with Rosie Redmond, a prostitute. It was this last contrast that caused audiences to riot in protest during the play's first production.

The strong sense of contrast that is provided simply by noting the range of characters in the play leads, in turn, to an appreciation of the play's central conflict. It takes place between the two characters who are least equipped to handle it, Nora and Jack Clitheroe. When the challenge to their marriage comes, each responds in the way that the other is least able to accept. With this human conflict as a focus, The Plough and the Stars both retains the immediacy of its historical context and rises above that context to appeal to audiences regardless of their background. The significance of the rift between Jack and Nora is emphasized, as in other O'Casey plays, by suffering. Nora and Jack are the play's only couple. Their being together offers a model of possibility, romance, and, above all, love, which is the opposite of war. The promise that they represent, however, is not realized. On the contrary, those with the most to live for lose the most as the play proceeds.

O'Casey dramatizes this emphasis on loss through the fate of Bessie Burgess. The character who seems least likely to behave in a neighborly way turns out to be the play's clearest example of Christian charity in action. Like Jack and Nora, she also suffers disproportionately for her attempt to make good what has been destroyed. Bessie's fate leaves only the remnants of the community at the mercy of the occupying forces. The contrast between the optimism and vitality of the play's opening and the scene of death and destruction with which it closes could hardly be more graphic. This contrast is brought out with devastating irony in the soldier's closing chorus, particularly as the stage directions indicate that, offstage, the city is burning. In The Plough and the Stars, O'Casey meshes the private chaos that befell Captain Boyle and the destructive forces that struck down Minnie Powell to produce his most powerful play.

MIRROR IN MY HOUSE

First published: 1956

Type of work: Autobiography

This six-volume experiment in autobiography is as noteworthy for its style as for its content.

O'Casey's experiment in autobiography, Mirror in My House, consists of six separately published volumes. The project began in 1939 with the appearance of I Knock at the Door and continued through Pictures in the Hallway (1942), Drums Under the Windows (1945), Inishfallen, Fare Thee Well (1949), and Rose and Crown (1952), before concluding with Sunset and Evening Star (1954). As though to confirm the significance of the author's Irish experiences, volumes 1 through 4 cover the first forty-six years of his life, from his birth to his departure from Ireland. His life in England up to 1953, roughly, is the subject of the two concluding volumes.

Some readers may be critical of Mirror in My House because it unequally divides attention between the two basic phases of O'Casey's life. It might be thought more appropriate to reverse the work's emphasis by concentrating less on the formative Dublin years and more on the period when O'Casey achieved international renown as a playwright and political notoriety because of his communist associations. Yet while critical opinion on the value and significance of Mirror in My House was divided as the individual volumes appeared, it is generally agreed that the overall project constitutes one of the more important literary autobiographies of the twentieth century.

One of the main difficulties of Mirror in My House is its experimental character. O'Casey's original approach to autobiography has two surprising aspects. The first and most important of these is that O'Casey refers to himself in the third person throughout. The effect is challenging and significant. It is one of the means by which O'Casey, who was generally skeptical of artistic innovation, associated himself with the works of some of his most illustrious literary contemporaries, such as William Butler Yeats and James Joyce. The works of those two writers reveal the fluctuations and variety of human personality. O'Casey acknowledges their relevance by the self-consciousness of his autobiographical presence. Over the course of six volumes, however, the justification for this approach is not sufficient to outweigh its tiresomeness.

The second important feature of Mirror in My House is its language. O'Casey adapts the verbal style of his characters to his narrative style. The effect is to give an extremely vivid picture of O'Casey's life and times. The accounts of hardship, suffering, and neighborliness in the work's opening volumes are particularly noteworthy. They also reveal the sources of the sympathy and revulsion that animate his plays. In addition, the exaggerations and poetic effects of the language in Mirror in My House are an interesting reproduction of how life seems in memory, rather than how life actually was. As is appropriate for a work of autobiography, the overall effect of O'Casey's verbal vitality is to create the history of a personal consciousness rather than a reliable chronicle of the author's life and times. He draws a sharp and culturally important distinction between biography and autobiography. Judged on its own terms, however, Mirror in My House remains one of the twentieth century's most elaborate, sustained, and artistically ambitious works of literary autobiography.

Yet despite the depiction of the life of a sickly child in Dublin's Victorian slums and other powerful scenes of poverty and pain, there remains a sense of striving too hard for effect. To some extent, this makes the work resemble those written by O'Casey in exile. Their thematic material is too heightened and lacking in a sense of authentic detail to be persuasive. It is not true to say that Mirror in My House lacks substance. Particularly in the later volumes, however, it lacks the texture and the sense of intimacy between author and material that is to be found in the Troubles Trilogy. Those three plays are the works upon which O'Casey's lasting reputation is deservedly based.

SUMMARY

Sean O'Casey's long and prolific career is noteworthy for a number of reasons. In the first place, like all important writers, he drew the public's attention to ways of life and modes of perception that had previously not been considered subjects for art. In addition, his dynamic and colorful language subtly establishes and exposes the limits of his characters' worlds. The way people suffer when they have reached those limits is the overall theme of O'Casey's dramatic works. His greatest plays are suffused with an awareness of life's practical considerations, often presented from an economic point of view.

Yet these plays also remain sympathetically alive to his characters' human need to dream. The range of sentiment, action, and reflection evident in his plays, but especially in his first three major productions, is most vividly expressed in his use of language. This verbal skill disguises O'Casey's somewhat mechanical sense of plot and underlines his overwhelming responsiveness to the vagaries of human nature.

George O'Brien

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

DRAMA:

Cathleen Listens In, pr. 1923, pb. 1962 (one act)

The Shadow of a Gunman, pr. 1923, pb. 1925

Juno and the Paycock, pr. 1924, pb. 1925

Nannie's Night Out, pr. 1924, pb. 1962 (one act)

Two Plays, pb. 1925 (includes The Shadow of a Gunman and Juno and the Paycock)

The Plough and the Stars, pr., pb. 1926

The Silver Tassie, pb. 1928, pr. 1929

Within the Gates, pb. 1933, pr. 1934

The End of the Beginning, pb. 1934, pr. 1937 (one act)

A Pound on Demand, pb. 1934, pr. 1947 (one act)

Five Irish Plays, pb. 1935

Purple Dust, pb. 1940, pr. 1944

The Star Turns Red, pr., pb. 1940

Red Roses for Me, pb. 1942, pr. 1943

Oak Leaves and Lavender: Or, A World on Wallpaper, pb. 1946, pr. 1947

Cock-a-Doodle Dandy, pr., pb. 1949

Collected Plays, pb. 1949-1951 (4 volumes; includes Cock-a-Doodle Dandy, Bedtime Story, Hall of Healing, and Time to Go)

Bedtime Story, pb. 1951, pr. 1952

Hall of Healing, pr. 1951, pr. 1952 (one act)

Time to Go, pb. 1951, pr. 1952 (one act)

The Bishop's Bonfire, pr., pb. 1955

Selected Plays of Sean O'Casey, pb. 1956

Five One-Act Plays, pb. 1958, 1990

The Drums of Father Ned, pr. 1959, pb. 1960

Behind the Green Curtains, pb. 1961, pr. 1962

Figure in the Night, pb. 1961, pr. 1962 (one act)

The Moon Shines on Kilenamoe, pb. 1961, pr. 1962 (one act)

Three More Plays, pb. 1965

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Discuss the following: Few writers have had a more difficult early life and have made more of it in their writing than Sean O'Casey.
- Are O'Casey's ill-educated characters ever eloquent?
- Are O'Casey's female characters heroic or merely long-suffering?
- Assess O'Casey's relationship with the Abbey Theater.
- Examine the way comedy and tragedy intermingle in O'Casey's plays.
- Near the end of his autobiography O'Casey writes, "Though man may be foolish, men are not fools." What does he mean? Is the shift from singular to plural significant?

Sean O'Casey

The Harvest Festival: A Play in Three Acts, pb. 1979

The Complete Plays of Sean O'Casey, pb. 1984 (5 volumes)

Niall: A Lament, pb. 1991

POETRY:

Songs of the Wren, 1918

More Wren Songs, 1918

NONFICTION:

The Sacrifice of Thomas Ashe, 1918

The Story of Thomas Ashe, 1918

The Story of the Irish Citizen Army, 1919

The Flying Wasp, 1937

I Knock at the Door, 1939 (autobiography)

Pictures in the Hallway, 1942 (autobiography)

Drums Under the Windows, 1945 (autobiography)

Inishfallen, Fare Thee Well, 1949 (autobiography)

Rose and Crown, 1952 (autobiography)

Sunset and Evening Star, 1954 (autobiography)

The Green Crow, 1956

Mirror in My House, 1956 (2 volumes; reissue of 6 volumes of autobiography above)

Under a Colored Cap, 1963

Blasts and Benedictions, 1967

The Letters of Sean O'Casey, 1975, 1978 (3 volumes; David Krause, editor)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Windfalls, 1934 (essays, plays, poems, stories)

Feathers from the Green Crow: Sean O'Casey, 1905-1925, 1962 (essays, plays, poems, stories)

The Sean O'Casey Reader: Plays, Autobiographies, Opinions, 1968 (Brooks Atkinson, editor)

About the Author

Kenneally, Michael. Portraying the Self: Sean O'Casey and the Art of Autobiography. Totowa, N.J.: Barnes & Noble Books, 1987.

Kilroy, Thomas, comp. Sean O'Casey: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1975.

Kosok, Heinz. O'Casey the Dramatist. Translated by Heinz Kosok and Joseph T. Swann. Totowa, N.J.: Barnes & Noble Books, 1985.

Krause, David. Sean O'Casey: The Man and His Work. London: Macmillan, 1960.

Lowery, Robert G., ed. Essays on Sean O'Casey's Autobiographies. Totowa, N.J.: Barnes & Noble Books, 1981.

McDonald, Ronan. Tragedy and Irish Literature: Synge, O'Casey, Beckett. New York: Palgrave, 2002.

Murray, Christopher. Sean O'Casey: "The Shadow of a Gunman," "Juno and the Paycock," "The Plough and the Stars." London: Faber, 2000.

_____. Sean O'Casey: Writer at Work, a Biography. Dublin: Gill & Macmillan, 2004.

O'Casey, Eileen. Sean. London: Macmillan, 1971.

O'Connor, Garry. Sean O'Casey. New York: Atheneum, 1988.

O'Riordan, John. A Guide to O'Casey's Plays. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1984.

Stewart, Victoria. About O'Casey: The Playwright and the Work. London: Faber & Faber, 2003.

© The Nobel Foundation

KENZABURŌ ŌE

Born: Ōse, Shikoku, Japan
January 31, 1935

Basing his writing on significant events in his own life, Ōe explores feelings of betrayal, dislocation, and alienation on both a political and personal level.

BIOGRAPHY

Kenzaburō Ōe (oh-ay) was born in 1935 in the village of Ōse on the island of Shikoku, Japan, the smallest and most isolated of the four main islands. The third son of seven children, he was six when Japan entered fully into World War II. On August 6, 1945, when Ōe was ten years old, the United States Army dropped an atomic bomb on Hiroshima. On August 15, Emperor Hirohito for the first time spoke on the radio in a “human voice,” announcing the unconditional surrender of Japan. This event was a defining moment in Ōe’s life. Up until then, he had been taught, like all Japanese schoolchildren, to fear the emperor as a god and to promise to die for him if he were asked. Every day his turn came to be called to the front of the classroom and be asked: “What would you do if the emperor commanded you to die?” Trembling, Ōe would reply, “I would die, Sir. I would cut open my belly and die.” So the truth of the emperor’s divinity, as Ōe had been taught it, was declared a lie. He felt betrayed, and his anger became his motivation as a writer as he witnessed the suffering of many Japanese people who were affected by the war.

In 1954, Ōe entered Tokyo University, where he majored in French literature. While there, he published his first story in the student newspaper and received the May Festival Prize for it. Ōe’s first commercially published story, “Shisha no ogori” (1957; “Lavish the Dead,” 1965), missed the coveted Akutagawa Prize by one vote, but he did win that prize the following year for his acclaimed story “Shiiku” (1958; “The Catch,” 1966). Ōe was a brilliant student of language and philosophy, but he kept to himself. Withdrawn by nature and ashamed of his provincial accent and his stutter, he remained a loner. He lived in a rooming house near the campus, where at night he set about pursuing his writing career in earnest.

Ōe’s first novel, Memushiri kouchi (1958; Nip the Buds, Shoot the Kids, 1995), reflects his provincial background and was favorably compared with William Golding’s Lord of the Flies (1954). His next novel, Warera no jidai (1959; our age), brought the wrath of the critics down on Ōe’s head. Critics deplored the bitter pessimism and honesty of the book, which was published at a time that was being heralded as a bright, new beginning for Japan’s reemergence from the devastation of World War II.

In February, 1960, Ōe married, and later that year he traveled to Beijing, China, as a representative of young Japanese writers. In 1961, he traveled to the Soviet Union and Western Europe. His fascination with European culture has been lifelong. In June, 1963, his first son, Hikari, was born with serious brain damage. Devastated, Ōe put everything else aside and wrote Kojinteki na taiken (1964; A Personal Matter, 1968), for which he won the Shinchosha Literary Prize. The baby boy, whom he called “Pooh,” drastically altered his world. He describes his anguished relationship with the child in Warera no kyōki o ikinobiru michi o oshieyo (1969, 1975; Teach Us to Outgrow Our Madness: Four Short Novels, 1977).

While Hikari was growing up, a strong, intensely private bond developed between father and son. In a strange and painful way, Ōe and this fragile, deformed child became each other's best friend, embracing each other as if each carried the key to the other's destiny. Shortly after Hikari was born, Ōe ordered two gravestones to be placed side by side in the cemetery in his native village, for he was convinced that when Hikari died, he too would die.

In the summer of 1965, Ōe traveled to the United States for the first time to participate in the Kissinger International Seminar at Harvard University and to deliver a speech about the survivors of Hiroshima. He also visited Hannibal, Missouri, home of Mark Twain, whose Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884) was a major influence on Ōe's work. In 1967, Ōe published Man'en gan'nen no futtoboru (The Silent Cry, 1974) for which he won the Tanizaki Prize. In 1967, he also traveled to Australia, in 1968 to the United States, and in 1970 to Southeast Asia.

In 1973, Ōe published a two-volume novel, Kōzui wa waga tamashii ni oyobi (the waters have come in unto my soul), which won the Noma Literary Prize. In 1976, he taught at the Colegio de Mexico as a visiting professor. That same year he published Pinchi ran'nā chōsho (The Pinch Runner Memorandum, 1994). Ōe published a collection of short stories in 1980 and two others in 1982.

In 1989, the Belgium-based Europelia Arts Festival hosted Japan and named Ōe the recipient of the Europelia Award. Ōe was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1994. In the announcement of his prize, Ōe was described as an author "who with poetic force creates an imagined world, where life and myth condense to form a disconcerting picture of the human predicament today."

ANALYSIS

American readers can best approach Ōe's works through his fascination with Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. Ōe first read the book when he was fifteen, and he was keenly affected by Huck's pilgrimage down the Mississippi River. It was Huck's moral courage that captured Ōe's imagination. With the fearless determination to turn his back on the constraints of a rule-bound and racist society, Huckleberry Finn became the model for Ōe's own heroes, who bravely assume responsibility for carving out their own destinies. As he read more American fiction, Ōe found kindred spirits in such other Americans writers as James Baldwin, J. D. Salinger, Philip Roth, Saul Bellow, Jack Kerouac, Henry Miller, and Norman Mailer, all of whom were rebellious in their own ways. These writers' young heroes possessed the independence and resolution that Ōe's heroes realize they must acquire if they are to survive in a world caught between the collapse of the old order and the creation of the new.

Ōe's early heroes find themselves banished from the security of childhood and thrust into a world that bears no relation to their past. The values that regulated life when they were growing up vanish in the aftermath of the atomic bomb. The postwar world they now face is a gaping hole, a blank, a terrifying nothingness. They know the penalty of surrendering to despair but are all too aware of the difficulty of solving the riddle of survival. They feel they need to cling to their anger and to employ their hostility as a weapon against bewilderment and apathy. Terrorism is a temptation. Ōe's protagonists fantasize about throwing hand grenades into the emperor's limousine or joining the Foreign Legion, but they cannot bring themselves to act on their fantasies. Instead, they dabble in perversions that temporarily relieve the ache but never really fill the void that causes it.

Ōe's writing style has been the subject of much controversy in Japan. On one hand, it is refreshingly experimental, honestly brutal, and challenging; on the other hand, it can be merely undisciplined, trivial, and annoying. Ōe tries hard to avoid the tendency toward vagueness, which is said to be inherent in the Japanese language. He deliberately ignores its natural rhythms and pushes the meanings of words beyond commonly acceptable limits. To many it seems clear that he is in the process of evolving a language and vocabulary all his own, a language that can express the vitality of his imagination. There are critics in Japan who are offended by his breaking with literary tradition. They say that Ōe's prose "reeks of butter," meaning that he has corrupted the purity of Japanese with borrowings from European languages. To them, he offends traditional notions of what constitutes the spirit of Japanese language. This is hardly surprising, however, considering that it has always been Ōe's intention to attack traditional values. Like Huck Finn, his heroes are searching for their identity in a perilous wilderness. It is only fitting, then, that their language is graphic and untamed.

In addition to objecting to his style, critics have expressed disenchantment with Ōe's subject matter. While his early works were received enthusiastically, critics expressed disappointment with what followed. His stories between 1958 and 1964 are generally about the life of a college student in Tokyo, unable to fit in, aimless, politically ambiguous, morally unrestrained, and with very little hope. Critics and readers alike objected to the sordid world he portrayed, as well as to his use of explicit language. It was clear that he was far ahead of his times.

Depressed by this response but unrepentant, Ōe chose not to tone down his language but to continue to write graphically about troubled young men who wander aimlessly in dangerous territory, rootless and dispossessed, no longer innocent boys but not quite adults. The student unrest of the 1960's had a tremendous influence on Ōe's narratives. Suspicion of the adult world became a major theme in his works.

When A Personal Matter appeared in 1968, American reviewers responded enthusiastically to this English translation of Kojinteki na taiken. It marked the debut, in English, of a major Japanese writer whose treatment of postwar youth was rendered with uncompromising realism. In 1977, when Teach Us to Outgrow Our Madness was published in the United States, Ōe was described as a brilliantly obsessive writer.

Although Ōe is not a joiner, he has deep political convictions. That he feels strongly about his role as a writer in society is apparent both in his essays and his speeches. In his speeches, he has discussed many of the sociopolitical issues, such as nuclear disarmament and Japan's need to take a leading role on the world stage, that many people would rather politely avoid. Critics have objected to the lack of romantic love in his fiction and to the relegating of female characters to secondary roles. Defenders argue that all Ōe's characters are more symbolic than real, and that the men stand for characteristics common to all people. While it is true that he may view the world from a masculine perspective, he does not excuse the often insensitive treatment of female characters by male ones. He uses such behavior to illustrate human failings in the larger sense.

Ultimately, Ōe's works read like diaries of the modern soul, rudderless and adrift, stumbling about in a darkening world.

A PERSONAL MATTER

First published: Kojinteki na taiken, 1964
(English translation, 1968)

Type of work: Novel

The father of a deformed child is at first devastated but ultimately redeemed as he becomes devoted to his brain-damaged son.

A Personal Matter was the first of a series of novels whose main character is the young father of a brain-damaged child. Called Bird because of his birdlike appearance, the young father is a frustrated intellectual and unhappy husband who dreams of flying off to Africa. When Bird's wife gives birth to a baby with a hideously misshapen head, Bird sees the baby as a threat to his dream. Convinced that the baby will not live long, Bird arranges with one of the doctors to dilute the baby's milk, but miraculously the baby thrives on this potentially lethal diet. Overwhelmed by the infant's instinctive power to survive, Bird resolves to devote his life to his son regardless of the cost.

The baby is not only the cause of the father's personal anguish but also the symbol of the anguish of humanity faced with calamity. The connection between personal and universal tragedy is made at the moment when Bird, as he is about to murder the baby, hears a news broadcast announcing the Soviet resumption of nuclear testing. In a flash Bird sees the world's destiny mirrored in his own. Whether it is one life or a million lives, the act of murder is equally evil.

The moment he perceives the connection between the baby's fate and the fate of humanity, Bird decides he must take care of the baby. He knows the odds are against him, that he will be creating misery for himself while sustaining a life that means absolutely nothing to the world. Accepting these odds, he says to himself: "It's for my own good. It's so I can stop being a man who's always running away. . . . All I want is to stop being a man who continually runs away from responsibility." Bird does not ask what is wrong with himself or what he had done to deserve this tragedy. Instead he assumes that his fate has a purpose and that he will come to understand that purpose. With his commitment to the baby, the father embarks on a new life. His happiness will come from nurturing the life, not causing the death, of his son. Near the end of A Personal Matter, Bird gradually begins to identify with his son. At this point, he seems to be emerging from something like a trance, during which he has gained the strength to face a world intolerant of any deviation from the norm. His devotion to the baby has already begun to liberate Bird from the self-indulgence he was prey to when he saw a deformed child as merely an obstacle to his own happiness.

Bird is the first of Ōe's heroes to reject the central fantasy of life—"pleasure with responsibility"—because he knows that morally he has no choice. In the end he learns to substitute forbearance for hope.

"THE CATCH"

First published: "Shiiku," 1958 (collected in The Catch, and Other War Stories, 1981)

Type of work: Short story

A black American prisoner of war becomes a hero to the children of a remote Japanese village, only to die a tragic death.

"The Catch," a story in the collection The Catch, and Other War Stories (1981), begins with the capture of a black American soldier whose plane has been shot down in a remote part of Japan near the end of World War II. The narrator, the older of two brothers, is given the job of keeping the black soldier (the catch) alive. Gradually the black soldier becomes an accepted part of village life as the narrator, his brother, and their best friend, Harelip, learn to communicate with him without the means of spoken language. When word arrives that the prisoner must be handed over to the army, the narrator tries to warn the black soldier who, in desperation, holds the boy hostage. In the end the black soldier is killed by the boy's angry father, who also seriously wounds his son.

"The Catch" is Ōe's way of expressing the shock he felt when, at the end of the war, he heard the emperor's surrender speech on the radio and knew the emperor was not a god but an ordinary man. It is a story of the passing of the innocent world of the village in the valley and of how the war finally intrudes into the lives of two devoted brothers. In the center of this world is the catch, a powerful, black giant of a man who is worshiped by the village children. The story reaches its richest and most moving point when the narrator describes how the black soldier joins the children for a swim in the village pond. It is a celebration of summer and high spirits. Totally unrestrained, and yet totally unspoiled, the swimmers abandon themselves to the ancient ritual of cleansing and rebirth.

To the young narrator, the black soldier becomes a symbol of an uncorrupted world in which people and animals live happily together. The black soldier is even described as "a rare and wonderful domestic animal, an animal of genius." The young narrator instinctively understands the natural rhythms of pastoral life. For a moment there is peace and harmony and joy and passion of the purest intensity. The narrator thinks that it will never end. It does end, and it is the memory of this mystical moment that makes the end all the more devastating.

"The Catch" also explores the bond between the two brothers and the way it helps the older brother survive his ordeal as a hostage. Later, it is his younger brother who is the only person who can comfort him during his convalescence. The younger brother's innocence and caring resolve help heal the narrator, who cannot remain in despair in their presence. When the narrator comes to realize, however, how dependent he has become on his brother, he knows he must put his childhood behind him and enter the adult world.

AGHWEE THE SKY MONSTER

First published: Sora no kaibutsu aguwē, 1964 (English translation, 1977)

Type of work: Novella

A young father kills his newborn son, who returns as a phantom baby the size of a kangaroo, wearing a white cotton nightgown.

The main character of Aghwee the Sky Monster is a young composer and father who kills his newborn baby by giving him only sugar water. When the autopsy reveals that the baby had only a benign tumor, the father goes into seclusion and gradually becomes obsessed with the idea that his baby flies down from the sky and visits him. This phantom baby, described as being the size of a kangaroo and dressed in a white cotton nightgown, descends from the sky at odd times and always out of doors.

The narrator of Aghwee the Sky Monster, a young man the same age as the composer, is hired as a companion by the composer's father, a banker who is concerned that his son is demented and will do something embarrassing or dangerous. The composer, known only as D, is the only one who can see the phantom. It soon becomes clear that the baby is D's conscience and that it appears from the sky to torment the father with a reminder of his crime. This illusion also suggests that the father wants desperately to communicate with the child who, during its brief life, uttered only one word: "Aghwee!" In the end, the father wants to go beyond communication and actually join the baby. To the narrator, who is starting to believe in the apparition, it seems as if the baby is able to fulfill the father's wishes. As the two men are out walking one day, the baby suddenly appears, and the father runs out into a busy intersection to pursue what to him is a beckoning figure. This is the first time the father has actually followed the baby. The father is struck by a car and killed. At this point the narrator begins to wonder if the baby is an angel of mercy or of vengeance.

The focus in this story, as in many of Ōe's stories, is on the narrator, who begins as a skeptic and ends as a would-be believer. At the point when D runs into traffic in pursuit of Aghwee, the narrator is just about to make the leap of faith. He pulls back, however, fearing he has been misled, and at that moment he is hit in the head by a rock and suffers a serious eye injury. As D is being carried away in the ambulance, the narrator tries to get a straight answer from him, but all he gets is an ambiguous smile. Even so, he is haunted by what D has said about sacrificing his own livelihood for the sake of the child whose life he cut short. It is another example of Ōe's concern about accepting responsibility, especially for those to whom one has given life.

ROUSE UP, O YOUNG MEN OF THE NEW AGE!

First published: Atarashii hito yo mezameyo, 1983 (English translation, 2002)

Type of work: Novel

Inspired by the poetry of William Blake, the famous novelist K attempts to redefine himself and to pass his wisdom on to his mentally retarded son Eeyore.

In Rouse Up, O Young Men of the New Age!, the novelist-narrator reflects on many difficult challenges facing him in life. The narrator's career path bears many similarities with that of Ōe, who published other autobiographical novels about distressed fathers of disabled children. This novel recounts the harrowing circumstances of Eeyore's birth (also described in A Personal Matter), when the baby was born with two brains, one protruding outside his skull that was surgically removed. The protagonist's single-letter name alludes to Kokoro (1914), a novel by Natsume Sōseki, in which the character K impedes the path of the protagonist toward ideal love. In the same way, K's son Eeyore provides a constant stream of funny, disheartening, and shocking statements that cause the narrator to stumble. As K attempts to understand Eeyore's peculiar behavior, he is propelled toward new definitions of life, death, love, and human compassion.

On one of his frequent trips out of Japan, K happens to buy an edition of the Complete Works of William Blake, the eighteenth century British poet, visionary, composer, and engraver. K recalls that many years ago he had attempted his own translation of a Blake poem in the midst of a writing project. As the father of a severely handicapped son, K feels his imagination being drawn toward the world of Blake as a means of explaining suffering and life's ironies. Blake's poems become a powerful subtext and running commentary on K's life as an author and parent. Unable to sleep in his Frankfurt hotel room, K reads his volume of Blake poems, seeking comfort from the mind-numbing stress and chaos of being the parent of a mentally challenged son. Eeyore is almost twenty years old and has reached a physically intimidating size. He is a mental infant inhabiting the body of a powerful man. K fears the increasing unpredictability of his son, whose hulking presence preempts the needs of his other two children.

Looking back over his career as a writer, K recalls a promise that he would transcribe all the dominant themes of life in a manner so simple that even his retarded son could understand. Blake felt compelled to redefine the major themes of Christianity and European history. As a dutiful parent, K is obligated to leave instructions and wisdom behind him after his death. K soon realizes that this goal is impossible. Instead, K chronicles the changing directions of his imagination under the powerful influence of Blake. Each chapter of Rouse Up, O Young Men of the New Age! takes the title of a Blake poem such as "Let the Inchaind Soul Rise and Look Out" (chapter 6).

K closely monitors Eeyore's schooling, his attempts to work at jobs, and various disastrous accidents, such as the time a student kidnaps Eeyore and abandons him at a train station in protest of K's liberal politics. Ultimately, Eeyore finds his true calling when he begins to write and perform classical music. The book's culmination takes place when Eeyore rejects his nickname and refuses to join the family at dinner until they call him by his real name, Hikari, which means "light."

SUMMARY

By giving events in his own life universal significance, Kenzaburō Ōe broadened the scope of the autobiographical novel. In so doing, he defied Japanese literary tradition, which insisted that personal narratives be straightforward and factual. The main reason this approach works for Ōe is that his heroes are self-aware and never self-pitying. They can even be unreliable narrators at times, a device Ōe admires in Western writers. Ōe has two themes: the loss of innocence and the acceptance of responsibility. Ōe's heroes are very modern; they begin by deceiving themselves and trying to make bargains with fate. Eventually they discover that avoiding truth is a kind of madness. Learning how to outgrow this madness becomes, ultimately, their purpose in life and their salvation.

Thomas Whissen; updated by Jonathan L. Thorndike

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Memushiri kouchi, 1958 (Nip the Buds, Shoot the Kids, 1995)

Warera no jidai, 1959

Yoru yo yuruyaka ni ayume, 1959

Seinenno omei, 1960

Okurete kita seinen, 1962

Sakebigoe, 1963

Nichyoseikatsu no boken, 1964

Sora no kaibutsu agurue, 1964 (novella; Aghwee the Sky Monster, 1977)

Kojinteki na taiken, 1964 (A Personal Matter, 1968)

Man'en gan'nen no futtoboru, 1967 (The Silent Cry, 1974)

Nichijo seikatsu no boken, 1971

Kōzui wa waga tamashii ni oyobi, 1973

Pinchi ran'nāchōsho, 1976 (The Pinch Runner Memorandum, 1994)

Dōjidai gemu, 1979

Atarashii hito yo mezameyo, 1983 (Rouse Up, O Young Men of the New Age, 2002)

Natsukashii toshi e no tegami, 1987

Jinsei no shinseki, 1989 (An Echo of Heaven, 1996)
Chiryōtō, 1990
Shizuka na seikatsu, 1990 (A Quiet Life, 1996)
Chiryōtō wakusei, 1991
Moeagaru midori no ki, 1993-1995 (includes “Sukuinu-shi” ga nagurareru made, 1993; Yureugoku “vashire-shon,” 1994; Ōinaru hi ni, 1995)
Chūgaeri, 1999 (2 volumes; Somersault, 2003)
Torikaeko, 2000 (also known as Chenjiringu)
Ureigao no doji, 2002
Nihyakunen no kodomo, 2003

SHORT FICTION:

“Kimyo na shigoto,” 1957
 “Shisha no ogori,” 1957 (“Lavish the Dead,” 1965)
Miru mae ni tobe, 1958
 “Shiiku,” 1958 (“The Catch,” 1966; also as “Prize Stock,” 1977)
Kodoku na seinen no kyuka, 1960
 “Seiji shonen shisu,” 1961
 “Sebuntin,” 1961 (“Seventeen,” 1996)
Seiteki ningen, 1963
Warera no kyōki o ikinobiru michi o oshieyo, 1969, 1975
 (Teach Us to Outgrow Our Madness: Four Short Novels, 1977)
Gendai denikshu, 1980
 “Ame no ki” o kiku on’natachi, 1982
 “Rein tsurī” o kiku onnatachi, 1982
Ika ni ki o korosu ka, 1984
Kaba ni kamareru, 1985
Boku ga hontō ni wakakatta koro, 1992

NONFICTION:

Sekai no wakamonotachi, 1962
Genshuku na tsunawatari, 1965
Hiroshima nōto, 1965 (Hiroshima Notes, 1982)
Jisokusuru kokorozashi, 1968
Kakujidai no sōzōryoku, 1970
Kowaremoto to shite no ningen, 1970
Okinawa nōto, 1970
Dōjidai to shite no sengo, 1973
Bungaku nōto, 1974
Jōkyō e, 1974
Kotoba ni yotte, 1976
Shosetsu no hoho, 1978
Ōe Kenzaburō dojidaironshu, 1981
Sengo bungakusha, 1981
Kaku no taika to “ningen” no koe, 1982
Atarashii bungaku no tame ni, 1988
Bungaku sainyūmon, 1992

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Given that Mark Twain’s Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (1884) is Kenzaburō Ōe’s favorite American book, how do the themes of exploration and moral courage appear in his novels?
- In his Nobel Prize acceptance speech, Ōe quoted the Danish philologist Kristoffer Nyrop: “Those who do not protest against war are accomplices of war.” How do Ōe’s views about Hiroshima, nuclear disarmament, and the peace movement show up in his novels?
- Describe the circumstances of the birth of Ōe’s son, Hikari, and how his relationship with his son figures into two different works. Would Ōe have achieved fame without Hikari’s unusual development and career?
- How does Ōe’s interest in people at the peripheries, marginal groups, and nonnative ethnic people influence the style of his fiction?
- What topics in Ōe’s novels have been most controversial in Japan, and why?
- In what ways do Ōe’s novels celebrate Japanese culture, and how do they undermine or challenge it?

Aimai na Nihon no watakushi, 1995 (Japan, the Ambiguous, and Myself: The Nobel Prize Speech, and Other Lectures, 1995)
Kaifuku suru kazoku, 1995 (A Healing Family, 1996)
On Politics and Literature: Two Lectures, 1999
“Jibun no ki” no shita de, 2001
Bōryoku ni sakaratte kaku: Ōe Kenzaburō ōfuku shokan, 2003

EDITED TEXT:

Nan to moshirenai mirai ni, 1985 (The Crazy Iris, and Other Stories of the Atomic Aftermath, 1985)

About the Author

Ishiguro, Kazuo. “The Novelist in Today’s World: A Conversation.” Boundary 2: An International Journal of Literature and Culture 18 (Fall, 1991): 109-122.
_____. “Wave Patterns: A Dialogue.” Grand Street 10, no. 2 (1991): 75-91.
Lindlsey, Cameron. “Kenzaburō Ōe and His Son Hikari: A Story of Creative Rebellion.” World Literature Today 76, no. 1 (January, 2002): 31-37.
Lippit, Noriko Mizuta. Reality and Fiction in Modern Japanese Literature. Armonk, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe, 1980.
Snyder, Stephen, and Philip Gabriel, eds. Ōe and Beyond: Fiction in Contemporary Japan. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press, 1999.
Wilson, Michiko N. The Marginal World of Ōe Kenzaburō: A Study in Themes and Techniques. Armonk, N.Y.: M. E. Sharpe, 1986.
Yoshida, Sanroku. “Kenzaburō Ōe: A New World of Imagination.” Comparative Literature Studies 22 (Spring, 1985): 80-96.

Archive Photos

BEN OKRI

Born: Minna, Nigeria
March 15, 1959

Okri's poetry and fiction examine the political and social crises of contemporary Nigeria, while celebrating the resilience and spiritual strength of its people. His creative use of realism, modernist narrative techniques, African storytelling, postmodernist experiment, and allegory makes Okri one of the most original writers of his generation.

BIOGRAPHY

Ben Okri (OHK-rih) was born on March 15, 1959, in Minna, central Nigeria, to Grace and Silver Oghekeneshineke Loloje Okri. His father held a management-level position at the Nigerian Railway but wished to pursue a law degree in England. As a result, the Okri family moved to London, where Ben began his education at the John Donne Primary School in Southwark. He returned to Nigeria with his mother shortly before the outbreak of the Nigerian civil war of 1967-1970. Okri's education continued at the Children's Home School in Ibadan, the Mayflower School in Ikenne, and the Urhobo College (secondary school) in Warri, from which he graduated at the age of fourteen.

Okri's early years had a profound impact on his writing. His exposure to both European and African cultures gave the future novelist the breadth and richness of perspective that marks his mature work. The experience of the Nigerian civil war, also known as the Biafran war, introduced Okri to the painful reality of contemporary African politics that was to become one of his central literary preoccupations. During the 1967-1970 conflict, which followed a failed military coup and secession attempt, the Igbo ethnic group became the target of violent retaliation. As a half Igbo, Grace Okri was forced to go through a period of hiding, remembered by her son as a time of uncertainty marked by frequent changes of address and the necessity of flight. This childhood experience of destabilization sharpened Okri's awareness of the strong ethnic and political tensions within the newly independent, modern Nigerian state.

After completing his secondary schooling, Okri worked toward a correspondence degree in journalism while holding a job as a clerk in a paint store. During this period, he wrote poetry, fiction, and journalism, occasionally publishing short stories in newspapers and magazines. He also read voraciously, drawing both on his father's extensive library of Western literary classics and on the work of his great contemporaries, including Chinua Achebe and Wole Soyinka. Okri's father, having received his London law degree, opened a legal practice serving the disenfranchised populations of Lagos. His clients lived in some of the poorest areas of the city and became the inspiration for Ben Okri's disquieting depictions of urban poverty and deprivation.

In 1978, Okri was granted a government scholarship to attend Essex University, where he studied philosophy and literature. Because of Nigeria's economic difficulties, however, the scholarship was cancelled, and Okri went through a period of homelessness and destitution. In the 1980's, he began working for the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) World Service as a broadcaster for the program Network Africa and served as poetry editor of West Africa Magazine. His short fiction appeared in a number of journals, including the Paris Review, New Statesman, and PEN New Fiction. His first novel, Flowers and Shadows, was published in 1980, followed shortly by The Landscapes Within (1981). In the next several years, Okri published two highly successful short-story collections: Incidents at the Shrine (1986), which won the Commonwealth Writers Prize for Africa in 1987, as well as the Paris Review Aga Khan Prize for Fiction, and Stars of the New Curfew (1988), which was short-listed for the Guardian Fiction Prize. In 1987, Okri became a fellow of the Royal Society of Literature.

Okri's next novel, The Famished Road (1991), brought him worldwide literary recognition, receiving, among other honors, the Man Booker Prize for Fiction in 1991 and the 1993 Chianti Ruffino-Antico Fattore International Literary Prize. Following the success of The Famished Road, Okri continued to develop the narrative of its main characters in two more novels: Songs of Enchantment (1993) and Infinite Riches (1998). The 1990's were Okri's most prolific decade: Alongside the Famished Road trilogy, he published Astonishing the Gods (1995), Birds of Heaven (1996), and Dangerous Love (1996), which received the Italian Premio Palmi award. He also published work in genres other than fiction, including the 1992 poetry collection An African Elegy and the 1999 epic poem Mental Fight. A selection of Okri's essays, including meditations on art, literature, and politics, as well as tributes to his contemporaries Salman Rushdie, Chinua Achebe, and Ken Saro-Wiwa, came out in 1997 under the title A Way of Being Free.

Okri then published the novels In Arcadia (2002) and Starbook: A Magical Tale of Love and Regeneration (2007). His work from this period explores, in allegorical form, the questions of spirituality and self-knowledge that have been Okri's lifelong interest. Brought up in a Christian family, Okri witnessed his father's turn to animism in search of a spiritual language better capable of expressing the complex transformations of contemporary African culture. Okri's own search led him toward martial arts, meditation, and Taoism. He calls himself a "universal spiritualist" and has emphasized, in both interviews and writings, the central importance of spirituality to his political and artistic convictions.

In the course of his successful literary career, Okri has been a board member of the Royal National Theatre, a fellow commoner in creative arts at Trinity College, Cambridge, and vice president of English PEN. He was awarded honorary doctorates by the University of Westminster in 1997 and the University of Essex in 2002; he received the Crystal Award from the World Economic Forum in 1995 and the Order of the British Empire in 2001.

ANALYSIS

Ben Okri belongs to the second generation of modern African novelists. While the work of the preceding generation gravitates toward questions of identity in pre- and postindependent African states, Okri's writing has been criticized for its insufficient involvement in national politics. A close look at Okri's oeuvre, however, reveals a profound interest in political problems considered from a broader philosophical perspective. Okri focuses on the phenomenon of collective consciousness, examining the ways in which it is shaped, destroyed, and nurtured by the forces of history. His work denounces the materialism and shortsightedness of contemporary political elites, while pointing toward a possibility of renewal grounded in Africa's rich imaginative and spiritual heritage. Okri's fiction, poetry, and essays call for a transformation of African consciousness, a task he considers to be as important as the transformation of political structures.

The artistic trajectory of Okri's fiction leads from realism combined with modernist narrative methods, through bold experimentation with oral models of storytelling, to innovative use of allegory. His two earliest novels, Flowers and Shadows and The Landscapes Within, are firmly rooted in the realist and modernist traditions, offering an unflinching picture of contemporary urban Nigeria seen through the eyes of highly sensitive, introspective protagonists. The first work is a bildungsroman, or novel of education. It traces the journey of Jeffia Okwe, the son of a wealthy businessman, from a state of childhood ignorance to a painful adult knowledge of the corruption and violence that marked his father's career. In this debut novel, Okri evokes the atmosphere of late twentieth century Lagos, offering vivid descriptive details and introducing dialects to indicate his characters' social background.

Similarly set in a modern-day urban milieu, The Landscapes Within is a Künstlerroman, or the story of artistic maturation. Its artist-protagonist is Omovo, a young painter trying to reconcile his inner life (the "landscapes within") with the external social reality of corruption, censorship, and brutal violence that he observes around him. Through the creation of canvas “scumscapes,” Omovo expresses the shocking chaos of Nigerian metropolitan life. The novel’s twin epigraphs, taken from James Joyce’s Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man (1914-1915, serial; 1916, book) and Chinua Achebe’s Things Fall Apart (1958), point to Okri’s dual allegiance to the African and European narrative traditions.

In his two short-story collections, Incidents at the Shrine and Stars of the New Curfew, Okri continues to explore troubling modern landscapes through a combination of realist and modernist fictional techniques. Scenes of seedy dance halls and dilapidating city blocks alternate with images of wartime violence and everyday deprivation. While the continuities with his previous work are apparent, both collections move beyond the familiar territory mapped by Okri’s early novels. His short fiction has been compared to the narratives of Franz Kafka and Gabriel García Márquez, indicating a new interest in departures from a traditional realist agenda. Dreams and visions begin to play an increasingly important role in the characters’ lives, as seen in the first volume’s title story. “Incidents at the Shrine” recounts a newly fired library worker’s return to his native village, where he reconnects with the hidden power of ancestral spirits through a series of rituals and hallucinatory journeys. Okri’s new artistic direction is even more apparent in the second volume, where dreams, shamanistic visions, and folklore-inspired figures invade the fictional world with increasing frequency.

Okri’s interest in spirituality and traditional oral storytelling finds its full expression in his next novel, The Famished Road. Told from the point of view of Azaro, an abiku, or spirit-child, who travels between the worlds of the dead and the living, the story explodes conventional notions of novelistic structure, plot, and characterization. Rather than following a linear narrative pattern, the novel takes its readers on interlocking visionary journeys through the equally dangerous realms of spirits and preindependence politics. Okri returns to the same cast of characters in Songs of Enchantment, which follows two love quests undertaken by Azaro’s father. Both the political conflict between the Party of the Rich and the Party of the Poor introduced in The Famished Road and the spiritual conflicts taking place in the characters’ dreams and visions are intensified in this sequel. In contrast to its widely acclaimed predecessor, however, Songs of Enchantment has been criticized for excessive authorial intrusions and direct moralizing. Infinite Riches is the last volume of the trilogy, bringing Azaro’s story to the eve of national independence. Dominated by a violent apocalyptic mood, the novel provides a forceful finale to Okri’s epic narrative sequence.

One of the dominant themes of the abiku trilogy is transformation: Both the novels’ characters and the narratives themselves undergo a series of metamorphoses, acquiring unexpected forms and characteristics. Similarly, Okri’s fiction continues to evolve in new directions. Astonishing the Gods is a modern fable set in an invisible quasi-mythical land. Birds of Heaven transcends traditional genre distinctions, offering a “secular sermon” followed by a series of aphorisms. Dangerous Love is a creative reworking of Okri’s early novel, The Landscapes Within, reintroducing the protagonist Omovo and his search for artistic identity. In Arcadia draws on the tradition of allegory, taking a group of dissatisfied characters on a search for the real Arcadia. The subtitle of Okri’s 2007 novel, Starbook: A Magical Tale of Love and Regeneration, points to the author’s continued interest in fairy-tale and allegorical conventions, which he combines with social commentary to create a richly symbolic narrative structure.

Okri’s work famously defies attempts at literary classification. Critical categories applied to his writing include Magical Realism, spiritual realism, animistic realism, shamanistic realism, postmodernism, and postcolonialism, but the energy and boldness of Okri’s creative imagination render all labels unsatisfactory. Like so many of his characters, Okri’s oeuvre is a metamorphic creature: never fixed, always changing and renewing itself, deeply committed to the task of endless transformation.

THE FAMISHED ROAD

First published: 1991

Type of work: Novel

An abiku boy recounts his childhood experience of political violence, material deprivation, spiritual wealth, and familial love in a preindependence African city.

Azaro, the narrator-protagonist of Okri's Famished Road, is an abiku, or spirit-child, destined to undergo a recurring cycle of birth, early death, and rebirth. Azaro betrays his abiku destiny by choosing to remain among the living when he sees the sad face of his mother. He belongs both to the world of humans and the world of spirits, a double identity that gives him insight into the hidden nature of people and phenomena. Azaro's double vision is also the vision of the novel: Okri constructs a multi-dimensional universe in which appearances give way to surprising realities and all things have their spiritual, as well as material, aspects.

The multidimensionality of The Famished Road is apparent in the twin metaphors of its title. The road is one of the novel's central images, recurring on various levels of narrative structure. Sometimes it is a literal road, where characters travel or lose their way. Sometimes it becomes a mythical creature, the Road King, eternally hungry for victims. It represents the spiritual journeys of the protagonists and the meanderings of the story itself. At times it is a river, echoing the powerful fluidity of the narrative, as well as its characters. Okri's concept of hunger is similarly flexible. It is the literal hunger of families struggling to survive, but it also is the greed of the powerful, the deprivation of the powerless, and the spiritual yearning of a suffering people. Food is the central currency in the novel's social and symbolic economy: It is stolen, poisoned, rationed, and withheld, but also shared in moments of familial and communal feasting. Both hunger and the road function in the novel as versatile metamorphic symbols, carrying the text's structural and philosophical complexity.

Like his symbolism, Okri's characters are never static. Azaro travels back and forth between waking life and the realm of the spirits, which he traverses in visions and hallucinatory journeys. His father fights political enemies but also supernatural opponents who leave him drifting through strange liminal zones between death and life. Azaro's mother encounters beings from realms beyond the human during her long days at the market. Madam Koto, a powerful local businesswoman, is rumored to possess magical abilities and is pregnant with spirit-triplets. Drawing on traditional West African mythology, as well as his own nondenominational mysticism, Okri creates a fictional universe that is, at its core, a universe of the spirit. While his characters are subject to harsh political and socioeconomic realities, their battles for survival and dignity are also fought in the realm of dreams, visions, and the imagination.

The importance of dreams in Okri's fiction goes beyond the private mental life of his subjects. Azaro has the ability to enter and influence the dreams of other characters, as well as understand the unconscious desires of his people. All of the spirit-child's visionary adventures are played out in the context of the human community, reinforcing the ties that bind Azaro to his nuclear family and neighborhood compound. This emphasis on communal connections is a central feature of The Famished Road, reflecting Okri's interest in the collective forces that shape contemporary African society. As John Hawley argues, Okri's work is concerned with the question of collective consciousness, seeking to redefine not only the political but also the aesthetic and spiritual boundaries of colonial oppression.

The oppression experienced by Azaro's people has many sources: the legacy of colonialism, political corruption, the greed of landlords, lack of will, and the workings of malignant spiritual powers. The boy's story is set against the background of a vicious partisan struggle between the Party of the Poor and the Party of the Rich, whose campaigns mock the ideals of democracy with their hypocrisy, lies, and brutal coercion. While the two parties clash, the inhabitants of Azaro's compound continue to suffer daily deprivation. The Famished Road offers overwhelmingly powerful images of pain, both mental and physical, perhaps best captured in the figures of the starved, deformed beggars befriended by Azaro's father. Suffering is a constant presence throughout the narrative, constituting, as Okri confirms in an interview with Jane Wilkinson, one of its most important characters.

The Famished Road is a tale of violent juxtapositions: the rich and the poor, hunger and excess, brutality and tenderness, spirits and humans. Another contrast developed in Okri's novel is that between a traditional African way of life based on ancient beliefs and values and the encroachment of modernity with its ambiguous blessings. The old order manifests itself in the community's medicinal practices, ritual blessings, and religious observances. The new order enters with the appearance of electricity and motor vehicles, viewed with a mixture of amazement, envy, and deep suspicion. While some characters, notably Madame Koto, capitalize on these improvements, their main effect on the compound's inhabitants is a deepening of social contrasts and the reinforcement of preexisting power structures.

Okri's epic narrative offers an account of life in an African neighborhood on the eve of national independence, mapping its tensions and crises, as well as its moments of grace: the warmth of family meals, the love of Azaro's parents, the pleasures of storytelling. The novel's structure departs from Western literary conventions, turning to the oral narrative tradition for its nonlinear, recursive, and highly symbolic patterns. This combination of the mythical and the historical gives The Famished Road its richness and originality, qualities that inspired worldwide admiration and established the novel's status as a classic of modern Nigerian literature.

SUMMARY

Over the course of three decades, Ben Okri's work has evolved from realistic depictions of modern Nigerian life to innovative fictional explorations of contemporary spiritual identity. Expanding the boundaries of the novelistic form, Okri's narratives combine European and African storytelling traditions in surprising and original ways. Although his work is grounded in the political and social realities of his times, Okri's main focus is the journey of human consciousness as it negotiates its place in a complex and ever-changing universe.

Magdalena Maczynska

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- Flowers and Shadows*, 1980
- The Landscapes Within*, 1981
- The Famished Road*, 1991
- Songs of Enchantment*, 1993
- Astonishing the Gods*, 1995
- Birds of Heaven*, 1996
- Dangerous Love*, 1996
- Infinite Riches*, 1998
- Phoenix Rising*, 2001
- In Arcadia*, 2002
- Starbook: A Magical Tale of Love and Regeneration*, 2007

SHORT FICTION:

- Incidents at the Shrine*, 1986
- Stars of the New Curfew*, 1988

POETRY:

An African Elegy, 1992

Mental Fight, 1999

NONFICTION:

A Way of Being Free, 1997

About the Author

Fraser, Robert. Ben Okri: Toward the Invisible City. Tavistock, Devon, England: Northcote House, 2002.

Gates, Henry Louis, Jr. "Between the Living and the Unborn." The New York Times Book Review, June 28, 1992, p. 3.

Moh, Felicia Alu. Ben Okri: An Introduction to His Early Fiction. Enugu, Nigeria: Fourth Dimension, 2001.

Quayson, Ato. "Ben Okri." In African Writers, edited by C. B. Cox. Vol. 2. New York: Scribner's, 1997.

Ringrose, Christopher. "Assessing Ben Okri's Fiction, 1995-2005." In British Fiction Today, edited by Philip Tew and Rod Mengham. London: Continuum, 2006.

Warnes, Christopher. "Ben Okri." In World Writers in English, edited by Jay Parini. Vol. 2. New York: Scribner's, 2004.

Wilkinson, Jane. "Ben Okri." In Talking with African Writers, edited by Wilkinson. London: Heinemann, 1991.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How does the metaphor of the journey function in Ben Okri's writing?
- What is the importance of dreams in Okri's work?
- What are the literal and metaphorical functions of landscape in Okri's fiction?
- How does Okri portray encounters between African and Western cultures?
- What is the symbolic importance of the abiku child in Okri's trilogy?
- How does Okri's use of nonlinear narrative structure reinforce the themes of his work?
- What narrative genres and traditions does Okri employ and transform in his novels?

OMAR KHAYYÁM

Born: Naishapur, Persia (now in Iran)

May 18, 1048 (?)

Died: Naishapur, Persia (now in Iran)

December 4, 1123 (?)

Omar Khayyám wrote poetry celebrating the joys of life in spite of the limitations of human existence. His poetry was later collected and published under the title The Rubáiyát.

BIOGRAPHY

Little is known for certain about the life of Omar Khayyám (OH-mahr ki-YAHM). His family name means “tent maker” in Persian, so many assume he had some connection with that trade. He was born in the 1040’s in Naishapur, Persia (now in Iran), a thriving city at an oasis on the Silk Road, the caravan route that brought exotic products from China to the Middle East in those days. This was a chaotic period in the history of Persia. A few years before Omar Khayyám was born, his province of Khorassan was invaded from Turkey by the Seljuk conqueror Toghril Beg. The Seljuk Empire quickly expanded to include Mesopotamia, Syria, Palestine, and most of Iran. The contemplative life of a man of science and letters, desired by Omar Khayyám, was not easy to achieve or maintain in this turbulent environment.

Legend associates Omar Khayyám with Hassan ibn Sabbah, the infamous founder of the sect of assassins known as the Hashishin. Omar Khayyám is reported to have studied with Hassan at the feet of the Persian wise man of the time, Imam Mowaffak. Joining them was a third student by the name of Nizām-al-Mulk, who later became a powerful minister in the Seljuk Empire. Because of a schoolboy agreement, both Hassan and Omar Khayyám came to Nizām-al-Mulk later in life to collect on promises he had made to them. As the story goes, Omar Khayyám only wanted a modest pension and the indulgence of the empire to pursue his studies. Hassan ibn Sabbah claimed a prestigious administrative position, but his keen ambition created problems, and he was dismissed. In bitter recrimination, Hassan founded his notorious gang of drug-crazed assassins, killing Nizām-al-Mulk as one of his first victims.

The revenge of Hassan ibn Sabbah took many years, however, and Omar Khayyám was able to enjoy the patronage of the empire during that time. He wrote a number of books on mathematics and one on music before he turned twenty-five. In 1070, he moved to the ancient, fabled city of Samarkand in what is now Uzbekistan. There, with the support of Abū Tahir, a prominent jurist, he wrote his most famous book on mathematics, Maqalat fi al-Jabr wa al-Muqabila (1070; The Algebra of Omar Khayyám, 1931). This book developed the first method for classifying cubic equations, using the intersections of parabolas. Omar Khayyám went a long way toward the unification of algebra and geometry, anticipating the work of René Descartes about five hundred years later. This feat is especially impressive because neither named variables nor algebraic notation had been invented at that time, so Omar Khayyám had to imagine the problem and then solve it using ordinary language.

In 1073, he was invited to Esfahan, the capital of the Seljuk Empire, by his old friend Nizām-al-Mulk, who had become Malik-Shāh’s vizier. Omar Khayyám was put in charge of a team of astronomers commissioned to reform the calendar. This work resulted in the adoption of a new era called the Jalali, which began on March 15, 1079. The new system of reckoning time resulted in an error of only one day every five thousand years.

Things became more difficult for Omar Khayyám after the assassination of Nizām-al-Mulk by the Hashishin in 1092. According to some accounts, Malik-Shāh was killed a month later by the same terrorist group. Whatever the cause of his death, Omar Khayyám fell out of favor when the shah's widow subsequently assumed control of the empire. He was also under pressure from orthodox Muslims, who were suspicious of his free thinking. Finally, in 1118, Malik-Shāh's third son, Sanjar, came to power and moved the capital of the Seljuk Empire to Merv (now Mary, Turkmenistan). Omar Khayyám went there and was able to continue his work in an atmosphere of greater freedom.

Omar Khayyám was not well known as a poet during his lifetime. His livelihood and his reputation came from his accomplishments as a mathematician and astronomer. Presumably, his poetry was an avocation, a hobby that he pursued for relaxation. No reference to poetry by Omar Khayyám can be found until almost fifty years after his death. In an anthology of Khorassan poets published then, four verses of two lines each in Arabic are attributed to Omar Khayyám.

Arabic was the language of learned discourse in that part of the world at that time, the same role played by Latin in the Middle Ages in Europe. Therefore, Omar Khayyám did his scientific writing in Arabic, but his literary fame comes from The Rubáiyát, which was written in the Persian language.

No verses attributed to Omar Khayyám in Persian can be found until the early thirteenth century. In fact, some scholars doubt whether any of the Persian poetry attributed to him was actually written by him. Literary fashion of the day tolerated minor poets signing the names of more famous writers to their own work in order to attract a wider readership. Most researchers do accept that the mathematical genius, Omar Khayyám, is also the author of The Rubáiyát, but the evidence is debatable.

ANALYSIS

Since the biographical details of the life of Omar Khayyám are shrouded in legend and uncertainty, textual questions are central to an understanding of his importance as a poet. The collection of his work that led to his international literary fame was not discovered until 1855, and it was included in the Sir W. Ouseley Collection at the Bodleian Library at the University of Oxford. The manuscript is believed to have been compiled around 1460 in Shiraz, Iran. It contains 158 poems and was brought to light by Professor E. B. Cowell of Cambridge University. Cowell passed it on to Edward FitzGerald to be translated from Persian to English. FitzGerald weeded out poems he considered to be of doubtful authenticity and published seventy-five of those remaining in his first edition of The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám in 1859.

FitzGerald also had access via Cowell to a manuscript from Calcutta, India, which contains 516 poems. Since 1855, well over one hundred different manuscripts have been discovered containing thousands of poems attributed to Omar Khayyám. Which manuscripts are dated correctly, however, and which poems really came from Omar Khayyám are questions that continue to be debated. Other translations into English and versions of The Rubáiyát include those done by Edward Whinfield in 1883, Arthur Talbot in 1908, and Richard Brodie in 2001. FitzGerald himself published three more versions of The Rubáiyát before his death in 1883.

All the poetry collected under the presumed authorship of Omar Khayyám, however, does have one thing in common: Each individual poem is written in the form of the rubá'ī, which is one of the four main forms of Persian poetry. The rubá'ī is believed to have been discovered when a Persian poet overheard a group of boys playing marbles with walnuts. They were using rubáiyát (the plural of rubá'ī) to describe the action in a kind of play-by-play commentary. From these authentic folk roots, the rubá'ī became the only purely Persian verse form, and, according to many, the most perfect form of epigram in all of literature.

Other Persian verse forms are less known in the West. The qasida is a long poem with lines all ending in the same sound, usually in praise of some individual or idea. The masnavi is composed of rhyming couplets and is usually used for heroic or romantic, narrative verse. The ghazal is a shorter poem in monorhyme, usually used for amorous or mystical themes. Omar Khayyám's chosen form, the rubá'ī, is a short poem composed of four lines having five accents, each with a rhyme scheme of aaba. It is a poetic form well suited to display the keen wit of the poet using it.

In the case of The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, this form has also been a challenge to the keen wit of the translator. In addition to selecting rubáiyát that are authentically written by Omar Khayyám, the precise rendering of each poem into English, or any other language, will determine the overall meaning. Therefore, interpretation is even more open to debate in Omar Khayyám's poetry than it is in most.

Perhaps the central issue in understanding the meaning of this work is the extent to which Sufi insight is present in it. Sufism is the part of Islam that addresses itself to the mystical aspects of religion. It emphasizes the individual's internal struggle, or jihad, to develop the true faith within oneself. Sufis believe that God can be experienced directly in this world, in a kind of preview of paradise, through various techniques of breathing, dancing, and meditation. The Persian cultural tradition, in a sense, sees all true poets as Sufis and all true Sufis as poets.

FitzGerald, the first and most famous of Omar Khayyám's translators, was not interested in the Sufi aspect of his poetry. He believed that The Rubáiyát was a celebration of the pleasures of this world, pure and simple, an invitation to hedonistic self-indulgence. In his foreword to the third edition, FitzGerald attacks a contemporary French translation of Omar Khayyám for promoting this mystical dimension. Thus began a debate about the spiritual significance of Omar Khayyám's poetry, which has continued for more than 150 years. FitzGerald does concede, however, that considering the longevity and accomplishment of his life, Omar Khayyám obviously wrote more about hedonistic self-indulgence than he practiced it.

THE RUBÁIYÁT OF OMAR KHAYYÁM

First published: 1859

Type of work: Poetry

This famous collection of short poems starts with the break of day, develops a number of vignettes celebrating the joys of drinking wine, and ends with the appearance of the moon.

What is the purpose of life? Several possible answers are suggested in The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, but all are rejected in favor of the joys of drinking wine.

Should people devote their energies in this world to the accumulation of wealth and to attaining status in society? The number one goal of many people, perhaps most, in life is to make as much money as possible. However, do people who are so obsessed with wealth have any opportunity to really enjoy the fruits of their labors? The slave and the sultan are both invited to the huge party imagined by Omar Khayyám, and both have a great time. After all, the miser and the spendthrift leave this world on the same terms, each without money. According to Omar Khayyám, it is better to have another drink and not worry about status or money.

What about the life of the mind? Omar Khayyám writes that the wise words of all the learned sages are only dim dreams muttered by zombies in a trance, who soon fall back to earth and whose mouths are finally stuffed with dust in the end. He says he was once wed to reason, but he divorced her and took the daughter of the vine for his bride. After challenging the most profound mathematical questions of his day, Omar Khayyám confesses that the deepest understanding he ever attained was at the bottom of a glass of wine. His reformation of the calendar meant nothing compared to the ability to shrink all time to the present, majestic moment through the magic of wine.

All that remains is God, but the consolations of religion are also seemingly disparaged in the imagery of The Rubáiyát. Instead of burning, the bush of Moses has trapped him, and he reaches out to readers with a pale and lifeless hand. The psalmist, David, has fallen mute and sings no inspiring songs. Jesus Christ breathes deeply from his earthy tomb, but he does not arise. Many in Omar Khayyám's society pined for the paradise promised by the prophet, Muhammad. These promises are described in The Rubáiyát as the rumble of a distant drum, and they are considered far inferior to a glass of wine in the hand, here and now.

There is one very curious omission, however, in this list of life's futile pursuits. The translation of The Rubáiyát by FitzGerald makes no mention of the joys of sex or the children who come from sexual activity. The only sexual imagery involves people kissing pots of wine, not other people. Perhaps Omar Khayyám presumes that drinking wine will naturally lead to lowering inhibitions and making joyful love. Strict publishing taboos may have discouraged explicit mention of such things. Or perhaps the author, the translator, or both had no interest in sex, love, or children.

Drinking wine as the way to a happy life might be more expected in a Christian context. The first miracle performed by Jesus Christ was turning water into wine when he was attending a wedding party and the guests ran out of wine. In the sacrament of Communion, Christians consume wine symbolically, as the blood of Jesus, to celebrate their faith. Today, this element in Christianity is not emphasized, and even suggesting such a connection might be offensive to some people.

In Islam, however, wine is even more controversial. Many strict Muslims believe that drinking any form of alcohol is completely forbidden by Allah. Islam originated in the Arabian Peninsula in a desert climate of extreme heat. Since alcohol dehydrates the body, depleting it of the water that is vital for survival, extreme caution about alcoholic consumption there is very sensible.

Much of Iran does not have such an extreme climate, though, and there is a special ambivalence toward wine in Persian culture. Jamshyd was the founder of the city of Persopolis, the capital of the ancient Persian Empire. He is also celebrated as the inventor of wine. The legend says that his wife fell very seriously ill one time and drank the mysterious, fermented beverage believing she would die and that her misery would come to an end. Instead, she fell into a delightful sleep and was cured. Since the Muslim conquest in the seventh century, however, this story has been viewed in Iran with increasing suspicion.

The Sufi interpretation of The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám resolves the contradiction by interpreting the wine in the poems as purely symbolic. It is seen as representing an intense, ecstatic awareness of the power of God, which really has nothing to do with alcohol itself. This kind of personal possession by the holy spirit can be compared to that celebrated every spring at the Christian Pentecost.

SUMMARY

The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám is one of the most popular collections of poetry ever published. Getting a clear idea of the meaning of this famous work of literature, however, is complicated by a number of factors. First, scholars know very little for sure about the life of the writer. Second, scholars disagree about which of the individual poems were actually written by Omar Khayyám. Third, unless the readers can understand the original Persian, they are at the mercy of the translator's inevitable bias when trying to grasp the true meaning of the author. Finally, there is a basic disagreement about whether the extensive mention of wine in the poems should be understood in a literal or symbolic sense.

The things that are criticized in the poems, however, are fairly clear. Human pride in having money, in high social status, in political power, in intellectual accomplishment, or in the appearance of moral perfection is seen as futile and ridiculous considering humankind's basic ignorance of its ultimate fate.

Steven Lehman

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám, pb. 1859 (Edward FitzGerald, translator)

NONFICTION:

Maqalat fi al-Jabr wa al-Muqabila, 1070 (The Algebra of Omar Khayyám, 1931)

Mizan al-Hikma, eleventh century (The Measure of Philosophy, 1941)

The Nectar of Grace: Omar Khayyám's Life and Works, 1941 (includes The Measure of Philosophy and other essays)

About the Author

Aminrazavi, Mehdi. The Wine of Wisdom. Oxford, England: Oneworld, 2005.

Arberry, A. J. The Romance of the Rubáiyát. London: Allen & Unwin, 1959.

Dashti, A., and L. P. Elwell-Sutton. In Search of Omar Khayyam. London: Allen & Unwin, 1971.

Decker, Christopher. The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam: A Critical Edition. Charlottesville: University of Virginia Press, 1997.

Hazeldine, Norton F. W. The Sufism of the Rubáiyát: Or, The Secret of the Great Paradox. Whitefish, Mont.: Kessinger, 1995.

Malouf, Amin. Samarkand. Oxford, England: Abacus, 1995.

Rashed, R., and B. Vahabzadeh. Omar Khayyam, the Mathematician. New York: Bibliotheca Persica Press, 2000.

Tirtha, Swami Govinda. The Nectar of Grace. Allahabad, India: Kitabistan, 1941.

Yogananda, Paramhansa. Wine of the Mystic: The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam. Los Angeles: SRF, 1994.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Under what circumstances was The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám first published? What is the significance of these facts?
- What was Omar Khayyám best known for during his lifetime? Describe his accomplishments outside the literary field.
- What is the symbolic importance of wine in many interpretations of The Rubáiyát?
- What is Sufism and how might it be relevant to understanding The Rubáiyát?
- Who are Hassan ibn Sabbah and Nizām-al-Mulk and what was their relationship to Omar Khayyám?
- What special problems does translation into English, or any other language, pose for understanding The Rubáiyát?
- What is the verse form used by Omar Khayyám in The Rubáiyát? What is its importance in the history of Persian literature?

Courtesy, Picador Publicity Department, London

MICHAEL ONDAATJE

Born: Colombo, Ceylon (now Sri Lanka)
September 12, 1943

Ondaatje has fused his interests in poetry, history, narrative, and filmmaking to create a new fiction with unconventional approaches to chronology, character, and historical accuracy.

BIOGRAPHY

Philip Michael Ondaatje (on-DAHT-chee) was born in what is now Sri Lanka on September 12, 1943, the son of Philip Mervyn Ondaatje and Enid Gratiaen Ondaatje. His paternal grandparents had a successful tea plantation, and Ondaatje's memories of his early life there with his large extended family and with his unconventional parents are reflected in his autobiographical work Running in the Family (1982). There he records the power that the beauty of Sri Lanka held over him. He evokes his grandparents' lives in the tight-knit community of Europeans and describes his father's losing battle with alcoholism, conveying both the comedy and tragedy of that battle.

Ondaatje's parents separated when he was five. In 1952, his mother brought Ondaatje and his brother and sister to London, where he continued his early education at Dulwich College. Ondaatje, however, was unwilling to prepare for the O-level mathematics exam required by the English educational system. He was interested only in studying English, and at the age of nineteen he immigrated to Canada, where he joined his brother Christopher in Montreal.

Ondaatje entered Bishop's University in Lennoxville, Quebec, and majored in English and history. During that time, he began to read twentieth century poetry. He also met contemporary Canadian poets. These influences, combined with the enthusiasm fostered by one of his teachers, led Ondaatje to begin writing.

Ondaatje completed his B.A. at the University of Toronto, where his poetry attracted the attention of established writers. His work was included in an anthology of young writers, and he won the university's Epstein Prize for poetry. The connections he made in Toronto led to the publication of his first book of poetry, The Dainty Monsters (1967). Ondaatje went on to complete an M.A. at Queen's University in 1967; his thesis was on the poet Edwin Muir.

In 1964, Ondaatje married an artist, Kim Jones. Their two children joined with Jones's four children from a previous marriage to create a busy household. Themes of domestic life are important both in Ondaatje's first book and later in another poetry collection, Rat Jelly (1973). In the late 1960's, Ondaatje began working on a sequence of lyrics that told the true story of a Scottish woman who had been shipwrecked off the coast of Queensland, Australia, lived among Aborigines there, and was finally rescued by an escaped convict. Ondaatje's poem The Man with Seven Toes (1969) explored several themes and approaches that would appear in his later work, particularly the fictionalizing of a historical event and the use of multiple points of view. In that book, the woman's story is told through her voice as well as those of the convict and the narrator.

Ondaatje's experience with those techniques prepared him for The Collected Works of Billy the Kid: Left Handed Poems (1970), a work that combines lyrics with conventional narrative, news stories, and interviews to tell the story of the American outlaw. The work won the Governor-General's Award for 1970. Ondaatje adapted The Collected Works of Billy the Kid for radio and stage, an activity that sparked his experiments with filmmaking in the early 1970's.

In 1971, Ondaatje left the University of Western Ontario, where he had taught since 1967, to take a position at Glendon College in Toronto. There he began work on Coming Through Slaughter (1976), a novel that continued the experimental techniques he had used in The Collected Works of Billy the Kid. This novel offers a version of the life of Buddy Bolden, one of the earliest of the New Orleans jazzmen. Ondaatje did extensive research to create a life for Bolden, about whom little factual information exists. In 1976, Ondaatje visited Sri Lanka for the first time since his childhood; the experience resulted in a section of poems in his collection There's a Trick with a Knife I'm Learning to Do: Poems 1963-1978 (1979) and later inspired his family story, Running in the Family (1982).

In 1980, Ondaatje and his wife separated. He later married author Linda Spalding, and their relationship inspired him to write another collection of poetry, Secular Love (1984). The couple have coedited Brick, a literary journal. In 1987, Ondaatje published In the Skin of a Lion, a work he has called his first formal novel. This novel features characters who are involved with the industrial growth of Toronto in the early twentieth century. It also introduces two characters, Caravaggio and Hana, who return in The English Patient (1992), the novel for which he won the Man Booker Prize that year. Ondaatje has taught at numerous universities in Canada and the United States.

ANALYSIS

Some reviewers have noted that Michael Ondaatje's work is thoroughly original. Few writers draw less on conventional ideas about matters such as form, point of view, chronology, or the relationship between historical truth and fiction. Indeed, one writer has pointed out that Ondaatje has found Canada's lack of a ponderous literary tradition to be a liberating force for his work. Certainly he has felt free to combine elements of lyric poetry and the visual arts along with historical fact and the traditional approaches to narrative in order to create a new sort of fiction.

The Collected Works of Billy the Kid and Coming Through Slaughter offer examples of his technique. Both works involve the lives of real people, and Ondaatje conducted extensive research to uncover biographical details about his protagonists. For the latter work he traveled to Louisiana, interviewed elderly jazz musicians, and read accounts of jazz history and of Storyville, the New Orleans district where jazz was first popularized. He even read the records of the East Louisiana State Hospital, where Buddy Bolden spent his last years. He made similar efforts to unearth information about the life of Billy the Kid.

Details from this research permeate these books, but Ondaatje's interest is never the simple re-creation of a distant historical setting. In fact, as his notes at the end of Coming Through Slaughter make clear, he often changes dates and alters details to suit his needs. That he is not interested in historical realism might best be demonstrated by examining the voice he creates for Bolden, an African American musician born about 1876 in the Storyville district. Ondaatje portrays an artist whose tragic career blossomed briefly in the midst of poverty and violence in the late nineteenth century. Much of the story is told by Bolden himself; many other parts are told by his friends and lovers. For their voices, however, Ondaatje never uses African American dialect. Instead, he gives his characters a simple, direct, and often poetic speech which conveys the intensity and violence with which they lived. He uses similar techniques to create a voice for Billy the Kid. Both works contain transcriptions from historical documents, such as news reports and interviews. Ondaatje uses the same technique, though less extensively, in The English Patient.

Ondaatje's willingness to interrupt his narrative with other materials (frequently poems) is an indicator that he is not primarily interested in narrative in any conventional, linear sense. He does not describe chains of events that lead inevitably to a climax. Instead, he looks at his characters and events through multiple lenses, presenting them to the reader from different points of view. The story may be told by several of its main characters as well by a narrator. The result is that the reader may be left uncertain about the truth of some events.

Ondaatje is concerned with how artists deal with truth. A powerful image for him is an early photograph from the period when photographers were first learning what sort of truth they might capture on film. The first page of The Collected Works of Billy the Kid, for example, contains a frame followed by a photographer's claim that the picture demonstrates what he is able to accomplish with his new, fast shutter. The frame is empty. In Coming Through Slaughter, the historical photographer E. J. Bellocq, whose photographs recorded early Storyville life, becomes a character in the novel. Photographs mislead, however, by showing only one side of the truth; in that way they resemble narration from a single viewpoint, never allowing the viewer to see more than the photographer sees through a lens.

The photographer and the musician are both artists, however, and artists are another theme of interest to Ondaatje. In Coming Through Slaughter, the narrator identifies with the tormented artist Bolden, whose madness strikes in the midst of his career. At the novel's end the narrator asks rhetorically what it was that drew him to Bolden's story. The answer lies in his desire to understand Bolden.

Some similar impulse drew Ondaatje to Billy the Kid's life. The ambiguities of the outlaw's bloody career, the juxtaposing of his violence and his tenderness, seem to make him a metaphor for the artist. The artist's task is like the illegal acts of Billy the Kid that society rejects.

Beginning with Ondaatje's first volume of poetry, violence has been an important theme in his work. Violence defines Billy the Kid's career; it surrounds Bolden; even Running in the Family, for all its pleasure in recording Ondaatje's unpredictable family, has a dark vein of violence in his father's alcoholism and in the forces of nature. Violence is particularly important in The English Patient, with its wartime setting and its title character, who is burned beyond recognition, as well as in In the Skin of a Lion and Anil's Ghost (2000).

Ondaatje brings to his prose a poet's precise attention to sensory impression. His writing is studied with evocative imagery. He finds the details that communicate the heat of a Sri Lankan afternoon. He creates the visual picture of a shooting victim's neck vein pecked out by a chicken and drawn across the yard in The Collected Works of Billy the Kid. In The English Patient, he uses sensory details, such as Hana feeding the patient a peeled plum to suggest the strangely erotic relationship between them. Such imagery goes beyond scene setting; it offers the reader a key to the psychology of the characters. Some critics have suggested that his reliance on minute description gives Ondaatje's work a static quality. Certainly his earlier works show more interest in descriptive moments than in sequenced events. Although linear narrative is never Ondaatje's intention, in The English Patient the reader finds both. The narrative line moves steadily (though sometimes its movement is circular rather than forward), all the while illumined by Ondaatje's startling images—the image of the young Indian sapper, for example, lying on his back to look through a rifle's scope at the ceiling paintings of the Sistine Chapel while flares provide the light. Images like these define the power of Ondaatje's fiction.

THE COLLECTED WORKS OF BILLY THE KID: LEFT HANDED POEMS

First published: 1970

Type of work: Poetry and prose

Eyewitness accounts, poems, and legends tell the story of the outlaw William Bonney's bloody career and death.

The Collected Works of Billy the Kid: Left Handed Poems depicts the last year of the outlaw's life, his twenty-second, when Pat Garrett is made sheriff to clean up New Mexico. Shortly after Billy turns twenty-one, Garrett kills Tom O'Folliard, one of Billy's gang, on Christmas Eve. "Blood a necklace on me all my life," Billy says. Ondaatje tells the story in a series of pictures (sometimes literal pictures) that gradually moves the reader to the final confrontation between Billy and Garrett. Along the way, passages are spoken by various friends and enemies of Billy. Some of the pictures are poems, many in Billy's voice.

The book is not intended to make a linear account of events, nor are the voices intended to evoke any characteristics of period speech or outlaw speech. Instead, Ondaatje wants to look at the mind of a man who became the subject of legend because of his cold-blooded killings. He wants to examine the meaning of that term "outlaw."

Ondaatje offers several scenes that show Billy as part of the ordinary world of human friendships, particularly in his appearances at the Chisum ranch and his friendship with Sallie Chisum, who recalls him as gentle, dapper, even witty. Garrett knew the Chisums, too, and he describes a time when Billy brought Angela D., his fiancé, to the ranch. Billy's shooting of Sallie's sick and aged cat ends that episode. Garrett says that Angela seemed terrified by this action. On a different visit to the Chisums, Billy recalls being told a story about a man who created a pack of spaniels so inbred, deformed, and vicious that the only thing they were fit for was destruction.

Billy also relates the sequence that follows his capture by Garrett. Garrett, earlier described as the "ideal assassin," ties Billy and his men to their horses for the whole of a grueling five-day trek across the desert. Billy is even bareheaded; under the sun, he says "the brain juices begin to swell up." By the end of the trip to jail, the whole episode is packed with nightmarish images of suffering. In a temporary jail, Billy recovers enough to give a lively interview to the Texas Star; and shortly after that he escapes, only to be killed by Garrett in the home of a friend.

The prose is interspersed with poems from Billy that demonstrate his distorted perceptions of the world. As a narrator, he cannot be trusted to tell the truth that others see. This misperception is a quality that makes him interesting to Ondaatje. Billy's solitude and his habit of seeing things differently seem to suggest the outlaw quality of the artist, a subject Ondaatje addressed in later work.

COMING THROUGH SLAUGHTER

First published: 1976

Type of work: Novel

Jazzman Buddy Bolden created music in the midst of poverty and violence until he disappeared and later went mad during a performance.

Coming Through Slaughter chronicles the life of Buddy Bolden, one of the founders of Dixieland jazz. Little factual material is known about Bolden, who lived in poverty and played cornet in the Storyville district of New Orleans during the 1890's. From the fragmentary evidence produced by his research, Ondaatje portrays Bolden as a man driven by the demands of his art, as well as by his human attachment to his family and friends. Tension mounts in Bolden until he feels forced to disappear. He reappears briefly and returns to his music, but the stress is too much for him, and he is precipitated into madness. Bolden was born in 1876; in 1907, he was committed to an insane asylum, where he died in 1931.

As in The Collected Works of Billy the Kid: Left Handed Poems, Ondaatje tells the story through shifting points of view, sometimes speaking as Bolden himself, sometimes through Bolden's friend Webb, the detective who finds Bolden when he disappears. Even E. J. Bellocq, the historical photographer who documented New Orleans life in the late nineteenth century, has a voice. Once again, Ondaatje explores the isolation of the artist, and once again he is uninterested in the sociological implications of his subject. Bolden's oppressed position as a black musician and his poverty are never explicitly discussed.

The novel's early sections portray Bolden as a lively man, a barber and writer for a local broadside as well as a musician. Despite his heavy drinking, he manages to juggle these jobs successfully. At the same time, he seems to be happy in his marriage and he obviously is solicitous of his children's well-being, walking them to school and telling them jokes. Then he disappears. His old friend Webb, a detective, goes to see him, only to be told by Bolden's wife, Nora, that Bolden has left her, his job, his writing, his music, everything. The central part of the novel is a detective story. To trace his friend, Webb goes first to the photographer Bellocq and manages to get a picture of Bolden from him. The picture, a group shot of Bolden's band, is reproduced on the title page of the novel. Webb finally finds Bolden living with some old friends. He has been gone for nearly two years; in that time he has not played a note.

His return home is brief. Bolden is changed, erratic, and detached from his old life. A few days later, he joins a parade where his music somehow achieves all he has ever wanted it to be. “God this is what I wanted to play for, if no one else I always guessed there would be this.” That is when he goes mad. He is taken by train to the hospital, passing through little towns in northern Louisiana, including Slaughter, but in a larger sense Bolden has been coming through Slaughter all his life.

IN THE SKIN OF A LION

First published: 1987

Type of work: Novel

The story of the role of Canada’s immigrant population in founding Toronto is told thorough the experiences of native-born Patrick Lewis.

Ondaatje offers two epigraphs for In the Skin of a Lion. One is from the ancient epic of Gilgamesh and refers to the hero’s sorrowful search for his dead friend. The second is from the novelist John Berger; it asserts that no story is the only story. Both epigraphs apply to the multiple threads of narrative in this novel, which in part tells the story of Patrick Lewis’s journey from backwoods Canada to Toronto; of his love affair with an actress, Clara Dickins; his introduction to radical politics; and his later love affair with Clara’s friend Alice Gull. However, the novel also incorporates historical events from the life of Toronto millionaire Ambrose Small, including his mysterious disappearance. Also woven throughout the work are several building projects—a bridge, viaduct, tunnel, and water purification plant—all of which grew from the labor of Italians, Greeks, Finns, and Macedonians—the whole body of immigrants whose sweat built the city.

When Patrick leaves home for the city, he leaves behind his first connections with immigrants—the loggers for whom his father worked as a dynamiter. With Ondaatje’s typical interest in visual effects, one of the novel’s many powerful images is of Finnish loggers, ice skating by night, lit by torches made of flaming cattails. In the city, Patrick meets actress Clara Dickins, and their love affair flourishes despite her position as Ambrose Small’s mistress. When Ambrose disappears (this historical event dominated the news in the 1920’s), Clara disappears as well, and Patrick becomes one of Canada’s many “searchers” who sought the missing millionaire. As he often does, Ondaatje has blended two historical figures, Small and Clara, with a cast of fictional characters, including Patrick and Clara’s friend, Alice.

Patrick’s real search is for Clara; when he finds her, she insists that she must stay with Small, and Patrick returns to Toronto to work on a huge tunnel under Lake Ontario, part of a water purification plant. He also begins a love affair with Alice, who takes him to some secret meetings of labor organizers. Participants come from every part of Toronto’s immigrant workers’ world, a world in which Patrick gradually becomes comfortable. He also enjoys his life as a foster father to Alice’s daughter Hana, the same Hana who later appears in The English Patient, as does the neighborhood thief Caravaggio.

In the novel’s climactic events, Patrick and Caravaggio sabotage the water plant as part of a labor protest. After a term in prison, Patrick returns to the city and to Hana, who has lived with a Russian family after her mother’s death. She and Patrick now form a miniature family that, at the novel’s end, is about to be increased by Clara’s return.

The novel is developed in a series of oblique pictures in which various characters sometimes hold the spotlight. Indeed, sometimes the building projects themselves seem to become central characters. The result is an unusually rich weave of character and event in a relatively short work, one in which every story seems part of other larger stories.

THE ENGLISH PATIENT

First published: 1992

Type of work: Novel

In Italy at the close of World War II, Hana, Caravaggio, and Kip care for a burn patient, who may be a spy.

The English Patient is Ondaatje's most conventional novel, but it retains many characteristics of his earlier works in its shifting viewpoints, its use of historical documents, and its insistence on the ambiguity of truth. It won the Man Booker Prize in 1992.

As the novel begins, Hana, a young Canadian nurse, has been left in charge of a badly burned patient who seems to have been shot down while flying over the desert. They are the only inhabitants of the Italian villa that had been used as a hospital until the close of World War II, when staff and patients moved elsewhere. Hana often puzzles over the notebook the patient has made from an old copy of Herodotus's Historiai Herodotou (c. 424 B.C.E.; The History, 1709). Most of his entries concern the Arabian desert.

Hana is joined in the villa by Caravaggio, a thief whose thumbs have been cut off. He accuses her of being in love with the English patient, but she denies it, saying that she thinks he is a "despairing saint" whom she wants to protect. Soon the three are joined by Kip, a young Indian explosives expert. Kip is a detached and solitary person who sleeps in his tent at the edge of the villa's grounds. After Hana helps him defuse a bomb, they are drawn into a love affair, although Caravaggio is also vying for Hana's attention.

The novel's fourth section concerns the events that happened to an expedition from the London Geographical Society into the Arabian desert in the 1930's. The expedition was searching for a lost oasis, Zerzura. One of the party, Geoffrey Clifton, brought along his bride, Katharine. She and Almásy, the narrator of this section (and apparently the English patient), eventually begin a passionate affair. Caravaggio later identifies Almásy as a Hungarian spy for the Germans in North Africa. Even Caravaggio's extensive inquiry, however, cannot confirm that Almásy is the patient. The patient's story jumps to 1942, when, stranded in the desert, he remembers that the earlier expedition left an airplane hidden in the desert caves. In the cave, he finds Katharine's mummified body. She had died at her husband's hands, and her husband had then killed himself. Attempting to fly her body out of the desert, Almásy crashes and burns. This, at least, is one version of the story. Parts of it are retold in ways that cast doubt on its truth.

Kip has told Hana how he was selected for special explosives training by the kindness of Lord Suffolk. He spent the early years of the war in England, a country he much admired. When the atomic bomb falls on Hiroshima, he realizes that he is essentially Asian and, after a tension-filled confrontation with the others in which he threatens to shoot the English patient, he leaves. Caravaggio also leaves. The novel's end moves into the future, when the Indian sapper and the nurse are still solitary, ever altered by their affair in the closing days of the war.

ANIL'S GHOST

First published: 2000

Type of work: Novel

Returning from the United States to her native Sri Lanka to investigate what caused the death of some newly discovered skeletons, Anil Tessera, a forensic anthropologist, must confront the effects of political terrorism on her homeland.

The terrorism which has thrived in Sri Lanka since the early 1980's forms a backdrop for this novel, although the historical factions involved in its ongoing guerrilla war are never explicitly named. Instead, Ondaatje's focus is on themes of family, history, identity, and the effects of violence on these important elements of humanity. The novel is developed with Ondaatje's characteristic indirection, but it is told primarily from Anil's point of view, moving backward and forward through her own history as she grapples with the problem of collecting evidence which will prove that the skeleton with which she is entrusted met with a recent and violent death.

Anil's life has been privileged. She grew up in a well-to-do Sri Lankan family and studied first in London and then in the United States, where she participated eagerly in the strange community of forensic investigators. Now she has been called by a human rights organization to use her considerable analytical skills in her native country, a nation which feels familiar to her in many ways. She knows its language, food, clothing, and customs; she even has a few acquaintances left in the capital city. However, she is also aware that the country's political turmoil means that no one can be taken at face value; no secret is entirely safe. For that reason she cannot feel quite sure that Sarath, the archaeologist with whom she must work, can be trusted when she realizes that the skeleton they have named "Sailor" was surely murdered in the near past. Nor can she be sure that Sarath is really cooperating as they try to identify the skeleton, the first step in assembling evidence which might locate and convict his killers.

Ondaatje's descriptions of the novel's Sri Lankan settings are particularly vivid, a product perhaps of both the author's feelings about his homeland and his life as a poet, as well as a novelist. Thus the country's greenery and flowers, its pools and ancient temples take on their own weight as characters in the work. Vision is often a powerful theme for Ondaatje; in this novel it is realized in the character of Ananda, a nearly blind sculptor whom Anil and Sarath hire to reconstruct a bust of Sailor in hopes that someone in the area will recognize him. Anil's part of the novel concludes with her defeat by corrupt government officials, the same ones who probably ordered Sarath's death. In the novel's final images, Ananda has been hired to paint the eyes in a reconstructed statue of Buddha, thus using his art to confound the terrorists who destroyed the original.

SUMMARY

Michael Ondaatje's artistic interests extend beyond the novel to include poetry and film. The former interest informs his fiction with careful language. Ondaatje is quick to include words for technical elements of viaduct-building or words from Sinhalese, the language of Sri Lanka. His interest in history threads through his work at every level, as he incorporates historical events into his fictional worlds. His concern with film is surely part of his strong consciousness of the look of things—a painting, a sculpture, a rain forest, an old monk—all the vivid pictures which give his work its texture. Finally, Ondaatje's novels are characterized by his indirection, his use of discontinuous time, and his occasional shifts in point of view. He asks for careful attention from his readers, and he rewards that attention with stories whose power lies not only in character and event but in the pulsing world his art creates.

Ann D. Garbett

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Coming Through Slaughter, 1976

In the Skin of a Lion, 1987

The English Patient, 1992

Anil's Ghost, 2000

Divisadero, 2007

POETRY:

The Dainty Monsters, 1967
The Man with Seven Toes, 1969
The Collected Works of Billy the Kid: Left Handed Poems, 1970
Rat Jelly, 1973
Elimination Dance, 1978, revised 1980
There's a Trick with a Knife I'm Learning to Do: Poems, 1963-1978, 1979
Secular Love, 1984
The Cinnamon Peeler: Selected Poems, 1989
Handwriting, 1998

DRAMA:

The Collected Works of Billy the Kid, pr. 1973 (adaptation of his novel)
In the Skin of a Lion, pr. 1987 (adaptation of his novel)

NONFICTION:

Leonard Cohen, 1970
Claude Glass, 1979
Running in the Family, 1982

EDITED TEXTS:

The Long Poem Anthology, 1979
From Ink Lake: Canadian Stories, 1990
The Faber Book of Contemporary Canadian Short Stories, 1990
The Brick Reader, 1991 (with Linda Spalding)
An H in the Heart, 1994 (of B. P. Nichol's work; with George Bowering)
Lost Classics, 2000
The Conversations: Walter Murch and the Art of Editing Film, 2002

MISCELLANEOUS:

Vintage Ondaatje, 2004

About the Author

Bachner, Sally. "'He Had Pushed His Imagination into Buddy's Brain' or, How to Escape History in Coming Through Slaughter." Rethinking History 9, nos. 2/3 (June-September, 2005): 197-220.
Barbour, Douglas. Michael Ondaatje. New York: Twayne, 1993.
Bök, Christian. "Destructive Creation: The Politicization of Violence in the Works of Michael Ondaatje." Canadian Literature 132 (Spring, 1992): 109-124.
Cusk, Rachael. "Sri Lankan Skeletons." New Statesman 129, no. 4485 (May 8, 2000): 55.
Hillger, Annick. Not Needing All the Words: Michael Ondaatje's Literature of Silence. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2006.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What use does Michael Ondaatje make of historical events in his fiction? What is the effect of his occasional "rewriting" of history?
- What does Ondaatje's use of shifting points of view suggest about his understanding of "truth" in his stories? What other elements of his writing suggest this attitude?
- What does Ondaatje gain by abandoning traditional chronological order for the events of his fiction?
- What passages in Anil's Ghost reveal Ondaatje's interest in poetry?
- Many of Ondaatje's characters are involved in violence. Does the author condone this? Why does he include it?

- Kizer, Carolyn. "Mr. Small Isn't Here, Have an Iguana!" Review of In the Skin of a Lion, by Michael Ondaatje. The New York Times Book Review 92 (September 27, 1987): 12-13.
- Novak, Amy. "Textual Hauntings: Narrating History, Memory, and Silence in The English Patient." Studies in the Novel 36, no. 2 (Summer, 2004): 206-232.
- Ondaatje, Michael. "As Big as the Blue Jays." Interview by Susannah Hunnerwell. The New York Times Book Review 97 (November 1, 1992): 7.
- Ondaatje, Michael, and Brian D. Johnson. "A Sort of Improvisation Happens." Maclean's 115, no. 36 (September 9, 2002): 40-41.
- Scanlan, Margaret. "Anil's Ghost and Terrorism's Time." Studies in the Novel 36, no. 3 (Fall, 2004): 302-318.
- Solecki, Sam. Ragas of Longing: The Poetry of Michael Ondaatje. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2003.

Library of Congress

GEORGE ORWELL

Born: Motihari, Bengal, India

June 25, 1903

Died: London, England

January 21, 1950

Widely recognized for both his novels and his essays, Orwell, especially during the last decade of his life, worked "to make political writing into an art."

BIOGRAPHY

George Orwell was born Eric Arthur Blair in Motihari, Bengal, India, on June 25, 1903, the son of Richard Walmesley Blair, a minor official in the British government, and Ida Limouzin Blair. In 1904, Orwell's mother took him to England, where the family lived at Henley-on-Thames, Oxfordshire. Orwell had two sisters, one five years older and the other five years younger. According to his own account in his essay "Why I Write," Orwell, until he was eight years old, barely saw his father. Consequently, Orwell developed a habit of solitude that resulted from his developing "disagreeable mannerisms" that made him "unpopular" throughout his schooldays.

Orwell's schooldays were spent at Sunnyslands, an Anglican convent school in Henley. He also spent time as a boarder at St. Cyprian's preparatory school in Eastbourne, Sussex, and as a King's Scholar at Eton. He attended one term at Wellington College in 1917.

Upon completing his formal education, Orwell prepared for the India Office examinations, after which he became assistant superintendent of police in the Indian Imperial Police in Burma, a position that he held from 1922 to 1927. Because of his disdain for British imperialism, reflected in such later essays as "A Hanging" and "Shooting an Elephant," Orwell resigned his post, moved to Paris, and gradually began his career as a writer.

His first works, written while he was working as a dishwasher in Paris and later as a hop picker near London, were published under his birth name, Eric Blair. These works include "A Scullion's Diary" (1931), which is an early version of Down and Out in Paris and London (1933), and "A Hanging." Perhaps the best overview of Orwell's early writing comes from Orwell himself. In "Why I Write," he recounts his first experiences as a writer. He says that he wrote his first poem, dictated to his mother, at the age of four or five. As Orwell reflects on this poem, he thinks it was probably "a plagiarism of William Blake's 'Tiger, Tiger.'" His first published poem, "Awake Young Men of England," is a patriotic poem written during World War I. It was printed in the local newspaper, the Henley and South Oxfordshire Standard, when Orwell was eleven years old. In his early years, Orwell also attempted a few short stories, but he considered the attempts "ghastly failures" and abandoned the genre.

Mostly, Orwell regarded his earliest writing as insignificant except insofar as he was aware that he wanted to be a writer. He begins "Why I Write" with an acknowledgment of that awareness:

From a very early age, perhaps the age of five or six, I knew that when I grew up I should be a writer. Between the ages of about seventeen and twenty-four I tried to abandon this idea, but I did so with the consciousness that I was outraging my true nature and that sooner or later I should have to settle down and write books.

From 1932 to 1933, Orwell taught at a small private school in Hayes, Middlesex. It was then that he began to write books. In 1933, he published his first book, Down and Out in Paris and London, under his pseudonym George Orwell, a name that he used for the rest of his books. In the next seven years, eight of Orwell's books were published: Burmese Days (1934), A Clergyman's Daughter (1935), Keep the Aspidistra Flying (1936), The Road to Wigan Pier (1937), Homage to Catalonia (1938), Coming up for Air (1939), Inside the Whale, and Other Essays (1940), and The Lion and the Unicorn (1941). His two most highly acclaimed novels, Animal Farm (1945) and Nineteen Eighty-Four (1949), were yet to be written. During these years, prior to 1945, Orwell was gaining the personal and political experience that went into his final works.

In 1936, Orwell married Eileen O'Shaughnessy; in 1944, they adopted a one-month-old baby. In March, 1945, Eileen died during an operation. Also in 1936, Orwell began a series of economic, social, and political experiences that gave him a deeper understanding of his earlier experiences in Burma and in Paris. For three months in 1936, he investigated working-class life and unemployment, a process that undoubtedly gave him insight into the despair that he felt at entering a hospital in Paris in 1929 during a time of personal poverty. He recalled the experience in his essay "How the Poor Die." During the summer of 1936, Orwell attended the Independent Labour Party Summer School. In early 1937, he was part of a detachment on the Aragon front in Spain. Orwell was wounded in the throat and honorably discharged.

Orwell says his experiences in 1936 and 1937 were a turning point:

The Spanish war and other events in 1936-37 turned the scale and thereafter I knew where I stood. Every line of serious work that I have written since 1936 has been written, directly or indirectly, against totalitarianism and for democratic Socialism, as I understand it.

Politics and writing, for Orwell, had become interwoven. He continued both his writing and his political involvement despite his ill health. In 1938, Orwell entered a tuberculosis sanatorium and later went to Morocco for his health. In 1940, back in London, he joined the Local Defence Volunteers (Home Guard). From 1941 to 1943, Orwell was in charge of British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) broadcasts to India and Southeast Asia. In 1945, he was a war correspondent for The Observer in Paris and Cologne. In June and July, he covered the first postwar election campaign. In August, 1945, Animal Farm was published.

Animal Farm is a culmination of Orwell's wide-ranging socioeconomic and political observations. In this novel, Orwell succeeds in making "political writing into an art." Animal Farm was followed by Critical Essays (1946; published in the United States as Dickens, Dali, and Others) and, finally, by Nineteen Eighty-Four. More than four hundred thousand copies of Nineteen Eighty-Four sold within the first year of its publication.

During the final years of Orwell's life, he was in and out of tuberculosis sanatoriums and other hospitals. In September, 1949, he was transferred from Cotswold Sanatorium, Cranham, Gloucestershire, to University Hospital in London. There, on October 13, only a few months before his death, he married Sonia Brownell, an editorial assistant with Horizon. Orwell died suddenly, on January 21, 1950, of a hemorrhaged lung. He was buried in the churchyard of All Saints, Sutton Courtenay, Berkshire.

ANALYSIS

Orwell's writing of both novels and essays divides fairly distinctly into two parts, the periods prior to, and after, 1936. Orwell himself, in "Why I Write," makes the division, citing as the turning point his participation in the Spanish Civil War and alluding to other events occurring in the same year.

Orwell's writing up to 1936 includes essays recounting his experiences in Burma, India, Paris, and London. These works sharply criticize British imperialism, economic inequity, and class barriers. The works are highly analytical narratives, characterized by flashes of insight into humanity. In "A Hanging," for example, Orwell narrates his participation in the hanging of a man in Burma. As Orwell and the other executioners escort the condemned man to the gallows, the man sidesteps a puddle. At this moment, Orwell says, he realizes the "unspeakable wrongness" of cutting a man's life short when it is in "full tide." Again, in "How the Poor Die," Orwell recounts his experience of admitting himself, while impoverished, to a hospital in Paris. He concludes that the fear of hospitals that one finds among the poor is warranted. Yet again, in "Shooting an Elephant," Orwell narrates an experience in Lower Burma during which he unnecessarily destroys an elephant because he fears losing face with the natives. He suddenly realizes that he has no choice in his actions, and that one of the effects of imperialism is that it changes him, as well as others like him, into a sort of "hollow, posing dummy." He acknowledges, during this flash of insight, "the hollowness, the futility of the white man's dominion in the East." Similarly, in his books during these early years, Orwell recounts his experiences in Burma, India, Paris, and London. Down and Out in Paris and London explores his experiences as a dishwasher in Paris and as a hop picker in England; his novel Burmese Days examines his experience as an officer in the Indian Imperial Police from 1922 to 1927.

Orwell's writing after 1936 is consciously focused political commentary, sometimes in works such as Animal Farm and Nineteen Eighty-Four, and other times in essays such as "Politics and the English Language." In "Why I Write," Orwell states that his purpose is "to make political writing into an art."

Evident also in Orwell's later writings are other philosophical changes stemming from his sharply focused worldview. These later works often reflect a lack of faith in the human capacity to survive, and they point to the inevitability of oppression. To Orwell, oppression seems inevitable insofar as people are deceived by, and deceive others with, political language—that is, with discourse aimed at deception rather than expression. In Animal Farm, for example, the animals reject the totalitarian rule of the cruel humans and try to erect a democratic socialism, only to become victims of new tyrants, the pigs and dogs. The oppressed animals are repeatedly deceived by clever political language and, thereby, allow themselves to be victimized. In the end, it matters little to the oppressed animals whether their oppressors are humans, hogs, or dogs.

Nineteen Eighty-Four explores these themes even more fully. Critics have called Nineteen Eighty-Four a satire, a dystopian novel, and a negative utopian novel. These labels all fit. They all capture the grim, cheerless worldview evident in this, Orwell's last novel. The protagonist, Winston Smith, tries to free his mind and body from the rigidly totalitarian controls of Big Brother, the figurative leader of Oceania. Smith struggles for freedom of thought, freedom to have an accurate picture of history, and freedom to love, only to discover that Big Brother has monitored his every move. Not only is Smith physically destroyed; he is, more horribly, also mentally remade into a creature without a will. His final submission is to acknowledge his love of Big Brother, who, mercifully, shoots Smith in the back of the head. The novel, often compared to Aldous Huxley's Brave New World (1932) and the Russian Yevgeny Zamyatin's My (wr. 1920-1921; pb. 1927, 1952; We, 1924), ends with the total defeat of humanity. Orwell depicts not only a society in which power is a means to an end but also one in which power itself is the end. The final image of total oppression, as in Animal Farm, is tied to the pernicious effects of political language. Smith himself has, ironically, spent his career rewriting history and erasing from the language those words that permit people to talk about or even think about freedom and humanity. He is left with only enough autonomy to admit to his beloved Julia that he has betrayed her. Orwell carefully interweaves the horror of oppression, the decay of language, and the loss of humanity.

These are themes that he explores in his nonfiction, as well. For example, in "Politics and the English Language," Orwell characterizes modern English prose as a "mixture of vagueness and sheer incompetence." His thesis is that "political speech and writing are largely the defence of the indefensible," that such language is used by people who want "to name things without calling up mental pictures of them." Orwell's conclusion in "Politics and the English Language," however, is not so grim as his conclusions in the final two novels are. The essay is, rather, a call to action to stop the decline of language, to reclaim its clarity.

In both his novels and his essays, Orwell succeeds in interweaving politics and language. More than that, however, Orwell the stylist holds a place in Western literature. He has, in fact, made political writing into an art. Often anthologized are such essays as "A Hanging," "Shooting an Elephant," "Why I Write," and "Politics and the English Language." Orwell is recognized as a careful stylist, conscious of his writing down to the word level, carefully using anthropomorphism in "Shooting an Elephant," painting scenes in Burma vividly with sensory images and fresh similes, and artfully sustaining dramatic moments. Readers are drawn to his strong narratives, his flashes of insight, and his clear analysis. Finally, his greatest appeal may be his honesty, his absolute candor with himself and others, what he calls his “power of facing unpleasant facts.”

ANIMAL FARM

First published: 1945

Type of work: Novel

In what Orwell calls a “fairy story,” animals overthrow the cruel humans only to fall into their own oppressive social structure.

George Orwell says of Animal Farm, a novel subtitled A Fairy Story, that it was the first book in which he tried, with “full consciousness” of what he was doing, “to fuse political purpose and artistic purpose into one whole.” Set at Manor Farm, run by Mr. and Mrs. Jones, Animal Farm begins with a sketch of farm life from the perspective of the animals. Jones, who drinks excessively, and his non-descript wife do little to care for the animals while living off the animals’ labor. It is old Major, the prize Middle White boar, who speaks in his old age of better times when the animals will set their own laws and enjoy the products of their labor. He tells the farm animals, “All the habits of Man are evil,” and he warns them to avoid human vices, such as living in houses, sleeping in beds, wearing clothes, drinking alcohol, smoking tobacco, touching money, and engaging in trade. It is old Major who leads the farm animals in their first song of solidarity, which they sing so loudly that they wake the Joneses. Jones, hearing the ruckus and assuming that a fox is responsible for it, fires shots into the darkness and disperses the animals. Three nights later, old Major dies peacefully in his sleep. With him dies the selfless belief system needed to enact his vision.

As old Major has predicted, the overthrow of the Joneses and Manor Farm occurs. Jones, increasingly incapacitated by alcohol, neglects the animals and the fields and finally leaves the animals to starve. In their desperation, the starving animals attack Jones and drive him off Manor Farm. Mrs. Jones flees by another way. Though the humans have been overthrown, it is not harmony but a lengthy power struggle that follows.

In this power struggle, essentially between the two young boars Snowball and Napoleon, one sees at first a sort of idealism, especially in Snowball, who speaks of a system that sounds much like Orwell’s particular vision of “democratic Socialism.” The animals begin by renaming Manor Farm as Animal Farm and by putting into print their seven commandments, designed primarily to identify their tenets and to discourage human vices among themselves. At first, the new order almost appears to work: “Nobody stole, nobody grumbled. . . . Nobody shirked—or almost nobody.” In fact, Orwell’s animals have human weaknesses that lead to their destruction. Mollie, one of the horses, is vain and does not want to forfeit ribbons and lumps of sugar. The sheep, hens, and ducks are too dull to learn the seven commandments. Boxer, a horse, believes blindly in the work ethic and the wisdom of Napoleon. Benjamin, a donkey, is cynical, refusing to act or become involved because he believes his actions are irrelevant. He believes “hunger, hardship, and disappointment” are “the unalterable law of life.” In fact, the one action that Benjamin takes, a desperate attempt to prevent Napoleon from sending his friend Boxer to the glue factory, is futile. When he acts, his actions make no difference. Nothing changes.

Gradually, the pigs begin claiming the privileges of an elite ruling class. They eat better than the other animals, they work less, and they claim more political privileges in making major decisions. The outcome of the power struggle between Snowball and Napoleon is that Napoleon and his trained dogs drive Snowball into hiding. Snowball becomes in exile a sort of political scapegoat, a precursor to Emmanuel Goldstein in Nineteen Eighty-Four. Napoleon, now the totalitarian ruler of Animal Farm, rewrites history, convincing the other animals that Snowball was really the cause of all their problems and that he, Napoleon, is the solution to them.

Under Napoleon's rule, Animal Farm declines steadily. As the pigs break the commandments, they rewrite them to conform to the new order. The sheep bleat foolish slogans on Napoleon's behalf. Napoleon's emissary, Squealer, a persuasive political speaker, convinces the increasingly oppressed animals that nothing has changed, that the commandments are as they always were, that history remains as it always was, that they are not doing more work and reaping fewer benefits. Squealer, in his distortion of history and his abuse of language for political purposes, is a precursor of Winston Smith and the other employees in the Ministry of Truth in Nineteen Eighty-Four who spend their days rewriting history and stripping the English language of its meaning. Ironically, all the animals pour their energy into creating a system that leads to their oppression.

The final decay of Animal Farm results from the pigs' engaging in all the human evils about which old Major had forewarned them. The pigs become psychologically and even physically indistinguishable from the humans. The pigs wear clothing, sleep in beds, drink alcohol, walk on two legs, wage wars, engage in trade, and destroy their own kind. Ultimately, despite old Major's vision, nothing has changed. The pigs and their dogs have become bureaucrats and tyrants: "neither pigs nor dogs produced any food by their own labour."

Though Animal Farm is antitotalitarian, it cannot really be called prodemocratic Socialism, except in the sense of a warning, because the animals have no choice; the course of their fate appears inevitable. Even if they had been given a choice, little in the novel indicates that it would have mattered. The final image in the novel is of the oppressed "creatures" outside the house looking through the window at the pigs and men fighting over a card game. They "looked from pig to man, and from man to pig, and from pig to man again; but already it was impossible to say which was which."

NINETEEN EIGHTY-FOUR

First published: 1949

Type of work: Novel

In the year 1984 in the oppressive society of Oceania, the protagonist Winston Smith futilely tries to preserve his humanity.

Nineteen Eighty-Four, a grim satire directed against totalitarian government, is the story of Winston Smith's futile battle to survive in a system that he has helped to create. The novel is set in 1984 (well into the future when the novel was written) in London, the chief city of Airstrip One, the third most populous of the provinces of Oceania, one of three world powers that are philosophically indistinguishable from, and perpetually at war with, one another.

Smith, thirty-nine, is in marginal health, drinks too much, and lives alone in his comfortless apartment at Victory Mansions, where he is constantly under the eye of a television surveillance system referred to as Big Brother. Smith's wife, Katharine, who lived with him briefly in a loveless marriage—the only kind of marriage permitted by the government—has long since faded from Smith's life, and his day-to-day existence has become meaningless, except insofar as he has memories of a time in his childhood before his mother disappeared. In the midst of this meaningless existence, Smith is approached clandestinely by Julia, a woman who works with him in the Ministry of Truth. She passes him a note that says, "I love you."

The next several months are passed with "secret" meetings between Winston and Julia. From Mr. Charrington, a shopkeeper from whom Winston has bought a diary and an ornamental paperweight, they secure what they believe is a room with privacy from Big Brother's surveillance. During these months together, Winston and Julia begin to hope for a better life. Part of this hope leads them to seek out members of the Brotherhood, an underground resistance movement purportedly led by Emmanuel Goldstein, the official "Enemy of the People." In their search for the Brotherhood, Winston and Julia approach O'Brien, a member of the Inner Party, a man who they believe is part of Goldstein's Brotherhood. Smith trusts only Julia, O'Brien, and Mr. Charrington. He feels that he can trust no one else in a society in which friend betrays friend and child betrays parent. Both he and Julia know and articulate their knowledge that, in resisting the government and Big Brother, they have doomed themselves. Still, they seem to hope, much as the oppressed animals in Orwell's Animal Farm embrace hope in a hopeless situation.

Winston and Julia's small hopes are destroyed when they are arrested by the Thought Police, who surround them in their "private" apartment. They are further disillusioned when they learn that Mr. Charrington is a member of the Thought Police and that their every movement during the past months has been monitored. Winston realizes further, when he is later being tortured at the Ministry of Love, that O'Brien is supervising the torture.

Evident in both the Ministry of Truth, where history is falsified and language is reduced and muddled, and in the Ministry of Love, where political dissidents and others are tortured, is Orwell's preoccupation with the effects of paradoxical political language.

Even the slogans of the Party are paradoxical: "War Is Peace," "Freedom Is Slavery," and "Ignorance Is Strength." The Ministry of Truth, particularly, is concerned with reducing language, moving toward an ideal language called Newspeak. To clarify the purpose of the language purges, Orwell includes an appendix, "The Principles of Newspeak," in which he explains that Newspeak, the official language of Oceania, has been devised "to meet the ideological needs of Ingsoc, or English Socialism." Once Newspeak is fully adopted, "a heretical thought—that is, a thought diverging from the principles of Ingsoc—should be literally unthinkable." It is because Winston Smith still knows Oldspeak that he has been able to commit Thought Crime.

In the Ministry of Love, Smith comes to understand how totalitarian control works, but he continually wonders about the reasons for it. Why, for example, should Big Brother care about him? It is O'Brien who provides Smith with the answer: power. Power, as O'Brien explains, is an end in itself. Power will destroy everything in its path. O'Brien concludes that, when all else is gone, power will remain:

But always—do not forget this, Winston—always there will be the intoxication of power, constantly increasing and constantly growing subtler. Always, at every moment, there will be the thrill of victory, the sensation of trampling on an enemy who is helpless. If you want a picture of the future, imagine a boot stamping on a human face—forever.

The purpose, then, of totalitarian government becomes only that of sustaining its feeling of power.

Still, even late in the novel, when O'Brien forces Smith to look into a mirror at his naked, tortured body and his "ruined" face, Smith clings to the idea of his humanity. He says to O'Brien, "I have not betrayed Julia." Yet Smith is stripped of this last tie to his humanity before Orwell's bleak vision is complete.

After a brief time of physical recovery, Smith wakes from a dream, talking in his sleep of his love for Julia. He has retained some part of his will and concludes of Big Brother and the Party: "To die hating them, that was freedom." Whatever he says in his sleep is, of course, being monitored by Big Brother. As a result, Smith faces his ultimate horror, the horror that makes him betray Julia. Physically and mentally ruined, Smith is released from the Ministry of Love to await the death that O'Brien has promised him. Smith retains only enough self-awareness to tell Julia, during their final brief meeting, that he has betrayed her. She, too has betrayed him.

Winston's final defeat is encapsulated in the last words of the novel, seconds after the "long-hoped-for bullet" is "entering his brain." He has become convinced of the insanity of his earlier views; his struggle is finished: "He loved Big Brother."

“SHOOTING AN ELEPHANT”

First published: 1936 (collected in Shooting an Elephant, and Other Essays, 1950)

Type of work: Essay

In a narrative account of shooting an elephant unnecessarily, Orwell argues that the experience showed him the “real nature of imperialism.”

Based on Orwell’s experience with the Indian Imperial Police (1922-1927), “Shooting an Elephant” is set in Moulmein, in Lower Burma. Orwell, the narrator, has already begun to question the presence of the British in the Far East. He says that, theoretically and secretly, he was “all for the Burmese and all against their oppressors, the British.” Orwell describes himself as “young and ill-educated,” bitterly hating his job.

Orwell’s job, in this instance, is to respond to a report of the death of a local man who was killed by an elephant in musth. Orwell finds the man “lying on his belly with arms crucified and head sharply twisted to the side.” The corpse grins with “an expression of unendurable agony.” At this point, Orwell feels the collective will of the crowd urging him to shoot the elephant, but Orwell, knowing that the elephant is probably no longer dangerous, has no intention of shooting the elephant. He begins to anthropomorphize the elephant, changing the pronouns from “it” to “he,” referring to the elephant’s “preoccupied grandmotherly air,” and concluding that “it would be murder to shoot the elephant.”

Despite Orwell’s aversion to shooting the elephant, he becomes suddenly aware that he will lose face and be humiliated if he does not shoot it. He therefore shoots the elephant. The death itself is sustained in excruciating detail. After three shots, the elephant still does not die. Orwell fires his two remaining shots into the elephant’s heart. He sends someone to get his small rifle, then pours “shot after shot into his heart and down his throat.” Still, the elephant does not die. Orwell, unable to stand the elephant’s suffering and unable to watch and listen to it, goes away. The elephant, like the Burmese people, has become the unwitting victim of the British imperialist’s need to save face. No one is stronger for the experience.

Orwell candidly depicts his unsympathetic actions both in shooting the elephant and in the aftermath, when he is among his fellow British police officers. He is relieved, he admits, that the coolie died, because it gave him a pretext for shooting the elephant. As far as his fellow officers are concerned, he did the right thing. As far as the natives are concerned, he saved face. Yet Orwell concludes, “I often wondered whether any of the others grasped that I had done it solely to avoid looking a fool.”

Throughout the essay, Orwell weaves his thesis about the effects of imperialism not only on the oppressed but on the oppressors, as well. He says that “every white man’s life in the East was one long struggle not to be laughed at,” that “when the white man turns tyrant it is his own freedom that he destroys,” and that the imperialist “becomes a sort of hollow, posing dummy, the conventionalized figure of a sahib.” Orwell’s essay, however, is more than one person’s riveting narrative about the beginning of an awareness. “Shooting an Elephant” captures a universal experience of going against one’s own humanity at the cost of a part of that humanity.

“POLITICS AND THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE”

First published: 1946 (collected in Shooting an Elephant, and Other Essays, 1950)

Type of work: Essay

Orwell analyzes the corrupting influence of political language on clear thinking and concludes that “political speech and writing are largely the defence of the indefensible.”

“Politics and the English Language,” though written in 1946, remains timely for modern students of language. In this essay, Orwell argues that the English language becomes “ugly and inaccurate because our thoughts are foolish, but the slovenliness of our language makes it easier for us to have foolish thoughts.” To illustrate his point, Orwell cites writing from two professors, a Communist pamphlet, an essay on psychology in Politics, and a letter in the Tribune. All these examples, Orwell argues, have two common faults: staleness of imagery and lack of precision. In his follow-up analysis, he discusses general characteristics of bad writing, including pretentious diction and meaningless words. His purpose in the analysis is to show “the special connection between politics and the debasement of language.”

Orwell maintains that, in his time, political speech and writing are “largely the defence of the indefensible.” That is, the actions of ruthless politicians can be defended, but only by brutal arguments that “do not square with the professed aims of political parties.” He gives examples of the British rule in India, the Russian purges and deportations, and the dropping of the atom bombs on Japan. In order to talk about such atrocities, Orwell contends, one has to use political language that consists “largely of euphemism, question-begging and sheer cloudy vagueness.” Orwell translates for his readers the real meanings of such terms as “pacification,” “transfer of population,” “rectification of frontiers,” and “elimination of unreliable elements.” He concludes: “Political language—and with variations this is true of all political parties, from Conservatives to Anarchists—is designed to make lies sound truthful and murder respectable, and to give an appearance of solidity to pure wind.”

This premise is one that Orwell explores more fully in his novels Animal Farm, particularly in the pigs Napoleon and Squealer, and Nineteen Eighty-Four in Big Brother, Newspeak, and the Ministry of Truth. Orwell’s conclusion in “Politics and the English Language” is less bleak than are his conclusions in the two novels. In the novels, the damage to language is irreversible. In the essay, Orwell calls his readers to action. He asserts that bad habits spread by imitation “can be avoided if one is willing to take the necessary trouble.” He concludes that “one can even, if one jeers loudly enough, send some worn-out and useless phrase . . . into the dustbin where it belongs.”

Orwell’s 1946 essay is still calling readers to action. In 1974, for example, the National Council of Teachers of English began handing out its annual Doublespeak Awards for misuses of language with potential to cause harm or obscure truth. The awards, named in honor of Orwell, are meant to identify deceptive uses of language and to jeer them out of existence. Not surprisingly, perhaps, there is no shortage of nominees.

SUMMARY

George Orwell’s novels and essays have contributed to current literary and political writing an awareness of the connections among language and thinking and political actions. Particularly in his later works, Orwell focused his purpose on writing, merging art with politics, attacking the effects of the power motives of totalitarian governments in one’s humanity, warning his readers of the dangers inherent in “groupthink” and “doublespeak,” and grimly satirizing the human traits that have let oppressed peoples become the victims of those intoxicated by power. Though Orwell’s writing career, by twentieth century standards, was fairly short, several of his essays and novels hold for him a place in Western literature and in political thought.

Carol Franks

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Burmese Days, 1934

A Clergyman’s Daughter, 1935

Keep the Aspidochelone Flying, 1936

Coming up for Air, 1939

Animal Farm, 1945

Nineteen Eighty-Four, 1949

NONFICTION:

Down and Out in Paris and London, 1933
The Road to Wigan Pier, 1937
Homage to Catalonia, 1938
Inside the Whale, and Other Essays, 1940
The Lion and the Unicorn, 1941
Critical Essays, 1946 (pb. in the U.S. as Dickens, Dali, and Others)
Shooting an Elephant, and Other Essays, 1950
Such, Such Were the Joys, 1953
The Collected Essays, Journalism, and Letters of George Orwell, 1968 (4 volumes; Sonia Orwell and Ian Angus, editors)
Orwell: The War Broadcasts, 1985 (Orwell: The War Commentaries, 1986)
The Lost Orwell, 2006 (Peter Davison, editor)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Orwell: The Lost Writings, 1985
The Complete Works of George Orwell, 1986-1998 (20 volumes; Peter Davison, editor)

About the Author

Bowker, Gordon. George Orwell. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003.
 Connelly, Mark. The Diminished Self: Orwell and the Loss of Freedom. Pittsburgh, Pa.: Duquesne University Press, 1987.
 Cushman, Thomas, and John Rodden, eds. George Orwell: Into the Twenty-first Century. Boulder, Colo.: Paradigm, 2004.
 Gardner, Averil. George Orwell. Boston: Twayne, 1987.
 Hitchens, Christopher. Why Orwell Matters. New York: Basic Books, 2002.
 Hunter, Lynette. George Orwell: The Search for a Voice. Milton Keynes, England: Open University Press, 1984.
 Jensen, Ejner J., ed. The Future of "Nineteen Eighty-Four". Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1987.
 Meyers, Jeffrey. Orwell: Wintry Conscience of a Generation. New York: W. W. Norton, 2000.
 Muller, Gilbert H. Major Modern Essayists. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1991.
 Taylor, D. J. Orwell: The Life. New York: Henry Holt, 2003.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How does George Orwell, in such works as "A Hanging" and "Shooting an Elephant," make vivid the evils of imperialism?
- What does Animal Farm owe to the medieval bestiary?
- What is a dystopian novel? Is a dystopia an intended utopia that has somehow gone wrong?
- Looking back at two of the most famous twentieth century works of the type, Aldous Huxley's Brave New World (1932) and Orwell's Nineteen Eighty-Four, which seems like a more prophetic book?
- Is Orwell correct about the extent of political influence on the English language, or is the "indefensible" use of the English language primarily a result of other influences, such as advertising?

Hulton Archive/Getty Images

JOHN OSBORNE

Born: London, England
December 12, 1929

Died: Shropshire, England
December 24, 1994

*Osborne's powerful domestic drama, Look Back in Anger, established the character of the "angry young man" in modern British theater. Subsequent plays developed and enlarged that character and its literary context.*

BIOGRAPHY

John James Osborne was born in Fulham, a grimy district of south London, England, on December 12, 1929, the only son of Thomas Godfrey Osborne, who worked as a copywriter for an advertising agency, and Nellie Beatrice Osborne, who worked as a barmaid. Osborne's father died when Osborne was ten, and at least partially sentimental portraits of fathers and grandfathers figure prominently in Osborne's plays, as do unflattering portraits of mother figures, as Osborne's relationship with his mother was not very satisfactory. His unhappy middle-class childhood and adolescence are vividly portrayed in the first volume of his autobiography, A Better Class of Person: An Autobiography, 1929-1956 (1981). The second and last volume of his autobiography, Almost a Gentleman (1991), covers an additional decade.

At fifteen, Osborne was expelled from St. Michael's, an undistinguished boarding school in Devon, for hitting a teacher. Three years later, while working as a journalist for trade magazines, Osborne drifted into his theater career, which began when he took a job as an assistant stage manager, actors' understudy, and tutor of juvenile troop members. After working seven years touring English provincial theaters and writing plays in his spare time, Osborne became an overnight sensation at the age of twenty-six when his third play, Look Back in Anger (pr. 1956, pb. 1957), was accepted by the English Stage Company and performed at the Royal Court Theatre, London, under the artistic direction of George Devine.

Look Back in Anger opened on May 8, 1956, and in a review in The Observer on Sunday, May 13, the legendary theater critic Kenneth Tynan hailed Osborne's work as "the best young play of its decade," adding, "I doubt if I could love anyone who did not wish to see Look Back in Anger." A Royal Court Theatre publicist described Osborne as an "angry young man," and that phrase came to designate a whole generation of British male writers, both playwrights and novelists, who came to be known as "the angry young men." Their work was typified by their working-class backgrounds, their irreverence for the traditional British establishment, and an intolerance for anything "highbrow" or "phoney." In the theater, Osborne's ruthless honesty with language and subject matter inspired a generation of vigorous British playwrights, including Arnold Wesker, John Arden, Harold Pinter, and Tom Stoppard. Look Back in Anger ran for a year and a half, was transferred to New York, and for years enjoyed enormous success in various touring productions around the world.

Osborne's next two plays, The Entertainer (pr., pb. 1957) and Epitaph for George Dillon (pr., pb. 1958), were also big hits. In 1959, however, The World of Paul Slickey was a critical and commercial disaster. Many more plays, television scripts, and film scripts followed in the 1960's and 1970's, but the general impression created by Osborne's work was that he was not fulfilling the promise he had exhibited in Look Back in Anger. Highlights in this relatively disappointing period included Luther (pr., pb. 1961), a dramatization of the life of Martin Luther; Inadmissible Evidence (pr. 1964, pb. 1965), in which a middle-aged lawyer tries to justify his disappointing life; The Hotel in Amsterdam (pr., pb. 1968), in which three couples meet in a first-class hotel and define their lives by their hatred of a tyrannical film producer; and the first volume of his autobiography, A Better Class of Person.

In 1958, Osborne joined with Tony Richardson, the original director of Look Back in Anger, to form Woodfall Films. His greatest popular success in screenwriting was winning an Academy Award for writing Tom Jones (1963), his adaptation of the 1749 novel by Henry Fielding. Among his many other projects, he successfully adapted three of his own plays for film: Look Back in Anger (1959), The Entertainer (1960), and Inadmissible Evidence (1968). Osborne also received the New York Drama Critics Circle Award (1957, 1963) and the Tony Award (1963). In 1991, Osborne published the second volume of his autobiography, and in 1993 he received a Lifetime Achievement Award from the Writers' Guild of Great Britain.

In 1958, Osborne had bought a twenty-three-acre estate in Kent that subsequently served as a refuge for his reclusive way of life. In 1978, he married his fifth wife, Helen Dawson, a drama critic. Osborne died in Shropshire, England, on December 24, 1994, of heart failure.

ANALYSIS

It is traditional to say that Osborne's Look Back in Anger represents a turning point in the history of British theater, ending the era of the 1930's and 1940's and ushering in the new, more contemporary style of the 1950's and 1960's. In British theater, the 1930's, 1940's, and early 1950's had been dominated by the esoteric verse dramas of T. S. Eliot and Christopher Fry, the aristocratic drawing-room comedies of Noël Coward, the commercial successes of Terence Rattigan, and the revivals of time-tested classics. In Look Back in Anger and subsequent plays, Osborne offered different fare.

His subject was not genteel, upper-class life but the life of contemporary, rough, and often unsophisticated working-class people. He was critical of British culture both past and present. Detesting the British elitism that emphasized class distinctions, Osborne questioned the conventional pride in England's Edwardian past and was equally critical of England's post-World War II welfare state, scoffing at anything "highbrow" or "phoney." His style was robust, even coarse, rather than elevated or dainty. These qualities of political attitude and style were the features that brought Osborne so much attention when he became a London phenomenon in the late 1950's. Since then, the more enduring feature of Osborne's drama has become the Osborne hero, modeled after the original "angry young man," Jimmy Porter in Long Back in Anger; Archie Rice in The Entertainer; George Dillon in Epitaph for George Dillon; Bill Maitland in Inadmissible Evidence; Pamela in Time Present (pr., pb. 1968), and perhaps even Martin Luther in Luther are all, more or less, heroes in the Jimmy Porter mold.

Like Jimmy, these heroes are often outspoken and irreverent in their criticism of contemporary British society, frequently angry, alienated, bitter, caustic, insensitive, and critical of people and things around them. Sometimes these characters brutalize those closest to them as they strike out from their personal pain. They are often failures, but not simply because they suffer from class distinctions. Mainly, they suffer and fail because they experience the past as a terrible burden. They often look back at their lives and find them very unsatisfactory. These are not genteel characters one can analyze from a distance with a detached attitude. These characters demand an emotional, complex, and often sympathetic response. In an oft-quoted statement, Osborne had said, "I want to make people feel, to give them lessons in feeling. They can think afterwards." The richness and complexity of Osborne's art in these characterizations is that in spite of their many unpleasant characteristics, these Osborne heroes are often still compelling. They are what American critic Harold Ferrar has called "the bastard we can't help caring about."

Yet the quality and prevalence in Osborne's drama of this kind of character also constitute a literary deficiency. At his best, Osborne creates an unforgettable portrait that may live forever in theatrical history; such a portrait was achieved in Jimmy Porter. This sort of angry hero, however, often becomes so dominant in Osborne's plays that other characters seem one-dimensional and cardboardlike in comparison. This charge is sometimes even made about Look Back in Anger, in which Jimmy's friend, Cliff, is seen as a cartoon sidekick, and Helena, a friend of Jimmy's wife, Alison, is seen as an unconvincing contrivance of plot when she suddenly accepts the abusive Jimmy as a lover at the end of act 2 and then gives him up just as suddenly in the last scene when Alison returns. Furthermore, the heroes who succeeded Jimmy Porter generally pale in comparison with their startling original counterpart, and Osborne seemed to be repeating himself without adding depth or dimension.

Some of Osborne's most interesting, if flawed, developments as a dramatist came after his great early successes. Though his later experiments were not tremendously successful, Osborne did move on to more technically innovative work. In The World of Paul Slickey, for example, Osborne made a clumsy attempt at the musical form. In his teleplay A Subject of Scandal and Concern (1960), Osborne attempted to employ historical materials for dramatic purposes, even though he did not achieve that harmonious blend of past and present that makes such materials come alive onstage.

In Luther, Osborne achieved more artistic success in shifting from a contemporary to a historical hero, though Osborne focused more on the unsophisticated and troubled personal psychology of Martin Luther than he did on the historical context of the Protestant Reformation. To many commentators, this play's focus on Luther's obsession with constipation seems distracting and not artistically effective, a retreat from the potential significance of such a monumental historical subject. Simon Trussler (The Plays of John Osborne, 1969) found a way to bring the two subjects together: "the evacuation of the bowels and the purification of the church are thus conceived as parallel processes in the life of the eponymous hero." More to the point, perhaps, is that Osborne was here enlarging the portrait of his typical hero, this time working out, on a great historical stage, his hero's difficult past relationship with his father.

In Osborne's boldest and perhaps most successful technical experiment, Inadmissible Evidence, Bill Maitland's mental breakdown is portrayed in a dream sequence that locates the play's action in the courtroom of Maitland's mind. In The Hotel in Amsterdam, Osborne seemed to be attempting to break from his focus on a single hero to create more of an ensemble approach to drama.

Osborne's historical importance is assured because Look Back in Anger altered the style and subject matter of a whole generation of British writers. The great nineteenth century poet and critic Matthew Arnold insisted that historical importance should not be confused with artistic importance, but Look Back in Anger is both a historical watershed and a significant artistic success.

LOOK BACK IN ANGER

First produced: 1956 (first published, 1957)

Type of work: Play

A pathologically unhappy and bitter young man vents his anger on all around him and is estranged from but then eventually reconciled with his wife.

Look Back in Anger opens on a lazy, mid-1950's Sunday afternoon in a one-room attic apartment in a town in the English Midlands. As usual, Jimmy Porter and his friend and business partner, Cliff Lewis, are reading the Sunday papers while Jimmy's wife, Alison, irons. As usual, Jimmy is verbally bashing everyone and everything around him, including Cliff and Alison—who seem to take his anger in stride.

What makes Jimmy so angry? To support a political reading of Look Back in Anger, critics cite Jimmy's famous speech near the end of the play, "there aren't any good, brave causes left," suggesting that Jimmy's anger comes from his disappointment that the faded Edwardian glory of England can no longer be real and felt with conviction and enthusiasm. This interpretation is supported by an earlier passage in the play in which Jimmy is quite nostalgic about the Edwardian world of Alison's father, Colonel Redfern: "all home-made cakes and croquet, bright ideas, bright uniforms . . . what a romantic picture." Jimmy admits that "if you've no world of your own, it's rather pleasant to regret the passing of someone else's."

In his contemporary England, Jimmy sees only political decay and the pretense of continued health. As an intelligent, articulate, and educated twenty-five-year-old, Jimmy has not been able to find work that matches his skills, so he earns a meager living running a street-corner candy stand with Cliff as his partner. Part of him reaches for more success, symbolized most eloquently in his frequent, offstage riffs on his jazz trumpet, but part of him mistrusts success because he does not trust aspiration in a country where aspiration is associated with all that is false and hollow. From his demeaning social position, Jimmy lashes out at all the self-important people around him. His anger strikes at everything associated with British bureaucracy, but, unhappily, it also overflows into mistreatment of his wife and his friend Cliff.

A more psychological and domestic interpretation of the play often points to Jimmy's pain over his father's death. When Jimmy was ten years old, he spent a year watching his father die. To him, the rest of the family did not seem to care, and Jimmy sees a similar lack of sensitivity in Alison. He calls her "Lady Pusillanimous" (meaning cowardly), a "monument to non-attachment," and in one of his verbal tirades even wishes that some catastrophe would shock her out of her lethargy, even something horrible such as having a child die. This is indeed what happens, and that tragedy serves, ironically, as the reconciling force in their marriage.

There are other interpretations of Jimmy's anger, but his complexity derives from the fact that the precise cause of his discontent remains elusive. In fact, audiences and critics find Jimmy compelling because the richness of his pain defies final analysis.

Jimmy's anger cools a little at the end of the play but only because his conflict with Alison is resolved at a very great price. When Alison discovers that she is pregnant, an old friend, Helena Charles, comes to stay with the Porters, and Jimmy's badgering intensifies; his harassment is eventually directed toward Helena. In reaction, Helena convinces Alison that she should leave Jimmy and live again with her father, and Alison leaves. At the end of act 2, however, Helena is drawn by some strange attraction to Jimmy and offers herself to him, becoming his mistress. When act 3 begins, it is Sunday afternoon again and Jimmy and Cliff are once more reading their Sunday papers. Now, however, in a mirror image of the opening of the play, Helena has replaced Alison at the ironing board.

Both the resolution of the conflict and the end of the play come as Alison returns, having lost both the baby and her fertility. In a scene that some critics find insufficiently motivated, Helena leaves and gives Jimmy back to Alison. The play ends with Jimmy and Alison reconciling, in part because Jimmy is satisfied that Alison's pain has brought her more in tune with his own suffering. The reconciliation is richly ambiguous. Have Jimmy and Alison repaired a marriage worth saving, or have they simply hid from problems they cannot face and handle? The enduring quality of Look Back in Anger is that either of these readings, and more, can be defended.

THE ENTERTAINER

First produced: 1957 (first published, 1957)

Type of work: Play

A third-rate music-hall comic fails as the father of a thoroughly unhappy family.

In The Entertainer, Osborne's hero is Archie Rice, a pathetic music-hall performer whose domestic life is as much a failure as his comedy act. Himself an admirer of the English music hall and its vaudevillian traditions, Osborne alternates domestic scenes of the Rice family with scenes of Archie's coarse patter in the music hall to symbolize the decline of imperial England. In its late nineteenth and early twentieth century heyday, the music hall was an important expression of urban working-class pride, an entertainment that avoided anything "highbrow," serious, or intellectual. By the 1950's, the music hall had been replaced by cinema and television, degenerating into an even more decadent popular art, and in this mid-1950's music hall Archie is merely a comic setup man for a tacky striptease.

The family unit headed by Archie is equally disappointing. As a father, Archie is self-centered and insensitive, viciously ridiculing his own doddering father, Billy, who lives with the family in their dilapidated and noisy slum apartment. Archie's wife, Phoebe, is a pathetic alcoholic who endures Archie's sexual infidelity by retreating mindlessly to the cinema. The play's action takes place in 1956, during the Suez conflict, when Egypt seized control of the Suez Canal. Frank, Archie and Phoebe's elder son, is a conscientious objector, fresh from six months in prison. Frank works two menial jobs. Mick, Archie and Phoebe's younger son, has accepted the call for army service in Cyprus but has been captured and made a prisoner of war. Jean, Archie's daughter by his first marriage, is a more sensitive person, having thrown off the old-fashioned and sexist attention of her conservative boyfriend, Graham, but, under the influence of a little too much gin, Jean seems equally incapable of strengthening the family unit. As the family members squabble throughout the play, it is clear that they all exist in their own little worlds, seldom listening to or really communicating with one another. In many ways, The Entertainer can be seen as an English version of Eugene O'Neill's Long Day's Journey into Night (pr., pb. 1956); both are portraits of profound domestic failure.

The climax of the action comes with the news that Mick, thought to be released and on his way home, has been killed. Compounded with that grief is the soon-to-follow funeral for Billy; Archie had attempted to get Billy back onto the music-hall stage in order to revive Archie's own career. In the last scene, Archie is on stage and the symbolic tax man, whom Archie has been cheating for the last twenty years, is waiting in the wings, like death, to take Archie to jail. Archie is supported in his last minutes by Phoebe, but there is no hopeful vision of an improved marriage as the lights snap out for the last time. Osborne's vision of the domestic future of the Rice family is as bleak as his vision of England's future as a world power.

One of the most interesting theatrical aspects of The Entertainer is that the renowned British classical actor, Sir Laurence Olivier, took the role of Archie Rice in its initial London production. In Look Back in Anger, Osborne had made himself into a literary phenomenon by belittling the British establishment. Olivier was a significant member of that es-tablishment's theater wing, but when he expressed an interest in Osborne's work, Olivier was cast as Archie Rice; Olivier's star status, along with a chillingly real performance, made The Entertainer a smash hit. It was soon transferred to London's West End and then was made into a successful film. After his first two plays, Osborne was himself a bona fide "star," part of a new establishment.

LUTHER

First produced: 1961 (first published, 1961)

Type of work: Play

A young man rebels against his father by becoming a monk and then rebels against the Catholic Church by leading the revolution that creates Protestantism.

In the first of its twelve episodic scenes, Luther opens in Germany in 1506 with the young Martin Luther joining an Augustinian monastery against his father's wishes. Luther has chosen a life of austere asceticism, while his father, a miner with entrepreneurial aspirations, had wished for his son a professional life with greater social stature. In this and subsequent scenes covering much of Martin's life, Luther displays naïveté, anger, and an almost pathological self-hatred. At one point, Martin says, "I'm like a ripe stool in the world's straining anus." Throughout the play, Martin is obsessed with physical health and, most specifically, with the working of his bowels.

In the second scene, a year later, Martin prepares for and performs his first Communion Mass, with his estranged father in attendance. In the crucial third scene of the play, Martin talks with his highly judgmental father after the celebration of the Communion, and an argument ensues in which Martin's father accuses his son of running away from life. At one point, Martin says "you make me sick," and this otherwise casual, colloquial phrase is the key to the scene. Martin's chronic constipation is a symbolic representation of his frustrated love for his father, his failure to please his father, and his conflicted attempt to run away from his biological roots. During the play, Martin adopts a more positive father figure, a high-ranking member of the Augustinian order, Johann von Staupitz, but that relationship clearly never compensates for Martin's initial loss of his father.

Martin's revolt against the Catholic Church is an extension of his conflict with his biological father, and Martin's friendship with Staupitz is an attempt to find peace with authority figures. In the scenes comprising the middle of the play, Martin battles several authority figures in the established Church—a seller of phony papal indulgences, a distinguished cardinal, and even the pope himself. Martin's father had believed that humans were not saved by their works, their good deeds; Martin adopts this view, adding to it the revolutionary notion that faith alone was the spiritual alternative to Catholicism. Consistent with the play's scatological theme, Martin reports that his inspiration for his famous and revolutionary Ninety-five Theses came to him while he was straining to empty his bowels.

In leading the Protestant Reformation, Luther liberated the common people to approach Christian salvation individually, without patriarchal intermediaries. Osborne, however, implies that this great historical revolution might have had a very prosaic foundation. In the penultimate scene of the play, the unruly Peasants' Revolt in Germany of 1524-1525 has failed, and Martin helps to crush it. In the final scene, set in 1530, Martin is a tired, middle-aged man, now married to a former nun and the father of a child himself. In the last moment of the play, Martin tenderly and hopefully addresses his own infant son, named Hans after Martin's father. The cycle of father and son relationships has come full circle.

SUMMARY

John Osborne's historical importance in modern British drama is seldom questioned. His play Look Back in Anger gave a name, "the angry young men," to a whole generation of British writers. There is also no doubting the solid theatrical quality of his first big hit, since the compelling portrait of Jimmy Porter continues to command the stage wherever Osborne's play is revived. His prolific output includes more than forty other stage, screen, and television plays.

Terry Nienhuis

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

DRAMA:

- Look Back in Anger*, pr. 1956, pb. 1957
The Entertainer, pr., pb. 1957 (music by John Addison)
Epitaph for George Dillon, pr., pb. 1958 (with Anthony Creighton)
The World of Paul Slickey, pr., pb. 1959 (music by Christopher Whelen)
Luther, pr., pb. 1961
Plays for England: The Blood of the Bambers and Under Plain Cover, pr. 1962, pb. 1963
Inadmissible Evidence, pr. 1964, pb. 1965
A Bond Honored, pr., pb. 1966 (adaptation of Lope de Vega's play La fianza satistecna)
A Patriot for Me, pr., pb. 1966
The Hotel in Amsterdam, pr., pb. 1968
Time Present, pr., pb. 1968
Hedda Gabler, pr., pb. 1972 (adaptation of Henrik Ibsen's play)
A Sense of Detachment, pr. 1972, pb. 1973
Four Plays, pb. 1973
The Picture of Dorian Gray, pb. 1973, pr. 1975 (adaptation of Oscar Wilde's novel)
A Place Calling Itself Rome, pb. 1973 (adaptation of William Shakespeare's play Coriolanus)
West of Suez, pr., pb. 1973
Watch It Come Down, pb. 1975, pr. 1976
Déjàvu, pb. 1991, pr. 1992

Plays, pb. 1993-1998 (3 volumes)

Four Plays, pb. 2000

SCREENPLAYS:

Look Back in Anger, 1959 (adaptation of his stage play; with Nigel Kneale)

The Entertainer, 1960 (adaptation of his stage play; with Kneale)

Tom Jones, 1963 (adaptation of Henry Fielding's novel)

The Charge of the Light Brigade, 1968 (with Charles Wood)

Inadmissible Evidence, 1968 (adaptation of his stage play)

TELEPLAYS:

A Subject of Scandal and Concern, 1960 (originally as A Matter of Scandal and Concern)

The Right Prospectus, 1970

Very Like a Whale, 1971

The Gift of Friendship, 1972

Ms.: Or, Jill and Jack, 1974 (also known as Jill and Jack)

The End of Me Old Cigar, 1975

Try a Little Tenderness, 1978

You're Not Watching Me, Mummy, 1980

A Better Class of Person, 1985

God Rot Tunbridge Wells, 1985

The Picture of Dorian Gray, 1991 (adaptation of Oscar Wilde's novel)

NONFICTION:

A Better Class of Person: An Autobiography, 1929-1956, 1981

Almost a Gentleman: An Autobiography, Volume Two, 1955-1966, 1991

Damn You, England: Collected Prose, 1994

About the Author

Denison, Patricia D., ed. John Osborne: A Casebook. New York: Garland, 1997.

Goldstone, Herbert. Coping with Vulnerability: The Achievement of John Osborne. Washington, D.C.: University Press of America, 1982.

Heilpern, John. John Osborne: The Many Lives of the Angry Young Man. New York: Knopf, 2007.

Hinchliffe, Arnold P. John Osborne. Boston: Twayne, 1984.

Page, Malcolm. File on Osborne. London: Methuen, 1988.

Prater, Eugene Greeley. An Existential View of John Osborne. Freeman, S.Dak.: Pine Hill Press, 1993.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Make a list of at least five important qualities that help characterize the "John Osborne hero." Then find fictional heroes from contemporary literature and film who resemble the "Osborne hero."
- Research the state of the British Empire shortly after World War I and then its disintegration after World War II. Use this research to summarize in detail what Jimmy Porter might have been aware of as he contemplated the decline of Britain as a world power in the mid-1950's.
- Male anger is a crucial part of Osborne's plays. What role do women play in Osborne's drama?
- Some of Osborne's plays deal with the dysfunctional relationship between fathers and sons. Characterize these dysfunctional relationships and then compare them with the relationships between fathers and sons, both fictional and real, with which you are familiar.
- Discuss alienation and isolation in Osborne's plays.
- Examine Osborne's plays for theatrical qualities, that is, those qualities that are most evident when audiences see these plays performed on a stage.
- Compare Luther to The Life of Galileo (pr. 1943, pb. 1955) by the German playwright Bertolt Brecht or to A Man for All Seasons (pr., pb. 1960) by British playwright Robert Bolt. How are the plays similar and/or different?

OVID

Born: Sulmo, Roman Empire (now Sulmona, Italy)
March 20, 43 B.C.E.

Died: Tomis, on the Black Sea, Moesia (now Constanța, Romania)
17 C.E.

One of Italy's most renowned poets of the Augustan Age, Ovid influenced medieval and Renaissance authors and wrote a masterpiece that preserved for history many Greek and Roman myths.

BIOGRAPHY

Ovid (AH-vuhd) was born Publius Ovidius Naso into a relatively wealthy family in Sulmo, Italy, on March 20, 43 B.C.E., one year after the assassination of Julius Caesar. Ovid's father's name is thought to be Leonides. From an early age, Ovid showed a great interest in writing poetry, but his father discouraged him because he considered poetry an unprofitable pursuit for his son. At the age of twelve, Ovid was sent from his small town in the mountains of central Italy to Rome, less than a hundred miles away, where he was to be educated for a career in politics. This same year, 31 B.C.E., saw the Battle of Actium bring defeat to Cleopatra and Marc Antony at the hands of Octavian, the future Emperor Caesar Augustus; for the rest of his life, Ovid would be under the influence of Augustus.

Ovid learned from the best rhetoric teachers in Rome. In addition to writing and public speaking, he probably studied the language and literature of Greece. Roman writer Seneca was several years older than Ovid, but many years later Seneca wrote of observing the boy Ovid in class and said that even as a youth he displayed a talent for writing and that his prose was always poetic. In 26 or 25 B.C.E., when Ovid was in late adolescence, he read and recited some of his poetry in public.

After completing his schooling in Rome, Ovid probably spent his early twenties studying in Athens and traveling in Asia Minor, as was customary for educated young men. His knowledge of Greek and Roman poetry, drama, and myth was becoming impressive. Returning to Italy, Ovid settled in the capital of Rome. He was married early in life, but the marriage was not successful, nor was a second one, although it produced his only child, a daughter. Eventually, Ovid married a third time, and this marriage was long and apparently very happy.

For a brief time, he held minor political offices but decided quickly that politics had no appeal for him; at the age of twenty-three he chose, instead, to devote his life to the passion that had held him captive since childhood: writing poetry. It was a good time to be a poet in Rome because the emperor, Augustus, supported the arts as a means of reestablishing the old Roman virtues of hearth and home, patriotism, and morality. Unfortunately, Ovid's first publishing venture did not address those values.

Borrowing a traditional Roman subject, Ovid wrote a collection of erotic love poems. The precise date that Amores (c. 20 B.C.E.; English translation, 1597) was first published is unknown; no copy of it has survived, but a second edition of the work, also of unknown date, indicates that the original was published in five books, while the second edition was reduced to three. The Amores is a collection of fifty poems written in elegiac couplets, the meter that Ovid used for all of his poems except the Metamorphoses (c. 8 C.E.; English translation, 1567). Although the poems are written in the first person, the object was to present a wide range of experiences that any young Roman man might have had under the spell of love. Some of the experiences that the poet claims are conventional ones in love elegies; thus, critics warn against trying to find biographical information about Ovid himself in these early poems. Still, the poetry does contain a vivid portrait of Roman daily life at the races, at the theater, and at the banquet table, some of it fairly decadent.

While still writing the Amores, Ovid probably began another work, the Heroides (before 8 C.E.; English translation, 1567), a collection of fifteen letters written in the voices of mythological and legendary women. The letters are directed to the men in their lives at a moment of great emotional upheaval, heroic men whose stories were and are well known: Penelope to Ulysses, Medea to Jason, Dido to Aeneas. Ovid found an untold feminine perspective in the famous myths in the stories of the women who were swept aside in the wake of the hero and conveyed the poignance of their suffering.

Perhaps inspired by his work on the Heroides, sometime before 8 C.E., Ovid wrote his only play, the tragedy Medea, which was very well received. The Roman historian Cornelius Tacitus called it one of the greatest of Roman tragedies, but all that remains of it today are two lines quoted by his contemporaries. Given the play's apparent success, it is hard to imagine why he never wrote another. In any case, by this time his works had earned him quite a popular reputation. Sometime after his success with the drama, Ovid added to his earlier Heroides. The original work had contained only letters from women to their men; he added six more letters, this time from the heroes to their women and the women's replies. For example, Paris's love letter to Helen, while still a guest in her home in Greece, and her reply reveal the tentative beginnings of a passion that was to result in a long, heroic war.

By the time that Ovid was in his early forties, around 2 B.C.E., he wrote one of his most famous and influential books, the Ars amatoria (Art of Love, 1612). It was a type of work that was quite popular in Rome at the time, instructional poetry. The great author of the Aeneid (c. 29-19 B.C.E.; English translation, 1553), Vergil, for example, had written his Georgics (c. 37-29 B.C.E.; English translation, 1589) on methods of agriculture and animal husbandry. Ovid's latest work, however, contained lessons on the art of seduction.

The Art of Love may have proved to be the undoing of Ovid in the eyes of Augustus Caesar. The emperor was a generation older than Ovid and, unlike him, had lived through war and civil strife. At a time when moral standards were lax and divorce and adultery were rampant, the emperor was trying to effect sweeping moral reform in dissolute Rome; he promoted humble living, encouraged religious piety, upheld chastity and sanctity of marriage, and imposed laws against sexual misconduct. In short, he wanted Romans to return to the values and virtues of a simpler past that Ovid had not known. Ovid's work would seem to mock much that the emperor held dear. Ovid had written, for example, that others could pine for old times if they wished, but he preferred the present, and his Art of Love instructed men on such things as the best places in Rome to meet women and informed women on how to communicate secretly with their lovers at a banquet when their husbands were present. It was a sophisticated, titillating, and wildly popular work that seemed to fly in the face of the emperor's campaign, and just as the book reached its peak of popularity, the emperor discovered that his own daughter was an adulterer. Although Ovid must have been an irritant to the emperor, Augustus took no action against him at the time of the book's appearance; nonetheless, he apparently harbored a grudge against the poet and later made him pay dearly for his irreverence and lack of discretion.

As Ovid was approaching middle age, he began what would prove to be his masterpiece, a collection of about 250 stories from Greek and Roman mythology, linked by the theme of bodies transformed into new shapes, hence the title, Metamorphoses. His professed intent is to tell the history of metamorphosis chronologically from the beginning of time until his own times. His pseudohistory has the sweep and scope of an epic, for it not only begins with the creation of the world but also ranges through most of the known world: Europe, Africa, and Asia. Every hero and heroine of Greek and Roman legend and myth appears in the Metamorphoses; because the stories evolved from oral traditions and from written works that have vanished, Ovid's masterpiece preserved for history this rich Greco-Roman legacy.

By 8 C.E., Ovid was working on his final version of the Metamorphoses and had half completed a long poem about the holidays and rituals of the Roman calendar, the Fasti, for which the work is named, when disaster befell him. Emperor Augustus banished Ovid from Rome to Tomis, a bleak, semibarbarous outpost on the Black Sea (in modern Romania). A further indignity was that the emperor had all Ovid's books removed from public libraries. Since censorship was unusual in Rome, this action speaks loudly of the emperor's conviction that Ovid's works were morally degrading. The full reason will never be known, for Ovid would always insist that he had done nothing illegal or immoral, but he did say that his poetry was part of the reason for his downfall. Augustus had recently discovered that his own granddaughter, Julia, was an adulterer, as her mother had been. It is possible, therefore, that Ovid became a scapegoat for the emperor's inability to control his own family, much less reform Roman society.

Ovid was spared the harsher punishment of exile, which would have stripped him of citizenship and of property. He retained both, but because his beloved wife had to stay in Rome to oversee their estate and finances, they were separated forever. She wanted to accompany him to Tomis, but he refused, optimistically believing that the emperor would relent and let him return. As soon as he arrived in Tomis, Ovid immediately began attempts to ingratiate himself with Augustus, but as time passed and it was clear that Augustus would not be moved to show mercy to him, he was devastated. Ovid's remaining works would be written far from the people and the city that he loved, and almost every word that he wrote was to enlist sympathy for his cause and to persuade Augustus to recall him to Rome.

The first of Ovid's works in exile was a collection of poetic letters entitled Tristia (Sorrows, 1859), written between 8 and 12 C.E.; the poet's voice is filled with the sorrow of a man suffering loss and separation. He disguises the identities of the friends to whom the letters are written out of concern that association with him may be detrimental to the recipients. In truth, in some ways his banishment enhanced his fame, but at the same time some of his friends abandoned him. His next work, Ibis (after 8 C.E.; English translation, 1859), is an attack on just such a former friend whom historians have never been able to identify. His final work was Epistulae ex Ponto (after 8 C.E.; Letters from Pontus, 1639), another collection of letters that were not private missives but were clearly meant to be circulated and to be brought to the attention of Augustus. So that he would not be forgotten by the Romans, Ovid wrote a considerable amount of autobiography into his last works. For several years, Ovid humbled himself and argued his case, but Augustus remained deaf to his pleas and justifications. The emperor's death in 14 C.E. renewed Ovid's hopes of being returned to Rome, but Augustus's successor, Tiberius, also refused to relent.

For the first years of his banishment, Ovid was despondent; a man of great culture and learning, he was cast among barbarians whose language he did not speak. Despairing and ill because of the frigid climate, he felt isolated physically, emotionally, and intellectually. He was too social a creature, however, to remain set apart for long, and eventually he learned the language of the natives and, consummate poet that he was, composed a poem in it. Therefore, when Ovid died in Tomis at the age of fifty-nine or sixty in 17 C.E., far from the Rome that he loved, he was buried with honor by the local people with whom he had forged a mutual love and respect. Today, in Romania, a marker commemorates the great poet of Rome.

ANALYSIS

Along with Vergil, Ovid is the preeminent artist of Augustan Rome, and he has remained popular in part because of his subject matter. He glorifies human experience and, in the process, reveals a keen understanding of psychology and the human psyche. His books on finding love, his ability to represent the feminine perspective in male-dominated literature, and his portraits of heroes and gods (who are immortal and yet as flawed as any mortal) brim over with insights into the workings of minds, hearts, and souls. His human and humane concerns no doubt explain his great popularity through the ages and his huge influence on Western European arts and artists—medieval writers Dante and Geoffrey Chaucer, Renaissance writers Petrarch and, later, John Milton, as well as modern poet T. S. Eliot. Painters, sculptors, and composers, too, have been influenced by this prolific writer of Augustan Rome.

Ovid was famed for his great knowledge and use of myths in his art, and in his masterpiece, the Metamorphoses, he assumes the Herculean task of weaving 250 varied and complex stories into a coherent narrative. The work is a richly textured tapestry of stories that conform, for the most part, to his theme of eternal change.

The quality that most readers associate with Ovid is a sly, sophisticated wit. At a time when the emperor wanted nationalism and virtue celebrated in art, Ovid gave readers a taste of Roman humor. His own humor is never biting or sarcastic but good-natured. Additionally, he was fond of using irony as a comic device. His playfulness manifests itself in his work not only in his subject matter but also in his diction; he draws the reader's attention to the message and to the medium by using such techniques as plays on words, overstatement, paradox, echoes, and other devices. He was also one of the earliest writers to experiment with narrative perspective, the point of view from which a story is told. His Heroides presents famous stories from the perspective of characters traditionally regarded as secondary.

Realism is one of Ovid's great strengths as a writer; he had a keen eye for the telling details that breathe life into his stories. Capturing the exact pose, word, or physical detail, he burns the moment or scene into the reader's memory. One trait, however, for which both modern critics and his own contemporaries fault Ovid is his prolixity. Although his style itself is spare, he seems unable to offer only a few examples to support a point; instead, he piles example upon example upon example, soon wearying his reader.

The characteristic of Ovid's writing that makes him seem most modern is his inclination to express the point of view of women. In his love poetry, he includes advice to women about finding satisfactory love relationships, and he insists that the act of love should be a pleasure to both parties. In Heroides, he looks at the scene behind the hero, finds the forgotten or cruelly used woman, and gives her a voice, an opportunity to tell her story, which has usually been left out of the total picture.

Ovid was not given in general to philosophical musing or religious devotion; although his works are filled with gods and goddesses, to most Romans, religious observances were more form than substance, so that deities in Ovid's work would have commanded little credulity. What seems to have been most sacred to him are human experience and art. These are the subjects that he celebrates again and again in his writing.

METAMORPHOSES

First published: c. 8 C.E. (English translation, 1567)

Type of work: Poem

Beginning with the transformation of shapeless matter into the created world, the gods have, throughout all history, changed bodies from one form into another.

The Metamorphoses represents Ovid's greatest artistic challenge, 250 stories from Greek and Roman mythology, legend, and history woven into a loosely chronological continuous narrative, starting with the creation of the world and ending with the assassination of Julius Caesar. Written in the meter of epic poetry, dactylic hexameter, the stories concern the transformation of bodies into different forms, such as animals, plants, or stars, each story evolving from the preceding one. Almost every deity, hero, or heroine from classical times is represented in these tales. In fact, most of the myths with which modern readers are familiar were preserved by the Metamorphoses.

One important element that helps to hold this massive work together is the voice of the poet himself; instead of remaining completely outside the events that he narrates, Ovid asserts his presence in the poem by addressing the reader, as well as the characters, on occasion. The voice is witty, sophisticated, occasionally sympathetic, frequently mocking.

Ovid begins his tales with the ultimate metamorphosis, the transformation of primal cosmic matter into the beautiful, fruitful earth. He then describes the four ages of the earth, Golden, Silver, Bronze, and Iron, which saw the transformation of humanity from peaceful, innocent beings into bloodthirsty, deceitful exploiters of other humans and of the earth itself. An angry Jove intervenes in human affairs by sending a great flood and starting afresh with a new race of mortals, and the Metamorphoses begins, telling the story of one transformation after another through all of history and through most of the known world and Olympus. Some of the metamorphoses are grotesque, some humorous, some quaint, and some touching.

After the introductory material on the creation and on the first transformation effected by Jove, the poem divides into three parts that deal with the deities, heroes and heroines, and actual historical figures (although these divisions are blurred by Ovid's frequent digressions). The deities of the Metamorphoses frequently have the same flaws and foibles as the mortals in these stories. They can be petty, jealous, unfaithful, vengeful. In fact, the story of Apollo and Daphne stems from the revenge that Cupid takes on Apollo, who, in his arrogance, has offended Cupid. In retaliation, Cupid shoots him with a gold-tipped arrow that causes Apollo to fall helplessly in love with Daphne, who shuns him because Cupid has shot her with a lead-tipped arrow that makes her reject love completely. Thus, Apollo can only feel thwarted and frustrated as he seeks to woo the beautiful demigoddess who inspires his passion but cannot share it. Ironically, then, in this story, love becomes ruinous to the beloved.

As arrogant as he was with Cupid, Apollo calls Daphne foolish for fleeing him and reminds her that he is no common shepherd or farm boy but a great and powerful god. Ovid, typically sensitive to the woman's perspective, conveys vividly Daphne's distress at her unwanted suitor and then her terror as Apollo chases her relentlessly through woods where briars tear at her legs. Pale, panting, feeling his breath on her hair, she engages the reader's profound sympathy in this heart-pounding scene of near rape, for she is a suffering pawn used by one god in a game of vengeance against another.

She pleads for release from her torment, and, as she is metamorphosing into a laurel tree, still shrinking from Apollo's touch and kiss, he triumphantly claims, in her form as a tree, the woman whom he could not possess as a flesh-and-blood being. He declares that, always green and shining, she will be his personal plant for all time, and he will always wear a wreath of laurel on his head. Ovid makes a respectful acknowledgment of his emperor by having Apollo foretell that the laurel will be worn in triumph by great Roman military leaders of the future and will decorate the portals of Emperor Augustus. Her metamorphosis, then, is poignant, yet satisfying.

During the time that Ovid was working on the Metamorphoses, a revival of an old Greek philosophy was underway in Rome. In the sixth century B.C.E., the Greek philosopher/mathematician Pythagoras had devised a humane philosophy opposing animal sacrifice and advocating vegetarianism. In Ovid's day, this doctrine was being rekindled and preached around Rome. Critics have argued about whether Ovid himself was a neo-Pythagorean; nonetheless, he includes a lengthy section on the teachings of Pythagoras near the end of his Metamorphoses.

The historical figure Pythagoras lends himself quite well to this collection of tales of transformations, for he believed in the transmigration of souls from humans to animals or animals to humans and therefore shunned the eating of meat. Underlying his philosophy was a deeply compassionate concern for the living creatures that share creation with human beings. Ovid presents Pythagoras's philosophy compellingly and persuasively.

In the opening lines, he establishes Pythagoras's authority as a learned, wise man who understands the workings and the nature of the world and then allows Pythagoras to speak in his own voice. Pythagoras admonishes people that the earth provides a rich abundance of healthy foods—fruits and vegetables, milk and honey—which do not require bloodshed. He further strives to awaken compassion and respect in the hearts of his hearers toward animals because these creatures are fellow workers and beautiful and innocent in their own right. His last and strongest case against slaughtering and eating animals is his theory that souls transmigrate. Souls are deathless, he argues, and when the body housing a soul dies, the soul finds a new dwelling place.

The souls of humans move into the bodies of animals and vice versa. Hence, eating animal flesh is akin to cannibalism.

Pythagoras speaks at length of the perpetual flux of the universe, asserting that nothing is unchanging. Referring to natural phenomena—the tides, the seasons—he draws attention to the mutability of all forms, while arguing that the underlying matter remains constant. Thus, he says, humans should never fear death because the soul is deathless. To include such a philosophy near the end of this work is to suggest a rationale for all the other metamorphoses presented: change as a universal principle. It is not possible to assert with finality whether Ovid personally was a neo-Pythagorean or whether he included the philosophy because it provided a fitting climax to his work, whose theme was transformations. The rather serious consideration of philosophy in this section of the Metamorphoses might not seem well assimilated with the other stories, but in fact it corresponds to the creation scene of the first book of the work in its cosmic implications.

HEROIDES

First published: before 8 C.E. (English translation, 1567)

Type of work: Letters in verse form

In letters to the men whom they love, mythical and legendary women vent their feelings of love, longing, or abandonment.

Most epic, drama, myth, and history of the classical period focuses on the stories of men and their exploits, but in the Heroides, Ovid finds the feminine point of view that is often missing from these stories. The epistolary format is really another way to present a soliloquy or monologue, in this case of a secondary character whom Ovid depicts, thus adding to, not supplanting, the reader's understanding of the original story. In this collection of letters, the women whose names are familiar but whose perspectives have been given little consideration by the reader—or, for that matter, by the hero—present their thoughts and feelings at a moment of emotional turmoil or crisis.

Readers of Homer's Iliad (c. 750 B.C.E.; English translation, 1611) are familiar with the famous quarrel between Achilles and Agamemnon, when Agamemnon seizes Achilles' war prize, the girl Briseis. She is treated as chattel, passed between the men like an inanimate object with no regard whatever for her feelings as a human being. In Homer's story, Achilles is furious at losing her to Agamemnon, not so much because he cares for her personally but because he has been insulted and humiliated by Agamemnon's action. In Briseis' letter to Achilles in the Heroides, she even comments that he gave her up with no apparent reluctance and wishes that he had at least shown some resistance, whereby she would know that he had feelings for her. In Homer, when Agamemnon's envoys offer Achilles great riches and the return of Briseis if he will rejoin the battle, Achilles refuses; in Ovid, Briseis sees his refusal as a rejection of her and asks what she has done to earn his disfavor. She has heard that he has threatened to sail for Greece and is distraught; she asks to whom she is now to be left. When she refers to her husband and brothers who were killed in the battle when she was taken captive, the reader understands her clinging to Achilles, her captor. She has been left with nothing: no homeland, no family, no security. Achilles represents at least a future for her. Thus, Ovid shows a complex human being who was, in the Iliad, a flat figure.

The character of Medea must have been a greater challenge for Ovid because her story was so widely known and had been told magnificently by the fifth century B.C.E. Greek dramatist Euripides. The difficulty, then, was to present her in a way that did not diverge from the well-known myth and yet to capture something of her that had not been explored before. Ovid immediately captures her disordered state of mind by beginning the passage in the middle of a sentence. This suggests that her feverish thoughts have focused relentlessly on her abandonment by Jason, and anything she says or writes on the subject is indeed the continuation of an inner monologue. Like Euripides' Medea, Ovid's recounts the numerous deeds, both foul and fair, that she had done in the past for Jason's sake. Unlike Euripides' character, Ovid's Medea says, whether sincerely or not, that her current pitiful state is her punishment for the harm that she did to others on Jason's behalf. Whereas Euripides has portrayed her as a woman much like Achilles, a woman who will have vengeance and be remembered for it, Ovid conveys the idea that in her heart of hearts, Medea feels helpless, powerless. She recalls several examples of her magical prowess and laments that she is unable now to use magic on herself to cure her grief, bitterness, and pain. Because the reader knows that Medea will ultimately commit infanticide, she does not, finally, come across as more likable than the woman of Greek drama, but for a moment the reader can see a vulnerability in her that is not usually portrayed.

Although the letter of Hermione to Orestes concerns a marriage contract that she was forced to obey, a fascinating subplot emerges in her letter. Hermione is the daughter of Helen of Troy, the most beautiful woman in the world, who abandoned her husband and child to run away to Troy with her lover Paris. The main part of the letter to Orestes concerns their betrothal in childhood, which she regards as a marriage. Now, however, she has been given against her will to Pyrrhus, the son of Achilles. What is revealed is the portrait of a woman whose whole life has been filled with loss: Her mother abandons her, her father leaves to fight for ten years to retrieve his wife, she is betrothed to her childhood companion but then is given to another man, who treats her unfeelingly. She begs Orestes to rescue her, but it is the poignant look at the childhood loss of her mother that is the truly memorable part of this letter. She recalls the tumult left in the wake of Helen's betrayal of her family: She remembers tearfully asking her mother why she was leaving her, she laments never having had a mother to hold her, and finally she recalls seeing her mother at last when Helen was returned to Greece, not knowing her face but recognizing her only because of her great beauty. In her portrait, Ovid has presented a lost and lonely soul, buffeted by the egocentric, heroically proportioned figures in her life, this time both male and female.

SUMMARY

Ovid was noted for his exploitation of myth, and in the Metamorphoses he combines 250 diverse tales into a richly textured narrative that exemplifies the theme of universal change. Change is also apparent in the letters of the heroines of the Heroides, whose destinies are altered eternally as a result of their relationships with the heroes.

Ovid's literature embodies a profound understanding of the human psyche, a gentle wit, incisive realism, and an innovative feminine perspective, all of which have made his works universal and lasting.

Linda Jordan Tucker

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

- Amores*, c. 20 B.C.E. (English translation, 1597)
- Ars amatoria*, c. 2 B.C.E. (Art of Love, 1612)
- Remedia amoris*, before 8 C.E. (Cure for Love, 1600)
- Medicamina faciei*, before 8 C.E. (Cosmetics, 1859)
- Heroides*, before 8 C.E. (English translation, 1567)
- Metamorphoses*, 8 C.E. (English translation, 1567)
- Fasti*, c. 8 C.E. (English translation, 1859)
- Tristia*, after 8 C.E. (Sorrows, 1859)
- Ibis*, after 8 C.E. (English translation, 1859)
- Epistulae ex Ponto*, after 8 C.E. (Letters from Pontus, 1639)

DRAMA:

- Medea*, pr. before 8 C.E. (fragment)

About the Author

- Boyd, Barbara Weiden, ed. Brill's Companion to Ovid. Boston: Brill, 2002.
- Davies, P. J. Ovid and Augustus: A Political Reading of Ovid's Erotic Poems. London: Duckworth, 2006.
- Frankel, Hermann. Ovid: A Poet Between Two Worlds. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1969.
- Jones, Peter. Reading Ovid: Stories from the "Metamorphoses". New York: Cambridge University Press, 2007.

- Knox, Peter E. Oxford Readings in Ovid. New York: Oxford University Press, 2006.
- Mack, Sara. Ovid. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1988.
- Mendell, Clarence W. Latin Poetry: The New Poets and the Augustans. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1965.
- Otis, Brooks. Ovid as an Epic Poet. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1966.
- Rand, Edward. Ovid and His Influence. New York: Cooper Square, 1963.
- Rimmell, Victoria. Ovid's Lovers: Desire, Difference, and the Poetic Imagination. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
- Woodman, Tony, and David West, eds. Poetry and Politics in the Age of Augustus. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1984.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Show how Ovid, in Heroides and in his works on love, achieves a mastery of literary point of view that was rare in his time.
- How seriously is the reader expected to take Ovid's Art of Love?
- Was Ovid's message to classical poets "Make love, not war"?
- Establish the relationship of Ovid's Amores to Latin love poetry as it then existed.
- By what techniques was Ovid able to absorb so many myths into the unified Metamorphoses?
- What qualities make Ovid's Metamorphoses much more than a handbook on mythology?
- How does Ovid's influence on Renaissance writers differ generally from his influence on medieval writers?

Library of Congress

WILFRED OWEN

Born: Oswestry, England
March 18, 1893

Died: Sambre Canal, France
November 4, 1918

Owen wrote about the horror and pity of World War I in poetry that challenged the conventional view of war as a romantic adventure.

BIOGRAPHY

Wilfred Edward Salter Owen was born in Oswestry, England, on March 18, 1893, the son of Thomas and Susan Owen. A man who loved sports and male companionship, Owen's father often had trouble understanding his son's introspective nature and his love of books. Owen was much closer to his mother, Susan, who seemed to approve and encourage his interest in art and nature. When Owen was ten, his mother took him on a holiday excursion to Brixton by the Hill, a nature trip that Owen would later describe as his birth as a poet. Although Owen's experiences in World War I would cause him to lose faith in his mother's more orthodox Christianity, he still retained his love for her, writing in a letter that it was his mother and not his motherland (England) that gave him the strength to carry on during the heavy fighting.

At age eighteen, Owen found that he did not have enough money to attend the University of London. His mother, who had always wanted him to become a cleric, urged him to discover whether he might have a religious calling, and so Owen went to work as an unpaid lay assistant to a vicar in Dunsden, Oxfordshire. There, he helped with the care of the poor and sick in the parish, further developing the sympathetic nature that would speak so strongly in his later poetry. It was also as a parish worker that Owen began to believe that the Church of England did not do enough to help those in need. After leaving the parish and spending two years in France teaching languages, Owen returned to England in 1915. Believing that it was his duty to fight since his country was at war, Owen enlisted. The next time Owen journeyed to France, in January, 1917, he went as a commissioned officer to the Western Front in order to serve his country in World War I.

Like many young men of his generation, Owen went to war imagining that it would be a glorious adventure. Politicians had said that it was noble and heroic to die for one's country; religious leaders had described the battle as a holy war and the men as Christian soldiers fighting in a just cause; poets through the ages had written war poems that made fighting sound like a romantic adventure, a chance for individuals to prove their strength in combat. Owen's first letters from the front praised his company's "fine heroic spirit" and romanticized the sound of its guns as having "a certain sublimity."

Yet only two days later, after Owen had actually seen combat, the tone of his letters changed. Gone was the earlier belief in war as a heroic adventure. Now, Owen described the blasted battlefield as an "inferno" of "mud and thunder." He admitted that his earlier visions of glory were horribly mistaken; politicians, priests, and poets were wrong about what it was like to be a soldier. On January 8, 1917, Owen and his men slogged through two and a half miles of trenches that had filled with rainwater, turning the dirt to heavy mud. Because of the constant firing, there was rarely any chance for soldiers to change their wet, frozen clothes. The shrill wail of incoming shells made it impossible for the men to get any sleep. One night, Owen was blown right out of his trench by a shell that landed only six feet away; he discovered that the officer next to him had been buried alive in the blast. On March 19, Owen was hospitalized for a brain concussion caused by an accidental fall into a fifteen-foot-deep shell hole. He seemed to recover, but after suffering from terrible headaches later diagnosed as symptoms of shell shock, Owen was sent back to a hospital in England to recuperate.

After being moved several times, Owen finally entered Craiglockhart Military Hospital in Edinburgh, Scotland. It was there, in August, 1917, that he met Siegfried Sassoon, an army captain and poet who befriended Owen and encouraged him to write war poetry of his own. Sassoon's antiwar poetry shocked the public and provoked Owen to write more realistic verse. Owen had been writing poems since his teens, but his early work was mostly sentimental nature and love poetry inspired by such English Romantic poets as Percy Bysshe Shelley and John Keats. Under Sassoon's influence, Owen began to write war poetry that revealed the true horrors of battle. Like other shell-shocked soldiers, Owen was accustomed to stammering when he spoke, but with Sassoon's friendship and guidance, Owen became newly articulate, learning to speak and write poetry with confidence. Most of Owen's best poems were written from August, 1917, to September, 1918, a short period of amazing productivity begun by his meeting with Sassoon and brought to a premature end by Owen's death.

Owen returned to the fighting in France in August, 1918, believing that his firsthand experience of the horrors of battle would make him a more credible witness, enabling him to plead on the soldiers' behalf for an end to the war. When Owen received the Military Cross in October, 1918, he was pleased, not for himself, but because he felt that winning this award for bravery in action would make more people believe him when he wrote poetry about the need to stop the war. Owen's words of warning were not heard in time for his own life to be saved. At age twenty-five, trying to get his company across the Sambre Canal, north of Ors, France, Owen was killed by machine-gun fire on November 4, 1918, one week before the armistice.

Most of Owen's poetry was published posthumously. Written by a decorated soldier who was killed in action, Owen's poems may finally have had the extra credibility that he wanted for them. His friend and fellow soldier-poet, Sassoon, collected and published twenty-three Poems by Wilfred Owen (1920).

ANALYSIS

Before his death, Owen wrote a brief preface for the volume of poems that he had hoped to see published while he was still alive. It is in this preface that Owen specified his beliefs as a war poet. "This book is not about heroes," Owen wrote, and he added that he is "not concerned with Poetry." Owen believed that too many of the war poems written in the past had been glorifications of war, praising soldiers as if they were heroes dying noble deaths. Owen intended to write antiwar poetry; he would flout convention and take words and phrases that earlier poets had used to romanticize war and alter them so that they told the truth: War is a senseless waste of young lives, and is not about the making of heroes. Owen wanted readers to be shocked by the violent and bloody meaninglessness of war, but he also wanted them to feel sympathy for all the dead and dying. As he put it, "My subject is War, and the pity of War. The Poetry is in the pity." If people could be brought to feel sympathy for the loss of life on both sides of the conflict, maybe they would be less eager to continue the deadly fighting or to start another war once this one was over. Owen did not want his readers to be consoled: He intended his gruesome-but-true depictions of death in battle to stand as a warning to his generation that war must be stopped. Nevertheless, Owen hoped that there would one day come a time, perhaps for future generations, when his poems could serve as a consolation, helping people who had learned their lesson to mourn the dead and get on with life.

A poem such as "Anthem for Doomed Youth" shows both sides of Owen the poet: his intent to give shocks as warnings, and his desire to evoke the reader's sympathy for suffering. The poem begins as if it were going to be a traditional Christian elegy mourning the dead, but then it shifts abruptly to emphasize the un-Christian brutality of a soldier's death in battle: "What passing-bells for these who die as cattle?" Owen makes striking use of ono-matopoeia (words whose sound imitates their sense) to describe the ironic prayers these fast-dying soldiers receive on the battlefield: "Only the stuttering rifles' rapid rattle/ Can patter out their hasty orisons." The repeated sounds of the letters "r" and "t" represent the jarring effect of gunfire, totally at odds with the solemn service that these men might have received had their deaths been truly sanctioned by God. Owen uses the octave (first eight lines) of this sonnet to argue against religious leaders who persuaded young soldiers that they were dying for a holy cause.

The sestet (last six lines) of the sonnet then proceeds to change the mood from shock to pity, as the poem shifts its emphasis from the brutality of death in battle to the sadness of those at home who mourn their dead brothers, sons, and would-be bridegrooms. Owen again displays his gift for poetic effects, but now they are more subtle and subdued as befits a scene of mourning. When he writes that "The pallor of girls' brows shall be their pall," his wordplay is very serious and sensitive, suggesting that the whiteness of grief-stricken faces is a truer sign of sympathy for the dead than any orthodox religious rite. The last line of the poem, with its heavy stresses on the opening words and its long, drawn-out syllables, beautifully conveys natural human sadness at the loss of these men's lives: "And each slow dusk a drawing-down of blinds."

Unlike his fellow war-poet Sassoon, whose ironic and satirical verse inspired Owen to write more realistically about the horrors of war, Owen often introduced another dimension into his poetry: the pity of war, a deep sympathy for the suffering. Even when Owen would use disturbing diction (choice of words) and ugly sounds, as he often did in his characteristic off-rhymes ("flashes"/"fleshes," "winds"/"weaned"/"wounds"), he still tried to save some room for tenderness and compassion, as if looking forward to the world of brotherhood that might be created if all wars were to cease. In his poem "Dulce et decorum est," Owen mocked the deadly sentiment expressed by the Latin poet Horace that "It is sweet and fitting to die for the fatherland," exposing this belief as a lie. Yet in other poems, such as "Strange Meeting," he soothes the living and the dead with words of sympathy: "Then, when much blood had clogged their chariot wheels,/ I would go up and wash them from sweet wells,/ Even with truths that lie too deep for taint."

"STRANGE MEETING"

First published: 1920 (collected in Poems by Wilfred Owen, 1920)

Type of work: Poem

A soldier imagines that he is dead and in Hell, where he meets the enemy whom he killed in battle.

"Strange Meeting" is probably Owen's most celebrated poem. He may have taken his title from a line in The Revolt of Islam (1818), a poem by the British Romantic poet Percy Bysshe Shelley. In Shelley's poem, two warriors are reconciled in life, but Owen's poem is more pessimistic: His soldiers can become friends only after both have died and are no longer fighting for their respective countries, England and Germany. Owen implies that as long as men and women live, they will fight wars.

The tunnel down which the speaker escapes in the first stanza could be a trench, the speaker's unconscious, or the classical underworld, where people were supposedly sent after death. Owen describes this tunnel as having been "scooped" by many wars to indicate that what he has to say in this poem applies to wars throughout the ages, not merely to World War I. People have always realized too late that the so-called enemy was really a friend, no matter how strange or foreign that enemy may have seemed at first. Owen's use of off-rhymes emphasizes the digging pain of war ("groined" and "groaned") and forces readers to see the lines that death etches into human faces ("grained" and "ground"). At the same time, the fact that these words almost rhyme suggests that these sworn enemies are really very much alike in their vulnerability to pain and in their shared mortality.

The speaker realizes that he and his enemy shared the same hopes while alive and that each was, in a sense, the other's hope: Each might have made the other man laugh in fellowship; each might have done something, if he had lived, to make the world a better place for others. Perhaps most important, each might have told others about the truth of war, about how unglorious and merely wasteful death is. Instead, both men are now dead, and the truth about war will die with them. The ignorant people back home who do not realize the true horror of war will only continue the meaningless fighting. They will be quick to act, but quick in the sense of rash and fierce, like a mindless animal “swift with swiftness of the tigress.” They will go looking for grand adventure, but by going to war they will make a journey back into barbarism, a “trek from progress.”

The poem ends with the strange friend suggesting that he and the speaker, now that they have fought and killed each other, should now go to sleep. At least in death, they are at peace. Fortunately, the truth about the horror of war does not have to die with them. Owen’s poem conveys it and suggests that readers take pity on other people and on themselves—before it is too late.

“DISABLED”

First published: 1920 (collected in Poems by Wilfred Owen, 1920)

Type of work: Poem

A depressed war veteran, having lost both legs and an arm, recalls a time when he thought that war would be glorious.

To dramatize the terrible consequences of war, “Disabled” presents an ironic contrast between a strong-limbed, handsome youth eager to be a hero in battle and the wrecked body in a wheelchair that the man becomes as a result of being horribly wounded. In the first stanza, the voices of boys playing in the park can only sound sad to the disabled veteran, who feels the painful difference between their freedom and his forced immobility.

The next two stanzas bring memories of what a physically attractive young man the veteran had been. Only the year before, he seemed so very young, “younger than his youth” in terms of innocence and inexperience. Now, suddenly, he is old with a terrible wisdom, having learned of the destruction that war can do to the body. By saying that he “threw away his knees,” Owen emphasizes the carelessness with which the young man went to war, not giving a thought to the mutilation that might befall him. As a result of his injuries, women are now loath to touch him, as if his wounds were somehow contagious like a “queer disease.” Owen makes an ironic reference to love poetry when he describes blood from the man’s leg as a “leap of purple” that “spurted from his thigh.” This spurt is not the sign of a virile young man’s love. War is not the place where he proves his manhood; it is where he loses it.

Ironically, as the fourth stanza reveals, the young man seems to have gone to war in hope of winning the approval and admiration of women. Owen’s description of these women as “giddy jilts” implies some anger toward young females who would get excited at the thought of a man in army uniform, then flee from him in fear when he returns wounded from the war. A further irony in this stanza has to do with the very real difference between violence in sports and the violation of war, a difference that the young man did not understand until he discovered it the hard way. He had considered a bloody leg to be a sign of pride, proof that he had played a fierce game of football, having used his body to its full potential. Yet war is not, as he thought, another game; rather than developing his body, war causes it irreparable damage. Owen uses this poem to warn future young people that war is not fair or fun like football: It is a “game” in which what is lost can never be regained.

SUMMARY

The British poet Cecil Day Lewis believed that Wilfred Owen’s poems were “certainly the finest written by any English poet of the First War.” Owen’s warning remains as valid today as it was when he wrote it. He depicted the horrors of war with sometimes shocking realism. The pity that he felt for people who knew no better than to kill one another comes through strongly in his poems. What also comes through, in the fact that he wrote such passionate antiwar poetry, is his hope that the war—and all war—would end soon.

Douglas Keeseey

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Poems by Wilfred Owen, 1920 (Siegfried Sassoon, editor)

The Poems of Wilfred Owen, 1931 (Edmund Charles Blunden, editor)

The Collected Poems of Wilfred Owen, 1963 (Cecil Day Lewis, editor)

Wilfred Owen: War Poems and Others, 1973 (Dominic Hibberd, editor)

NONFICTION:

Collected Letters, 1967 (Harold Owen and John Bell, editors)

Selected Letters, 1998 (Bell, editor)

About the Author

Fussell, Paul. The Great War and Modern Memory. New York: Oxford University Press, 1975.

Hibberd, Dominic. Wilfred Owen: A New Biography. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 2002.

Hipp, Daniel W. The Poetry of Shell Shock: Wartime Trauma and Healing in Wilfred Owen, Ivor Gurney, and Siegfried Sassoon. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2005.

Owen, Harold. Journey from Obscurity, Wilfred Owen, 1893-1918: Memoirs of the Owen Family. 3 vols. New York: Oxford University Press, 1963.

Quinn, Patrick, ed. British Poets of the Great War: Sassoon, Graves, Owen. In Dictionary of Literary Biography, Documentary Series 18. Detroit: Gale Research, 1999.

Stallworthy, Jon. Wilfred Owen: A Biography. 1974. Reprint. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

White, Gertrude M. Wilfred Owen. New York: Twayne, 1969.

White, William. Wilfred Owen, 1893-1918: A Bibliography. Kent, Ohio: Kent State University Press, 1967.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Which idea does Wilfred Owen's poetry convey better: that people can and must overcome the tendency to go to war, or that, given human nature, war is inevitable?
- Are the disabled soldiers you have heard about like the one in Owen's "Disabled," or are they more positive—or is it impossible for other people to know?
- Discuss Owen's use of sonnets as forms to describe war experiences (including "Dulce et Decorum Est," which is very much like two sonnets wrapped together).
- Does Owen's war experience assist or damage his poem "Miners"?
- Had Owen not died a few days before the armistice, would he have been maligned as a bitter opponent of a heroic military endeavor?

© Miriam Berkley

AMOS OZ

Born: Jerusalem, British Mandate of Palestine (now in Israel)
May 4, 1939

Oz was the first novelist born in Israel to make the Israeli experience accessible to readers from around the world and to capture the distinctiveness of Jewish and Israeli history as represented in the lives of his characters.

BIOGRAPHY

Amos Oz (ohz) was born Amos Klausner on May 4, 1939, at the home of his parents in Jerusalem, when that city was in the British Mandate of Palestine. His father, Yehuda Klausner, was an émigré from Eastern Europe and was part of a family that had attained great distinction in the study of literature and religion. Yehuda's uncle, Joseph Klausner, was the author of a study of Jesus as a representative of Jewish tradition, which had shocked the more conservative elements of the Jewish world but which was well received in the general intellectual community. When Joseph Klausner arrived in what would later be the nation of Israel, he was hailed as a leading light of the country and given a position at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem. Yehuda Klausner was eager to follow in his uncle's footsteps, but he never managed to achieve that degree of recognition and spent most of his career working as a librarian at the university.

Oz's mother, Fania, came from a family that had been associated more with business than with scholarship. They had also come to Palestine in response to the growing sense of persecution against the Jews in Eastern Europe. Fania herself was an imaginative child who maintained that fondness for stories into adulthood. While she was a serious student, her vision of the world blended literatures from different languages and cultures creatively rather than in a scholarly fashion.

Oz was the beneficiary of attention in large measure from both parents, and he saw himself early as having the responsibility of fulfilling the dreams of both of them. He wanted to be a writer but also a scholar, who would take on the mantle of his great-uncle in a way that his father never could. His father had fairly strong political views that were influenced by Vladimir Jabotinsky, a right-wing ideologue, but he did not take an active political role himself. Oz recalled endless political discussions within the family and the neighborhood at large. Schools were chosen for young Amos with some eye toward their political orientation, but scholarship came first. He retained a vivid sense of the role teachers had in shaping his literary ambitions by introducing him to the use of language by authors past and present. Family friends included Shmuel Yosef Agnon, the first Israeli to win the Nobel Prize in Literature, although Agnon's fondness for Jewish tradition made him unwelcome to Joseph Klausner.

While Oz was still living at home, it was impossible to avoid political factors in the world around him. World War II broke out within the first year of his life. Even after the defeat of Adolf Hitler, however, there was the more local issue of interaction with the Arab community. The young Amos had positive and negative relationships with various Arabs, but when political differences intensified, there was a separation that he could not help regretting. The partition plan from the United Nations that led to Israeli independence and the creation of a Jewish state in 1948 was achieved after many people had lost their lives, and Oz remembered the deaths of his friends in a way that left him ambivalent about Palestinian-Israeli relations.

Perhaps the most influential event of his youth, however, was the suicide of his mother when he was twelve. His mother seems to have felt increasingly isolated from the family and from the rest of the world, which did not match up to the imaginings of her childhood and her reading. While Oz remained at home for a year or two after his mother's death, it was one of the factors that led to a drastic alteration in his life. He left his father's home, went to live on a kibbutz (a collective farm which practiced the virtues of socialism on a day-to-day basis), and changed his last name to Oz (pronounced with a long o). The word oz is the Hebrew word for "strength," and it was partly intended to indicate that he was giving up on the world of his father, in which discussions went on interminably without resolution or action, and joining in the world of the young Israelis who were making the desert bloom.

Even in Kibbutz Hulda, however, Oz remained something of an outsider, still moved by words in a way that his contemporaries were not. After the customary range of activities on the kibbutz, he served in the Israeli army, during which time he met the Israeli prime minister, David Ben-Gurion. When his army service was over in 1960, he married Nily Zuckerman, whom he had met on the kibbutz and with whom he had three children. He received his undergraduate degree after studying at Hebrew University. After a number of years on the kibbutz, he and his family settled in Arad, Israel, which remained Oz's home even as he traveled around the world as a speaker and writer. He has held the chair in Hebrew literature at Ben-Gurion University, thereby fulfilling his father's dream for academic success.

Oz began writing for publication in the 1960's and has continued to produce both short stories and novels that have been translated into English and a variety of other languages. His first short-story collection, Artsot hatan (1965, revised edition 1976; Where the Jackals Howl, and Other Stories, 1981), came out in 1965. The next year saw his first novel, Ma'kom a'her (1966; Elsewhere, Perhaps, 1973), and the publication of Mikha'el sheli (My Michael, 1972) in 1968 was his first best seller. It was also his first book to be published in an English-language translation, although the earlier works were subsequently translated into English. His work has been recognized by many awards, such as the Bialik Prize, the Prix Femina, and the Israel Prize.

Beginning in the 1980's, Oz became more conspicuous because of his involvement with the Israeli peace movement. Despite his ambivalence about the cordiality of relationships between Jewish Israelis and Palestinian Muslims, he accepted early on that there would have to be compromise and sacrifice on both sides. In his book How to Cure a Fanatic (2006), he argues for the importance of compromise on the part of both Israelis and Palestinians so that neither nation will have to lose its children in a continuing conflict. While his literary work does not portray Arabs in an especially sympathetic manner, his political opinions recognize the presence of Palestinians and the creation of a Palestinian state as an essential part of the solution.

ANALYSIS

In his novels and other fiction, Amos Oz has worked out the experiences of his own life and the lives of his family and the Jewish community that came to Israel to create a Jewish state. His fiction about the current world contains echoes from generations past. He has also sought to find room for many Hebrew literary influences. Among the leading influences from his childhood, and especially through his mother, are Russian authors like Leo Tolstoy, Fyodor Dostoevski, and Anton Chekhov. In addition, however, he has also managed to find room for the adventure stories of which his mother was fond, such as the novels of Jules Verne. Captain Nemo and Michael Strogoff, characters from Verne novels, also play a role in the imaginations of the characters in Oz's work.

Oz has tried to describe the atmosphere of the Palestine and Israel that he knows. In Panther barmartef (1994; Panther in the Basement, 1997), he captures the sense of being an adolescent in the last days of the British Mandate and the political uncertainties of that time. Other novels that describe families living through the years of Israeli independence do not paint a rosy picture of the country, even though the government has changed from British supervision to a Jewish state. If anything, Oz's characters are readier to complain about the state of things when their coreligionists are running the country than they were when they could not expect much from a British administration.

Oz portrays Israel and Israeli society as a family writ large. His experiences with his father's family and his mother's isolation from contemporary events shaped his later life, and his mother's suicide introduced an element of irrationality into his world. As a result, the female characters in Oz's novels often play a disruptive role, picking up the lives of those around them and shaking them until they arrive at a new configuration. In particular, Ilana, the central figure of Kufsaḥ shehorah (1987; Black Box, 1988), seems continually able to disrupt the lives of her first and second husbands, as well as her son, while the men in that novel seem able to reach an understanding with one another. Critics have sometimes criticized this attitude as misogynistic, but the female characters in Oz's fiction do not always leave a shattered world behind them.

Another element in Oz's fiction is the role played by the Arab characters, a group given special scrutiny because of Oz's political activity. While he has stood firm in his conviction for the need to compromise with the Arab population on the political scene, in his novels Arab characters often take on roles that are defined in the imaginations of the Jewish characters with whom they interact. In My Michael, for example, the narrator recalls the Arab boys with whom she spent her childhood with affection, but their role becomes increasingly threatening as the story proceeds. This may be an expression of the difficulty Oz felt in separating himself from the Arab friends of his childhood as political issues drove them apart.

Within Oz's fiction dwells the city of Jerusalem, where his early experiences in walking with his parents enabled him to appreciate the subtle differences between one neighborhood and another. There were the secular neighborhoods, the religious neighborhoods, the socialist neighborhoods, and the nationalist neighborhoods, and then there were the neighborhoods in which the non-Jewish population was ensconced. One of the reasons that Oz left his family as a teenager in order to live on a kibbutz was to live the Zionist dream of casting off the recollections of Eastern Europe and making their new country fruitful. His characters from the kibbutzim have the same problems as those who come from more traditional backgrounds.

The desert also plays a role in Oz's fiction. While the desert may seem threatening by virtue of its proximity to Arab territory, it is also a source of liberation from the constraints of the streets of Jerusalem. It is not surprising that he chose to live far from Jerusalem and close to the desert.

MY MICHAEL

First published: Mikha'el sheli, 1968 (English translation, 1972)

Type of work: Novel

The narrator, a young Israeli woman of great imagination, marries a scientist and drifts away from him into the world of her own imagination.

My Michael was the first of Oz's novels to enjoy wide sales in the original Hebrew-language edition and his first novel to be translated into English. The narrator of the book is often seen as a fictionalized version of Oz's mother, although the novel does not conclude with the narrator's death. Instead, the novel ends with the narrator's descent into a world of her own, where the visions that she described earlier take on an apocalyptic character. There is an air of destruction in the closing pages that is reminiscent of Moby Dick (1851), one of the novels that influenced Oz.

From the beginning of the book, there is a sense that the narrator and her husband, the Michael of the title, are mismatched. The warmth of their relationship is tepid, at best, and the wife maintains a sense of distance from her husband and from the subjects in which he is interested. The fact that he is a geologist, while she is a student of the humanities, serves as an excuse for her to ignore his scholarly work. When she eventually pays a visit to the university where he works, there is a sense on both of their parts that this is a merely a gesture of politeness.

Politeness is not something the narrator values in the dream world in which she comes increasingly to reside. In that world, she sees herself as a queen, with servants like Michael Strogoff from Jules Verne's novel of that name and with foes out to destroy the realm over which she rules. She remembers an illness during her childhood when she was confined to bed and how much she enjoyed the solitude, being allowed to spend time with her dreams. In an adult world she still manages to find an excuse for succumbing to illness in order to keep the world at arm's length.

Almost the only character with whom the narrator interacts in a personal fashion is a teenage poet who lives nearby. She is inclined to tease him, but it may be partly because he is closer to the age at which she saw herself as happiest. Her effect on his life is disruptive, but he recovers and is sent off to a different environment. Her husband is unable to play a role in her imagination, and his efforts at restoring their relationship do not succeed. The failure of the narrator to fit into the world around her is characteristic of the disruptive effect of women characters in Oz's fiction.

Two characters that appear in her visions are Arab brothers whom she knew in childhood. From a relatively benign presence, they become more and more threatening, until by the end of the book they are cooperating with her in an effort to blow up Jerusalem. One can argue that these are Arab individuals, who, in reality, could easily be part of a constructive environment but who, in dreams, become dangerous allies. Even in the closing pages, Oz maintains a vision of the real Jerusalem that surrounds the narrator, while she is preoccupied with Danzig and other cities she knows only by name. The descent into madness takes place while the rest of the world goes on, and the internal life betrays its inhabitant.

BLACK BOX

First published: Kufsah shehorah, 1987
(English translation, 1988)

Type of work: Novel

The correspondence of a woman, her former husband, and her current husband reveals how much playacting is involved in the words they exchange and the lives that they live.

The "black box" of the title refers to the piece of equipment carried on airplanes that provides an exact recording of what goes on in the cockpit. It is designed to help investigators determine why an airplane crashed. In this novel, the black box is the sequence of letters and telegrams exchanged by the characters that provide an account of the actions they take and the motivations for those actions. By contrast with the black box on a plane, however, these communications are always subject to revision and contradiction, so that none of the characters or the reader can be sure of what can be believed.

Oz claims that he did not start out trying to write an epistolary novel, but that the characters and the action dictated the form as it went along. Unlike some of his earlier novels, which were centered entirely on Israel, the characters in this novel go to Europe and the United States, in part a recognition of the extent to which yeridah (emigration out of Israel) has become a feature of Jewish life.

Ilana initiates the correspondence by writing to Alec, her former husband, a successful military leader turned scholar, who has made a study of fanaticism and is now living in Chicago. Ilana's current husband, Michel, is an observant Jew, and her opening letter to Alec is full of protestations of love for Michel. The only reason she is writing her former husband, she claims, is out of concern for Boaz, the son the two had.

As the novel unfolds, almost every aspect of the initial letter becomes open to question, and the statements in subsequent letters from Ilana's former and current husbands express some of that uncertainty. Mixed in with the relationships between those three are Boaz, Alec's legal representative in Israel, and Ilana's sister. Alec is prepared to give his son some money, but he distrusts the influence of Michel, whom he sees as a fanatic. Alec's legal representative tries to corrupt Michel and succeeds admirably. The problem is that the corrupted Michel is still a human being, and he is puzzled by the extent to which his wife still seems captivated by her former husband.

Boaz takes on the responsibility of running a commune and wishes a plague on the houses of both his father and stepfather. Ilana admits to retaining an affection, with a strong physical component, for Alec, and she reunites with him by the end of the book, telling Michel that Alec is dying and needs someone to look after him. Michel is inclined to cite biblical texts in his correspondence, even if the point is not always clear to the recipient. The tone of Ilana's final letter to Michel echoes many of the details of her initial letter to Alec.

The men in this novel are characteristic of various aspects of Israeli society. Ilana, however, is a force capable of disrupting the men's lives and rearranging them as she chooses. After expressing herself in the strongest possible terms in a letter, she will admit in the next letter that what she had previously written was a lie. One detects an echo of the suicide of Oz's mother, deceiving those who thought she had not lost touch with the realities of life.

A TALE OF LOVE AND DARKNESS

First published: Sipur' al ahavah ve-hoshekh, 2002 (English translation, 2004)

Type of work: Autobiography

After a lifetime in which he refused to speak about his mother's suicide, Oz writes an autobiography of great complexity in which that event is the focus.

In this autobiographical account of his family and his early life, Oz tries to penetrate the background that led to his mother's suicide when he was twelve and to his subsequent desertion from family tradition and even from his name. The "love" of the title refers to the crosscurrents of affection through his family and perhaps to the glimmerings of romance that become visible toward the end of the book. While those unfamiliar with Oz's life may not know in advance what the "darkness" will be, there are plenty of moments at which the approaching suicide is foreshadowed.

The structure of the book is an exercise in symmetry. As this autobiography proceeds, it oscillates between events that occurred before he was born and from his early years to those in later life. The oscillations become narrower as the book proceeds, and it becomes clear only at the end of the book that their center is his mother's suicide.

While in his novels Oz was inclined to list the suburbs of Jerusalem, in this book he stretches the Hebrew language to its grammatical limits. Sentences run on at length to capture the actions of the characters and the responses of family members. The flavor of the Hebrew is well rendered into English by translator Nicholas de Lange, who has worked on Oz's novels for more than thirty years.

Oz describes the wealth of the intellectual heritage in which he grew up, but even as a child he is torn between the scholarship of his father and the tales brought by his mother from Europe and reminiscent of a countryside that he had never seen. As a child he was a part of a literary culture that included many of the eminent writers in Israel, including his own great-uncle. The life of scholarship by itself was not enough to attract Oz, perhaps because he saw the difficulty of his father in achieving the position he deserved. On the other hand, the tales that his mother told did not bring her happiness or change the world, so he could not see himself solely as an artist outside of political considerations.

The autobiographical elements serve to underscore the political convictions for which Oz is best known. Oz's uncle and cousin were killed by the Nazis, which serves as evidence for the inability of the Jews to trust European civilization, however much it may be appealing. In and around the Jews' own country of Israel, there are Arabs who seem prepared to take Israeli lives for no purpose. As a result, Oz is not inclined to trust European civilization or his Arab neighbors. The Holocaust is evidence enough for why the Jews deserve a state of their own. While it may be hard on the Palestinians to have been displaced, the Israelis are not going to leave, but they need to accommodate the rights of their predecessors in that land. As a result, both Israelis and Palestinians must be prepared to give up something to attain peace; although neither side will be entirely happy or satisfied, the children of both nations will not be killed in the conflict and will be able to reach adulthood.

SUMMARY

In his novels and nonfiction, Amos Oz reflects on aspects of Israeli life both before and after the War of Independence. His characters interact with the land around them and with the uncertainties of life for both Arabs and Jews. The creation of a Jewish state provides a refuge for the Jews but creates new problems because of the conflict with Palestinians.

The absence of solutions to these problems comes from the fact that societies are simply families on a larger scale. After thousands of years of living in families, human beings have yet to figure out how to communicate with one another or to promote the welfare of others. Oz describes how countries and societies are equally unable to communicate and to live together harmoniously.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Do women have a positive role to play in Amos Oz's novels?
- Are there any examples of happy families in Oz's works? How is that a reflection of his own childhood?
- Oz changed his name when he left home to live in a kibbutz. Could he have written his novels under the burden of his birth name?
- Some observant Jews object to the portrayal of sexual scenes in Oz's books. Is that the only reason that they might find his novels unsympathetic?
- Why does Oz like to give lists of place names in his novels? Is this to add an air of realistic setting to a fictional narrative?
- Oz has compared Anton Chekhov's tragedies with those of William Shakespeare's and noted that, however unhappy the characters are in the former, they are alive at the end. Can one describe Oz's novels as tragedies in the Chekhovian mode?

Thomas Drucker

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Ma'kom a'her, 1966 (Elsewhere, Perhaps, 1973)

Mikha'el sheli, 1968 (My Michael, 1972)

Laga 'at ba-mayim, laga 'at ba-ruah, 1973 (Touch the Water, Touch the Wind, 1974)

Menuhah nekhonah, 1982 (A Perfect Peace, 1985)

Kufsa shehorah, 1987 (Black Box, 1988)

La-da'at ishah, 1989 (To Know a Woman, 1991)

Matsav ha-shelishi, 1991 (Fima, 1993)

Al tagidi lailah, 1994 (Don't Call It Night, 1995)

Panther ba-martef, 1994 (Panther in the Basement, 1997)

Oto ha-yam, 1999 (The Same Sea, 2001)

SHORT FICTION:

Artsot hatan, 1965, revised edition 1976 (Where the Jackals Howl, and Other Stories, 1981)
Ahavah me'uharet, 1971 (Unto Death, 1975)
Har ha'etsah ha-ra'ah, 1976 (The Hill of Evil Counsel: Three Stories, 1978)

NONFICTION:

Be-or ha-Techelet ha-azah: ma'amarim ve-reshimot, 1979 (Under This Blazing Light: Essays, 1995)
Po va-sham be-Erets-Yisra'el bi-setav, 1982 (In the Land of Israel, 1983)
Mi-mordot ha-Levanon: Ma'amarim u-reshimot, 1987 (The Slopes of Lebanon, 1989)
Shetikat ha-shamayim, 1993 (The Silence of Heaven: Agnon's Fear of God, 2000)
Israel, Palestine, and Peace: Essays, 1994
Mathilim sipur, 1996 (The Story Begins: Essays on Literature, 2000)
Kol ha-tikvot: Mahashavot 'al zehut Yisre 'elit, 1998
Sipur' al ahavah ve-hoshekh, 2002 (A Tale of Love and Darkness, 2004)
How to Cure a Fanatic, 2006

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

Sumkhi, 1978 (Soumchi, 1980)

About the Author

Balaban, Avraham. Between God and Beast: An Examination of Amos Oz's Prose. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1993.
Cohen, Joseph. Voices of Israel. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1990.
Mazor, Yair. Somber Lust: The Art of Amos Oz. Translated by Margarit Weinberger-Rotman. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2002.
Negev, Eilat. Close Encounters with Twenty Israeli Writers. London: Valentine Mitchell, 2003.
Wirth-Nesher, Hana. City Codes: Reading the Modern Urban Novel. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1996.

© The Nobel Foundation

BORIS PASTERNAK

Born: Moscow, Russia

February 10, 1890

Died: Peredelkino, near Moscow, Soviet Union (now in Russia)

May 30, 1960

Known outside Russia as a novelist, Pasternak was also a master of short fiction and one of Russia's greatest twentieth century poets.

BIOGRAPHY

Boris Leonidovich Pasternak (PAS-tur-nak) was born in Russia in the city of Moscow on February 10, 1890 (January 29 by the Julian calendar used in Russia until the Bolshevik Revolution of October, 1917). His family was well known and comfortable, his father, Leonid Pasternak, a famous artist and his mother, Rozaliya Kaufmann, a professional pianist. Young Boris grew up in a house frequently visited by writers, composers such as Aleksandr Scriabin and Sergei Rachmaninoff, painters, and scholars.

The young Pasternak studied philosophy and literature at Moscow University and took courses in musical composition at the famous Moscow Conservatory, hoping to become a professional musician. In 1912, he traveled to Marburg, Germany, where he studied European philosophy. He returned to Moscow and graduated from the university in 1913, yet he decided to become neither a musician nor a philosopher but chose to be a poet instead. His first book of verses, Bliznets v tuchakh (1914; a twin in rainclouds), was published a year later, and a second collection, Poverkh barierov (1917; Above the Barriers, 1959), appeared in 1917.

Exempted from military service, Pasternak spent most of World War I in the Ural Mountains. He returned to Moscow after the revolution of February, 1917, that had swept away the czar's government. He was generally sympathetic with the revolution of October, 1917, which brought the Bolsheviks to power. During the years of revolution and civil war that followed, Pasternak wrote feverishly. He published Sestra moia zhizn': Leta 1917 goda (1922; My Sister, Life, 1964; also known as Sister My Life), his first broadly acclaimed book of poetry, in 1922 and another book of highly personal, extremely complex lyric verses, Temy i variatsii (1923; Themes and Variations, 1964), a year later. At the same time he was also writing prose, the best example being "Detstvo Liuvvers" (1923; "The Childhood of Liuvvers," 1945), which critics agree was the beginning of a novel.

In the mid-1920's, under pressure from Vladimir Mayakovsky, the official poet of the Bolshevik Revolution, Pasternak sought to change from his personal themes to more socially responsible writing. In 1923, he joined for a time Mayakovsky's Lef (left front of art), a group dedicated to putting modern art at the service of the revolution. He composed a verse "epic" about the first (aborted) Russian revolution of 1905, Devyatsot pyaty' god (1926; The Year 1905, 1989). In 1931, he published a novel in verse about the 1917 revolution.

Pasternak's first marriage was breaking up about this same time, which may explain in part why at the end of the 1920's he started an autobiography, Okhrannaya gramota (1931; Safe Conduct, 1945). The last part of this book describes his youthful fascination with Mayakovsky and the shock produced by the Soviet poet's suicide in April, 1930. With the verses of Vtoroye rozhdeniye (1932; Second Birth, 1964) Pasternak turned away from the extreme complexity of his earlier writing.

He attempted to play the role of officially sanctioned poet, making speeches and traveling in a Soviet delegation to Paris in 1935. As the terror unleashed by Soviet dictator Joseph Stalin intensified, however, Pasternak found it prudent to cease efforts to publish original poetry and instead turned his attention to translating. Holding himself to a high standard, Pasternak translated from English, German, Georgian, and at least four other languages. Among his translations are William Shakespeare's plays Hamlet, Prince of Denmark (pr. c. 1600-1601, pb. 1603), King Lear (pr. c. 1605-1606, pb. 1608), Othello, the Moor of Venice (pr. 1604, pb. 1622), and Romeo and Juliet (pr. c. 1595-1596, pb. 1597), which remain the accepted Russian translations to this day.

With the Nazi invasion of Russia in 1941 came an easing of restrictions on writers. Pasternak managed to publish two more books of his verses, Narannikh poezdakh (1943; On Early Trains, 1964) in 1943 and two years later Zemnoy prostor (1945; The Vastness of Earth, 1964). Both reflect his developing interest in Christian morality. He suffered a heart attack in 1953, after years of intensifying political criticism and the arrest of his third wife, Olga Ivinskaya.

In 1956, he submitted a novel Doktor Zhivago to the journal Novy Mir for publication but was refused. The manuscript was taken out of the Soviet Union, translated, and published in Italy in 1957; an English translation, Doctor Zhivago, appeared in 1958. A masterpiece, the novel did not adhere to the official ideology of the Soviet government. Pasternak was awarded a Nobel Prize in Literature in 1958 and was subjected to a hail of abuse from literary officials in the Soviet Union, some calling for his exile. He was compelled to refuse the prize and to petition Communist Party leader Nikita Khrushchev to be allowed to remain in his homeland. He died at the end of May, 1960, and was buried in a ceremony attended by thousands of admirers. His beloved wife Olga was rearrested and sentenced to prison a short time later.

ANALYSIS

Pasternak's creative work is traditionally divided into two periods, with the break coming around 1932-1934. In the earlier period, he was a full-fledged member of a school of writing that demanded innovation in poetic form above all. Innovation could come at the price of obscure or difficult work. In the later period, Pasternak openly repudiated much of his earlier work, claiming that it had been unnecessarily obscure, and that simplicity and clarity were indispensable characteristics of all meaningful writing.

In the years before World War I, Pasternak took part in the heated arguments among Russia's poets about the future of art. Like mathematicians of the late nineteenth century, who had started to examine shapes that exist not in three but in four or more dimensions, or atomic physicists who claimed that matter is made up of many essentially empty submicroscopic particles, poets and other artists no longer felt that merely reproducing the outward appearances of things, the goal of realism, was an ambitious enough task. Pasternak for a time was drawn to the Futurists, a group of poets who believed that the so-called great writers of the past should be discarded along with their way of writing poetry. In Russia, this would mean the end of well-wrought lyrical sentiments or philosophical statements expressed in elegantly rhymed and measured verses. Pasternak was especially drawn to one of the leaders of the Futurists, Vladimir Mayakovsky, who by 1913 was already known in Russia for his flamboyant personal behavior and extravagantly egocentric poetry filled with stunning metaphors and exaggerated emotion. Pasternak soon decided to follow his own path, yet with the Futurists he learned to regard poetry as the free manipulation of the material of language, undertaken to explore truths beyond the logical definitions of words.

There were personal as well as historical reasons for the daunting complexity of Pasternak's early writing. His early interest in philosophy had led him to some unconventional ideas about what are normally accepted as givens, such as the relationship between cause and effect. This extended to artistic creation as well. Very early in his career, Pasternak became convinced that poems found their author and not the other way around. For him and his contemporaries as for the Romantic writers in the nineteenth century, the world was teeming with symbols, not merely lofty, conventionally poetic ones, but emphatically mundane ones that pressed themselves on the receptive mind of the poet and served to uncover the secret connection of all things in the world. When he wrote in one poem that poetry is “a night that covers leaves in hoarfrost,” he meant that such nights are true poetry in themselves as well as signs showing the inner workings of poetry. Both were things of fragile beauty wrought in the cold and dark where they must remain or else melt away and disappear.

At the same time he believed that the poetic mind itself reverses the usual causal order and brings about changes in reality by mere perception. He wrote in his first autobiography, Safe Conduct, that in art there is “a record of a shift in reality brought on by emotion.” Emotions cause the connections between a word and its logical meanings to weaken. Suddenly the similarities in the sound of two words shows them closer together than previously realized. In his rhymes and other sound repetitions (assonances and alliterations), Pasternak is a master at revealing these striking, multilayered similarities. In one poem he explores in a single line the suggestive sound patterning and logical connections in the Russian words for “tear,” “blind,” “dry,” and “salt”: slyezy, slyepa, vysyxli, and sol, though the line itself seems a puzzle, the solution of which is just out of reach: “Salt went blind. And tears dried.”

Many passages of Pasternak’s earlier writing will show the reader this kind of splintered world, the parts of which seem to have nothing in common. Often the reader must put the poet-perceiver back into the middle of this maelstrom of perceptions to glean sense. In Pasternak’s prose, for example, the word “however” is used to join two notions that have no other discernable connection than that they have occurred to the same person. For this reason the great Russian language theorist Roman Jakobson said that Pasternak’s work depends more than most writing on metonymy, that is, the relationship of things by their physical contiguity. A character in a story may, for example, think of two disparate events or objects otherwise unrelated to one another. There is great humanizing power to this approach in that, in this way, Pasternak continually underscores the uniqueness of the experience of every sentient being. This uniqueness of perception (and therefore experience) is crucial for people caught up in the mass destruction of war, civil strife, and Soviet collectivization of everything from farms to poetry cafés.

It was the abject ugliness of Soviet life that set Pasternak, in the second half of his life, to consider the link between a sense of beauty and moral behavior. He evolved the notion, set forth in living detail in Doctor Zhivago, that poetry, in seeking to show the contiguities that link objects and ideas, is a moral act. It is an expression of faith in the worthiness of this world and a belief that unifying love is stronger than forces that demand murder of one’s enemies or, failing that, suicide.

“DEFINITION OF POETRY”

First published: “Opredelenie poezii,” 1922 (collected in My Sister, Life, 1964)

Type of work: Poem

In a list of oblique but revealing intuitions, a word painting of poetry’s nature takes shape.

This poem appears in Pasternak’s My Sister, Life, a collection of poems that is among his most popular with Russian readers. It is placed at the beginning of a section of the book called “An Exercise in Philosophy,” but it has little in common with abstract thinking about art.

The outer form of “Definition of Poetry” is conventional: four four-line stanzas. Each line is made up of three anapestic feet, that is, two weakly accented syllables followed by a strongly accented one, as in the word “Montreal.” In the first eight lines of the poem, seven finely chiseled images are arranged in neat verses. At the middle of them, Pasternak sharpens a gentle, timeworn poetic image with the claim that poetry is “two nightingales dueling.” He seems to say that to write poetry is not just to record moments of one’s intuition. Instead, it is the struggle of two equals, a vision that sees new connections.

Pasternak’s methods are not always readily apparent in translation. The rhythm is symbolic in itself, but almost impossible to reflect accurately. To the Russian listener, this particular meter creates an impression of solemn pronouncements, of a finger regularly stabbing the paper while pointing out inescapable truths. It tends, after a time, toward monotony, as does all sententiousness. Pasternak plays a game with the high seriousness of his topic, at times enhancing the solemnity, such as in the repetitions of “it is,” at other times allowing the images to clash with the staid meter. Ambivalent feelings about his theme are hinged neatly at the very middle of the poem, where he concludes that poetry is “Figaro crashing like a hailstorm down from music stands and flutes into a flowerbed below.”

Translation creates another problem for Pasternak’s reader in that the presence of certain words in his poetry is not motivated by logical dictionary definitions. Instead, words appear because they share similar sounds with other words. This similarity suggested to Pasternak and many of his contemporaries that the things such similar words refer to must also be somehow related. The word for “peas” is connected in this way in the poem with the word for “being overgrown” and in turn to “deepness” and then “deafness.” Then the pea pods are opened, where poetry, now tears of the universe, is found. The Russian for “tears” and “universe” are related by sound. Pasternak claimed that nature very often affirmed his intuitions about these secret connections. Indeed, if one breaks open a pea pod freshly picked in the garden, inside one finds a crystalline drop of sap, silently reflecting all that surrounds it.

SAFE CONDUCT

First published: Okhrannaya gramota, 1931
(English translation, 1945)

Type of work: Autobiography

The poet examines the people and experiences that confirmed the choice of a life in poetry.

Safe Conduct is the earlier of Pasternak’s two autobiographies. The quirky method of its composition demonstrates, no less than Pasternak’s prose fiction, the persistence of his search for poetry in life as he lived it. As a story about a person’s life it is a puzzling work. There is little discussion of his family life; there is only a weak story line with few dates to help situate the seemingly disjointed events. The writing at times is like Pasternak’s early poetry. Cause and effect are often turned around so that, for example, the spring months strive to invent the earth so that they would have somewhere to return each year, and steam whistles carry trains through mountain tunnels.

In the first of the book’s three parts, Pasternak describes his boyhood through the impressions made on him by a family friend, the Russian composer Aleksandr Scriabin. The point of view is not that of a middle-aged writer reflecting on his past, but rather of the precocious teenager Pasternak was at the time. As one would expect from a dreaming adolescent, the importance of events is exaggerated. He allows his future in music (for which from the age of two he had studied for fifteen years) to be decided by an offhand answer to a question put to his idol, Scriabin. He also makes the penetrating observation that his poetry was unique, perhaps, because for the first decade and a half of his life he abstained from words for the sake of sound (that is, for music).

In the second part, Pasternak tells of his days as a philosophy student at the university in Marburg, Germany, and then as a tourist in Italy. This serves as a point of departure for musings on the nature of art, to which he would eventually dedicate his life. Pasternak sees poetry, his name for any perceived beauty, as nothing less than transcendence. To tell truths, he writes, is to be captured in time. Life moves on and truths change, but to capture the image of an instant is to preserve truth for eternity. Emphasizing the passivity of the artist, he often said this poetry was not created but came freely to the poet, an idea borrowed from German Romantic thinkers of the nineteenth century.

This leads logically to the topic of the third part, which is a kaleidoscopic portrait of the Soviet poet Vladimir Mayakovsky, who had killed himself the year before Safe Conduct was published. True to Pasternak’s tendency to capture the essence of an object by examining what is connected to it, he communicates the uniqueness of Mayakovsky’s poetic gift by observing the awe it engendered in those around him.

Safe Conduct stands at approximately the middle of Pasternak’s life as a poet. He was then just a year over forty and at the end of his first marriage. He was nearing the end of his illusions about the direction that the Russian revolution had taken. More important for his poetry, he was beginning to realize he would have to write in a new way. The task would be the same: finding a name for the moment at which the poet suddenly sees the world as it has never before been seen. The name, Pasternak was coming to realize, must be as transparent to the understanding of all as a biblical parable.

DOCTOR ZHIVAGO

First published: Doktor Zhivago, 1957
(English translation, 1958)

Type of work: Novel

A Russian physician, in the midst of storms of war and revolution, struggles to return harmony to his world through poetry.

Doctor Zhivago is Pasternak's last major work of prose fiction and represents a kind of summing up of all the beliefs that had survived with him through the fires of two revolutions, two world wars, a vicious civil war, the Sovietization of Russia, and Joseph Stalin's oppression. He wrote the novel in part because he had survived when most of his fellow writers had not. In death they joined the perhaps forty million Soviet citizens killed in wars, famine, or concentration camps.

Pasternak's main intent is to show the mass of interconnections tying the hero, Urij Zhivago, to the whole of Russia. The great number of characters brought on stage are all shown to be connected, however tangentially, to him. Family members, friends, and officials who decide his fate or that of his friends and family are all linked to Zhivago. Improbable coincidences bring characters together across vast spaces. This continues Pasternak's lifelong tendency to examine in his writing the sometimes invisible links that make the world an organic whole. The novel is not explicitly political; it was seen as an affront to Soviet authoritarian ideology, with its cult of the Communist Party and its contempt for all other groups.

The names Pasternak gives his characters reflect their relationship to life itself: Zhivago (the living) recalls the gospel story of the resurrection: "Why seek thee the living among the dead?" His lover, Lara (from "laurel"), is life's reward for the true poet, the perfect example of Russian womanhood. Her family, Russified Belgians, represents the debt owed to the rest of Europe for some of the best things in Russia. Komarovsky, a Bolshevik functionary and formerly a rapacious businessman who seduced Lara in her youth, has a name derived from the Russian for "mosquito." Pasha Antipov, a young intellectual and Lara's husband, has a good Russian surname, but upon becoming a revolutionary he takes an underground code name, Strelnikov (the gunman). These are only the novel's most obvious symbols. As in a good poem, every detail of the novel can be shown to have symbolic importance. Zhivago's escape with his family from turmoil in Moscow eastward to the Urals is covered by a concealing blanket of snow. So too are his brief moments of bliss with Lara insulated from the menacing surroundings by heavy snow. Candles burn throughout the novel as a symbol of the passion for life. Lara and Pasha, linked by the traditional folk image of the blood-red rowanberry, eventually perish, victims of Stalin's blood lust. The railroad is perhaps symbolic of Pasternak's method. It runs through the entire novel, linking one set of characters or episodes with the others.

Zhivago is like many Russian literary heroes, a weak man endowed with a poetic soul. What makes this novel a unique and important event in Russian literature is that this hero does not just talk about, recite, or feel poetry; he has the power to re-create through his writing what he has seen and felt. The last chapter in the book includes twenty-five poems of searing beauty ostensibly composed by Zhivago at various stages in the novel's progress. They prove by their existence poetry's unique ability to preserve, and in the end to resurrect, what has been: love, courage, longing, beauty, and faith.

SUMMARY

Boris Pasternak asks his reader to make a radical reevaluation of what passes for everyday reality. He insisted that all poetry, in which he included both verse and prose, tends to the realistic because the poet "does not invent metaphors, rather they are found in nature ready to be reproduced." A poet's originality is to be prized, but not as if it were creation itself. It is precisely when poets, like his idol Vladimir Mayakovsky, turn to helping earthly powers create facts that they lose their poetic vision, crush their talent, and neutralize their moral sense.

Lawrence K. Mansour

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Doktor Zhivago, 1957 (Doctor Zhivago, 1958)

SHORT FICTION:

"Pisma iz Tuly," 1922 ("Letters from Tula," 1945)

"Detstvo Liuvers," 1923 ("The Childhood of Luvers," 1945)

Rasskazy, 1925

Sochineniya, 1961 (Collected Short Prose, 1977)

POETRY:

Bliznets v tuchakh, 1914

Poverkh barierov, 1917 (Above the Barriers, 1959)

Sestra moia zhizn': Leto 1917 goda, 1922 (My Sister, Life, 1964; also known as Sister My Life)

Temy i variatsii, 1923 (Themes and Variations, 1964)

Vysokaya bolezni', 1924 (High Malady, 1958)

Carousel: Verse for Children, 1925

Dev'yatsot pyaty' god, 1926 (The Year 1905, 1989)

Lyutnant Shmidt, 1927 (Lieutenant Schmidt, 1992)

Spektorsky, 1931

Vtoroye rozhdeniye, 1932 (Second Birth, 1964)

Na rannikh poezdakh, 1943 (On Early Trains, 1964)

Zemnoy prostor, 1945 (The Vastness of Earth, 1964)

Kogda razgulyayetsa, 1959 (When the Skies Clear, 1964)

Poems, 1959

The Poetry of Boris Pasternak, 1917-1959, 1959

Poems, 1955-1959, 1960

In the Interlude: Poems, 1945-1960, 1962

Fifty Poems, 1963

The Poems of Doctor Zhivago, 1965

Stikhotvoreniya i poemy, 1965, 1976

The Poetry of Boris Pasternak, 1969

Selected Poems, 1983

DRAMA:

Slepaya krasavitsa, pb. 1969 (The Blind Beauty, 1969)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What philosophical influences on Boris Pasternak made his continued adherence to Bolshevik principles impossible?
- What resemblances are there between the patterns of Pasternak's poetic images and those of T. S. Eliot?
- What might account for the fact that Pasternak's poetry has had less impact than Doctor Zhivago on non-Russian readers?
- What resemblances are there between Pasternak's and Leo Tolstoy's ways of conveying history through fiction?
- Did Soviet censors in effect assure the worldwide popularity of Doctor Zhivago?

NONFICTION:

Okhrannaya gramota, 1931 (autobiography; Safe Conduct, 1945, in The Collected Prose Works)
Avtobiograficheskiy ocherk, 1958 (I Remember: Sketch for an Autobiography, 1959)
An Essay in Autobiography, 1959
Essays, 1976
The Correspondence of Boris Pasternak and Olga Freidenberg, 1910-1954, 1981
Pasternak on Art and Creativity, 1985
Pis'ma k gruzinskim, n.d. (Letters to Georgian Friends by Boris Pasternak, 1968)

TRANSLATIONS:

Hamlet, 1941 (of William Shakespeare)
Romeo i Juliet, 1943 (of Shakespeare)
Antony i Cleopatra, 1944 (of Shakespeare)
Othello, 1945 (of Shakespeare)
King Lear, 1949 (of Shakespeare)
Faust, 1953 (of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe)
Maria Stuart, 1957 (of Friedrich Schiller)

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Collected Prose Works, 1945
Safe Conduct: An Early Autobiography, and Other Works by Boris Pasternak, 1958 (also known as Selected Writings, 1949)
Sochinenii, 1961
Vozdushnye puti: Proza raz nykh let, 1982
The Voice of Prose, 1986

About the Author

Ciepiela, Catherine. The Same Solitude: Boris Pasternak and Marina Tsvetaeva. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2006.
Davie, Donald C., and Angela Livingstone, eds. Pasternak. New York: Macmillan, 1969.
De Mallac, Guy. Boris Pasternak: His Life and Art. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1981.
Erlich, Victor, ed. Pasternak: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1978.
Gifford, Henry. Pasternak: A Critical Study. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1977.
Hughes, Olga R. The Poetic World of Boris Pasternak. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1974.
Ivinskaya, Olga. A Captive of Time. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1978.
O'Connor, Katherine T. Boris Pasternak's "My Sister—Life": The Illusion of Narrative. Ann Arbor, Mich.: Ardis, 1988.
Rowland, Mary F., and Paul Rowland. Pasternak's "Doctor Zhivago". Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1967.
Rudova, Larissa. Understanding Boris Pasternak. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1997.
Weir, Justin. The Author as Hero: Self and Tradition in Bulgakov, Pasternak, and Nabokov. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 2002.

Library of Congress

ALAN PATON

Born: Pietermaritzburg, Natal, South Africa
January 11, 1903

Died: Botha's Hill, Natal, South Africa
April 12, 1988

Gifted and compassionate, Paton made the world understand the tragedy of South African apartheid and the oppressive exploitation, racist intolerance, greed, and fear that destroy a nation's soul.

BIOGRAPHY

Alan Stewart Paton (PAT-uhn) was born in Pietermaritzburg, Natal, South Africa, on January 11, 1903. He attended high school at Maritzburg College, received a bachelor of science from the University of Natal in 1923 with distinction in physics, and was student representative to the first Imperial Conference of Students in London. He taught privileged youngsters mathematics and chemistry at Ixopo High School, Natal, from 1925 to 1928, then joined the staff of Maritzburg College in 1928. He married Doris Francis the same year; they had two children.

Stricken with enteric fever, he redirected his life and in 1935 became the principal of Johannesburg's Diepkloof Reformatory for some four hundred delinquent African youths. He immediately instituted major changes to upgrade their quality of life, restore their dignity, encourage improved behavior, and provide job training and paid work opportunities. A decade later, in Cry, the Beloved Country (1948), a pleasant, young reformatory counselor proudly describes these enlightened policies. Debbie Go Home (1961; published in the United States as Tales from a Troubled Land, 1961) also recounts reformatory life. Success at Diepkloof earned Paton an international reputation for penal reform. Ineligible for military duty, he became the wartime chair of the combined Young Men's Christian Association and Toc H War Services. In 1942, he was appointed to the Anglican Diocesan Commission to report on church and race; the next year, he began a series of articles on crime, punishment, and penal reform for Forum. In 1946, while studying correctional institutions in Europe, the United States, and Canada, he wrote Cry, the Beloved Country, which he says poured from his soul.

In 1948, when the proapartheid National Party won the election, Paton resigned from Diepkloof to serve as honorary commissioner for Botha's Hill, Natal; to head the antiapartheid Liberal Party until the government banned interracial parties in 1968; and, much like Arthur Jarvis in Cry, the Beloved Country, to write about injustice and responsibility. In 1954, he toured the United States, writing on race relations for Collier's, receiving a doctorate in humanities from Yale University (the first in a long series of honorary degrees), and addressing the World Council of Churches. In 1956, as trustee of the Treason Trial Defense Fund, he gave mitigating evidence on behalf of Nelson Mandela and other black Africans. He received a bachelor's of education from the University of Natal in 1966, the year the Defense and Aid Fund was banned. His wife, Doris, died in 1967; two years later he married Anne Hopkins. He founded and edited Reality: A Journal of Liberal Opinion, served as honorary president of the South African National Union of Students, and opposed foreign sanctions and divestiture as means of combating apartheid. In 1977, he lectured at the University of Michigan at Flint, Western Michigan University, and Michigan State University. Despite heart surgery in 1982, he celebrated his eightieth birthday by touring the western United States. In 1986, he lectured at Harvard and La Salle universities. He received numerous awards for writing about and supporting human rights. He died at home in Botha's Hill on April 12, 1988. A social, religious, and antiapartheid political activist, he was too actively engaged in the obligations of life to achieve the level of literary production of which he was capable.

ANALYSIS

Paton accurately labeled his works "a compound of truth and fiction," for these fictional treatments of South African realities are firmly based in Paton's own experiences as a youth growing up in Natal and working in Johannesburg, a city of which the omniscient narrator of Cry, the Beloved Country says, "No second Johannesburg is needed upon the earth. One is enough." The changes wrought by the discovery of gold at Odendaalsrust; the miners' strike for better treatment, higher wages, and the right to be near their families; increased rates of prostitution, crime, and violence; the benign policies of the Diepkloof Reformatory; the legal consequences of the "Immorality Act" on interracial affairs; and Afrikaner fear of an overpowering black majority—these are historical threads of truth worked into the fabric of Paton's fictional depiction of the personal consequences of such events and patterns. Tales from a Troubled Land captures the pain of being "colored," accepted by neither whites nor blacks, while "A Drink in a Passage" explores a favorite Paton theme: racial opposites crossing social barriers to make tentative, fleeting personal contact.

Paton's unique, modern style blends Western and African patterns and themes. It builds on strategies and concerns from T. S. Eliot's The Waste Land (1922) and John Steinbeck's The Grapes of Wrath (1939)—fragmented voices, interwoven symbolic images, a vague sense of futility and loss, the disruption of natural harmony, progression toward decay, pollution, and erosion, communication breakdowns, alienation, dying children, and hollow men. South African critics find the characters' speech an English re-creation of Zulu sounds and syntax, pointing to techniques others have labeled "biblical" or "Greek"; they note an economy of diction, a heavy reliance on repetition and parallelism, a formality and stateliness that lend weight and dignity to simple words, a preference for proverbs and aphorisms, and a use of metaphors connecting humankind, earth, and plants. The description of Msimangu's speech typifies this "biblical" or "Zulu" pattern, with its repetition of "voice . . . of gold," its image of a voice like "a deep hollow bell": "it was the voice of a man whose heart was golden, reading from a book of golden words." The words capture a mystical sense of rural wisdom and traditional oral storytelling. Too Late the Phalarope (1953) echoes the motifs and patterns of Greek tragedy as it depicts the inner struggle of a divided soul—war hero, soccer star, police lieutenant, and father, but also sexually driven breaker of social and legal taboos, tragically destroyed by pride and passion.

When Paton describes the land past or future, his voice rings lyrical and mellifluous. A dramatic quality infuses his language and plots. Paton's style changes to fit voice; short, sharp alternating lines of stichomythia heighten dramatic tension and capture contrasting perspectives. His dramatic vignettes turn on the complexity and irrationality of behavior and motive—for example, Gertrude, a prostitute and would-be nun.

Thematically, Paton explores words and acts that divide fathers and sons, and failed reconciliations. For example, Stephen Kumalo in Cry, the Beloved Country loses his beloved son to the city and cannot comprehend his deeds. James Jarvis, in the same book, fails to take his son seriously until death separates them but resolves that contact with his grandson will be closer. Jacob van Vlaanderen's harsh punishment of young Pieter for his failure to achieve scholastic superiority in Too Late the Phalarope leads to permanent estrangement. The black father in "The Waste Land" finds himself forced, in self-defense, to kill one of three young robbers who pursue him through a junkyard; the youth proves to be the man's own son.

Contemtuously of authoritarianism and compelled by a deep-seated love of freedom, Paton studies crime and punishment, justice and law in novels featuring trials. The accused in Cry, the Beloved Country, a product of bad laws that speed the disintegration of tribal values, deserves punishment, although perhaps not to the degree awarded. The accused in Too Late the Phalarope, however, is victimized by the fear, ignorance, jealousy, and righteous indignation of his fellow citizens. Other concerns raised in Paton's books are the devastating effects of the migration of rural populations to urban industrial wastelands, the inhuman plight of squatters and shantytown dwellers, and the Afrikaner's obsession with racial purity. Paton captures and holds the imagination by delving into the secret heart of humanity and infusing personal desolation with a sense of hope despite obstacles.

Paton's depiction of Napoleon Letsitsi, an agricultural demonstrator, typifies this balance of faith and despair. The young man is the answer to Stephen Kumalo's prayers for renewed values and restoration of a lost past. Letsitsi transforms the land step by step but understands the practical difficulties of the ruined soil, the sullen, silent villagers myopically centered on immediate personal advantage, and unchecked population growth that could undo all progress. He is one of Africa's new men, educated, and employed by whites, but looking to an Africa in which black Africans also have a say in what will happen to them and their land. Paton lets him have the final words of Cry, the Beloved Country, words of hope but also of the need for responsibility.

CRY, THE BELOVED COUNTRY

First published: 1948

Type of work: Novel

When a black clergyman's son murders a white landowner's son, together the grieving fathers battle the ignorance, poverty, and racism that divide their nation.

The title of Cry, the Beloved Country echoes throughout the book. It first appears as a lament after the senseless murder of Arthur Jarvis, a courageous young white South African, a dedicated, enlightened fighter for justice for African blacks. His death forms an irony central to Paton's argument, an irony best stated by the Reverend Msimangu, who fears that when the whites finally turn to "loving," blacks will already have turned irreconcilably to "hating." Jarvis was shot by a frightened Zulu youth (one of three would-be robbers) while writing an impassioned treatise arguing that the white South African's destruction of the tribal system and its failure to offer anything positive in its place was the reason that black youths resorted to crime. The dead man's moving, sympathetic analyses of white-black relationships gone awry, read posthumously by his father to understand the stranger who was his son, provides clear intellectual statements of what Paton suggests dramatically through sad, lyric passages bemoaning the black experience. In a dramatic rendering of the black African heart, Paton uses multiple voices: "Cry for the broken tribe, for the law and the custom gone," cry for the dead and bereaved, but most of all "Cry, the beloved country" for the violence, death, separation, and suffering "not yet at an end." The "cry" continues through descriptions of the injustices and daily humiliations of apartheid, the senseless cries and the anguish deeply felt.

The cry encapsulates the fears of a rural people who have lost a traditional way of life and who move among strangers in a disorienting urban wasteland, its rules and customs not their own. Paton effectively communicates general fear and despair through individual fear and despair—the brother whose sister turns prostitute, the father whose wayward son missteps, the mother whose infant dies from starvation and disease. His lines, "Cry . . . for the unborn . . . inheritor of our fear. Let him not love the earth too deeply," verbalize another poignant thematic concern: the contrast between a land of poetic beauty "lovely beyond any singing of it" and the ugliness of the overgrazed, scorched, eroded valleys of the black reserves, where the titihoya cries no more and the red hills stand desolate, their "red blood" streaming away. Paton draws parallels between earth and humankind, with the ravaged soil no longer able to support the men and women who stream into the cities on a tide of blood.

Despite shifting perspectives and a dramatic rendering of multiple and dissonant voices, the novel centers on the Reverend Stephen Kumalo, a simple, devout rural Zulu clergyman from Ndotsheni, and his disturbing contact with Johannesburg, the boomtown where all roads lead. His eyes record the breakdown of community and values, the disintegration of a people. The story begins with Kumalo receiving a disturbing letter from a fellow clergyman, Msimangu, urging him to come to Johannesburg to assist his “sick” sister, Gertrude. The trip is costly, but Kumalo decides to make the sacrifice and perhaps, at the same time, find news of his son and of his brother, both of whom disappeared into the shantytowns of Johannesburg long before.

Kumalo’s first quest ends quickly, and, with the help of his new friend Msimangu, Kumalo rescues his sister and her daughter from the squalor and shame of prostitution and alcohol. His second quest, for his son, proves far more difficult. During it, he rescues from potential disaster his son’s girlfriend, pregnant with his grandchild. He also finds his missing brother, a self-important man who has rejected his roots and whose stirring oratory gives him great destructive powers, powers he is too cowardly to use fully against the white establishment he privately denounces. He has no real loyalties and is easily corrupted, as he later proves when his own son is accused as an accessory to murder. Everywhere Kumalo hears disturbing tales of his son but fails to find him. His search provides Paton with the opportunity to explore Johannesburg and its people. Caught up in a bus strike, Kumalo is persuaded against public transportation by those committed to change. He witnesses the forces that built a shantytown overnight. He shares in the pain and loss of the city’s black citizens. He hears of exploitation in the gold mines but also experiences the kindness of white strangers who go out of their way to give him a lift, who maintain model schools for blind natives, and who take pride in the good wrought in the “reformed” juvenile reformatories. When Kumalo finally finds his son, he is too late to save him, for young Absalom Kumalo has unquestionably murdered Arthur Jarvis out of fear and greed. His trial is swift but just, and, despite the counsel of a white attorney who works “pro deo” (for God), he is condemned to death—a sad young man in the wrong place at the wrong time with the wrong friends. His words of repentance are empty in the face of his deed and his fear. His father tries to redeem what he can, arranging a marriage to legitimize his grandchild-to-be, taking his new daughter-in-law’s child home with him, but he cannot help a son infected by city ways and needs.

The first part of the book depends on the relationship between the two clerics, on the kindness and understanding between them as they deal with a changing world in which they feel increasingly alienated. There is strength in their hopes and dignity in their efforts to cope. Msimangu tells Kumalo, “Something is happening that no Bishop can stop.” Ultimately, Msimangu opts for the monastic life and, in a last act of goodwill, gives Kumalo his entire savings. Kumalo, in turn, returns home to face parishioners with his son’s misdeeds.

The second part of the book depends on the relationship between James Jarvis, the father of the murdered, and the father of the murderer, Stephen Kumalo. Kumalo is appalled that his son has killed a man dedicated to improving conditions for black Africans. Neither the parish members nor James Jarvis blames the father. At first, Jarvis wants revenge. After understanding the depth of Kumalo’s suffering and studying his own son’s life and writings, however, he realizes that the best memorial is to practice his dead son’s beliefs, to take the first steps to account for past injustices. Inspired by a grandson very much like his dead son, Jarvis sends milk to hungry children, assigns an agricultural demonstrator to restore soil fertility, replaces bad seed with good, and begins building a dam to assure land restoration. After a wet night with Kumalo in the leaky wooden church, he vows to build a new one. Critics find Jarvis’s generosity unrealistic, but Paton modeled him on a true benefactor, Acting Prime Minister Jan Hofmeyr, who unselfishly endowed programs to assist the education and training of black Africans and whose biography Paton wrote.

Paton makes convincing the unspoken communication between the two saddened fathers. His novel ends hopefully, with both fathers vowing to fight the moral paralysis that grips their land and to build constructively on the ruins of tragedy. Jarvis’s grandson learns the Zulu language and empathizes with its speakers. Jarvis is committed to transforming his valley and to assisting the natives who share it. Kumalo goes into the mountains to await his son’s dawn execution. His final cry is a lament for the lost, wasted lives of Africa’s wayward sons; but it is also a cry of hope for a future of bettered relationships, of revitalized land, of a dawn for black Africans. Kumalo sees darkness still engulfing the land—"the fear of bondage and the bondage of fear"—but believes the dawn of black emancipation must come as the morning dawn "has come for a thousand centuries, never failing." Cry, the Beloved Country is a paean to Africa: its misery, its suffering, its beauty, and its potential.

Paton offers no simple solutions, no positive answers, only individual courage, personal responsibility, and an uncertain hope that someday blacks and whites, untouched by greed, will work together for the good of a country that is theirs together. His well-rounded characters are complex individuals with strengths and weaknesses. Kumalo may be named for the saintly martyr Stephen, but his anger and urge to punish sometimes overpower his Christian charity. Paton condemns a social order destructive of human values and life but also emphasizes individual differences that make one person choose right, no matter how difficult, and another choose wrong, no matter how much help, encouragement, or support he or she receives.

SUMMARY

Alan Paton's literary creations are inseparable from South Africa and its politics. As Edward Callan so aptly states, the vision of his novels encompasses South Africa's nationwide conflict "between black aspirations to human dignity and white fears for the loss of power and privilege." His writings—most particularly Cry, the Beloved Country—speak to the heart in a simple, clear, dramatic way that cannot be ignored. They are intellectually honest, infused with a love of Africa, and exhibit a belief in the essential dignity of all humankind and a sadness at the suffering of a people and nation. They capture the human condition, looking uncompromisingly at desolation, despair, cruelty, violence, and fear yet finding hope in small acts of kindness, in a bird's song, in fleeting moments of interracial understanding. As long as differences of race, color, or creed produce oppression, Cry, the Beloved Country will continue to be read as avidly as it has been read since its publication.

Gina Macdonald

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Cry, the Beloved Country, 1948
Too Late the Phalarope, 1953
Ah, but Your Land Is Beautiful, 1981

SHORT FICTION:

Tales from a Troubled Land, 1961 (pb. in England as Debbie Go Home, 1961)

DRAMA:

Sponono, pr. 1964 (with Krishna Shah)

NONFICTION:

The Land and People of South Africa, 1955
South Africa in Transition, 1956 (with Dan Weiner)
Hope for South Africa, 1958
Hofmeyr, 1964 (abridged as South African Tragedy: The Life and Times of Jan Hofmeyr, 1965; biography)
Instrument of Thy Peace, 1968 (meditations)
For You Departed, 1969 (meditations; pb. in England as Kontakion for You Departed, 1969)
Apartheid and the Archbishop: The Life and Times of Geoffrey Clayton, Archbishop of Cape Town, 1973 (biography)
Towards the Mountain, 1980 (autobiography)
Journey Continued, 1988 (autobiography)

About the Author

- Baker, Sheridan. Paton's "Cry, the Beloved Country": The Novel, the Critics, the Setting. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1968.
- Bloom, Harold, ed. Alan Paton's "Cry, the Beloved Country". Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2004.
- Callan, Edward. Alan Paton. Rev. ed. Boston: Twayne, 1982.
- _____. "Cry, the Beloved Country": A Novel of South Africa. New York: Twayne, 1991.
- Coetzee, J. M. White Writing: On the Culture of Letters in South Africa. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1988.
- Fuller, Edmund. "Alan Paton: Tragedy and Beyond." In Books with Men Behind Them. New York: Random House, 1962.
- Gerstung, Estrella, ed. Readings on "Cry, the Beloved Country". San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 2001.
- Ngwarsungu Chiwengo. Understanding "Cry, the Beloved Country": A Student Casebook to Issues, Sources, and Historical Documents. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2007.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How did Alan Paton's early career prepare him for the novels he wrote?
- What aspects of Paton's literary style have impressed critics most?
- Demonstrate the influence of John Steinbeck's The Grapes of Wrath (1939) on Paton.
- Examine the wisdom of fathers in Cry, the Beloved Country.
- Cite "small acts of kindness" that make a difference in Paton's novels.
- What events since Paton's death have substantiated the hope that he felt for his native land?

CESARE PAVESE

Born: Santo Stefano Belbo, Italy
September 9, 1908

Died: Turin, Italy
August 27, 1950

One of the leading writers of post-World War II Italy, Pavese produced short stories, novels, and poems that underscore the essential loneliness of the individual.

BIOGRAPHY

The rugged hill country of the Italian Piedmont was not only the region where Cesare Pavese (pah-VAY-say) was born and spent his childhood but a source for the writer's imagination throughout his brief career. When Pavese was only six years old, his father died, leaving him and his older sister to be raised by a mother who, the writer implies in his journal, was domineering and abusive. Later, critics were to question this picture of his mother, suggesting that Pavese dramatized his account in a journal he meant ultimately to be published. In any case, his mother saw to it that Cesare was given a good education in first-rate schools in Turin.

The young man proved a scholarly and creative student, though his teacher and mentor, Augusto Monti, was quick to discern a streak of morbidity, an unhealthy melancholy, in his star pupil. Already at fifteen, Pavese was becoming depressed and solitary. He read widely, especially the Romantic poets of the period.

By the time Pavese entered the University of Turin at the age of eighteen, he had become convinced that suffering was necessary to the production of art. A writer, he believed, confirms his or her art by the act of pain, emotional, intellectual, and physical. At the university he was attracted to American literature. Though the Fascist regime of Benito Mussolini ignored American studies for political reasons, Pavese was a private, self-absorbed intellectual, indifferent to politics. He enjoyed the colloquial breeziness of American English and among his favorite writers were Walt Whitman, Herman Melville, and Ernest Hemingway. He also read heavily in the Greek and Roman classics.

Pavese's mother died in 1930. Pavese considered going to the United States but never pursued the idea. By the early 1930's, he had joined the Fascist party—not out of a sense of political conviction but from a need to earn a living. He wanted to teach and needed a state-approved license.

Of more significance, however, was Pavese's association at this period with a circle of intellectuals, among whom were his old mentor, Monti, and a group of editors and writers. Antifascists, they favored the advancement of Italian culture through exposure to foreign ideas. La cultura, the magazine devoted to this aim, featured articles on American writers by Pavese. Meanwhile, he was teaching in the public schools and his position as translator and young critic was building him modest recognition.

This recognition soon brought him before the Fascist authorities. For having been editor of La cultura for a brief time, Pavese was arrested as a radical. In 1934, he was sentenced to three years' exile in Calabria, southern Italy. Increasingly despondent and introspective, Pavese began his journal. Il mestiere di vivere: Diario, 1935-1950 (1952; The Burning Brand: Diaries, 1935-1950, 1961; also known as The Business of Living), was published posthumously. The entries of this period show a petulant, sardonic personality. He felt alone and abandoned. He had fallen in love, but the relationship ended with Pavese in yet deeper despair.

Released after eight months, Pavese returned to Turin. His first important work, Lavorare stanca (1936; Hard Labor, 1976), was published in 1936. Though original, it failed to gain immediate recognition. By the late 1930's, Pavese had no real job and little income. The instability of his career as a part-time editor, translator, and critic deepened his melancholy; his journal of the time shows him on the verge of suicide.

In spite of such personal torment—or perhaps because of it—Pavese wrote and published several novels. Paesi tuoi (1941; The Harvesters, 1961), was begun in 1939 and appeared in 1941. Another novel, Il carcere (1949; The Political Prisoner, 1959), was obviously inspired by his exile in remote Calabria; its central idea of confinement reflects more of a personal alienation than a merely physical one. The theme of solitude and self-doubt is at the heart of most of his work.

The decade of the 1940's was to be the most productive of Pavese's career. In the span of ten years, he published nine novels, a collection of short stories, and a volume of poetry. He also continued to translate English-language works, including novels by William Faulkner and Gertrude Stein. His sense of English idiom fueled his own experiments in a colloquial Italian style.

As World War II advanced and brought social chaos to the country, Pavese was horrified and repelled. He joined the Communist Party in a half-hearted attempt to assert his need to feel politically and morally responsive to the suffering and injustice about him. He was not, however, a political creature. Privately he began to escape into a world of literary theory and contemplation.

By 1944, Pavese had withdrawn into the hill country above Turin and lived out the war in meditation and self-analysis. For about a year he lived in a monastery, studying theology and religion in an attempt to find final certainty. This period of contemplation amid the closing days of the war was the prelude to the great burst of creativity that followed. From 1945 until his death five years later, Pavese produced a remarkable series of novels, notably La casa in collina (1949; The House on the Hill, 1956); a philosophical dialogue, Dialoghi con Leucò (1947; Dialogues with Leucò, 1966); and his putative masterpiece, La luna e i falò (1950; The Moon and the Bonfire, 1952; also translated as The Moon and the Bonfires).

After the end of another unhappy love affair, this time with an American actress, Pavese took his own life by an overdose of sleeping pills on August 27, 1950. He was forty-one.

ANALYSIS

Comprising an impressive body of short stories, poems, novels, and critical essays, Pavese's work at once summarizes literary trends and ideas of the period while forging an innovative technique reflecting its author's suffering as a writer and human being.

Literature in prewar Italy, particularly in the 1930's when Pavese began to write, was marked by a diluted Romanticism: poetry and prose that recorded the private, subjective experience of the writer in conflict with the values of society or the external world. Poetry was often lyrical, as in the work of Gabriele D'Annunzio, and the prose often experimental or impressionistic, as in the work of Italo Svevo. The so-called Hermetic school, whose leading exponent was Salvatore Quasimodo, often produced difficult, abstruse poems that sought escape into a kind of private, self-centered world.

Pavese was influenced by this literature, which he found congenial to his own introverted personality, but also crucial in his creative development were his discoveries in American literature. He wrote his master's thesis on the poetry of Walt Whitman, who was to be a source of inspiration for his own poetical style in Hard Labor: American writers such as Whitman and Herman Melville gave Pavese a new way of viewing experience, of making a connection with the outside world. He saw in American writers a creative "virility"—his own word—a freedom in the treatment of character, event, and language.

His characters are often peasants, laborers, and whores. Many are violent or use violence to cope with the world around them, a world of war, as in The House on the Hill, or the world of personal, solitary agony, as in The Moon and the Bonfire. Sometimes the violence of the world is symbolized in the act of giving birth, as in some of the early stories.

Set against this world of peasants and workers is the narrator or protagonist, often a teacher (as was Pavese) or an intellectual. Throughout his work a major tension is presented between the country types and the urban intellectual who lives among them and who, despite his cynicism, learns from them. Such a tension suggests that the narrator is somehow incomplete as a personality until he can fully relate with the people and life of the countryside. It is this inability of the narrator to take hold of his life, to relate sexually or emotionally, that makes him brooding, lonely, and unfulfilled.

Loneliness is the most central and compelling theme of Pavese's work. His characters are often struggling against the external world of observation and the inner world of doubt and uncertainty. The protagonist's own knowledge, his cynical perception of the world, conflicts with the basic, almost intuitive experience of the peasants and workers, who have committed themselves to the act of living.

Not only the subject matter, but the method of exploring such matter in a colloquial idiom was suggested to him by his studies of American literature. The poetry of Hard Labor is marked by a fresh use of the colloquial. Its language is crisply informal, casual yet incisive. The plain, unemotional prose of The House on the Hill recalls the unadorned styles of Sherwood Anderson and Ernest Hemingway, whose works Pavese knew well.

Characteristic of Pavese's work, therefore, is the particular meshing of the sensitive, highly allusive style of the previous generation of Italian writers with the seemingly open, objective, almost casual narrative voice of the Americans he read. His fiction seems to build upon the minutiae of everyday experience—playing cards, walking the hills, sitting at a table under the trees—and to resolve this into personal insight and emotions. Finally, the Italian countryside, descriptions of which fill his books, serves as a mystical, stabilizing force in the lives of all the characters. The countryside gives meaning to their lives in a world of violence and uncertainty.

HARD LABOR

First published: Lavorare stanca, 1936
(English translation, 1976)

Type of work: Poetry

This first published work presents a series of short narrative poems that can be seen as forming a kind of spiritual autobiography.

This collection of poems is important for two reasons. First, in its conversational rhythms, the book is an attempt by Pavese to construct a realistic, twentieth century Italian poetic language rich in narrative detail and colloquial spontaneity. His indebtedness to American literature, and to Whitman in particular, is evident both in the spirit and structure of the collection. In an early appreciative essay on Whitman, Pavese declared that the American poet was the first to "see things with a virgin eye." Whitman was the poet who comprehended the world in his own being. For Pavese, the vignettes of Leaves of Grass are not separate entities, but part of the all-embracing understanding.

Such an interpretation can be applied to the structure of Lavorare stanca. Like Whitman, Pavese set about in this work to create a new poetry, strong and honest in its presentation of life. All the poems in the collection tell stories or develop as vignettes. Just as Leaves of Grass begins with "Song of Myself," a long poem that establishes for the poet a personality who assumes all, so Pavese opens Hard Labor with his longest poem, "I mari del Sud" ("South Seas"), which introduces a narrator who begins his quest for identity. The narrator of "South Seas," wrote Pavese in his journal, was his "spiritual personality." In its rhythms, the poem is a kind of Italian equivalent of Whitman's free verse, though Pavese's poetic line is firmly rooted in traditional metrical cadences.

"South Seas" begins with the narrator recalling his silent walk in the hills with his cousin, who has just returned from a journey around the world. Among other things, the cousin tells the narrator of his seafaring life and of his adventure hunting whales. In contrast, the narrator ponders his own uneventful life, his childhood among the hills, and his loneliness.

In the contrast between the worldly cousin and the naïve narrator, the poem establishes a theme of frustration and uncertainty. The peasant narrator and the urbane cousin are obvious spiritual kin, each part of the personality of the poet. Neither part is fulfilled; each is at odds with the other.

This conflict of the private, peasant personality with the public, urban personality is a central theme in Pavese's work and is the second foundation for the book's importance. Other poems in the collection outline a similar tension and develop related polarities between youth and age, innocence and sophistication, reality and illusion, commitment and withdrawal—all reflections of Pavese's own personal crisis.

THE HOUSE ON THE HILL

First published: La casa in collina, 1949
(English translation, 1956)

Type of work: Novel

In the closing days of World War II in Italy, a teacher finds himself unable to act, either as an individual or as a member of the resistance movement.

About midway through the novel, the narrator, Corrado, is walking through a war-torn section of the city of Turin. The city is braced for the violence inevitable at the retreat of one army and the advance of another. Cate, the woman with him, angrily accuses him of not understanding the suffering of the people. “You people’ can’t refer to me,” he responds. “I’m alone. I try to be as alone as possible. . . . Only a man alone can keep his head.”

The remark encapsulates both the theme and the characteristic predicament of the narrator—his inability to understand and to commit to love. The major image in the novel is the house on the hill. The narrator goes to the house at the beginning of the book to live out the war as it rages in the valley and in the city below. News of the war is heard on the radio or from people who straggle in. From time to time the narrator descends, goes into Turin and witnesses the violence for himself.

The action of the book recalls the basic pattern of some of the poems in Hard Labor, especially “South Seas.” In the novel the narrator sets out on a kind of quest, but unlike that of “South Seas,” the quest is both a literal and metaphorical descent into violence and uncertainty. Like that of “South Seas,” the quest is also a search for meaning.

Part of that meaning is symbolized in the narrator’s uncertainty of his relationship with Dino, a young boy whom he befriends and suspects to be his son. Cate, the boy’s mother, refuses to tell the narrator whether he is the boy’s father, but the narrator believes that Dino is his son, just as he believes that he still loves Cate. He left her years before. Yet Corrado, the narrator, remains noncommittal; he is cynical regarding Cate, the war, and his own ability to relate. He is, by nature, solitary, unable to commit himself to loving Cate or to acting as a responsible member of society by joining the resistance movement.

The novel follows a pattern of departure and return, a duality further strengthened by the contrast between country and city, peasant and urbanite. In the house on the hill, Corrado is able to live the solitary life of the self-centered and the selfish. Elvira, the other woman in his life, loves him, but Corrado does not return her love. He lives in the country setting, immured from commitment and responsibility. He voices opinions but does not act on them.

Conversely, his descent into Turin brings him the pain of knowing the suffering brought on by the war, a pain he is able to ignore by returning to the house on the hill. The hill is a controlling symbol of Corrado’s detachment from the life of action and responsibility. Such detachment is underscored by the flat, bland, dispassionate tone of the prose, which identifies love, people, and war as if they were all insignificant.

THE MOON AND THE BONFIRE

First published: La luna e i falò, 1950
(English translation, 1952)

Type of work: Novel

A man returns home to seek meaning in life through a recollection of his past.

The Moon and the Bonfire is Pavese’s last and greatest work. On one level it recapitulates the themes of loneliness and quest that characterize his earlier prose and poetry. In this novel, the narrator has become like the world traveler in “South Seas.” In this case, however, he has returned not from the sea but from America. As the novel opens, the narrator is walking amid the hills of his native Piedmont with his friend, Nuto. The war is over, and the narrator has returned to his roots to find himself through a recollection of his youth. He befriends Cinto, a lame boy, the son of a neighbor, a violent man who burned down his house before killing himself. The boy—reminiscent of Dino in The House on the Hill—is drawn to the narrator as a symbol of romance and the exciting life of adventure in the new world. For the narrator, however, life in America was not romantic but lonely and bitter. He recalls spending a night in the cab of a truck on the edge of a vast desert. His only romance was with a woman as lonely and frustrated as he. She left him one morning, and he never saw her again.

The vague, almost dreamlike description of life in America cannot be interpreted solely as a failure on Pavese's part, since he had never seen America, but as a correlative to the narrator's own state of mind. America is not a place but a symbol of the bitter loneliness mirroring the narrator's life.

The Moon and the Bonfire is more than a recapitulation of earlier work. The book is an artistic advance in its treatment of natural symbols. The narrator's return to his natal ground is a salvific experience, unlike the barren years in America. In the Piedmont hills, which are described evocatively and poetically, the narrator finds a connection between himself and the land—a connection in time. Nuto's self-assuredness, his insistence that the moon is a symbol of destiny and of endurance, and his remark about bonfires renewing the fertility of the land, suggest to the narrator that he has, indeed, come home. Despite the violence of the past, the unrequited loves and the deaths of friends, the narrator understands that he has become part of a process of regeneration.

Nuto, the good friend, and Cinto, the boy, thus form antipodes that the narrator reconciles by his understanding. Nuto is the peasant, the man of feeling, of instinct. Cinto is youth, innocence, promise. Between them is the narrator, who has come from the cities and deserts of the new world and has seen through recollection of his past so that he may find a place in this world of hills and bonfires. The novel achieves a dramatic tension between the narrator's cynicism and despair and his desire to become a part of the process of living.

SUMMARY

Cesare Pavese plumbed his own experiences for the core of his material. His works could readily be understood in the context of the lonely, despairing personality of his journal and letters. Pavese was not, however, simply an autobiographical writer. His solitary protagonists seeking meaning in a violent world express the doubts and anxieties of many, while his colloquial style and poetic evocation of landscape give his work a timeless, universal quality. The secret of his art is its honesty, the fusion of personal anguish with the unflinching rendering of objective reality.

Edward Fiorelli

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Paesi tuoi, 1941 (The Harvesters, 1961)

La spiaggia, 1942 (The Beach, 1963)

Il compagno, 1947 (The Comrade, 1959)

La bella estate, 1949 (includes Il diavolo sulle colline and Tra donne sole; The Beautiful Summer, 1959)

Il carcere, 1949 (The Political Prisoner, 1959)

La casa in collina, 1949 (The House on the Hill, 1956)

Il diavolo sulle colline, 1949 (The Devil in the Hills, 1954)

Prima che il gallo canti, 1949 (includes Il carcere and La casa in collina)

Tra donne sole, 1949 (Among Women Only, 1953)

La luna e i falò, 1950 (The Moon and the Bonfire, 1952)

Fuoco grande, 1959 (with Bianca Garufi; A Great Fire, 1963)

The Selected Works of Cesare Pavese, 1968

SHORT FICTION:

Feria d'agosto, 1946 (Summer Storm, and Other Stories, 1966)
Notte di festa, 1953 (Festival Night, and Other Stories, 1964)
Racconti, 1960 (Told in Confidence, and Other Stories, 1971)
Told in Confidence, and Other Stories, 1971
The Leather Jacket: Stories, 1980
Stories, 1987

POETRY:

Lavorare stanca, 1936, expanded 1943 (Hard Labor, 1976)
La terra e la morte, 1947
Verrà la morte e avrà i tuoi occhi, 1951
Poesie edite e inedite, 1962
A Mania for Solitude: Selected Poems, 1930-1950, 1969

NONFICTION:

Dialoghi con Leucò, 1947 (Dialogues with Leucò, 1966)
La letteratura americana e altri saggi, 1951 (American Literature: Essays and Opinions, 1970)
Il mestiere di vivere: Diario, 1935-1950, 1952 (The Burning Brand: Diaries, 1935-1950, 1961; also known as The Business of Living)
Lettere, 1966 (partially translated as Selected Letters, 1924-1950, 1969)

TRANSLATIONS:

Il nostro signor Wrenn, 1931 (of Sinclair Lewis's Our Mr. Wrenn)
Moby-Dick, 1932 (of Herman Melville)
Riso nero, 1932 (of Sherwood Anderson's Dark Laughter)
Il 42 parallelo, 1935 (of John Dos Passos's Forty-Second Parallel)
Uomini e topi, 1938 (of John Steinbeck's Of Mice and Men)
Tre esistenze, 1940 (of Gertrude Stein's Three Lives)
Il borgo, 1942 (of William Faulkner's The Hamlet)

About the Author

Biasin, Gian-Paolo. The Smile of the Gods. Translated by Yvonne Freccero. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 1968.
 Binetti, Vincenzo. "Contextualizing Marginality: Urban Landscape and Female Communities in Cesare Pavese's 'Among Women Only.'" In Italian Women and the City: Essays, edited by Janet Levarie Smarr and Dana Valentini. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2003.
 Fiedler, Leslie. "Introducing Cesare Pavese." Kennyon Review 16 (Autumn, 1954): 536-553.
 Lajolo, Davide. An Absurd Vice. Translated and edited by Mario Pietralunga and Mark Pietralunga. New York: New Directions, 1983.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Was Cesare Pavese a man born in the right place but at the wrong time?
- Explain why a young Italian in Pavese's circumstances might join first the Fascists and then the Communists.
- What are the difficulties of a young twentieth century Italian poet using Walt Whitman as a model, as Pavese does in Hard Labor?
- Examine the symbols indicated in the title The Moon and the Bonfire. Why is the bonfire a particularly useful symbol for Pavese?
- Could Pavese's characters resolve the loneliness that he himself never could resolve?

- Norton, Peter M. "Cesare Pavese and the American Nightmare." Modern Language Notes 77 (January, 1962): 24-36.
- O'Healy, Aine. Cesare Pavese. Boston: Twayne, 1988.
- Pavese, Cesare. Cesare Pavese and Anthony Chiuminatto: Their Correspondence. Edited by Mark Pietralunga. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2007.
- Simborowski, Nicoletta. Secrets and Puzzles: Silence and the Unsaid in Contemporary Italian Writing. Oxford, England: Legenda, European Humanities Research Centre, 2003.
- Sontag, Susan. "The Artist as Exemplary Sufferer." In Against Interpretation. New York: Anchor Books, 1990.
- Thompson, Doug. Cesare Pavese. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1982.

© The Nobel Foundation

OCTAVIO PAZ

Born: Mexico City, Mexico
March 31, 1914

Died: Mexico City, Mexico
April 19, 1998

A poet and essayist of international stature, Paz championed the poet's struggle against alienation and the corruption of language.

BIOGRAPHY

Octavio Paz (pahz) was born in Mexico City, Mexico, on March 31, 1914, the son of Octavio Paz, a mestizo, and Josephina Lozano, a woman of Spanish descent. His father, a lawyer and journalist who defended the peasant revolutionary Emiliano Zapata and helped implement agrarian reform in Mexico after the revolution, made Paz aware of social justice issues. Paz grew up in his grandfather's house in the small village of Mixoac. His grandfather, a popular novelist, introduced Paz to literature. Paz also lived and attended school in the United States for almost two years while his father was in political exile during the Mexican Revolution.

Paz began his literary career in his late teens, publishing his first book of poems, Luna silvestre, in 1933. He reacted against the fierce nationalism dominant in Mexican culture after the revolution and allied himself with Mexican poets interested in world literature. Nonetheless, he was very concerned about Mexico's identity and future in the revolution's aftermath. In 1937, Paz went to Yucatán to work in a rural school, leaving behind his university studies. He did not want to be a doctor or lawyer as his family desired. He wanted to be a poet whose poetry would help to change the world.

In 1937, Paz also went to Spain in support of the Spanish Republic. After trying unsuccessfully to enlist as a soldier to fight in Spain's civil war, he defended the Spanish Republic with his poetry. He met many poets in Spain: Pablo Neruda, César Vallejo, Antonio Machado, and Stephen Spender, among others.

Paz returned to Mexico in 1938, determined to further the cause of the Spanish Republic through Taller (1938-1941), a literary magazine that he edited. With the Spanish Republic's defeat, a disillusioned Paz realized that political action could not save the world from evil. He turned to poetry as a means for changing the world for the better, believing that poetry opposes evil by creating an alternative reality with language.

In 1943, Paz left Mexico to travel extensively for two years in the United States on a Guggenheim Fellowship. He entered the Mexican diplomatic service in 1945 and was stationed in Paris from 1946 to 1951. While in Paris, he became friends with André Breton, the founder of Surrealism. Paz was attracted to Surrealism because it maintains that poetry is a moral force capable of subverting the established social and political order. Paz saw poetry as a vehicle for the cultivation of inner values, such as love, imagination, and fantasy. In the aftermath of World War II, Paz believed that it was imperative that poetry defend the human spirit in the face of the isolation and alienation characteristic of modern industrial society.

Paz firmly established himself as a major literary figure in the 1950's. He returned to Mexico in 1953, after an absence of almost eleven years. Paz's meditations on Mexican identity and psychology resulted in his much acclaimed study of Mexican culture, El laberinto de la soledad: Vida y pensamiento de México (1950; The Labyrinth of Solitude: Life and Thought in Mexico, 1961). In 1956, he published El arco y la lira (The Bow and the Lyre, 1971), a defense of poetry as a force for social change. In his book-length poem Piedra de sol (1957; Sun Stone, 1963), Paz uses the Aztec calendar and its circular conception of time to express the poetic quest for freedom and communion through lovemaking.

During his life, Paz personally experienced love in three relationships; the third one lasted for the rest of his life. In 1938, he married the Mexican writer Elena Garro, with whom he had a daughter. They divorced in 1959. That same year he went to Paris with his lover Bona Tibertelli de Pisis, an Italian painter. In 1965, the relationship ended and he married Marie-José Tramini, a French woman with whom he spent the rest of his life.

Paz served as Mexican ambassador to India from 1962 to 1968. His contact with Oriental cultures and thought made him more conscious of the role of silence and empty space in poetic composition. In Salamandra (1962), the spacing of the words on the page is as important as the words themselves. In the long poem Blanco (1967; English translation, 1971), the layout and the use of different typefaces allow for several alternative readings of the poetic text.

Paz resigned from his position as ambassador to India in October, 1968, when the Mexican government killed more than three hundred student demonstrators in Mexico City. In 1968, Paz began to devote himself to teaching and lecturing abroad, mainly in the United States. He edited and published Phural, a magazine dedicated to art and politics, from 1971 until 1976. He became the editor of the literary magazine Vuelta in 1976. His many honors and prizes include the Jerusalem Prize in 1977, the Cervantes Prize, the most important award in the Spanish-speaking world, in 1981, and the Neustadt International Prize for Literature in 1982. In 1990, Paz received the Nobel Prize in Literature; he was the first Mexican to be so honored.

Through the early 1990's, Paz wrote extensively about politics and culture in Latin America. A maverick championing freedom and democracy, he criticized both capitalism and communism for exploiting human beings for the sake of economic goals. He incurred the wrath of many Latin American intellectuals for his criticism of leftist revolutionary movements in Latin America. Insisting that he had no political affiliations, Paz continued to view poetry as a vehicle through which people can resist all ideologies that alienate and dehumanize them. As the author of numerous books of poetry and prose, Paz was considered to be not only one of the greatest poets ever in the Spanish-speaking world but also the most prominent intellectual in Latin America. He died in Mexico City on April 19, 1998.

ANALYSIS

Paz not only was a poet of international stature but also incorporated the influences of different and even opposing cultures and literatures: Mexican culture with its pre-Columbian and Spanish colonial traditions and its modern revolution, Spanish art and literature, the French Surrealism of Breton, the works of Stéphane Mallarmé, and Oriental myth and philosophy. Throughout his life, Paz was concerned with the problem of how human beings can recover their wholeness and innocence in a fragmented and corrupt world. He turned to French Surrealism and Oriental philosophy to take a moral stand against the harmful effects of modern society.

For Paz, as for the Surrealists, the primary values of life are love, liberty, and poetry. Although he was not drawn to Surrealist techniques, such as automatic writing, Paz adopted wholeheartedly Surrealism's call to practice poetry as rebellion against society's suppression of human freedom. Poetry, he believed, invites the reader to experience ecstatic union with "the other" (woman, nature, or language), an occurrence discouraged, when not forbidden, by society. The world is dominated by science, reason, and materialism, while poetry champions the values of the spirit. Through love, imagination, art, and dreaming, the poet is inwardly transformed, thereby introducing changes in society.

In "Más allá del amor" ("Beyond Love"), Paz exalts woman as the other who makes it possible for him to leave the domain of time. He identifies history as the force that alienates humanity and divides it into national, ideological, and religious camps. As an antidote to the tyranny of time, Paz advocates the poetic moment, an experience of unity and wholeness outside time.

In "Himno entre ruinas" ("Hymn Among the Ruins”), Paz attributes to poetry the power to redeem a world destroyed by World War II. The poem’s pyramid structure and references to Aztec ruins evoke Mexico’s Aztec past. The poet seeks the ultimate origins of humanity and language as an archaeologist seeks to uncover buried treasures of the past, hoping to bring humanity to authentic life. When alienation is conquered, language is alive and makes fully present what it signifies. Words are simultaneously flowers, fruit, and action.

In his collection of prose poems ¿Águila o sol? (1951; Eagle or Sun?, 1970), Paz combines his quest to recover Mexico’s pre-Columbian past and his own childhood with his experience as a Surrealist in Paris. In the first section of the book, “Trabajos del poeta” (“Works of the Poet”), the poet fights with language, striving to transcend it so that duality gives way to unity. The need to choose between eagle or sun yields to the realization that eagle and sun are one. The poet purges himself of corrupt language so that from inner silence he might give birth to a new untainted language and escape alienation. In the last section, “Hacia el poema” (“Toward the Poem”), the poet describes the consequences of restoring language’s purity. Poetry becomes an instrument for changing consciousness and creating a new ideal society.

Sun Stone is one of Paz’s finest poems. It is the culmination of the first period of his poetic work, before he became Mexican ambassador to India in 1962 and incorporated Oriental philosophy into his poetry. The poem addresses Paz’s principal themes: the relationship of self and other, the theme of alienation, and the quest for communion and transcendental experience. The poet searches for true freedom by experiencing the poetic moment in lovemaking. While the poem’s structure is Surrealist in that it is composed of many unrelated images, Paz evokes his Mexican heritage by organizing the poem around the Aztec calendar and employing its notion of circular time.

Salamandra marks a change in Paz’s poetic technique. In this collection, Paz employs fewer words and more space, making his poems visual, as well as oral. Using more space brings the role of silence to the forefront in his poetry. It represents the silence that the reader and poet enjoy beyond words. It also refers to the infinite potential of all meaning available to the still and silent mind. In the title poem, “Salamandra,” Paz attacks science for dehumanizing life. Paz liberates the word “salamander” by associating it with air, fire, water, wind, and many other images in the poem. The word “salamander” thus assumes multiple meanings and is no longer limited to only one. Through wordplay, the poet rediscovers the latent possibilities of language and brings it to life. Liberated and purified language frees people from the grip of alienation.

Paz integrated Oriental thought, especially Buddhist philosophy, into his poetry after he became Mexico’s ambassador to India in 1962. His poetry also evidences his constant reading of Mallarmé. In both Mallarmé and Buddhism, Paz found the concept of the negation of the ego. The poet uses poetry to transcend the ego by disappearing into the poem. Like Mallarmé, Paz allows his words to hang suspended in the whiteness of the page. Surrounded by nameless white space, the word is liberated from fixed meanings and freed for the reader to explore an infinite play of meanings.

Ladera este (1969), a collection of travel and love poetry, reflects Paz’s years in India. The long poem Blanco (1967; English translation, 1971) continues the experimentation with the relationship of poetic text and space begun in Salamandra. The poem was originally published on a single continuous sheet of paper. It was printed with black and red ink and several typefaces. Through the use of blank space, ink color, and typeface, Paz breaks the one long poem into several shorter but complementary poems. In Blanco, Paz establishes an analogy between writing a poem and making love to a woman. The woman’s white body is like the paper on which the poet writes his passion. It draws from the Buddhist Tantric tradition, which advocates lovemaking as a technique and ritual for spiritual liberation. Poetry, like woman, leads man to unite with a timeless reality beyond words.

SUN STONE

First published: Piedra de sol, 1957 (English translation, 1963)

Type of work: Poem

The poet embraces women because love allows him to overcome his alienation and the evils of death, destruction, and war.

In Sun Stone, the poet searches for the experience of the poetic moment through making love. The quest is framed by a structure modeled after the Aztec sun stone, a calendar divided into 584 days. The poem is composed of 584 lines and opens and closes with the same six lines. Setting the tone for the entire poem, these six lines invoke a world free of alienation, a paradise outside of time. Sun Stone rushes forward without any breaks, leading to an ending that returns the reader to the beginning. Even as the calendar is round, time is cyclical. The protagonist's experience is also repetitive, alternating between ecstasy and alienation.

The opening lines of Sun Stone point to a reality outside the passage of time where opposites are united. The poet describes a river flowing backward and forward, always returning to the same point. On its bank is a tree at once firmly rooted and dancing.

Alienation intrudes. The protagonist becomes disoriented and confused in the urban landscape. He cannot even remember his name. He is confronted with the horrors of history: bombings, concentration camps, and assassinations. He recalls Socrates' death, the assassination of Julius Caesar, the betrayal of Montezuma, the murder of Leon Trotsky in Mexico. Yet in Madrid, in 1937, in the midst of the Spanish Civil War, the protagonist manages to overcome the atrocities of history through love. Love brings human beings to a timeless paradise where individual identity is lost in oneness:

these nakednesses, woven together, can overleap time and are invulnerable, nothing can touch them, they go to the origins,
there is no You nor I, tomorrow, yesterday, names.

After the protagonist has succeeded in stepping out of history through love, he finds himself once again subject to alienation. He feels isolated, separated from others by barbed-wire fences, spikes, and bars. Love is his only defense against isolation and death. Through love, he is free from all forces that dehumanize him. The world changes when love is practiced. It is a means for transforming society: "The world grows fresh and green while you are smiling and eating an orange." The bliss of lovers anticipates an ideal world where all are lovers and poets.

The protagonist pays tribute to woman, who makes him whole. Woman is a goddess, the female principle that redeems him from isolation and the horrors of history. He evokes women from many times and places, figures of myth and women immortalized in famous poems: Laura, Isabel, Eloise, Persephone, and Mary. Woman is the gateway to vision and knowledge. Alienation is broken by ecstasy, and history is undermined through the mediation of the woman. She is the "flower of resurrection and grape of life."

Sun Stone is perhaps Paz's most important poem. The reader experiences a full cycle of history, starting and ending with an eternal present before time and history. Through the mediation of woman, the protagonist is able periodically to escape the tyranny of history and his own alienation.

BLANCO

First published: 1967 (English translation, 1971)

Type of work: Poem

The poet compares writing poetry to making love to a woman.

In Blanco, Paz experiments with poetry as a visual and oral art form. The poem was first published on one continuous sheet of paper, using various typefaces and two colors of ink. A single column of text alternates with two parallel columns. These in turn are either spaced separately or joined together and are only distinguishable from each other by their contrasting typefaces. Paz arranges the poetic text in such a way that the words are able to interact with each other. On the theory that the poet should not manipulate language, he denies his ego any role in the creative process. Paz applies the Tantric tradition to the poetic text. The words set free on the page, surrounded by space, assume a life of their own. They are erotic objects free to attract, repel, and unite with each other. The use of different columns of text running separately or parallel to each other allows many alternative readings. This one long poem has fourteen texts that can be read separately or in different combinations.

The poem begins with a wordplay about the origins of language before its corruption by history. The text of the single central column deals with the poet's labor to bring forth poetry. The lamp represents the poet's alertness. He waits patiently for language to rise into his consciousness. When it does so, the words of the poem flow forth, and the poet dissolves with his mistress in an experience of pure language.

The double column is a love poem. The two columns separate and join together, opening and closing like legs in imitation of Tantric texts. The poet penetrates his beloved. He fertilizes words, and they ascend the stalk that produces the flow of poetry in the central column.

The influences of Mallarmé and Tantric Buddhism are most evident in this long and very complex poem. Blanco likens writing poetry to making love. Paz follows Mallarmé's position that living language is carnal and that words have flesh like a woman. The graphic layout of the poem and the use of white space between the words encourage the reader to explore the infinite possibilities in words. In Tantric Buddhism, erotic love serves as a means to gain spiritual liberation. In Blanco, erotic love and the inception of poetry are aspects of the same experience of transcending time and language.

THE LABYRINTH OF SOLITUDE

First published: El laberinto de la soledad: Vida y pensamiento de México, 1950 (English translation, 1961)

Type of work: Nonfiction

Within the labyrinth of solitude, which is everyone's existence, Mexican identity has created itself and Mexican history has evolved into the modern Mexico.

Although The Labyrinth of Solitude: Life and Thought in Mexico is a work of prose, it has been hailed as Paz's greatest poetic achievement. It is written in a rich, poetic language, and it explores the themes and ideas that Paz expresses in his poetry.

In The Labyrinth of Solitude, Paz discusses Mexican identity, what it means to be Mexican, the history of Mexico and its importance in shaping the Mexican identity, and finally the solitude which is the condition not only of Mexicans but of all human beings. The book is composed of nine essays, each of which can be read as an independent work. The first four essays deal with who the Mexicans are, their identity, and how they acquired it; these essays reflect the influence of existentialism on Paz.

The first essay, "El pachuco y otros extremos" ("The Pachuco and Other Extremes"), looks at the pachuco, or Mexican living in North America, who emphasizes his difference and yet is ashamed of his ancestry. He is an individual who does everything possible to isolate himself, to shut himself off from everyone else, including his own compatriots. This solitude surrounds the Mexican, who, caught between his Indian and his Spanish past, between primitive religion and Spanish Catholicism, is deprived of an origin that he can embrace.

"Máscaras mexicanas" ("Mexican Masks") explores the concept of solitude and expands upon Paz's belief that the Mexican refuses to reveal his true self. He hides behind masks until he becomes the mask. Paz discusses the Mexican preference for order and ceremony. Inherited from both Indian and Spanish tradition, this desire for regulation and stability derives from the need to protect oneself, to hide one's true self. At its extreme point, the mask provides nonexistence for the Mexican; he seeks not only his own nonexistence but also the nonexistence of others.

In contrast to this desire for nothingness, the Mexican's love of fiesta and noisy celebration is examined in "Todos santos, día de muertos" ("The Day of the Dead"). The fiesta is a true explosion of the individual; he opens out in chaos and excess. Yet this excess leads to the void and connects the Mexican to death—his constant companion. Death, like life, has no meaning for him.

In "Los hijos de La Malinche" ("The Sons of La Malinche") Paz examines the Mexican attitude toward women, work, the working class, and language and how these attitudes isolate the Mexican from his past and from others. His solitude is all around him as he rejects his traditions, whether they are Indian or Spanish.

The next four essays treat Mexican history. Paz concentrates on the different concepts of land-ownership and the problems caused by eliminating the common lands, the inadequacies of the revolution, and the difficulties faced by the intelligentsia who are participating in government while critiquing it objectively.

In the final essay "La dialéctica de la solitud" ("The Dialectic of Solitude"), Paz examines solitude as the lot of each human being. He analyzes how social control virtually eliminates the experience of love, which is the escape from solitude. He postulates that what humankind seeks is a return to freedom and primitive purity and the flinging away of the masks.

SUMMARY

Octavio Paz's poetry champions the ecstasy that takes people beyond the tyranny of time, history, and alienation. The poet redeems his isolated individuality through a union with woman. Poetry allows the poet to experience oneness beyond time and language. Paz sees poetry as the antidote to the isolation and spiritual desolation of humankind in the modern world. The need to escape isolation and alienation is also a central theme of his acclaimed prose work, The Labyrinth of Solitude.

For Paz, writing poetry is an ethical act that contributes to the creation of a better world. Through his poetry, he seeks to liberate language, the reader, and the poet, so that all are able to experience a primal unified reality beyond the layers of dead language and alienated egos that bring so much suffering to life.

Evelyn Toft; updated by Shawncey Webb

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

- Luna silvestre*, 1933
- Bajo tu clara sombra, y otros poemas sobre España*, 1937
- Raíz del hombre*, 1937
- Entre la piedra y la flor*, 1941
- Libertad bajo palabra*, 1949, 1960
- ¿Águila o sol?*, 1951 (Eagle or Sun?, 1970)
- Semillas para un himno*, 1954
- Piedra de sol*, 1957 (Sun Stone, 1963)
- La estación violenta*, 1958
- Agua y viento*, 1959
- Libertad bajo palabra: Obra poética, 1935-1957*, 1960, revised 1968
- Salamandra*, 1962
- Selected Poems*, 1963

Blanco, 1967 (English translation, 1971)
Discos visuales, 1968
Topoemas, 1968
La centena, 1969
Ladera este, 1969
Configurations, 1971
Renga, 1972 (with others; Renga: A Chain of Poems, 1972)
Early Poems, 1935-1955, 1973
Pasado en claro, 1975 (A Draft of Shadows, and Other Poems, 1979)
Vuelta, 1976
Poemas, 1979
Selected Poems, 1979
Airborn = Hijos del Aire, 1981 (with Charles Tomlinson)
Arbol adentro, 1987 (A Tree Within, 1988)
The Collected Poems of Octavio Paz: 1957-1987, 1987
Obra poetica (1935-1988), 1990
Stanzas for an Imaginary Garden, 1990 (limited edition)
Viento, agua, piedra/Wind, Water, Stone, 1990 (limited edition)
 "Snapshots," 1997
A Tale of Two Gardens: Poems from India, 1952-1995, 1997
Figuras y figuraciones, 1999 (Figures and Figurations, 2002)

DRAMA:

La hija de Rappaccini, pb. 1990 (dramatization of a Nathaniel Hawthorne story; Rappaccini's Daughter, 1996)

NONFICTION:

Voces de España, 1938
Laurel, 1941
El laberinto de la soledad: Vida y pensamiento de México, 1950 (revised and enlarged 1959; The Labyrinth of Solitude: Life and Thought in Mexico, 1961)
El arco y la lira, 1956 (The Bow and the Lyre, 1971)
Las peras del olmo, 1957
Rufino Tamayo, 1959 (Rufino Tamayo: Myth and Magic, 1979)
Magia de la risa, 1962
Cuatro poetas contemporáneos de Suecia, 1963
Cuadrivio, 1965
Poesía en movimiento, 1966 (New Poetry of Mexico, 1970; translated and edited by Mark Strand)
Puertas al campo, 1966
Remedios Varo, 1966
Claude Lévi-Strauss: O, El nuevo festín de Esopo, 1967 (Claude Lévi-Strauss: An Introduction, 1970)
Corriente alterna, 1967 (Alternating Current, 1973)
Marcel Duchamp, 1968 (Marcel Duchamp: Or, The Castle of Purity, 1970)
Conjunciones y disyunciones, 1969 (Conjunctions and Disjunctions, 1974)
México: La última década, 1969
Posdata, 1970 (The Other Mexico: Critique of the Pyramid, 1972)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What role does history as a force play in Octavio Paz's The Labyrinth of Solitude?
- What do masks symbolize in The Labyrinth of Solitude?
- Explain the title The Labyrinth of Solitude.
- How does Paz's experimentation with the physical placement of the poem on the page reflect Stéphane Mallarmé's influence?
- What is the significance of making love for Paz and how does he portray it in his poems?
- According to Paz, what is the poet's role in society?
- Does contemporary society and its rules make love almost impossible, as Paz believed?

Octavio Paz

Las cosas en su sitio, 1971

Los signos en rotación y otros ensayos, 1971

Traducción: Literatura y literalidad, 1971

Solo a dos voces, 1973

El signo y el garabato, 1973

Apariencia desnuda: La obra de Marcel Duchamp, 1973 (Marcel Duchamp: Appearance Stripped Bare, 1978)

Los hijos del limo: Del romanticismo a la vanguardia, 1974 (Children of the Mire: Modern Poetry from Romanticism to the Avant-Garde, 1974)

La búsqueda del comienzo, 1974

Teatro de signos/transparencias, 1974

Versiones y diversiones, 1974

El mono gramático, 1974 (The Monkey Grammarian, 1981)

The Siren and the Seashell, and Other Essays on Poets and Poetry, 1976

Xavier Villaurrutia en persona y en obra, 1978

In/mediaciones, 1979

México en la obra de Octavio Paz, 1979, expanded 1987

El ogro filantrópico: Historia y política 1971-1978, 1979 (The Philanthropic Ogre, 1985)

Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz: O, Las trampas de la fe, 1982 (Sor Juana: Or, The Traps of Faith, 1989)

Sombras de obras: Arte y literatura, 1983

Tiempo nublado, 1983 (One Earth, Four or Five Worlds: Reflections on Contemporary History, 1985)

Hombres en su siglo y otros ensayos, 1984

On Poets and Others, 1986

Convergences: Essays on Art and Literature, 1987

Primeras letras, 1931-1943, 1988 (Enrico Mario Santi, editor)

Poesía, mito, revolución, 1989

La búsqueda del presente/In Search of the Present: Nobel Lecture, 1990, 1990

Pequeña crónica de grandes días, 1990

La otra voz: Poesía y fin de siglo, 1990 (The Other Voice: Essays on Modern Poetry, 1991)

Convergencias, 1991

Al paso, 1992

One Word to the Other, 1992

Essays on Mexican Art, 1993

Itinerario, 1993 (Itinerary: An Intellectual Journey, 1999)

La llama doble: Amor y erotismo, 1993 (The Double Flame: Love and Eroticism, 1995)

Un más allá erótico: Sade, 1993 (An Erotic Beyond: Sade, 1998)

Vislumbres de la India, 1995 (In Light of India, 1997)

EDITED TEXTS:

Antología poética, 1956 (Anthology of Mexican Poetry, 1958; Samuel Beckett, translator)

New Poetry of Mexico, 1970

MISCELLANEOUS:

Lo mejor de Octavio Paz: El fuego de cada día, 1989

Obras completas de Octavio Paz, 1994

Blanco, 1995 (facsimiles of manuscript fragments and letters)

About the Author

- Bloom, Harold, ed. Octavio Paz. New York: Chelsea House, 2001.
- Fein, John M. Toward Octavio Paz: A Reading of His Major Poems. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1986.
- Ivask, Ivar, ed. The Perpetual Present: The Prose and Poetry of Octavio Paz. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1973.
- Kozlarek, Oliver. "Theodore W. Adorno and Octavio Paz: Two Visions of Modernity." Culture, Theory and Critique 47, no. 1 (April, 2006): 39-52.
- MacAdam, Alfred. "Octavio Paz: The Art of Poetry XLII." Paris Review 33, no. 119 (Summer, 1991): 82-123.
- Nugent, Robert. "Structure and Meaning in Octavio Paz's Piedra de sol." Kentucky Foreign Language Quarterly 13, no. 3 (1966): 138-146.
- Phillips, Rachel. The Poetic Modes of Octavio Paz. London: Oxford University Press, 1972.
- Quiroga, José. Understanding Octavio Paz. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1999.
- Wilson, Jason. Octavio Paz. Boston: Twayne, 1986.
- _____. Octavio Paz: A Study of His Poetics. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1979.

SAMUEL PEPYS

Born: London, England
February 23, 1633

Died: Clapham, England
May 26, 1703

From 1660 to 1669, Pepys kept an informative and entertaining Diary, which provides modern readers with a detailed and unparalleled portrait of Restoration London.

BIOGRAPHY

Samuel Pepys (peeps) was born on February 23, 1633, in Salisbury Court, close to St. Bride's in Fleet Street, London, England. He was the fifth of eleven children of John Pepys, a tailor, and Margaret Kight, of whom little is known except that she was a washmaid and the sister of a butcher. Samuel grew up in a sturdy, middle-class Puritan family that boasted connections to the wealthy and powerful Mountagu family of Huntingdonshire. Of Pepys's childhood there is almost no record except for rare references in The Diary of Samuel Pepys (1825), which indicate that Pepys acquired his love of music from his father, that he was introduced to the theater—another lifelong passion—before the Civil War closed all the theaters for a time, and that he and his brother Tom spent some time in the country, probably for health reasons.

The Diary reveals that Pepys attended Huntingdon Grammar School some time before 1645 or 1646 when, evidence suggests, he returned to London and entered St. Paul's School, which was then a staunchly Puritan institution. At St. Paul's, Pepys came under the influence of Dr. Samuel Cromleholme, a fine scholar and bibliophile, with whom Pepys continued to correspond long after he left school—even up to the time of the Diary. From St. Paul's, Pepys went to Cambridge, where he established residence at Magdalene College shortly after his eighteenth birthday and became a student of Samuel Morland, who had acquired an impressive reputation as mathematician and Latinist, as cryptographer and engineer, as historian and inventor. The influence of Cromleholme and Morland on Pepys is evident in the Diary, which records Pepys's lifetime interest in books, his membership in the Royal Society and fascination with science, and his passion for classical literature.

In 1654, Pepys took his degree at Cambridge and returned to London. By December, 1655, he was married to Elizabeth St. Michel, a beautiful, penniless fifteen-year-old of French and Anglo-Irish parentage. By this point, Pepys was also employed by his aristocratic cousin, Sir Edward Mountagu, as some kind of steward. When Pepys joined his cousin's staff, Mountagu was already firmly ensconced in the inner circle of the government of Oliver Cromwell, the English soldier and member of Parliament, and was thus able to assist the young and ambitious Pepys, who acted as Mountagu's agent while Mountagu served the Commonwealth government as a general-at-sea. Through Mountagu's influence, Pepys was appointed one of the tellers of the exchequer, a position that allowed him to learn the intricacies of public administration and cultivate powerful friends.

The year 1658 was an important one for Pepys, both personally and politically. Plagued for years with pain from a stone in the bladder, Pepys finally consented to a lithotomy—called “cutting for the stone”—which was one of the few serious operations possible in 1658. He survived the surgery, and his Diary records his celebrations of the anniversary of his ordeal with thanksgiving dinners for his friends. In September, 1658, Cromwell died and was succeeded by his son, Richard, who, incapable of governing his unruly citizens, was forced by the army generals to dissolve Parliament and reenter private life. Although Pepys was unaware of it, the careful Mountagu had already contacted the future Charles II, then in exile in France.

The next year was an eventful one as England endured political unrest, an unsuccessful royalist uprising, and an ineffective Parliament. As 1659 ended, Pepys decided to begin keeping a journal in the new year, and in preparation he purchased an octavo notebook and drew margins in red ink. The first entry, dated January 1, 1660, is a record of Pepys's continuing good health and comfortable life and a commentary on the political confusion in England.

Pepys got his first taste of glory in May, 1660, when he accompanied Mountagu, now an admiral, on the voyage that brought King Charles II from Holland to England. Shortly thereafter, Mountagu was created earl of Sandwich, and through his patronage, Pepys, now twenty-seven, was appointed to a position in the Navy Office as clerk of the acts, an appointment that gave Pepys considerable prestige, a fine salary, and an official residence.

Although Pepys remained in the service of the navy for much of his life, his natural curiosity and energy involved him in a number of other ventures and activities. He joined the Royal Society in 1665 and became its president in 1684; he carried word of the Great Fire of London to the king and helped with the efforts to contain the blaze; he traveled to Paris and Brussels with his wife, Elizabeth, just before her death in 1669; he was elected member of parliament for Castle Rising in 1673; he became master of Trinity House and governor of Christ's Hospital in 1676, and master of the Clothworkers' Company the next year; he served two terms as a member of Parliament for Harwich from 1679 to 1689; finally, he was appointed deputy lieutenant of Huntingdonshire, his family home. Among the offices that he held were commissioner for Tangier, secretary to the Office of Lord High Admiral of England, and secretary for Admiralty Affairs.

Like so many prominent Englishmen of the Restoration, Pepys had his share of problems. In 1679, he was forced to resign his position with the Admiralty and was imprisoned in the Tower of London on the charge of selling naval secrets to the French government. Released in July, he spent a year preparing his defense, but the charges were dropped, and Pepys was reinstated into the good graces of the king. In 1690, Pepys was arrested on suspicion of Jacobite sympathies, but the charges against him were dropped within a few months.

Pepys retired from public life in 1689, and in 1701 he left his beloved London and moved to Will Hewer's country home at Clapham, England, where he died on May 26, 1703. He was buried at St. Olave's in London, next to Elizabeth.

ANALYSIS

The Restoration gave English literature a new kind of prose, different from that practiced by John Milton, John Donne, Sir Thomas Browne, and other great stylists of the Renaissance. New discoveries in science and mathematics during the late seventeenth century demanded a written discourse that was free of the elaborate flourishes and figurative language that had marked the work of earlier writers; what was required was a prose that was notable for its clarity. The Royal Society required that its members report the proceedings and activities of the society in the plain, utilitarian, natural prose style best suited to the dissemination of scientific truths; the very public nature of the age gave rise to a written language that closely approximated the clear, urbane, elegant conversations that became a hallmark of the Restoration and the eighteenth century.

Like the deliberately public writings of his contemporaries, The Diary of Samuel Pepys is a model of uncluttered, simple, lyrical prose writing. Further, because Pepys wrote in Thomas Shelton's system of shorthand, he was able to record the events of his life without fear of discovery or exposure, and the result is an autobiographical account notable as a straightforward, unself-conscious, exceedingly detailed narrative that chronicles both the public and the private lives of its writer.

Pepys, like the early epic poets, delighted in catalogs and lists. His Diary delights readers with its insistence on detailed listings—of the notables present at a dinner or fete, of the specific foods Pepys consumed at a late-night supper, of the beautiful women he ogled at the theater, of the excessive and expensive purchases made by his wife at a bazaar, of the separate items of clothing that constitute an outfit that Pepys wore to a special occasion, of the emotions Pepys felt at having to end an affair. Pepys enumerates his household expenses, the plays he has seen, his sister's faults, and the friends with whom he socializes. He carefully documents historical events and personal encounters, family squabbles and political confrontations, births and deaths. These details—appealing or crude, minute or expansive, personal or public, comic or serious—draw readers into Pepys’s world and into the mind and life of a late seventeenth century English citizen.

A theme that unifies the varied sections of the Diary is the importance of a life properly lived. The Diary is a constant reminder of the Puritan virtues, a compendium of examples of Pepys’s ongoing attempts to master his soul and order his existence. Pepys smugly records his successes at moderation and contritely details his little falls from grace. Concerned with accountability and almost obsessed with thrift, he agonizes over the price of the telescopes and microscopes that his fascination with science has led him to purchase, and he complains about his wife’s spending habits. Disturbed at having indulged in expensive dancing lessons, Pepys records his attempts to silence his conscience by dropping a gift of fifteen shillings into the nearest poor box. Many entries in the Diary reveal that Pepys spent much time dealing with his accounts and other business matters—in fact, his descriptions of daily activities are often couched in the language of accounting. Puritan at heart that he was, Pepys frequently wrote about his gratitude to God for various benefits that came his way, his recognition of his moral errancies, and his feelings of repentance and attempts to live a better life. Overindulgence appears to be one of Pepys’s most dominant faults; his diary records his vows to spend less, eat less, refrain from chasing women, and avoid wine and strong drink.

As an account of the first nine years of the reign of Charles II, Pepys’s Diary has no equal. Pepys was privileged to be on board the ship that brought Charles Stuart back to England as the nation’s first monarch after the Commonwealth, and the Diary provides eyewitness descriptions of the royal arrival and also of the splendid coronation ceremonies. Major historical events—Charles’s marriage to Catherine of Braganza, the Dutch Wars, the succession of short-lived Whig-dominated Parliaments—are all carefully inventoried by Pepys. The Diary years coincide with the Great Plague and the Great Fire of London, both events on which Pepys reflected at length with his characteristic combination of factual detail, moral analysis, and eager curiosity. That same combination colors Pepys’s frequent entries detailing visits to theatrical performances. Pepys the Puritan believed it sinful to attend plays; Pepys the bon vivant delighted in the tremendous variety of performances that crowded the English stage after Charles’s accession reopened the theaters; and Pepys the Restoration gallant reveled in the opportunities to ogle both the actresses and the women in the audience.

The appeal of the Diary lies in its richness of detail; in its tone of unalloyed enjoyment of life and experience; in its delighted chronicling of the everyday juxtaposed with the significant; and in its candid revelation of the mind of an indefatigable, curious, and intelligent English citizen of the late seventeenth century.

THE DIARY OF SAMUEL PEPYS

First published: 1825

Type of work: Autobiography

A middle-class English civil servant records the events of his life in a cultural and historical context from 1660 to 1669.

The Diary of Samuel Pepys opens with an entry dated January 1, 1660. The author was twenty-seven years old and already well on his way to a lucrative career in the service of the English crown. “Blessed be God,” begins the entry, “. . . I was in very good health.” Pepys continues with a brief description of his household—himself, his wife, Elizabeth, and a servant named Jane—and then goes on to note “the condition of the State.” These opening sentences are significant in that they contain many of the distinctive subjects discussed in the Diary. Pepys was clearly a moral and religious man—in a very general and philosophical way; his journal entries often begin with an invocation to God, and he records a considerable amount of soul-searching coupled with resolutions to live a better life. Almost as important to Pepys as his religion was his health, which is mentioned, discussed, and analyzed at regular intervals. The early trouble with his bladder left Pepys with an obsessive consciousness of the workings of his body, and his concern with various ailments is a notable feature of the Diary. Other topics of major interest to Pepys were his wife and their ongoing servant problems and the affairs of the government, to which he devoted so much of his time and energy.

The opening lines of the Diary are important not only for their content but also for their tone and language and for the order in which Pepys—a very methodical man—arranged the details he included. Pepys's tone throughout the Diary is always calm and matter-of-fact, even when he reports unsettling or disturbing events. Thus it is that in a time of great political and social upheaval, he records dryly, "The officers of the army all forced to yield," in reference to the fact that General George Monck, one of the architects of the Restoration process, was marching south with his men to take Whitehall from the Parliamentary generals. Yet the concise sentences do not make for dull reading. On the contrary, because Pepys so carefully chooses his words, the details that he records stand out in clear and precise relief against the urbane but utilitarian prose that he employs. The Diary reflects the importance to Pepys of certain aspects of his life, mentioned in order of significance—God, health, family and household, politics. Pepys was, of course, vastly interested in a number of other subjects, but those five mentioned early are the topics to which he returns over and over in his narrative.

Through the Diary, modern readers enter the life and mind of one of the most remarkable Englishmen of all time, a man typical of his era and representative of it in both his virtues and his flaws, a man who lived a recognizably and humanly average life during a century that history recognizes as one of England's most turbulent. Therein lies one of the paradoxes of the Diary. Pepys records meals, sleepless nights, marital spats, lazy servants, colds and fevers, a pet dog, a sulking sister, new gloves and shoes, even (infrequent) baths as notable elements of a life that also included visits to the royal apartments, suppers with the aristocracy, speeches before Parliament, promotions and appointments to desirable posts, and friendships with the rich and famous. Pepys the private soul-searcher is also Pepys the avid theatergoer, Pepys the jealous husband is Pepys the philanderer, and Pepys the recorder of ailments is the same as Pepys the Royal Society man. Again and again, the Diary reveals the extent to which the private and the public met during the Restoration.

The Diary is especially valuable to historians for its evocative and vivid accounts of some of the most important events of the 1660's: the return of Charles Stuart to England, his coronation as King Charles II, the Great Plague of 1665, and the Great Fire of London in 1666, among others. Also of historical and literary importance are Pepys's descriptions of theatrical performances. He comments on the architecture of the theaters, on the new practice of casting women in female roles, on stage machinery, on specific plays, on actors and actresses in various roles, on the audience. Although theater historians have long recognized Pepys's Diary as a valuable source of information on the Restoration theater, social historians also owe Pepys a great debt. The Diary is a prime source of information on the elements of Restoration society and culture, music (one of Pepys's passions), the decorative arts (furniture, silver, and china), architecture, painting, science and medicine, clothing, and books. Unlike Jonathan Swift's fictional Gulliver, Pepys was not a naïve observer, and his Diary reveals his opinions, his preferences, his biases, and his analyses of his own actions as well as those of others.

In 1669, Pepys began to fear that he might go blind. He had long had trouble with his eyesight, possibly the result of close scrutiny of naval documents and accounts and even household records; he even records that the candlelight in the theaters "did almost kill" him. On May 31, 1669, Pepys penned the last entry in the Diary, remarking in his characteristic plain style his readiness for possible loss of sight, "for which . . . the good God prepare me!" The Diary ends as it begins—quietly, calmly, concisely.

SUMMARY

With all of its richness, variety, and detail, the one singular element that unifies The Diary of Samuel Pepys into an intriguing whole is the portrait that it paints of Samuel Pepys himself. Clearly a man who embodied most of the beliefs and confusions of his age, he is the ultimate Restoration man, and in his personal narrative he illustrates and exemplifies the contradictions and confusion, the faith and intellectual curiosity, the frivolity and practicality of one of England's most interesting decades.

E. D. Huntley

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

NONFICTION:

Memoirs Relating to the State of the Royal Navy of England, 1690

The Diary of Samuel Pepys, 1825 (partial publication, as Memoirs of Samuel Pepys . . ., 1848-1849; as Diary and Correspondence of Samuel Pepys, 1875-1879 [6 volumes], 1893-1899 [10 volumes]; as The Diary of Samuel Pepys: A New and Complete Transcription, 1970-1983 [11 volumes])

About the Author

Bryant, Sir Arthur. Samuel Pepys: The Man in the Making. London: Collins, 1933.

_____. Samuel Pepys: The Years of Peril. London: Collins, 1935.

_____. Samuel Pepys: The Saviour of the Navy. London: Collins, 1938.

Coote, Stephen. Samuel Pepys: A Life. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 2000.

Eden, Cecil S. Pepys Himself. London: Oxford University Press, 1963.

Lee, Hermione. Virginia Woolf's Nose: Essays on Biography. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2005.

Ollard, Richard. Pepys: A Biography. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1974.

Tomalin, Claire. Samuel Pepys: The Unequalled Self. New York: Viking, 2002.

Trease, Geoffrey. Samuel Pepys and His World. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1972.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How does Samuel Pepys's Diary reflect his Puritan background?
- How does Pepys's Diary reflect his anti-puritanical interests?
- What does it mean to say that Pepys was "the ultimate Restoration man"?
- Explain how Pepys's exceptional powers of observation have vitalized our knowledge of the Great Plague and of the Great Fire.
- In what way did Pepys's concern with his health limit our perspective on his time and place?
- What picture does the reader get of Pepys's wife in his Diary?
- How does Pepys contribute to our knowledge of the culture of later Stuart England?

Centro de Turismo de Portugal

FERNANDO PESSOA

Born: Lisbon, Portugal
June 13, 1888

Died: Lisbon, Portugal
November 30, 1935

Foremost poet of the modern Portuguese language and a leader in his country's modernist movement, Pessoa produced poetry of acute sensitivity and introspection under his own name and that of numerous identities, termed heteronyms, created by him.

BIOGRAPHY

Fernando António Nogueira Pessoa (PEHS-wah) was born on June 13, 1888, at the home of his parents in Lisbon, Portugal. His mother was Maria Magdalena Pinheiro Nogueira and his father was Joaquim de Seabra Pessoa. In addition to being employed in the Ministry of Justice, Pessoa's father was also a part-time music critic. Pessoa's father died in 1893 and his mother remarried two years later. In 1895, the six-year-old poet wrote his first verse, "À minha querida mãe" (to my beloved mother). His mother had two sons from her first marriage, but Fernando's younger brother died in infancy. With her second husband she had five children, two dying in infancy. Her second husband was the Portuguese consul in Durban, South Africa, where the family moved in 1896.

Living in Durban until 1905, Pessoa studied in British-modeled primary and secondary schools. He attended a grade school run by Irish nuns, completing its five-year course in three. He graduated with honors from Durban High School, its teachers nurturing his interest in the classic English poets. English became his second language. He won the Queen Victoria Memorial Prize in 1903 for the quality of his English prose; however, he failed to be admitted to the University of the Cape of Good Hope.

In 1905, he returned to Lisbon in order to study literature at the University of Lisbon. However, he almost immediately abandoned his classes. He took business courses and became a freelance writer and correspondence secretary, in English and French, for foreign companies. Such work allowed him free time for his own writing but economically only modestly sustained him. Until his widowed mother returned to Lisbon in 1920, he lived with relatives or in rooming houses, moving frequently. No longer in school, he read extensively in Greek and German philosophy and French poetry. His maternal grandmother, with whom he had lived for a time and who was mentally unstable, died in 1907. She left him a small inheritance, which he used to set up a printing and publishing business, Empresa Ibis (Ibis Enterprise). It immediately went bankrupt.

Political and social turbulence mounted during this period. The socioeconomic state of Portugal had plunged drastically since its heroic Age of Discoveries in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries and the Brazilian gold rush of the eighteenth. In 1908, the king of Portugal was assassinated, along with his heir; two years later, a republic was declared. In 1918, an authoritarian government under a military leader, Sidónio Pais, took over. Hailed by some as a savior, a "president/king," he was assassinated the same year. Pessoa dedicated a poem to him. A more enduring authoritarian government emerged in the late 1920's under the economist and dictator António Salazar. His regime would last until well after World War II. In this atmosphere of political chaos and economic and historical decay, Portuguese cultural figures, such as Pessoa, emerged and sought to achieve the revival of a glorious national past through a modernizing renewal.

Pessoa considered 1914 to be the most significant year of his life. On March 8, he was inspired to begin creating the “heteronyms” for which he is most famous. This term is in contrast to a pseudonym, through which an author conceals his identity by use of a fictitious name. By a heteronym, Pessoa meant a literary figure, distinct from himself, with a separate biography and body of work, albeit created by Pessoa.

Throughout his life Pessoa suffered periods of depression. The writing he produced under his own name and that of his heteronyms seemed to balance his mental state. He is known to have had only one brief emotional relationship with a woman. Although he chain-smoked and drank excessively, he was rarely known to appear publicly drunk. Photographs from the late 1920’s and later show him rapidly aging. In 1935, he died of cirrhosis of the liver, having published the previous year Mensagem (Message, 1992), a prize-winning work that was his only book in Portuguese to appear in his lifetime.

After Pessoa’s death, a large trunk was found in which he had stored nearly thirty thousand scraps of paper. Pessoa published rather sparsely during his own life. However, over the course of the second half of the twentieth century, the dense archive of poetry and prose that he had stored was edited and published by his friends. Over the decades, the contents of the trunk have culminated in a multivolume, posthumous oeuvre, the steadily amassing foundation of the poet’s reputation.

ANALYSIS

Fernando Pessoa is the preeminent representative of modernism in Portugal, a movement that dominated Western culture from the late nineteenth through mid-twentieth centuries. It established a new canon of absolutes in terms of form and content, challenging the previous dictates of classicism, Christianity, and the Enlightenment. Ultimately it produced the postmodernist denouement, which dissolved all absolutes, considering all perspectives relative and inconclusive.

Pessoa knew and respected the old canons yet was absorbed by modernism. He anticipated the disorienting dilemmas of postmodernism. Pessoa explored esoteric philosophies, such as theosophy and Rosicrucianism; adhered to the Portuguese version of Arthurian mysticism, known as Sebastianism; and employed esoteric technologies of astrology and numerology.

He joined Renascença Portuguesa (Portuguese Renaissance), a modernist movement that published the vanguard literary journal A Águia (The Eagle). In it, he published his first poems, along with a series of controversial essays on the sociological and psychological aspects of modern Portuguese poetry. Pessoa was associated with the short-lived literary journals Orfeu (Orpheus) and Portugal futurista (Futurist Portugal). Such journals, together with newspapers, were the principal means by which he published his work during his lifetime. His poem “Antinous,” about the male lover of the Roman Emperor Hadrian, and the booklets or chapbooks entitled Thirty-five Sonnets (1918) and English Poems I-III (1921), published under the pseudonym Alexander Search, were published in his lifetime. They received unenthusiastic literary reviews in Great Britain, discouraging him from his ambition to become an English-language poet.

Crucial to understanding the work of Pessoa is recognizing that his ideas on the philosophy and the creation of poetry are expressed through the life and work of his principal heteronyms: Alberto Caeiro, Álvaro de Campos, and Ricardo Reis. The principal heteronyms he created in 1914 suggest both his awareness and resolution of the dilemma of conflicting absolutes and looming relativism. He could see the general validity of other poetic perspectives but not their individual validity for himself.

Alberto Caeiro is the master poet, and the others, including Pessoa, are his disciples. Caeiro is the poet’s poet; born in 1889 and dying of tuberculosis in 1915, he is raised as a peasant, and his roots lie in a rural, natural environment. He rejects any philosophy of poetry. For him, poetry is the unadorned expression of direct, immediate feelings. Being a poet is not a career ambition but a way of being. His representative works are two series of poems, O guardador de rebanhos (published in Obras completas, 1942-1974; The Keeper of Sheep, 1986) and O pastor amoroso (also published in Obras completas; the amorous shepherd). In these poems, he is not concerned with fitting sentiments into aesthetic or literary molds but seeks to convey their emotional impact as directly and naturally as possible.

Álvaro de Campos is a very structured poet, convinced of the relevance of modern technology and progress. Born in Portugal in 1890, he is a cosmopolitan professional, trained as a naval engineer in Scotland. Returning to live in Portugal, he founds a modernist literary journal in Lisbon and adheres to a sequence of vanguard literary movements. He is a consistent admirer of Caeiro but eventually dissolves into a nihilist. One of his most noted poems, “Tabacaria” (“The Tobacco Shop”), originates from this perspective. He confesses that he is and always will be nothing, that he has no ambition to be something, yet nonetheless he harbors within himself all the dreams of the world.

Also a formalist, Ricardo Reis adheres not to modernism but to a classicist poetic tradition. Educated by Jesuits and imbued with classical Latin learning, he is trained as a doctor. Neither the dates of his birth nor of his death are clear. He goes into exile in Brazil after the overthrow of the monarchy and the establishment of the republic in Portugal. Nonetheless, returning finally to Portugal, he visits Caeiro, greatly admiring him but recognizing he can never be his poetic equal or reach his poetic authenticity. His representative poetic works are odes, expressing both epicurean and stoic sentiments enveloped in a lingering sadness.

Having created Caeiro, Pessoa reasserted his identity by immediately composing under his own name the vanguard collection Chuva oblíqua (published in Obras completas; oblique rain). He then proceeded to create Álvaro de Campos and Ricardo Reis. Pessoa conceived of the poet as a dissembler, someone who dissembles so well that he ends up imitating the very sentiments he most acutely feels. The noted American literary critic Harold Bloom and the Chinese Nobel laureate Gao Xingjian consider Pessoa among the most representative poets of the twentieth century. Pessoa achieved his capacity for multiple perspectives not by concentrating a fractured whole but by consolidating a multifaceted diffusion. Beyond his literary achievement, his sustaining personal achievement may have been to create a multifaceted personality from a fractured one.

MESSAGE

First published: Mensagem, 1934 (English translation, 1992)

Type of work: Poetry

This modernist lyrical epic traces a tripartite cycle ranging from the iconic glories of Portugal's past to esoteric speculations about its future.

The first group or cycle of poems from the three sections of Message views Portuguese history through its principal heroic and princely figures. Pessoa produced the work within the tradition and under the shadow of the premier epic of Portuguese literature, Os Lusíadas (1572; The Lusiads, 1655), by Luis de Camões. This poem recounted the heroic exploits around the globe during Portugal's Age of Discoveries. The Lusiads themselves were written under the influence of the heroic national epics of Rome, the Aeneid (c. 29-19 B.C.E.; English translation, 1553), and of Greece, Homer's Iliad (c. 750 B.C.E.; English translation, 1611) and Odyssey (c. 725 B.C.E.; English translation, 1614).

The first poem of the initial cycle of Message views Portugal as the face of Europe, which sees the future from the perspective of the past. The next poem describes the arbitrary will of the gods and observes that while a life may occupy a small amount of time, a soul extends over a much greater length. There follows a sequence of eight poems, grouped as “The Castles,” referring to the stalwart figures of the founding and development of Portugal. The first figure is Ulysses, mythical founder of Lisbon, the Portuguese capital. Myth is considered a narrative made of nothing but which suffuses everything. The next poems concentrate on Portuguese monarchs and princes. In one poem, Pessoa speculates on nations as mysterious worlds unto themselves, begetting kingdoms and then empires.

The next cycle of poems, entitled “Portuguese Sea,” concentrates on the Age of Discoveries and begins with a poem on the death of Crown Prince Sebastian. His death in battle ended the dynasty of the discoveries and sparked the myth of Sebastianism, the idea that a royal figure would return to restore Portuguese glory. The section culminates with poems on the discoverers themselves: Bartolomeu Dias, Ferdinand Magellan, and Vasco da Gama. It begins with the observation that the desires of God become the dreams of men, prompting the work for their accomplishment. It culminates with a poem on the price for the Portuguese of the discoveries. Rhetorically, it inquires of the sea how much of its salt has come from Portuguese tears. Wondering whether the cost was worth the effort, the inquirer responds that anything not small-minded is worthwhile. God made the dangerous depths of the ocean yet its surface reflects an arching sky.

A third and final cycle, "The Covered," gathers poems of a mystical nature, seeming to foretell or anticipate a culminating climax for Portugal and humankind. An air of mystery or of the mystifying permeates the poems. This section achieves this atmosphere through esoteric and numerological frames of reference and visionary interpretations of Portuguese heraldry.

Message was the only book in Portuguese published in Pessoa's lifetime and under his own name, not a heteronym. It was compiled from poems written in the late 1920's and early 1930's, with a few going back to the period of World War I. They were compiled in order to compete for a 1934 prize in poetry, which he won, sponsored by the Secretariat of National Propaganda. The work's dedicated nationalism complemented the nationalist objectives of the Portuguese dictatorship of the time, although Pessoa maintained he was opposed to authoritarian government.

THE BOOK OF DISQUIET

First published: Livro do desassossego, wr. 1912-1935; pb. 1961, 1982 (English translation, 1991)

Type of work: Nonfiction

Published posthumously, this collection of journal-like entries jotted down over two decades gathers reflections on existential dilemmas and the nature of the self.

The Book of Disquiet (also translated as The Book of Disquietude) has a format somewhat like a journal or diary and is also a collection of vignettes and reflections. Begun in 1912, Pessoa made entries for it throughout his life, especially in his later years. He described it as a collection of fragments. Although originally written under his own name, he eventually attributed the book to Bernardo Soares, whom he considered a "semi-heteronym," even a mutilation of himself, who is described as an assistant bookkeeper in the city of Lisbon, a minor, anonymous clerical bureaucrat. Some critics attribute earlier parts of the work to another heteronym, Vicente Guedes.

What has impressed most readers of the book is its serene, succinct insights, as scintillating as they can be paradoxical. Though The Book of Disquiet is a work in prose, it is of a singularly poetic nature. The dominant theme or spirit of the work is introspection and self-reflection. This steady pursuit of self-inquiry gives the work a serenity that often belies its tortuous insights. Pessoa speculates that a heart would stop if it could think. Solitary reflection results in anguished isolation. Interested in everything but attached to nothing, he describes himself as a bisected individual, Siamese twins that are separated. The intensity of self-analysis leads him to conclude that his true dimension should not be measured in physical height but the size of his imagination.

The work also contains ironic reflections. Thinking of the banality and tensions of his life, he wryly observes that he suffers from a headache and the universe. He punctures pretensions by noting that while someone may have touched the feet of Christ, they should not be excused for lax punctuation. There are also lyrical recollections of the haunts of Lisbon, its cafés, bars, and byways, and of dreamlike delights.

A significant part of the work consists of reflections on prominent literary figures and their works. The literary masters for the author are Dante, William Shakespeare, and John Milton. He considers Shakespeare's King Lear (pr. c. 1605-1606, pb. 1608) to be defective; nonetheless, he is envious of its creator for what the drama does accomplish. He admires classical authors, such as Homer, Vergil, and Horace. The most exotic figure in his canon is the Persian poet and scientist Omar Khayyám. Recognized also are nineteenth century writers, such as François-René de Chateaubriand, Stéphane Mallarmé, Paul Verlaine, and Heinrich Heine. The author is moved by the vibrant writings of Charles Dickens and the severe reflections of Thomas Carlyle.

The Book of Disquiet was not published in Pessoa's lifetime, and how he would have organized it for publication is not known. Those who discovered the multitude of jottings that compose it were only able to organize and publish it after his death, in 1961. It quickly attracted favorable critical attention and was translated into numerous languages, with several admirable editions in English.

Ironically, while the author recognized it as a collection of fragments and conceived of it as a book, he never assembled it as such. Moreover, its creator had little sense of himself as an identifiable person. Thus the work has been described as a nonbook by a nonauthor. The word pessoa means "person" in Portuguese, although even Pessoa thought of himself as a nonperson.

While the chronological development of the work can be traced, its narrative continuity is nonexistent; it could be organized by either time or theme and has neither a beginning nor an end. One can dip into its thoughts at any point, drawn along on the serpentine allure of its insights. The work has neither a beginning nor an end, either as a genre or a pursuit.

SUMMARY

The most recognized modern Portuguese poet, Fernando Pessoa was notable but little distinguished in his own time. His reputation advanced as his archived writings were posthumously published. Composed under multiple identities, his work represents the varied nature and production of poetry over time, examines the character and dilemmas of poetry's creation in modern times, and reflects on the existential inconsistencies and contradictions of life and self-identification. Esoteric strains thread through both his poetry and prose.

Edward A. Riedinger

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Thirty-five Sonnets, 1918 (as Alexander Search)

English Poems I-III, 1921 (3 volumes, as Search)

Mensagem, 1934 (Message, 1992)

Obras completas, 1942-1974 (11 volumes)

Selected Poems, 1971

Sixty Portuguese Poems, 1971

The Keeper of Sheep, 1986

The Poems of Fernando Pessoa, 1986 (includes The Keeper of Sheep)

NONFICTION:

Cartas a Armando Côrtes-Rodrigues, 1945

Páginas de doutrina estética, 1946

Cartas a João Gaspar Simões, 1957

Livro do desassossego, wr. 1912-1935; pb. 1961, 1982
(The Book of Disquiet, 1991; also as The Book of Dis- quietude, 1991)

Páginas de estética e de teoria e crítica literárias, 1966

Páginas íntimas e de auto-interpretação, 1966

Textos filosóficos, 1968

Always Astonished: Selected Prose, 1988

The Selected Prose of Fernando Pessoa, 2001

MISCELLANEOUS:

A Little Larger than the Entire Universe, 2006 (Richard Zenith, editor)

About the Author

Kotowicz, Zbigniew. Fernando Pessoa: Voices of a No- madic Soul. London: Menard, 1996.

Monteiro, George. Fernando Pessoa and Nineteenth- Century Anglo-American Poetry. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 2000.

_____. The Man Who Never Was: Essays on Fernando
Pessoa. Providence, R.I.: Gávea-Brown, 1982.

_____. The Presence of Pessoa: English, American, and Southern African Literary Responses. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1998.

Sadlier, Darlene J. An Introduction to Fernando Pessoa: Modernism and the Paradoxes of Authorship. Gainesville:
University Press of Florida, 1998.

Serra, João B. Modern Art in Portugal, 1910-1940: The Artist Contemporaries of Fernando Pessoa. Translated by John S. Southard. Zurich, Switzerland: Edition Stemmler, 1998.

Tabucchi, Antonio. Dreams of Dreams and The Last Three Days of Fernando Pessoa. Translated by Nancy J. Peters.
San Francisco: City Lights Books, 1999.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Although a small, obscure country in modern times, Portugal has a very distinguished history. What were its main achievements in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries?
- What was Fernando Pessoa's attitude toward the historical achievements of Portugal?
- What is Sebastianism? How would you compare it to the tale of King Arthur or other national "returning savior" legends?
- What are "heteronyms" and why did Pessoa use them?
- How does a heteronym differ from a pseudonym? What authors have used pseudonyms?

Library of Congress

PETRARCH

Born: Arezzo, Tuscany (now in Italy)

July 20, 1304

Died: Arquà, Carrara (now in Italy)

July 18, 1374

Recognized as one of the three greatest Italian writers, along with Dante and Giovanni Boccaccio, Petrarch influenced generations of love poets and served as a pivotal figure in the literary transition into the Renaissance.

BIOGRAPHY

Francesco Petrarca—or Petrarch (PEE-trahrk), as he came to be known—was born in Arezzo, Tuscany (now in Italy), on July 20, 1304, to Pietro di Parenzo and Eletta Canigiani. He spent his early years in Incisa, near Florence, where, in 1307, his brother Gherardo was born. Around 1316, Petrarch began to study law at the University of Montpellier, a vocation for which he had little love. Still, under pressure from his father, he continued his studies there for four years and then studied for three years at Bologna, where he also came into contact with the vernacular (Tuscan) poetry of the region, literature that influenced the best of his poetry.

Upon his father's death in 1326, Petrarch and his brother settled in Avignon. There, in the Church of St. Clare on April 6, 1327 (Good Friday, by Petrarch's poetic re-creation), he spied and fell in love with a young woman whose identity is still somewhat uncertain. This lady, named Laura in his poetry, was to become for Petrarch what Beatrice was for Dante: the object of his love, the theme of his poetry, and his poetic inspiration, even after her death of the plague in 1348. Indeed, from among the poems that he wrote about Laura, Petrarch finally assembled his most famous work, the Rerum vulgarium fragmenta (1470, also known as Canzoniere; Rhymes, 1976). Composed mainly of sonnets and odes, the Canzoniere is one of only two major works, besides the Trionfi (1470; Tryumphs, 1565; best known as Triumphs, 1962), that Petrarch wrote in Italian. Ironically, it is this work upon which Petrarch's poetic reputation primarily rests, even though he believed that his Latin work would secure for him the fame that he so deeply desired.

In 1330, Petrarch's friend Giacomo Colonna was appointed bishop of Lombez. Petrarch accompanied him there, where he met several other young men who shared Petrarch's literary and scholarly interests and who would be important colleagues in Petrarch's attempts to revive interest in classical learning. These interests characterized Petrarch and his friends as Renaissance humanists. Also in Lombez, Petrarch received his first clerical appointment, chaplain to Cardinal Giovanni Colonna. That and future appointments provided Petrarch with an income that would support him while demanding few duties, thus allowing him important time for his own literary pursuits.

In 1333, Petrarch began a period of travel, ultimately establishing a residence in Vacluse, a secluded town near Avignon and where he would reside, off and on, until 1353. During this period, he visited France, the Low Countries, and Germany. In 1336, he and his brother climbed Mt. Ventoux, the mountain that had been a real presence in Petrarch's early childhood. His accounts of this ascent, describing the beauty that he encountered and the keen tension between his desire for worldly fame and the urge for spirituality, illustrate the sharp introspection that characterizes most of his poetry. By the time that he settled at Vacluse, Petrarch was already known as a man of strong personality, high intelligence, classical learning, and an impressive writer of Italian verse. At Vacluse, he began work on two of his important Latin works, De viris illustribus (1351-1353; later reorganized as Quorundam virorum illustrium epithoma) and Africa (1396; English translation, 1977), an epic with Scipio Africanus as its hero.

As a classicist, Petrarch was aware (however inaccurately) of the tradition of crowning a renowned poet with laurel, signifying his ability in letters. Eager for fame, Petrarch hinted that he felt coronation would be appropriate for him, and in September, 1340, Petrarch received two invitations for a coronation, one from the University of Paris and one from the senate of Rome. Petrarch chose Rome, and, having first been examined by King Robert in Naples, he arrived in Rome in the winter of 1341. For his coronation Petrarch prepared a classical oration, structured as a medieval sermon but focused on a text from Vergil rather than the Bible and filled with classical allusions. In the first part of the oration, he discusses the difficulty of the poetic endeavor, in the second, he examines the allegorical character of poetry, and in the third and perhaps most eloquent, he presents the rewards of the poet's calling. The coronation itself took place on April 8, 1341 (Easter) and was not only a moment of great pomp, providing Petrarch with much of the fame that he desired, but also a public announcement of the Renaissance.

Returning from Rome, Petrarch stayed a short while in Parma, completing a draft of Africa before moving on to Vacluse in 1342. In April of that year, Gherardo took orders as a Carthusian monk, a decision that seems to have caused Petrarch renewed self-analysis and a loss of companionship. Also at this time came the birth of his daughter Francesca (another illegitimate child, a son, had been born earlier). Unlike her brother, who was to cause Petrarch much pain, Francesca (and later her husband) was to be a source of joy and comfort for Petrarch. The complexities of this period in his life led Petrarch to work on one of his most significant, and typically "Renaissance," Latin pieces, the Secretum meum (1353-1358; My Secret, 1911), a searching self-inquiry, presented in the form of a dialogue between two characters: Augustinus (Saint Augustine), who gives voice to the traditional and institutional views of the religious ideal, and Franciscus (Petrarch), who, while admitting his faults, nevertheless strongly defends secular and poetic values. While Augustine accuses Petrarch of being bound by two chains—Laura and the desire for fame—Petrarch never renounces them, even though troubled by the discussion. In rejecting as givens the values of the medieval church, Petrarch again moves more fully into the more secular (and classical) world of Renaissance humanism.

The fame that Petrarch had sought and won, however, provided more problems than joy for the writer. A man renowned for his mediative qualities, Petrarch was often asked to serve diplomatic missions, an arduous task in this time of warring Italian city-states. Consequently, Petrarch had less and less time to spend on his writing.

In 1350, Petrarch left Vacluse for Rome to celebrate the Jubilee of 1350. On the way, he stopped in Florence to visit Giovanni Boccaccio, the famous author of the Decameron: O, Principe Galetto (1349-1351; The Decameron, 1620), with whom he had long been in correspondence. Boccaccio acknowledged Petrarch as his master and importuned him to establish residence in Florence. Instead of settling in Florence, however, Petrarch moved to Milan in 1353, where he resided until 1361, serving the lords of the city in a variety of posts. His work allowed him ample time for writing now, and he completed several works that had been in process, among them My Secret and several poems for the Canzoniere.

The plague drove Petrarch from Milan in the spring of 1361, and he moved first to Padua and then to Venice, and he alternately lived in those cities until he finally moved to Arquà, a small village near Padua, in 1370. During the remaining years of his life, despite declining health, he continued his writing and entertained the numerous visitors who traveled to converse with the great writer and humanist. On July 18, 1374, in Arquà, he died quietly.

ANALYSIS

Petrarch's importance for literature and culture is twofold. As one of the humanists, that group of thinkers influenced by classical literatures and intent on reinstating classical learning and values, Petrarch was most influential through his Latin writings: Africa, in which he painted a picture of a pagan and classical hero; De sui ipsius et multorum ignorantia (1367; On His Own Ignorance and That of Many, 1948), in which he defended classical poetry; and My Secret, wherein, through his development of an individual voice, he became a paradigm for later Renaissance writers, among them the French essayist Michel de Montaigne.

In truth, the critical trend to call the period of Petrarch (and stretching into the seventeenth century, in some parts of Europe) the Early Modern period rather than the Renaissance helps to understand his pivotal position. Petrarch anticipated modern sensibilities in his individualism, his emphasis on the experience of the poet rather than the nature of the object, and his constant self-analysis. Yet he was also as much someone who belonged to a “renaissance,” a rebirth, specifically of classical antiquity. The one work that endures as Petrarch’s most influential, the Canzoniere, displays many of those characteristics.

Composed of 366 poems, mostly sonnets—fourteen-line poems of iambic pentameter, usually with the abbaabba cdecde rhyme scheme that Petrarch perfected—the Canzoniere is a roughly narrative recounting of the influence that a woman named Laura had on Petrarch. The sequence was composed over a number of years, the entire collection being completed near the end of Petrarch’s life. The unique contribution of the sequence is that the lyrics in it are combined in such a way as to create a sense of narrative unity and to focus the reader’s attention on the voice of the poet, a presence at once unifying and individualizing. The sequence itself is divided into two main sections: poems 1 to 266 about Laura in life and 267 to 366 about Laura after death, the final poem taking the reader beyond human time and Laura’s death into heaven and eternity.

Besides its purely structural aspects, the Canzoniere is significant for the ways in which it ties together the three poetic strands that influenced Petrarch: classical Latin poetry, Romance (predominantly French) literature, and Augustinian meditation. From the classics Petrarch derived many of his conventional topoi (a topos is a type of recurrent poetic formula, such as the poet speaking outside his beloved’s door), his secularity, his pastoral vision of the landscape, and, above all, his urbane accommodation of much of Ovid’s language. From the Romance tradition, he assimilated the cultivated poetic and cultural sensibilities of Provence, the aristocratic worldview. Finally, from Augustinianism he developed his confessional and introspective voice. It is that voice—dignified and confessional, aristocratic and personal, tortured and inspired—that unites the Canzoniere.

Through that central persona, the Canzoniere develops three major themes, all interrelated—the meaning of Laura, the nature of the external landscape, and the question of time. For the speaker of the poem, the character of Laura goes well beyond any particular woman whom Petrarch may have seen in church on Good Friday, 1327. Through the Canzoniere her significance changes constantly. At times, she seems to be the historical person whom Petrarch saw, as in sonnet 3. Other times she becomes linked to the laurel crown of poetic fame, and as such she becomes suggestive of the poet’s own quest for glory and fame (which ended in his being crowned poet laureate). Again, she becomes linked to the idea of poetic inspiration and moral guidance (Petrarch often puns on Laura’s name, l’aura meaning “breeze,” a traditional symbol of poetic inspiration), much like Beatrice did for Dante. Another Laura in the Canzoniere allows Petrarch to investigate the theme of love, both secular and profane; this Laura causes Petrarch both pleasure and pain, joy and sorrow, hope and despair, and it is this Laura who, perhaps more than any other, became so influential in the Petrarchan poetry that developed throughout Europe.

Yet as important as Laura is for the sequence, finally it is not Laura but rather her effects on the speaker that become the center of Petrarch’s concern. Often he shows her influence by discussing the world of nature, a nature that becomes a reflection of his inner state. This external world reveals the melancholy, the springtime hope and despair, the comfort of solitary nature, and the reflections of the transience of life that Petrarch discovers in his own experience.

A third major theme in the Canzoniere, the relationship between the poet-speaker and time, again reveals Petrarch as a Renaissance writer. The speaker generally notes the transience of time and learns that the beauty of his world and his beloved must be grasped, either through experience or memory—as, for example, he suggests in the famous Sonnet 90 (“She used to let her golden hair fly free”) or the meditative Sonnet 272 (“Life hurries on, a frantic refugee”). Such poems are part of the carpe diem (seize the day) tradition that stretches back to the classical poets, but they are also part of the early modern sensibility that sees in the remorseless march of time not so much a theological or moral lesson as an indication of the “human condition” of which Montaigne would later speak. Ultimately, only in the final poem of the Canzoniere (Sonnet 366), the poem that transcends human time, does Petrarch finally arrive at any resolution of this tension with time, tension encompassing the questions of love, Laura, fame, and vocation.

SONNET 1

First published: Rime I, 1358 (collected in Rhymes, 1976)

Type of work: Poem

The poet renounces his earlier life and sets himself and his story forth as an example for the reader.

Although this first lyric, Sonnet 1, in Canzoniere was probably written well after many of those poems eventually included in the collection, Petrarch placed it first as an entry piece for the reader. The poem is by no means “original” in the modern sense of the term, for the rhetorical technique of renouncing previous positions was already conventional in poetry by the time that Petrarch wrote the piece. In this acceptance of poetic tradition and convention, the poem is typical of much in the Canzoniere. Later poets would follow this example, notably Sir Philip Sidney in Astrophil and Stella (1591) and Edmund Spenser in the Amoretti (1595). As an “entrance poem,” the sonnet introduces some of the major themes and characteristics of the entire collection.

The poem is a typical Petrarchan sonnet, with a rhyme scheme of abbaabba cdecde, and the syntax adheres to the octave/sestet structure, each portion composed of a single sentence. In the octave, the speaker renounces his former foolishness, the “errant youth” that he had spent pursuing the “vain and empty hope” of earthly “Love.” He presents himself as “Another man,” one who has learned from his experience and is now imploring “Pardon” and “Pity” from the reader. This first speech of the unifying persona of the Canzoniere not only creates the speaker and the audience but also establishes the relationship between the audience and the speaker by direct address to the reader. By indicating shared experience with the reader (the common experience that “Love can sear”), the speaker introduces one major motif of the collection, especially “Part I: Laura Living”—the destructive qualities of passion and its utter vanity (though these are still, in part, merely conventions of love poetry).

The sestet, as is common in Petrarch’s sonnets, presents a reversal and completion to the movement of the octave, noting the wisdom gained (“nought but shame my vanities have bred”) and the resolution to the sequence, the vision of the transience of earthly matters and the value of the spiritual (“earthly joys are dreams that swiftly pass”). The opening of the sestet, the “now,” also establishes the fictive structure of the sequence, a narrative of the speaker’s life of love.

The major themes of the Canzoniere are all in embryo form: the role of Love (Laura) in his life, the tension between the secular and the sacred, the passing of time. Likewise, in focusing on the personal effects of these themes, the poem provides for the reader an indication of the Renaissance perspective of the poet.

SONNET 269

First published: Rime CCCX, 1358
(collected in Rhymes, 1976)

Type of work: Poem

In the spring, when signs of new life abound, the poet mourns the loss of his beloved.

This famous Petrarchan sonnet, Sonnet 269, the basis for the translation “The Soote Season” by Henry Howard, earl of Surrey, was probably written in the spring of 1352, after the death of Laura (1348). A traditional Petrarchan sonnet divided into an octave rhymed abbaabba and a sestet with the rhymed variation of cdecde, the poem is both a lament over the loss of Laura and a meditation on the relationship between the speaker and the natural world around him.

The opening of the poem, with its classical references to Zephyr (the spring wind), Procne (the swallow), and Philomel (the nightingale), invokes the substance and ethos of classical poetry. Yet the opening is also ironically poignant, for the western wind, Zephyr, has replaced the poet's own breeze, Laura (l'aura, "breeze" in Italian), and left him without the hope generally associated with spring. The poet paints a concrete picture of the details of the season—the birds, the colors, the fair sky, the "glad" fields—yet notes the paradox that, while all around him the earth is in repair, he experiences only a "sweet despair," the typical Petrarchan oxymoron describing the experience of love.

Indeed, the second part of the poem, the sestet, shows that the poet is at odds with his context. While the life-giving wind comes to nature, he experiences "only heavy sighs" since Laura has gone to her "heavenly sojourn." Despite the renewal of the world around him, the speaker's internal landscape, the world of his experience, is precisely the opposite—"Where deserts burn/ The beasts still prowl on the ungreening sand"—and he finds no resurrection of hope.

The poem is one of the best instances of Petrarch's use of the natural world as an indicator of human experience. While in other poems the landscape had been an adequate mirror of his own emotional state, however, he now finds nature almost mocking his despair and tormenting with hope when he finds none.

SUMMARY

Along with Dante and Boccaccio, Petrarch is considered to be one of Italy's three greatest writers. His influence as a love poet is universal. Through the development of the sonnet form, the creation of a fiction of narrative development and a unifying and focalizing persona, the revivifying of classical tropes, and the pervading themes of love, nature, and time, Petrarch, in the Canzoniere, establishes himself as one of the first major writers of the Renaissance. He also provides a model for much of the poetry of the succeeding centuries, at least into the seventeenth century.

Daniel L. Colvin

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Epistolae metricae, 1363 (Metrical Letters, 1958)

Bucolicum carmen, 1364 (Eclogues, 1974)

Africa, 1396 (English translation, 1977)

Trionfi, 1470 (Tryumphs, 1565; also known as Triumphs, 1962)

Rerum vulgarium fragmenta, 1470 (also known as Canzoniere; Rhymes, 1976)

Rime disperse, 1826 (also known as Estravaganti; Excluded Rhymes, 1976)

NONFICTION:

Rerum familiarium libri, wr. 1325-1366 (English translation, 1975-1985, also known as Books on Personal Matters)

Collatio laureationes, 1341 (Coronation Oath, 1955)

Psalmi penitentiales, 1342-1347

Rerum memorandum libri, 1343-1345

De vita solitaria, 1346 (The Life of Solitude, 1924)

De viris illustribus, 1351-1353 (later reorganized as Quorundam virorum illustrium epithoma, with a preface by Petrarch, completed by Lombardo della Seta)

Secretum meum, 1353-1358 (also known as De secreto conflictu curarum mearum; My Secret, 1911)

Invectiva contra quendam magni status hominem sed nullius scientiae aut virtutis, 1355

Itinerarium Syriacum, 1358 (also known as Itinerarium breve de Ianua)

Sine nomine, 1359-1360 (Book Without a Name, 1973)

Senilium rerum libri, wr. 1361-1374 (Letters of Old Age, 1966)

Rerum familiarium libri xxiv, 1364-1366 (Books on Personal Matters, 1975)

De remediis utriusque fortunae, 1366 (Physicke Against Fortune, 1597; also as On Remedies for Good and Bad Fortunes, 1966)

De sui ipsius et multorum ignorantia, 1367 (On His Own Ignorance and That of Many, 1948)

Posteritati, 1370-1372 (Epistle to Posterity, 1966)

Invectiva contra eum qui maledixit Italiae, 1373

De otio religioso, 1376

Miscellaneous Letters, 1966

MISCELLANEOUS:

Opera quae extant omnia, 1554, 1581

About the Author

Bergin, Thomas G. Petrarch. New York: Twayne, 1970.

Bishop, Morris. Petrarch and His World. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1963.

Enenkel, K. A. E., and Jan Papy, eds. Petrarch and His Readers in the Renaissance. Boston: Brill, 2006.

Foster, Kenelm. Petrarch: Poet and Humanist. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 1984.

Kircher, Timothy. The Poet's Wisdom: The Humanists, the Church, and the Formation of Philosophy in the Early Renaissance. Boston: Brill, 2006.

Mann, Nicholas. Petrarch. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 1984.

Quillen, Carol Everhart. Rereading the Renaissance: Petrarch, Augustine, and the Language of Humanism. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1998.

Trapp, J. B. Studies of Petrarch and His Influence. London: Pindar, 2003.

Wilkins, E. H. Life of Petrarch. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Why has Petrarch's Laura influenced subsequent love poetry more than Dante's Beatrice?
- What besides the subject of Laura has made Petrarch's Canzoniere so important?
- What makes Petrarch's sonnet form difficult to accomplish in English?
- Why have writers on Petrarch attached such importance to the fact that he climbed Mt. Ventoux?
- Describe the influence of Petrarch on Giovanni Boccaccio.
- Millions of people have read Petrarch's Canzoniere in Italian or in translation; in general, only scholars read his Latin works. Why are the latter so important?

PETRONIUS

Born: Unknown

c. 20 C.E.

Died: Cumae (now in Italy)

c. 66 C.E.

By his complex, multileveled fiction and poetry in one literary work, The Satyricon, Petronius has increasingly been recognized as the only ancient Roman writer to realistically present everyday life in the Roman Empire while simultaneously and skillfully satirizing virtually all of ancient Roman civilization.

BIOGRAPHY

The scanty details of the life of Petronius (puh-TROH-nee-uhs) are drawn from what was written about him by other Roman writers of his time, including most famously by Tacitus. In book 16, chapters 17-19 of Annales (c. 116 C.E.; Annals, 1598), Tacitus described the events leading up to Petronius's suicide on the order of Emperor Nero in 66 C.E. Thus, more is known about the last days of Petronius's life than about the previous forty-odd years of that life, and even about those last days there is considerable uncertainty. However, it is generally known and agreed that Petronius was well educated and of artistic temperament; that he became governor of Bithynia and later a consul; and that during his last years he was in the inner circle of the infamous Emperor Nero, probably the most decadent and destructive of the Roman emperors.

It is also agreed that Petronius occupied the position of arbiter for Nero in the particular area of entertainment. Petronius's job seems to have been to review all entertainment activities and performances proposed for Nero's pleasure and to decide which performances Nero actually witnessed and in which entertainment activities the emperor actually engaged. Although there is uncertainty as to whether Petronius was actually involved in many, if any, of Nero's debaucheries, it seems clear that he was either involved or knew others well who were and who related the details to him. This is obvious from Tacitus's explanation that after Petronius was framed by a rival and perjured testimony provided to Nero about Petronius's supposed collusion with a conspirator against Nero, and after Nero's message that Petronius was to kill himself, Petronius wrote a detailed account of Nero's debaucheries. This account included the names of all of Nero's sexual partners, male and female, and a list of all of Nero's sexually deviant activities, and Petronius sent the account to Nero himself. Thus, even if Petronius was himself an Epicurian (worshipper of pleasure), as seems likely from his position in Nero's circle, he clearly retained a satiric sense of the perversity of Nero and had the courage to communicate that perception, albeit after his own suicide freed him from personal reprisals by Nero for the communication.

Petronius's courage and satiric vision, his ability to perceive the ironic disconnect between appearance and reality, between pretension and achievement, between selfish motive and rationalization, are also evident in his refusal to follow the custom of willing a substantial portion of his property to the emperor. In fact, Petronius destroyed some of that property, including a fluorspar wine dipper worth 300,000 sesterces, so that Nero would not receive it, as reported by Pliny. In addition, Plutarch indicates Petronius's courage and satiric tendency in noting that Petronius sneered at the reckless and wasteful spending and the pettiness and sordidness of Nero and others of Rome's elite class.

It is clear from the scanty biographical information that Petronius was a humanist with a sense of justice and fair play, also essential beliefs of the successful satirist. This humanism and sense of justice are evident in Tacitus's description of Petronius rewarding some of his slaves and punishing others prior to his death, and then destroying his signet ring—his seal of authority from Nero—so the ring could not be used to harm others.

Thus, the overall biographical picture of Petronius that results from the scanty details of his life is that he was well educated and artistic; that he was an Epicurian, yet retained a sense of enlightened decorum that caused him to abhor the extremes of debauchery that he witnessed at first hand or learned about from firsthand sources; and that he possessed an ironic perspective on the excesses of all aspects of life during the late Roman Empire. He also possessed the courage and sense of justice and fair play to satirize those excesses while recognizing his own, albeit more limited, participation in those excesses, which would eventually lead to the fall of the Roman Empire itself.

ANALYSIS

Petronius's style is unique in ancient literature in that it combines sophisticated literary allusiveness and symbolism with earthy, realistic situations, events, and characters; unites a variety of literary genres and modes; and combines complex satiric denunciation with a humorous and humanistic perspective that effectively captures both the comic and tragic nature of human life.

The repeated allusions to and deliberate parallels with the works of other ancient writers have produced a virtual cornucopia of scholarship tracing these allusions and parallels. They include direct references to Sophocles, Euripides, Pindar, Plato, Demosthenes, Thucydides, Hyperides, Cicero, and so many other ancient writers as to be virtually impossible to count. Ancient mythology also figures prominently in Petronius's work, including references to Athena, Mount Helicon, Minerva, Mercury, and others, yet these are also worked realistically into Petronius's writing as a reflection of the beliefs of the multitude of characters who populate that writing. For example, in the most famous section of Satyricon (c. 60 C.E.; The Satyricon, 1694), entitled "Dinner with Trimalchio," frescoes depicting scenes from Greek mythology and from Homer's Iliad (c. 750 B.C.E.; English translation, 1611) and Odyssey (c. 725 B.C.E.; English translation, 1614) line the walls of the home of Trimalchio, a wealthy merchant. In addition, as is typical in ancient literature, figures from mythology actually appear as characters in the work, including, for example, Circe's appearance to tempt Encolpius, the first-person narrator of The Satyricon, to have sexual relations with her.

However, unlike in ancient epics, this literary and mythological allusiveness in Petronius's work is deliberately combined with a decidedly non-heroic set of characters and situations, as the characters are uniformly in pursuit of pleasure, mostly sexual, while they usually attempt to maintain the public facade of other, more socially acceptable, purposes. This, of course, creates great potential for satire, as when the scholar/poet Eumolpus at one point in The Satyricon is in hot, lusty pursuit of a homosexual relationship with the narrator's slave-boy, Giton, and later declaims sonorously against "perversion everywhere."

Petronius's work is also uniquely a combination of literary genres and modes. Functioning overall as a fictitious travel narrative, The Satyricon also includes elements of Greek romance, including the requisite separation of lovers by shipwreck. The work features epic poetry, particularly Eumolpus's lengthy poetic recitation of Roman historical warfare that is one of the longer sections of the work. In addition, The Satyricon contains sections of declamatory rhetoric, as in the rant by the scholar Agamemnon that begins the work.

Much of the humor of The Satyricon derives from its mock-epic aspects, particularly those instances in which the heroic travels and adventures of Odysseus are parodied by the much less heroic misadventures of the narrator, Encolpius, whose name translates roughly as "the crotch."

In one humorous episode, Encolpius attempts to keep his sexual relationship with his slave-boy, Giton, despite the lusty pursuit of the handsome young Giton by Encolpius's best friend, Ascyltus, and by the scholar/poet Eumolpus. At one point, Encolpius encourages Giton to hide from Ascyltus by clinging to the underside of a bed, and Petronius makes the parodying, mock-epic parallel by indicating the similarity to Odysseus's escaping detection by the Cyclops by clinging to the belly of a ram. The dissonance between Odysseus's heroic struggle to save his life and return to family and country and Giton's attempt to hide from one of his homosexual lovers at the behest of another is humorously and satirically very effective.

Similar mock-epic parallels abound throughout The Satyricon, including the meeting between Circe and Encolpius, modeled after and contrasting with Odysseus's encounter with the same goddess in Odyssey. In Petronius's version, Encolpius's crotch hilariously fails him, as he is impotent with Circe despite the enchantress's beauty and sexuality. Upon that failure, Encolpius renders in epic poetry his attempt to sever his disobedient penis but inability to do it, and he then delivers an impassioned apostrophe to his penis, which of course hides its head in shame. The humor generated by the mock-epic parallels is probably the most effective aspect of Petronius's writing and the aspect most unique among ancient literature, and there was no really equivalent mock-epic written until Alexander Pope's The Rape of the Lock (1712, 1714).

Another important dimension of Petronius's writing is the combination of satiric denunciation with a humanistically tragicomic perspective. The bitter diatribes of most ancient satire are totally lacking in Petronius's work, in which all are implicated in the shortcomings presented. For example, in the final sections of The Satyricon, Petronius very effectively satirizes the greed of those who prey on the wealthy elderly in order to receive their property, but he does it by having all of his main characters concoct a plan for preying on those in Croton who prey on the wealthy elderly. These main characters decide to have the scholar/poet Eumolpus arrive in Croton and pretend to be a rich, elderly merchant as a way to get the legacy-hunters in Croton to bestow gifts upon him in hopes of receiving his estate. The plot works, and so does the satire; the humor is provided by the narrator's humanistic ambivalence about participating in the scam and his tragicomic fear that the ruse will be discovered and that he and the others will be deservedly punished. In Petronius's tragicomic, humanistic, and profoundly satiric vision, no one is free of responsibility for the chaos of the world.

THE SATYRICON

First published: c. 60 C.E. (English translation, 1694)

Type of work: Novel

Through the sexual and other decidedly unheroic misadventures of his main character, Petronius satirizes not only the heroic tradition but also the many excesses of ancient Roman civilization.

Understanding of The Satyricon (the name connoting both satire and satyr, a mythological sexual beast) needs to begin with the fact that the extant work is only a fragment of the original as Petronius wrote it. There are many gaps where entire sections and episodes have been lost. In fact, The Satyricon as it exists today is probably less than one-half of the original. Still, given the unique structure of the work, as a combination of fictitious travel narrative, epic poetry, rhetorical declamation, Greek romance, and mock-epic, it is likely that enough exists to suffice in understanding Petronius's purposes and achievement.

The overall structure of the work is best understood as a deliberate parallel to and parody of Homer's Odyssey. Like Odysseus, Petronius's main character, Encolpius ("the crotch"), has offended a deity, in this case Priapus, the lord of lust, and thus embarks on a diverse series of sexual and other misadventures. These include the loss of his slave-boy Giton, with whom he has an intimate homosexual relationship; temptation by the goddess Circe, with whom Encolpius cannot perform, despite her perfect beauty and sensuality; and endurance of the "cure" for his impotence by the hag Proseleunos, who among other activities inserts a leather phallus into Encolpius's rectum after covering the phallus with oil, pepper, and ground nettle seed. Implicit in all of these misadventures is the humorous mock-epic parallel with Odyssey, with Petronius satirizing the excesses of the ancient Roman world and showing human nature much more realistically than is shown in Homer's epic.

Manifestations of the satire include the hag Proselenos, who, drunk and frantic with lust, chases Encolpius down the street, and the slave-boy Giton, who skillfully manipulates the narrator and other lovers to achieve his sexual and monetary satisfactions. More importantly, there is Trimalchio, the wealthy merchant who is the focus of the longest section of the work, entitled "Dinner with Trimalchio." An obese, decadent man whose ostentatious wealth and wastefulness are epitomized by a meal of seemingly endless courses, Trimalchio cannot keep his hands (and his mouth) off of his slave-boys, even in the presence of his own wife; his narcissistic self-indulgence (symbolic of all Roman self-indulgence in the time of Nero, when Petronius wrote) is epitomized by his drunken display of dressing in funeral attire, lying down, and demanding that his dinner guests pretend that he is dead and sing his praises.

However, probably the ultimate satiric message of The Satyricon derives from the last section of the work, in which Encolpius and friends, before arriving at Croton, concoct a plan to victimize legacy-hunters who prey on elderly people with wealth in order to receive their property. The plan is that Eumolpus will pretend to be a wealthy merchant, with extensive land, capital, and slaves in Africa, so as to entice the legacy-hunters to donate property to him in the belief that the gifts will generate much greater gifts after his death. The double-edged satire is obvious, but Petronius makes it even more so, showing human beings' mutual attempts to devour each other by having Eumolpus write a will requiring that each devisee, in order to receive his property, eat a portion of Eumolpus's dead body. A more negative satiric assessment of human beings is difficult to imagine. However, at the same time, Petronius's humorously tolerant perspective on the weaknesses of all of his characters saves The Satyricon from the bitterness of other satires, such as Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels (1726), and combined with the inventive mock-epic structure, makes The Satyricon a unique, and uniquely valuable, work of ancient Roman literature.

SUMMARY

Only by the broadest definition a novel, Petronius's The Satyricon really defies categorization, but it is best understood as the first mock-epic narrative in any literature. By an original, inventive combination of elements from a multitude of literary genres and modes, Petronius effectively both depicts and satirizes Roman life under Emperor Nero, and he does so with such compassionate, earthy, and tragicomic humanism that The Satyricon richly deserves its recently acquired status as one of the greatest works of literature of the ancient world.

John L. Grigsby

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Satyricon, c. 60 C.E. (The Satyricon, 1694)

About the Author

Boyce, Bret. The Language of the Freedman in Petronius's "Cena Trimalchionis." New York: Brill, 1991.

Corbett, Philip B. Petronius. New York: Twayne, 1970.

Courtney, Edward. A Companion to Petronius. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 2001.

Jensson, Gottskalk. The Recollections of Encolpius: "The Satyricon" of Petronius as Milesian Fiction. Groningen, Netherlands: Barkhuis, 2004.

McMahon, John M. Paralysin Cave: Impotence, Perception, and Text in "The Satyricon" of Petronius. New York: Brill, 1998.

Payayotakis, Costas. Theatrum Arbitri: Theatrical Elements in "The Satyricon" of Petronius. New York: Brill, 1995.

Rankin, H. D. Petronius the Artist: Essays on "The Satyricon" and Its Author. The Hague, Netherlands: Martinus Nijhoff, 1971.

Rimell, Victoria. Petronius and the Anatomy of Fiction. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 2002.

Slater, Niall W. Reading Petronius. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1990.

Sullivan, J. P. "The Satyricon" of Petronius: A Literary Study. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1968.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- In what ways does Petronius's The Satyricon show the influence of Homer's Odyssey (c. 725 B.C.E.; English translation, 1614)?
- In making parallels to and contrasts with Odyssey, is Petronius's purpose to ridicule first century C.E. Roman life as he knew it, or to ridicule Homer's work, or both, or neither? If neither, what is Petronius's reason for using the parallels and contrasts with Odyssey?
- In what ways does The Satyricon reflect the worldview, philosophy, and religion of the ancient Greek and Roman world?
- How is Roman slavery as reflected in The Satyricon similar to and/or different from slavery in the American South before the Civil War?
- What opinion does Petronius seem to want the reader to formulate about Trimalchio? Does he seem to want the reader to admire Trimalchio, to be disgusted by him, or both, or neither? If neither, what attitude does Petronius want the reader to have toward Trimalchio?
- How does hyperbole (deliberate overstatement) contribute to the humor in The Satyricon?
- Who is the most despicable character in The Satyricon, and why? Who is the most admirable character, and why?

Jastrow

PINDAR

Born: Cynoscephalae, near Thebes, Boeotia, Greece
c. 518 B.C.E.

Died: Argos, Greece
c. 438 B.C.E.

The most gifted of all the lyric poets of ancient Greece, rivaled only by Sappho, Pindar is best known for his victory odes honoring athletic victors at the Olympia and other Panhellenic festivals.

BIOGRAPHY

Pindar (PIHN-dur; also known as Pindaros) was born in the small village of Cynoscephalae, which was controlled by the city-state of Thebes in the region of Greece called Boeotia. This was a mountainous and rustic territory, which also contained the most important religious site among the ancient Greeks, namely the cult and oracle of Apollo at Delphi. There was a popular story that Pindar was actually born during the Delphic, or Pythian, festival held every four years in honor of the god. If so, the year of his birth would have been either 522 or 518 B.C.E. Boeotia was also a region famous for producing poets, especially those who specialized in choral lyric song, and so Pindar would have been born into a lively musical culture centered on religious festivals, like those held at Delphi.

Five accounts of Pindar's life survive but they are all from late antique or Byzantine sources and their reliability in most matters is suspect. Nonetheless, it is possible to reconstruct the outlines of Pindar's biography from what he tells readers in his poems and from what others said about him. His family appears to have been connected with the Aegeids, a clan which is mentioned in mythical sources as belonging to both Sparta and Thebes. This would give him an outstanding aristocratic pedigree, and even if the claim of descent from the Aegeids is an exaggeration, it is likely that Pindar was born into a noble and wealthy Theban family. The name of his father is disputed: Daiphantus and Pagonas are given as possibilities, while Corinna, another Boeotian poet, says he was called Scopelinus, meaning "rocky."

As a boy growing up in Thebes, Pindar would have received the schooling in music and poetry that was an important part of the education of well-born males, along with physical and military training. At some later stage, he was sent to Athens to study the poetic arts and there would have had the opportunity to associate with that city's cultural and social elite. He seems to have developed a close link with one of the most powerful Athenian families, the Alcmaeonids, whom he praises in some of his later poems. While studying in Athens, he may have been tutored by the musician Agathocles, but the tradition that he was taught by Lasus of Hermione and Simonides of Ceos is probably false. He would, however, have been significantly influenced by the dynamic innovations in choral singing that occurred in and around the Great Dionysia festival during this period.

Thus it was, in all likelihood, a combination of his inborn talent and his broad education that turned Pindar into one of the leading poets of his day. At this time, the most successful poets traveled across the Greek world to perform in various towns and cities, and Pindar is known to have visited Thessaly and the island of Sicily. Yet what makes him unusual is the close bond he managed to maintain with his native city of Thebes, of which he speaks often and fondly in many of his poems. The fact that he continued to express his admiration for Thebes even after the city had sided with the invading Persians when Xerxes attacked Greece in 480 B.C.E. is eloquent testimony to his patriotic zeal. Thebes's long-standing enmity with Athens, and its general unpopularity after the Persian wars, do not appear to have affected Pindar directly, as he seems to have been largely uninterested in politics.

Pindar is credited with the composition of seventeen books of lyric poetry of various kinds. He started out by composing songs for religious occasions and songs of praise (paean) for particular cities and islands, including one of his favorite locations, Aegina. He made his career, however, with a series of epinikian odes (Epinikia, 498-446 B.C.E.; Odes, 1656), composed for victors in the athletic competitions held at the four great Panhellenic festivals: the Olympian, Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian. In these complex compositions, myth and history are blended with elaborate metrical forms and a highly metaphorical language to produce a unique encapsulation of the Panhellenic ideal as it was embodied in the achievement of a victorious athlete. Pindar's success in Sicily, where he composed epinikians for Hieron, the ruler of Syracuse, secured his reputation as the leading exponent of choral lyric.

Pindar arrived in Sicily around 476 B.C.E. and remained there for several years. He returned to the mainland a wealthy man and a much sought-after performer. He built a temple of Rhea and Pan near his home in Thebes and continued to travel widely. Criticized for being too friendly with tyrants and for being too concerned with getting paid, in his later years Pindar was forced to endure personal reproaches along with the praise that continued to be heaped upon his poetry. The political weakness of Boeotia and of his native Thebes in the face of rising Athenian power must also have been a cause of some distress. Even his poetic reputation came into question, as he is reported to have engaged in heated arguments over style and content with the Boeotian female poet Corinna. According to the tradition, he died in the Peloponnesian city of Argos around 438 B.C.E., breathing his last breath on the knees of a boy whom he loved. He had lived for about eighty years.

ANALYSIS

In his epinikian odes, of which forty-five survive, grouped under the names of the four great Panhellenic festivals—the Olympia, Pythia, Nemea, and Isthmia—Pindar strives to express what has often been labeled as the Panhellenic ideal. To understand what this means, it is vital to realize that ancient athletic competitions were primarily events of religious and cultural significance, rather than simple displays of physical prowess. The victory ode would originally have been written more or less on the spot by the poet commissioned for the purpose and performed on the evening of the contest; most of Pindar's, however, were composed after an interval of some time and then delivered to the home city of the victor. In such an ode, the victorious athlete was celebrated as the finest specimen of male virtue available and was associated with the realm of the divine through his achievements. Thus, while it often comes as a surprise to modern readers, an epinikian ode has little to say about the particular athlete's appearance or how he won his victory crown.

In his poems, Pindar strives to express the religious and cultural traditions that all Greeks shared as a common heritage. The unifying concepts included the two great poems of Homer, the Iliad (c. 750 B.C.E.; English translation, 1611) and Odyssey (c. 725 B.C.E.; English translation, 1614), the mythological tradition of stories about the gods and heroes, and the centrality of such holy places as Delphi, with its oracle of Apollo. Thus every ode contains a large mythological component, often focused on one major figure, such as Heracles, Jason, Apollo, or Perseus, but the stories are rarely told in a conventional, straightforward narrative form. Fleeting references to well-known events are combined with more detailed descriptions of minor incidents or complicated allusions to obscure, lesser-known parts of the myth. Chronological disruption is frequent, so that the end of the story may be mentioned before earlier parts of the tale are told. One of Pindar's favorite devices is to mix into his mythological material some references to the home city of the athletic victor in order to involve the victor's achievement with the great deeds of past heroes.

The epinikian ode extols the virtues, or the outstanding qualities, which have enabled the athlete to achieve his victory in whatever event he competed, be it wrestling, boxing, running, or the pentathlon. Certain key terms appear again and again, the most important of which is arête: in Greek, this covers a range of meanings, including “courage,” “excellence,” and “skill.” It is the excellence of spirit that has brought the athlete to the rewards of the highest skill a mortal can reach. Such excellence—which the poet believes he shares—at the same time requires an appropriate sense of modesty and restraint in order to avoid incurring the jealousy or anger of the gods. Pindar also speaks much of such praiseworthy attributes as loyalty, filial devotion, and respect for the gods. His poems are the product of a basically conservative outlook, one which has reverence for traditional institutions and religious practices. They are also tied to the aristocratic elements of Greek society, which were increasingly threatened by ideas about democracy and wider political participation. He often comments, for example, on the superiority of inborn or inherited qualities to those skills which can be taught or learned.

While the ideas expressed in Pindar’s poems are derived from a common storehouse of Panhellenic and aristocratic ideology, the language in which they are expressed is unique in the ancient world. At the root of Pindar’s skill as a poet is his mastery of all the varied meters in which Greek lyricists composed. His metrical forms and versification are extremely complex and were imitated by later poets, such as the Roman poet Horace. Unfortunately, it has not been possible to reconstruct the music or dances that were an integral part of the original performance.

The other remarkable element of the Pindaric ode is its language, especially in regard to word choice and word placement. Imaginative vocabulary and vivid metaphors run throughout the poems, and he is the master of the striking juxtaposition and the surprising turn of phrase. The focus of the poem shifts quickly, often unexpectedly, so that a general impression of speed and vitality is created. At the same time, the elaborate sentence structure, numerous asides and interjections, and difficult grammar all contribute to a sense of fluidity. It could be said that Pindar’s poetry is “experienced” rather than “understood” as it unfolds.

Each epinikian opens with an invocation of the Muses or some other divinity and moves to praise the individual victor and his city and family. Then comes the mythical content, which usually takes up the central part of the poem. The piece concludes with further praise of the victor or his homeland, as well as some praise of the poet himself, and some tribute to the presiding god of the festival, such as Zeus or Apollo. Although there are some variations, this pattern holds for the overwhelming majority of the odes.

Readers, ancient and modern, have reacted with varying enthusiasm to the Pindaric mode of expression. The ancients were fascinated by the notion that Pindar quarreled with his fellow Boeotian, the celebrated female poet Corinna, over style and content; she is reputed to have criticized him for “sowing with the whole sack” of myths, rather than concentrating on one story, as she appears to have done in her own, sparsely written, poetry. After Pindar, the epinikian form all but disappears. The world for which he wrote was changing rapidly, and, to a considerable degree, he was already looking back nostalgically to an era and a value system whose zenith had passed.

OLYMPIAN ODE 1

First published: 498-446 B.C.E. (English translation, 1656)

Type of work: Poem

Celebrating Hieron of Syracuse’s victory in the horse race at the Olympia, Pindar offers advice on rulership via the myth of Tantalus and Pelops.

Olympian 1, which opens the collection of Pindar’s forty-five victory odes, sets the template for all of his subsequent poems in this genre. It was produced to celebrate the victory in the horse race at the Olympia of Hieron of Syracuse in 476 B.C.E. At this time, Hieron was master of most of the Greek settlements on the island of Sicily and was establishing himself as a patron of the arts, especially poetry. Pindar, who was invited to Syracuse in 476, was an eyewitness to the magnificence of Hieron’s court and to his benevolent, if autocratic, rule. Olympian 1 is a response to what he saw and contains a mixture of praise and advice to the victor.

The ode opens with the famously impenetrable phrase “Best of all is water” and celebratory remarks on the Olympic festival and its patron deity, Zeus. Then Pindar moves to praise of Hieron and his city of Syracuse as worthy subjects for poetic song, along with the horse who was ridden to victory, Pherenikos (“Victory-bringer”). By interweaving references to Olympia and Sicily and deploying a connected series of metaphors and images, Pindar is able to link Hieron and his present-day actions with a long tradition of historical and mythical events.

After the introduction, the central part of the poem consists of the myth of Tantalus and Pelops, which Pindar retells in his own unique fashion. His purpose is to sanitize the story of its most disturbing—and, to Pindar, immoral—details, especially the notion that Tantalus tried to feed his son Pelops to the gods in a stew and that they replaced his shoulder with a piece of ivory when they put his chopped up body together again. The implication, of course, is that the gods actually ate part of his flesh before they discovered what Tantalus had done.

In Pindar’s version, this is dismissed as a mere tale invented by envious humans. Tantalus’s crime becomes the less horrifying act of stealing divine ambrosia and nectar to give to his mortal friends. Nonetheless, the behavior of Tantalus is an instance of hubris, namely an arrogant disregard for the laws of the gods. Thus the moral message of the myth is clear: One’s conduct should be guided by moderation in all things and by respect for the gods. This has direct applicability to Hieron, who although a popular and generally benign ruler, was an autocrat, or in Greek terminology, a “tyrant.” As Pindar knew well, many tyrants had turned out to be abusive and violent rulers (hence the negative connotations of the word today).

The story of Pelops’s famous chariot race for the hand of King Oenomaus’s daughter, which ultimately led to the foundation of the Olympic festival, is given only in a truncated form because Pindar has run out of time and space. He does, however, include Pelops’s prayer to the god Poseidon, which is a model of what Pindar would consider religious piety and heroic virtue. This leads readers back to Hieron, who is now praised for a second time but reminded that a god now watches over his labors. The ode concludes with an invocation of the Muse, who watches over Pindar’s poetic labors, and with a wish that he can share in friendship with the victors in the games.

PYTHIAN ODE 1

First published: 498-446 B.C.E. (English translation, 1656)

Type of work: Poem

Hieron’s victory at the Pythia offers the opportunity to praise him as an ideal sovereign and to celebrate his military triumphs.

Pythian 1 was written to celebrate Hieron’s victory in the chariot race in the Pythia of 470 B.C.E. and as a hymn of praise on his military successes and his virtuous actions. It is addressed to Hieron of Aetna to mark his recent foundation of that new city on the eastern coastline of Sicily. By this stage, the island was under Hieron’s control, and he had defeated foreign enemies, including the Carthaginians and the Etruscans. In spite of Hieron’s harsh treatment of his political opponents within Sicily, Pindar presents him as almost the incarnation of the ideal ruler.

The ode commences with a standard address to the Muse and to Apollo’s lyre, which has the power to subdue all powers in the human and divine realms. The eagle of Zeus is imagined as sleeping to the sweet melodies of choral song, while Ares, the god of war, lays down his weapons and has soothing dreams. The mention of Zeus takes readers into the first mythological excursus, namely the story of Typhon, the fire-breathing monster who was buried under Mount Aetna after he attacked the king of the gods. Rather unusually for Pindar, the mythical elements in this ode are brief.

There follows a description of a volcanic eruption on Aetna, which must have been inspired by first-hand experience during Pindar’s period of residence on the island of Sicily. The vivid images of fire, smoke, and lava make for a dramatic scene. This leads Pindar back to the city of Aetna and Hieron's victory at the Pythian games. He predicts that the city will win numerous victories in the future, as its athletes set sail across the sea to the great Panhellenic festivals on the Greek mainland. Apollo is asked to "make this land a mother of brave men."

A second mythological reference occurs in the third segment of the poem, to Philoctetes, who was left to spend the Trojan war on the island of Lemnos because he was suffering from a festering wound in his foot. When he was finally brought to the battlefield, after being persuaded by Odysseus and Diomedes, he shot Paris with his arrows and shortly thereafter Troy fell to its besiegers. Pindar draws a parallel with Hieron, although its precise import is left ambiguous; perhaps it is a general reference to the growth of Hieron's power and prestige, but one suspects there is somehow more to it than that.

Next, Pindar mentions the Greek victories in the battles of Salamis (480 B.C.E.) and Plataea (479 B.C.E.), which brought an end to the Persian invasion led by Xerxes. In the same passage, reference is made to the defeat of the Carthaginians and the Etruscans in two naval battles in which Hieron played a leading role. The implication is that Hieron's actions were akin to those of those other heroic Greeks who "saved Hellenic civilization" from the barbarians. This leads back to Hieron's athletic victory and Pindar's role as the poet who is to record it in song. It is his duty to be both effective and concise in this role, he says.

Perhaps because he has been so generous with his praise of him, Pindar ends the poem by proffering some advice to Hieron. He alludes to the dangers of envy and "hidden anger," as well as the need for the ruler's words to be "forged on the anvil of truth." Moderation, once again, is the key to good governance, both of one's self and one's subjects.

Better to be remembered, like Croesus, for being generous, than, like the tyrant Phalaris, for acts of cruelty. The most important goals in the contest of life, Pindar advises, are to win good fortune and preserve an honorable name; that is the greatest victory crown of all.

SUMMARY

The subject of Pindar's poetry, as evidenced by his forty five victory odes, is not the description of how an athlete won his particular event but the elucidation of the moral qualities that enabled him to achieve the status of an ideal human exemplar, one who is in touch with the laws of the gods. It is the virtues of courage, moderation, and piety that can elevate a man to the highest glories of achievement. This is an attitude grounded in the aristocratic system to which Pindar was politically and culturally attached.

David H. J. Larmour

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Why does Pindar use athletic victors as the hinge for a discussion of moral virtues?
- What does Pindar have to say about the importance of family background?
- How are metaphors and images used in Pindar's poetry to convey his ideas about human achievement?
- How does Pindar associate his own poetic skills with those of the victorious athlete?
- In what sense is Pindar's outlook an "anti-democratic" one?
- Why does not Pindar simply tell his myths in a straightforward manner?

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Epinikia, 498-446 B.C.E. (Odes, 1656)

About the Author

Carne-Ross, D. S. Pindar. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1985.

Conway, Geoffrey S. The Odes of Pindar. London: J. M. Dent, 1972.

Currie, Bruno. Pindar and the Cult of Heroes. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 2005.

Gerber, Douglas E. Pindar's Olympian 1, a Commentary. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1982.

Hornblower, Simon, and Catherine Morgan. Pindar's Poetry, Patrons, and Festivals: From Archaic Greece to the Roman Empire. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 2007.

Instone, Stephen. Pindar: The Complete Odes. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 2007.

Steiner, Deborah. The Crown of Song: Metaphor in Pindar. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 1986.

R. Jones

HAROLD PINTER

Born: London, England
October 10, 1930

Died: London, England
December 24, 2008

One of the most critically acclaimed postmodern British playwrights, usually associated with minimalist or absurdist theater, Pinter combines elements of conventional naturalism with an oblique symbolism to forge an offbeat, idiosyncratic Pinteresque style that has had a major influence on contemporary drama. He was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature in 2005.

BIOGRAPHY

Harold Pinter was born in Hackney, a working-class suburb of East London, England, on October 10, 1930, the son of Hyman and Frances Pinter. Even though the neighborhood was a rough area of abandoned warehouses, dilapidated tenements, and, at times, roving bands of fascists, his father was able to provide his family with a terraced house in a fairly comfortable middle-class setting. During the air raids on London in World War II, Pinter was evacuated from the city, and the themes of restrained panic and impending violence that recur in his plays suggest how deeply his war experience affected his writing.

Pinter expressed an early interest in acting. While attending Hackney Downs Grammar School, he won acclaim in the school magazine for his performances in several dramatic roles, although he remained ambivalent toward his academic studies. As he recalled in a 1966 interview with The Paris Review: “The only thing that interested me at school was English language and literature. . . . I was mostly in love at the time and tied up with that.” He did, however, develop a keen interest in sports—especially cricket and track—and motifs of sports and games often surface in his plays.

At eighteen, Pinter refused mandatory military duty as a conscientious objector, but not on religious grounds. He faced a possible jail term for his actions, but he was fined only thirty pounds and released. That same year, 1948, Pinter received a grant to study at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art but dropped out after two terms to travel, recording his experiences in poetry and short prose pieces. Meanwhile, he developed a sharp ear for dialogue, especially for the silences that punctuate ordinary conversation, and for the nuances and the anomalies of everyday language.

By 1950, Pinter had published poems in Poetry London and was working as a professional radio and television actor. Soon he was touring with Anew McMaster’s acting company in Ireland; in 1954, under the stage name of David Boren, he worked in various provincial repertory theaters all over England. It was while he was on tour that he met and married actress Vivien Merchant in 1956. Pinter told The Paris Review that his wife was “a very good actress and a very interesting actress to work with,” but he claims that he never wrote a part for her, even though she has appeared in many of his plays. In 1980, he divorced Merchant and married British writer and socialite Lady Antonia Fraser.

It was also on tour in 1957 that a director friend asked Pinter to write a play for the Bristol University theater department. Pinter promised it in six months but delivered it in four days. The play was The Room (pr. 1957, pb. 1960), which received little notice but did impress the London Sunday Times critic Harold Hobson, who championed Pinter’s next play, The Birthday Party (pr. 1958, pb. 1959), which nevertheless closed after its first week. Pinter's reputation, however, was growing. Hobson dubbed him "the most original, disturbing and arresting talent in theatrical London." After a 1960 production of The Room and The Dumb Waiter (pr. 1959 in German; pr., pb. 1960 in English) was transferred from the Hampstead Theatre Club to the Royal Court, The Caretaker (pr., pb. 1960) opened and began earning enough money to convince Pinter that he could make a living writing full time.

While The Caretaker ran for twelve months in London, then opened in New York for another successful run, Pinter continued writing at a feverish pace, producing short theatrical pieces, plays for radio and television, and several screenplays, mostly adaptations from other writers' novels. By the end of the 1960's, Pinter's reputation as one of the most distinctive and innovative contemporary playwrights was firmly established on both sides of the Atlantic. After the success of The Birthday Party and The Caretaker, Pinter scored again with his next full-length play, The Homecoming (pr., pb. 1965). Perhaps his most masterful piece, it confirmed his status as a major talent.

Having received over two dozen prestigious awards—among them the New York Film Critics Award (1964), Commander, Order of the British Empire (1966), New York Drama Critics Circle Award (1967, 1980), a Tony Award (1967), the Laurence Olivier/BBC Award for Best New Play (1979), the Companion of Literature (1990), the Laurence Olivier Special Award (1996), the Sunday Times Award for Literary Excellence (1997), the PEN/S.T. Dupont Golden Pen Award (2001), the Critics' Circle Special Fiftieth Year Award (2004), and Legion d'Honneur (2007)—Pinter is regarded by many critics as Britain's greatest playwright of his generation.

A lyrical dramatist, Pinter was impatient with epic plays involving multiple scene changes and large casts, preferring instead one set with a small cast. Pinter was also skeptical of "message" plays, or plays aesthetically compromised by social didacticism. He told The Paris Review: "I don't think I've got any kind of social function that's of any value. . . . I distrust ideological statements of any kind." His cool, detached perspective reflects the attitude that so exemplified the 1960's.

As Pinter began to explore the formal, structural properties of theater, developing meaning more by design than by plot or characterization, his poetry of language began to evolve into a poetry of images; and while he continued to write short plays, sketches, and bits for radio and television, Pinter's experiments with form in theater fueled his interest in cinema—film being by its nature more plastic and therefore more malleable a medium than the stage. Pinter's static plots and his clipped, elliptical dialogue, which was so innovative in the dramatic arts, proved perfectly suitable for his transition from the confines of stage to the freedom of film. His experiments with cinematic techniques created original treatments of several screenplays of other writers' novels, including The Servant (1963), Accident (1967), The French Lieutenant's Woman (1981), and The Handmaid's Tale (1990). Four of his own plays have been filmed: a version of The Caretaker entitled The Guest (1964), The Birthday Party (1968), The Homecoming (1971), and Betrayal (1983).

Despite his disavowal of an ideological context in his work, Pinter has always been a controversial playwright who refused to compromise his progressive political activism. His anti-Soviet rhetoric during the Cold War caused his plays to be banned in the former Soviet Union. Later, as an outspoken critic of British and American foreign policy—he adamantly opposed the bombing of Afghanistan in 2001 and the invasion of Iraq in 2003—he was applauded by liberal groups and condemned as a traitor by those supporting the war. In 2005, he was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature, and though he had been weakened by treatment for cancer of the esophagus in 2002, Pinter was feisty and confrontational in his acceptance speech, when he famously called for the prosecution of British Prime Minister Tony Blair and President George W. Bush for "blatant state terrorism."

In February, 2005, Pinter decided to abandon his career as a playwright and put all his energy into politics, though much of his later work reflects his long-standing concern with human rights and the global political arena. Mountain Language (pr., pb. 1988), for instance, is set in a prison for political dissidents in an unnamed country in which communication is forbidden and language has become the tool of oppression. Family Voices (pr., pb. 1981), Victoria Station (pr., pb. 1982) and A Kind of Alaska (pr., pb. 1982; revised, 1984), produced as a trilogy entitled Other Places (pr., pb. 1982) at The National Theatre, Cottesloe, in 1982, illustrate Pinter's interest in language as a weapon and the disconnect between the conceptual world and reality. In No Man's Land (pr., pb. 1975), Pinter suggests that the present is merely a series of faulty memories, reality only a series of misunderstood events, a "no man's land . . . which never moves, which never changes, which never grows older, but which remains forever icy and silent."

ANALYSIS

In his introduction to Pinter: A Collection of Critical Essays (1972), Arthur Ganz writes that Pinter "shares the reluctance of many writers to have the full evocative experience of his work reduced, or altered, to an intellectual formation." In Pinter's case, however, this reluctance is tempered by his conscientiously designing plays that, in Ganz's view, "demand analysis even as he frustrates inquiry." Pinter's willful obscurity was often viewed as a breach of contract between the playwright and his audience, which left many theatergoers dissatisfied, feeling cheated or foolish, as if they had missed something, while critics and scholars attacked Pinter for his frustrating dismissal regarding the "meaning" of his plays.

Those most hostile to his early work complained that Pinter intentionally teased viewers into expecting certain revelations that were never delivered. It was, however, this very technique of creating symbolic resonance in otherwise naturalistic action that would earn for Pinter his distinctive reputation.

Much of the confusion surrounding early public reaction to Pinter's work stems from the fact that his plays are neither clearly absurd nor clearly realistic; his style derives its distinctiveness by its quirky combination of elements from both schools. Pinter blends the authentic, mimetic behavior usually associated with realism—evoking a world that the audience recognizes as the everyday world that it inhabits—with the absurdist vision of a senseless, purposeless world to create, out of seemingly ordinary situations, symbolic overtones that invite interpretation.

For example, the room in his first short play, The Room, is a real room, but it is also a symbol of sanctity and violation, of security, betrayal, and displacement. Likewise, in The Dumb Waiter, the idea of two men receiving instructions from a serving hatch implies a theme larger than the surface meaning of the play: It details two guilty souls confronting an implacable, unseen, and unreasonable power beyond their understanding. In a similar way, The Caretaker is about two brothers and a tramp, but it is also a psychological study of power, allegiance, innocence, and corruption, just as The Homecoming is about both a bizarre family reunion and an ironic treatment of Old Testament myth, psychological disengagement, and familial archetypes.

The nineteenth century Irish wit and playwright Oscar Wilde once said in a letter that "it is only shallow people who do not judge by appearances." Pinter would agree. According to the British critic John Russell Taylor in Anger and After (1966), Pinter, when asked about the meaning of his plays, replied that they were about "the weasel under the cocktail cabinet," a statement that exemplifies the difficulty of critically coming to terms with Pinter's perverse style. Is it nonsense or enigma? In a 1971 interview with The New York Times Magazine, Pinter said that his remark was meaningless, meant only "to frustrate this line of inquiry." Ganz, however, suggests that the statement is a metaphor central to an understanding of themes in Pinter's plays, that of "the violence and bestiality that lies beneath the surface of our society and our selves."

Frequently labeled an absurdist, Pinter distances himself from any school of theater. He has, however, acknowledged the influence of Irish novelist and playwright Samuel Beckett. The lyrical dialogue, the meaningful silences, the intentional obscurity, the mordant humor, and the cryptic plots are all Beckettian techniques that Pinter has assimilated into his own style. Yet there are marked differences between Pinter's plays and those of Beckett. For one thing, where Beckett generally abandons any pretense to realism in his plays, Pinter strives to maintain a tentative surface realism that, like a thin veneer of logic, covers the menacing uncertainty beneath the action of the play. Another difference between Pinter and Beckett has to do with each playwright's attitude toward his characters. Beckett's players tend to be held in a sort of dramatic limbo, whereas Pinter's people are thrust into decisive encounters that radically change their lives. Additionally, whereas Beckett treats his characters mainly as vehicles for his ideas, Pinter shows them less contempt than compassion: The suffering in Pinter's plays is acutely human, and he is quick to shun subtle abstract truths in favor of more personal revelations of human nature.

For example, in Beckett's famous En attendant Godot (pb. 1952, pr. 1953; Waiting for Godot, 1954), two tramps inhabit a minimalist landscape obviously intended to be more representational than realistic. Their dialogue is laced with overt poetical and mythological allusions, and the entire structure of the play implies a larger metaphor of humanity's general despair, spiritual alienation, and debilitating nihilism. In contrast, Pinter handles similar themes in The Caretaker but without the heavy-handed symbolism and thematic posturing. The setting never pretends to be anything but what it is—a cluttered room—and there is no question as to what motivates the characters in their struggle for allegiance.

Though Pinter's is a private world, his style paradoxically has roots as much in the "kitchen sink" school of social realism as it does in the absurdist theater. Kitchen sink—a trend in British theater during the 1950's—was popularized by the so-called angry young men, playwrights such as John Osborne, John Arden, and Trevor Griffiths, whose plays focused on the problems of the working class. Pinter, however, while maintaining the often sordid realism, discards the moralistic concerns of kitchen sink drama. His plays tend to ignore the causes of social strife, presenting instead more spiritual conflicts involving the uncertainty of experience and the existential dilemma of identity, what Martin Esslin in Pinter: The Playwright (1984) calls "coming to terms with one's own being."

The theme that life is inscrutable, more a creation of the mind than an actual set of discernible facts, recurs throughout Pinter's work and underscores his disdain for both the use of language to make sense of the human predicament and of logic to explain absurd political dialogue. The Nobel Academy described his work as restoring theater "to its basic elements: an enclosed space and unpredictable dialogue, where people are at the mercy of each other and pretense crumbles." As one character explains in Old Times (pr., pb. 1971), "There are some things one remembers even though they never happened. There are things I remember which may never have happened but as I recall them they take place." In Pinter's world, experience is reality, the past cannot be verified, and no one possesses "the truth." Memory, in this context, can arm or disarm, depending on the speaker's intent.

THE DUMB WAITER

First produced: 1959, in German; 1960 in English (first published, 1960)

Type of work: Play

In a basement room, two thugs awaiting their next assignment receive directions from a serving hatch—a "dumbwaiter."

The Dumb Waiter, Pinter's second play, was his first critical success. A short one-act piece, it opened in English performance at the Hampstead Theatre Club in 1960 as a double bill with Pinter's first play, The Room, and immediately established Pinter's reputation as an important new voice in contemporary theater. Though Pinter draws his theme and plot from Samuel Beckett's Waiting for Godot, the treatment is highly original and contains all the stylistic trademarks that Pinter developed in his later work.

The most distinctive Pinteresque touch in the play is how the primary action acquires a secondary, allegorical meaning while never compromising the realistic grounding of the story. Moreover, while none of his other plays invites such a clearly allegorical interpretation, this technique of creating situations that, no matter how concrete, suggest larger, more abstract meanings became a standard device in Pinter's writing.

The plot of The Dumb Waiter is so straightforward that it is deceptively simple. The story concerns the lives of two thugs—possibly killers—on the night of a new assignment. The uncertainty of their situation, however, is remarkable: They do not know who has hired them or who their victim will be. They are merely waiting for their orders. For diversion, Ben concentrates on his newspaper, while Gus, the more inquisitive of the two and ultimately the most vulnerable, nags him with questions about their assignment. The menacing tone becomes more pronounced as Ben begins reading newspaper accounts of violent deaths—an elderly man crushed under a truck, a child killing a cat.

Then suddenly the two begin receiving requests for food from upstairs via the serving hatch. The more ridiculous the requests—from a braised steak to Char Siu and scampi—the more desperate the men's reactions: The absurdity is unsettling, as much for the audience as for the characters.

As if to regain a sense of allegorical equilibrium, Gus and Ben begin sending up stale cakes, potato chips—finally everything in their packs—as if their gesture of offerings might appease the unseen force upstairs, with whom they are soon communicating through a speaking tube that they find attached to the dumbwaiter. At a decisive moment, Gus leaves the room and Ben receives his instructions. When Gus reenters, he is disarmed, stripped of his coat, vest, and tie, and is clearly the intended victim of the night's assignment.

Much of the power of the play is derived from its haunting abstract dimension of existential doubt within the otherwise concrete reality on the stage. The situation is presented in realistic detail, but the absurdity of the action is disconcerting: The situation is as unintelligible to the audience as it is to the two men in the play. The orders from the dumbwaiter are specific but improbable and essentially meaningless. Who is sending down the orders? Why? American writer and critic Susan Sontag, in her influential 1964 essay "Against Interpretation," insists that "to interpret is to impoverish." Moreover, while The Dumb Waiter does not necessarily attempt to confound meaning, the dramatic effect of the play challenges the impulse of the audience to interpret the action in order to create in the viewer a more general acceptance, an immediate experience, of what is there "in reality."

Much of the suspense involves the attempts of the men to explain logically a basically illogical action; in this way, the play becomes self-referential: The experience of the characters on stage mirrors the experience of the audience; that is, just as the two men must try to make sense of what appears to be incomprehensible, so too must the audience try to decipher the apparently meaningless events on stage. The controlling allegorical theme, therefore, implies that the ways of God—the dumbwaiter—are often inscrutable to humankind—as ultimately the ways of Pinter, the playwright-god, are often inscrutable to his audience.

THE BIRTHDAY PARTY

First produced: 1958 (first published, 1959)

Type of work: Play

A retired musician hiding out in a dilapidated boardinghouse is visited by two men apparently sent to kidnap and possibly murder him.

The Birthday Party, Pinter's first full-length play, opened in 1958 to terrible reviews at the Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith. One performance reportedly played to exactly six people. Most critics found the play confusing, obscure, and unconvincing. The general theatergoing public, conditioned by the popular media, were equally dismissive, and the play closed after only a week. It seems that neither the public nor the critics were aesthetically or culturally prepared for Pinter's style, accustomed as they were to the established genres of the day, which, aside from musicals, consisted of strict realism or drawing-room comedies—the one an act of forceful social engagement, the other a clever, farcical escapism.

The play did, however, attract the attention of Harold Hobson, theater critic of the London Sunday Times, who had championed Pinter's first play, The Room, when it was produced at Bristol University in 1957. Following the critical and commercial success of Pinter's next full-length play, The Caretaker, The Birthday Party finally proved itself worthy of Hobson's accolades (and prescience) with a successful 1960 revival in London. Later that same year, it was televised by the British Broadcasting Corporation, and in 1968 it opened on Broadway. Along with The Caretaker and The Homecoming, The Birthday Party is generally considered to be one of Pinter's most significant plays, perhaps one of the most important plays of the mid-twentieth century.

The play, in three acts, centers around Stanley Webber, a retired musician in his late thirties, who is living at a boardinghouse in a resort town on the coast of England. Apparently, he is hiding from some unspecified event in his past that has forced him into exile, isolated from the world outside the confines of his room. Living in the house with Stanley are the proprietors, Petey and Meg Boles, both in their sixties. Petey works at a beachside hotel, while Meg manages the house. Aside from an occasional visit from a young woman named Lulu, their lives are dull and ordinary, punctuated only by habit.

The uneventful, monotonous life at the house, however, seems to be exactly what Stanley needs to maintain his isolation. The order of his routine provides him with a measure of security against the contingent forces that he fears outside. In fact, Petey and Meg form a sort of family unit: Petey is the father, absent at work and play, Meg is the fussy, doting mother, and Lulu completes the illusions of middle-class normality as “the girl next door.”

If Stanley’s withdrawal from the world represents a retreat back into childhood, however, his dream of infantile security turns to nightmare when two men, McCann and Goldberg, arrive to “do a job.” It is the night of Stanley’s birthday, and Meg has planned a party—hence the title of the play. She believes the occasion is merely an innocent celebration, which reinforces her surrogate sense of motherhood; for Stanley, the birthday party becomes a grim ritual of psychological terror. This contrast between Meg and Stanley’s understanding of the party is eerily illustrated at the end of act 1, when Meg gives Stanley a drum for his birthday. Stanley hangs his present around his neck and plays it, at first rhythmically, then erratically, his face “savage and possessed.”

Act 2 begins with Stanley’s initial encounter with McCann and Goldberg. Stanley tries to persuade them that they have come for the wrong man. The situation becomes increasingly violent as the men begin accusing Stanley of a series of offenses. Charged with “crimes” ranging from betraying some unnamed organization to “driving that old lady off her cork,” the accusations at first seem trivial, but soon it is clear that what Stanley has committed are existential transgressions. In his refusal to act, in his withdrawing from the world, he is not, as he hoped, free: He is still a man with a past, which he must acknowledge. Just because he is no longer active, no longer vital, he is not excused from being acted on. Apathy is no refuge from responsibility.

As the interrogation continues, McCann and Goldberg use more progressively absurd logic to break down Stanley’s defenses, both the tactical strategies that he has devised to hide from his enemies and the psychological barriers that he has erected against his own sense of guilt, until finally Stanley is unable to answer even the childish riddle of why the chicken crossed the road. By the time Meg and Lulu join McCann, Goldberg, and Stanley for the party, Stanley’s breakdown is nearly complete.

After a vicious game of blindman’s buff, Stanley tries first to rape Lulu, then to strangle Meg. His resistance having snapped, he finally accepts his role as a sacrificial victim trapped in a fate that he can no longer deny. By act 3, Stanley’s transformation is complete. He is an image of a broken man, compliant, no longer able to speak.

Even though his next play, The Caretaker, would be more immediately successful, The Birthday Party represents a turning point in Pinter’s career. He not only proved that he could sustain a full-length work but also demonstrated an uncanny control of suspense. A sense of horror is sustained throughout The Birthday Party by Pinter’s contrasting the vicious attacks on Stanley and his increasingly pathetic denials with the harmless pretensions of Meg and Lulu, whose complicity in the plot against Stanley only increases the irony of their ignorance. Finally, The Birthday Party marks a change in Pinter’s approach to his material, from his cerebral, often abstract early plays to plays that were less about ideas and more about people. It was this shift in focus, from the philosophical concerns of the playwright to the human concerns of the characters, that assured Pinter his later critical and commercial success.

THE CARETAKER

First produced: 1960 (first published, 1960)

Type of work: Play

One of two brothers sharing an East London house brings home an old tramp, who then tries to displace his benefactor.

Pinter's second full-length play, The Caretaker, opened in London in 1960, and, after a twelve-month run it moved to Broadway, where it was acclaimed as a critical, if not commercial, success. The Caretaker has been described as Pinter's most naturalistic play. The British theater critic Kenneth Tynan called it "a play about people," which, in Pinter's case, marks a significant turn in his approach to theater. His early work, such as The Room and The Dumb Waiter, was laden with symbolism and was heavily influenced by the absurdist theater of Samuel Beckett and Romanian-born French playwright Eugène Ionesco. In The Caretaker, however, Pinter eschews latent meanings and focuses instead on the lives of the three characters, presenting the action realistically, in naturalistic fashion. The setting—a cluttered room—has no overt symbolic significance: It is, as is often the case in Pinter's plays, a realistic vision of isolation and withdrawal, nor does Pinter force any allegorical message into the story. The characters are readily identifiable as localized people in ordinary circumstances.

Nevertheless, the play is anything but conventional. The characters seem unfinished, indeterminate, with no stable, verifiable stake in life. Davies, an inveterate liar, claims that he has "papers" in Sidcup that will establish his identity, but it is never made clear exactly who he is or where he has been or what the papers in Sidcup would prove. Aston, the benevolent brother who befriends Davies, recites a poetic soliloquy that describes his incarceration and treatment in a mental institution, but why he was committed is never established. He says only that, at some point in his life, he saw things too clearly and talked too much where he worked. Mick, his brother, who is more hostile to Davies, seems to improvise his past, whimsically concocting stories that confuse Davies while providing no real information regarding his identity. Their plans about the future are especially vague. Davies hopes to get his papers from Sidcup but makes no real effort to go there. Aston hopes to build a shed, but the idea sounds more like a pipe dream than any project he could actually complete. Mick mentions several projects involving renovation and a van, but he is never specific; when he offers details, no conclusions can be drawn from what he says.

Another characteristically unconventional tactic Pinter uses in The Caretaker, which gives it that quality of uncertainty that has become the trademark of his plays, is the way the meager plot belies the psychological complexities of the characters as they strive to discover and maintain their separate identities. Aston finds Davies one night after the homeless tramp has been fired from his job, and he offers to share his living quarters with him. Davies is a self-righteous bigot, a cantankerous reprobate, ungrateful, untrustworthy, and exceedingly selfish. Aston, who is laconic, withdrawn, and passive to a fault, overlooks the old man's negative traits and tries, inexplicably, to make him comfortable, offering him money, a bed, and a key to the house. As soon as Aston leaves the room, however, Davies is assaulted by Mick, who treats him like a burglar, an intruder, and asks him, "What's the game?" Mick has been trying to develop Aston's interest in some projects, hoping to help him adjust after his treatment at the mental institution. Mick sees Davies as a manipulator who is trying to take advantage of Aston's condition. He immediately engages Davies in a series of verbal encounters that serve to disorient the old man and protect Aston, all the while realizing that Aston must reject Davies voluntarily, thus assuring himself that he can deal independently with people and situations in his life. In the end, after talk of Davies becoming "caretaker" of the property, Aston sees through the tramp's machinations and tells him to leave.

The irony in the title of The Caretaker evolves from Davies's being offered a job as "caretaker" when, in fact, he is capable of neither caring for himself nor expressing care for others. It is his rejection of basic human kindness, his need to manipulate instead of trust, his choosing lies over honesty, that finally result in his being rejected by the brothers. Cynically, the play suggests that the innocents of the world are at risk and that to survive without being threatened, one must develop the defensive tactics that, it seems, Aston is still learning, but which Mick has already mastered.

THE HOMECOMING

First produced: 1965 (first published, 1965)

Type of work: Play

A son, who has been living in America, returns to England with his wife to visit his family, whom she has never met.

By the time that The Homecoming opened in London in 1965, Pinter's career as a major playwright had been firmly established. His name was synonymous with contemporary theater, and the public had grown accustomed to his style. In addition, by this time The Caretaker had been filmed, his screenplay of The Servant was in production, and his early plays were being revived at major theaters in England and abroad. The Homecoming would open in New York in 1967.

The play, in two acts, is deceptively realistic. Its themes of emotional blackmail and manipulation, of seduction and jealousy, are delivered in bizarre deadpan. The situation—an estranged son comes home to introduce his wife to his family—is cliché, and the painfully ordinary, middle-class set—with “a sideboard . . . a mirror . . . a radiogram”—appears to be nothing more than standard fare for a family drama. Yet Pinter's version of this “homecoming” is anything but traditional, and what appears realistic quickly shifts into parody.

The father, Max, is an embittered old man, fawning when he seeks advantage, striking out when cornered, soured by the world. His brother Sam is an ineffectual hanger-on and a latent homosexual. Son Lenny is a vicious pimp; son Joey, a hopeless, fledgling boxer. Indeed, their ineffectiveness fuels their aggression.

Into this acrimonious, all-male household (Max's wife died years before), Max's eldest son, Teddy, introduces his wife, Ruth. Teddy is bookish, objective, a “specialist” uneasy outside his field. Ruth is more intuitive, cagey, hungry to restore sexual vitality to her life. Yet like her husband, she too can be coolly detached, calculating—a game player.

Teddy, emotionally and intellectually isolated from the others, has lost touch with the basic needs of marriage—even with human relations—and finds himself literally “outside” the family. Ironically, however, Pinter suggests that emotional detachment is, at least, a strategy to maintain some sense of control in one's life, a sense of order that would otherwise be threatened by passion. Both Ruth and Teddy can remove themselves from their emotions, and this disaffection becomes a source of strength for them as the rest of the family's emotional fits underscore their weaknesses and reveal their vulnerabilities.

Eventually, after an abrasive reception, the men attempt to seduce Ruth, each man (except Sam) measuring her by his need. The men are motherless, wifeless, consumed by love-hate relationships with women. Lenny claims to have beaten the women who annoy him. Joey simply rapes them. Max is as quick to whine about his wife as he is to berate her. Their obsession is to restore harmony to the family, the male-female balance that is missing in their lives, so that they both fear and crave Ruth's attention. Like Ruth in the Old Testament legend, who by her strength and resolve restores order to a broken family, Pinter's Ruth in The Homecoming achieves her power and status by exploiting male desires.

By the end of the play, the pimps, boxers, and braggarts (Lenny, Joey, and Max) have been reduced to groveling at Ruth's feet. Lenny gets a dance and a kiss; Joey gets two hours of “love play.” Max suggests that they call her “Spanish Jacky” and “put her on the game.” The plan that they devise is preposterous: Ruth will stay in England and work as a prostitute, while ministering to the sexual needs of the family as well. The scheme is possible, but not probable, yet the irony is in how matter-of-factly the men propose the idea—as if it were not unusual in the least—and in how casually Ruth and Teddy accept it. The effect is both comic and disturbing, and in one of the most hauntingly funny scenes in all of Pinter's plays, Ruth agrees to the plan (strictly on her own terms), and Sam falls unconscious on stage, while the others ignore him and continue their negotiations.

The incongruity between the outrageous plan that the family concocts and Teddy and Ruth's equally outrageous reaction to it establishes The Homecoming as one of Pinter's most absurd plays; yet, on another level, the discrepancy between the audience's expectation and the jarring behavior of the characters provides Pinter with a perfect vehicle through which he comments on the irony inherent in human relationships. In The Homecoming, to be disconnected is an act of supreme virtue; to act without involvement or emotion a laudable goal. That Ruth can be so callous and Teddy so indifferent suggests that their marriage—and their relationship with their families—is nothing but a game of savage logic, where stability is purchased at the expense of humanity and where the intellect triumphs over feeling.

SUMMARY

Harold Pinter established himself as one of the most significant playwrights writing in English since the 1950's. Even as he devoted more and more of his time to writing for the screen rather than for the stage, revivals of his early plays continued to draw audiences to mainstream productions both in London's West End and on New York's Broadway, as well as to smaller regional and university theaters. Many critics consider his full-length plays, especially The Birthday Party, The Caretaker, and The Homecoming, to be among the best plays written after World War II. His plays, a quirky combination of absurdism and social realism, or what one critic has called "expressionistic naturalism," revitalized popular theater in the 1960's and 1970's, and his Pinteresque style remains indelibly original.

Jeff Johnson

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

DRAMA:

- The Room*, pr. 1957, pb. 1960 (one act)
The Birthday Party, pr. 1958, pb. 1959
The Hothouse, wr. 1958, pr., pb. 1980
The Dumb Waiter, pr. 1959 (in German), pr., pb. 1960 (in English; one act)
The Caretaker, pr., pb. 1960
"A Slight Ache," and Other Plays, pb. 1961
The Collection, pr. 1961, pb. 1963
The Lover, pr., pb. 1963 (one act)
The Homecoming, pr., pb. 1965
Tea Party, pb. 1965, pr. 1965 (televised), pr. 1968 (staged)
The Basement, pb. 1967, pr. 1967 (televised), pr. 1968 (staged)
Landscape, pb. 1968, pr. 1968 (radio play), pr. 1969 (staged; one act)
Silence, pr., pb. 1969 (one act)
Old Times, pr., pb. 1971
No Man's Land, pr., pb. 1975
Plays, pb. 1975-1981, revised pb. 1991-1998 (4 volumes)
Betrayal, pr., pb. 1978
Family Voices, pr., pb. 1981
Other Places: Three Plays, pr., pb. 1982 (includes Family Voices, Victoria Station, and A Kind of Alaska; revised in 1984, includes One for the Road and deletes Family Voices)
Mountain Language, pr., pb. 1988
Party Time, pr., pb. 1991
The New World Order, pr. 1991

Moonlight, pr., pb. 1993
Ashes to Ashes, pb. 1996
The Dwarfs and Nine Revue Sketches, pb. 1999
Celebration, pr., pb. 2000
Remembrance of Things Past, pr., pb. 2000 (with Di Trevis; adaptation of Marcel Proust's novel)
Press Conference, pr., pb. 2002 (sketch)

SCREENPLAYS:

The Servant, 1963
The Pumpkin Eater, 1964
The Guest, 1964
The Quiller Memorandum, 1966 (adaptation of Adam Hall's novel)
Accident, 1967
The Birthday Party, 1968 (adaptation of his play)
The Homecoming, 1971 (adaptation of his play)
The Go-Between, 1971
The Last Tycoon, 1976 (adaptation of F. Scott Fitzgerald's novel)
Proust: A Screenplay, 1977
The French Lieutenant's Woman, 1981 (adaptation of John Fowles's novel)
Betrayal, 1983 (adaptation of his play)
Turtle Diary, 1985
Reunion, 1989
The Heat of the Day, 1990 (adaptation of Elizabeth Bowen's novel)
The Handmaid's Tale, 1990 (adaptation of Margaret Atwood's novel)
The Comfort of Strangers, 1991
Party Time, 1991 (adaptation of his play)
The Remains of the Day, 1991 (adaptation of Kazuo Ishiguro's novel)
The Trial, 1992 (adaptation of Franz Kafka's novel)
Collected Screenplays, 2000 (3 volumes)

LONG FICTION:

The Dwarfs, 1990

POETRY:

Poems, 1968 (Alan Clodd, editor)
I Know the Place, 1979
Ten Early Poems, 1992
War, 2003

NONFICTION:

Pinter at Sixty, 1993
Conversations with Pinter, 1996
Death, etc., 2005

EDITED TEXT:

One Hundred Poems by One Hundred Poets, 1991 (with Geoffrey Godbert and Anthony Astbury)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Poems and Prose, 1949-1977, 1978, 1986 (revised as Collected Poems and Prose, 1991)
Various Voices: Prose, Poetry, Politics, 1948-1998, 1998

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Define what critics mean by “Pinteresque.”
- How does Harold Pinter use ellipses—the implied pauses in the characters’ lines—to create dramatic tension in his work?
- Discuss how Pinter’s work can be read as both “realistic” and “absurdist.”
- Define “kitchen sink” elements in Pinter’s work.
- Pinter often explores family relationships being threatened by intrusions from outsiders. Find examples of this dramatic technique in his work and discuss how these threats to the family unit are resolved.
- Discuss how Pinter’s plays are both humorous and frightening.

About the Author

- Baker, William, and John C. Ross. Harold Pinter: A Bibliographical History. New Castle, Del.: Oak Knoll Press, 2005.
- Billington, Michael. Harold Pinter. London: Faber & Faber, 2007.
- Burkman, Katherine H. The Dramatic World of Harold Pinter: Its Basis in Ritual. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1971.
- Esslin, Martin. Pinter: The Playwright. 4th ed. New York: Methuen, 1984.
- Gale, Stephen H., ed. Harold Pinter: Critical Approaches. Cranbury, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1986.
- Ganz, Arthur, ed. Pinter: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1972.
- Grimes, Charles. Harold Pinter's Politics: A Silence Beyond Echo. Cranbury, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press/Associated University Presses, 2005.
- Kerr, Walter. Harold Pinter. New York: Columbia University Press, 1967.
- Klein, Joanne. Making Pictures: The Pinter Screenplays. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1985.
- Lahr, John. "Harold Pinter and The Homecoming." The New Yorker 83, no. 41 (December 24 and 31, 2007): 54-69.
- Merritt, Susan H. Pinter in Play: Critical Strategies and the Plays of Harold Pinter. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1990.

© The Nobel Foundation

LUIGI PIRANDELLO

Born: Girgenti (now Argigento), Sicily, Italy
June 28, 1867

Died: Rome, Italy
December 10, 1936

Pirandello transformed both the form and the content of drama, and his characters continue to fascinate and haunt audiences.

BIOGRAPHY

Luigi Pirandello (pihr-uhn-DEH-loh) was born in Girgenti, Italy, on June 28, 1867, to Stefano and Caterina Pirandello. He and his older sister, Lina, grew up in a comfortable home, for their father was the wealthy owner of a sulfur mine. His father expected him to run the business eventually, but the sensitive and introspective son had different dreams. The child enjoyed listening to family stories about heroic struggles for political independence, as well as their servant's ghost stories, which helped Luigi to develop his imagination and interest in literature.

During his privileged youth, Pirandello became an avid reader. He began to question traditional customs and beliefs, and he learned to be self-assertive. He observed the masks of submission that his mother adopted in response to his father's adulterous affairs and his violent encounters with the Mafia. Also, he noted the preferential treatment that he received from teachers and clerics because he was the son of a prominent figure. He reacted to such hypocrisy by renouncing the Catholic church.

Pirandello received a fine education. He attended the elementary school in Girgenti, and, in 1880, the high school in Palermo. There, he wrote skits for classroom performances, and, at age sixteen, he began to write poetry. He studied classical languages and literature at the University of Palermo until he became engaged to an older cousin whom his father did not want him to marry. Therefore, Pirandello was sent to study at the University of Rome, where he took courses from 1887 to 1889. He then left for Bonn, Germany, to prepare for his doctorate.

While mastering German, translating Romantic verse, preparing two of his four collections of poetry for publication, and studying philology at Bonn University, Pirandello wrote his dissertation on the sounds and phonetic development of the Girgenti dialect. After earning the degree of doctor of philosophy in 1891, he taught Italian at the university for one year and studied philosophy.

Upon his return to Italy, Pirandello broke his engagement and joined a writer's colony near Rome. In January, 1894, he married Antonietta Portulano, the daughter of his father's business associate. With a generous allowance, the couple established their home in Rome. They had two sons and a daughter and enjoyed life, until their families lost their fortune in 1903: A landslide and flood destroyed the sulfur mine.

This crisis provoked his wife's nervous breakdown, and she never recovered her sanity. She suffered from paranoia and constantly accused her husband of infidelity. In discussing her tantrums with his biographer, Frederico Nardelli, Pirandello explained that his wife used her illness to control him. In addition to running the household, rearing their children, and teaching linguistics at the Istituto Superiore di Magistero (a teacher's college for women), he wrote much during her illness. In that "imprisonment," he discovered creative freedom and produced some of his most original works: four of his seven novels, short stories, essays on literary criticism and theory, and the first twelve of his forty-four plays. One of these novels, Il fu Mattia Pascal (1904; The Late Mattia Pascal, 1923), featured elements of his difficult life during this period, upon which Pirandello fantastically elaborated; the book was an immediate success and established his critical reputation.

Political events increased the couple's stress as well, for both sons were drafted and fought in World War I. After his daughter shot herself, Pirandello sent her to live with an aunt in Florence. In addition, after his wife tried to kill him, in 1918 he committed her to a sanatorium, where she soon died.

Because of the successful performances of his plays after the war, Pirandello's royalties increased. Hence, he quit his teaching job and devoted himself to his creative interests. Except for one novel, Uno, nessuno, centomila (1925; One, None, and a Hundred Thousand, 1933), which shows the dissolution of the personality, and some short stories, he focused his attention on the theater. His support of the Fascist regime assured him success, and he enjoyed dictator Benito Mussolini's enthusiastic reception of his plays. With a government grant, the playwright founded a theater company, the Teatro d'Arte di Roma. From 1925 to 1928, he produced both his own and foreign plays.

Pirandello's contact with professional actors marked a new stage in his career. Between 1922 and 1933, he wrote seven plays for his leading lady, Marta Abbea; he starred with her in three of them. In 1925 and 1926, he traveled with his troupe to introduce his plays to the major cities of Europe and South America. Lauded as the new voice in the theater, Pirandello became a member of the Italian Academy and was awarded France's Legion of Honor in 1929. In 1934, he won the Nobel Prize in Literature. Also, he received a contract to interpret the role of the father in the American film version of Sei personaggi in cerca d'autore (pr., pb. 1921; Six Characters in Search of an Author, 1922). He died of pneumonia in Rome, on December 10, 1936, before it was produced.

ANALYSIS

Pirandello had a penetrating, critical mind. While reflecting upon his life and works, he suggested to his biographer that the time and place of his birth—the Càvusu (Sicilian for “chaos”) district of Girgenti, during a cholera epidemic, which did not spare his father—informed the themes and style of his work. Besides indicating an intimate relationship between his life and the vision of the world communicated in his writing, Pirandello articulated his love for the disparate that marks the unity of his works, from his first collection of poetry Mal giocondo (1889; painful mirth) to his seminal analysis of the nature of the comic in L'umorismo (1908; revised, 1920; On Humour, partial translation, 1966, complete translation, 1974) and his avant-garde plays. In his dramas, Pirandello juxtaposes contradictions, fuses past and present, and interweaves tragedy and comedy. Analysis of the factors that helped him to develop a new dramatic mode permits comprehension of the subtleties of irony, as well as appreciation for his spiritually isolated characters, intellectually demanding situations, and dynamic theatricalism. The Sicilian sun, which awakens his characters' passions, shines most brilliantly in his poetry, early fiction, and folk comedies. Southern attitudes are present even in his later plays, however, where overtly lighthearted characters clash with the desperate.

In the 1890's, Pirandello joined a literary circle that included the Sicilian writers Luigi Capuana and Giovanni Verga. With their encouragement, he wrote naturalistic fiction about life among the lower classes in Sicily and transformed some of those narratives into plays. Written from an objective point of view, Pirandello's regional studies paint a Sicilian landscape in which his characters, with primitive passions and irrational fears, are overwhelmed by uncontrollable destiny.

From folk comedies, some written in his native dialect, such as La giara (pr. 1917, pb. 1925; The Jar, 1928), he broadened his scope and wrote about situations that were familiar to his audience. Foreign influences pervade these dramas. Some comedies have plots that resemble the French realistic drama. The “well-made plays” by Eugène Scribe, for example, focus on a specific incident. They have tightly constructed linear plots, leading to a major scene of reversal at the climax, and that “crucial episode” enforces the thesis. Genteel characters discuss social problems of the outside world in their parlor; and, because the parlor's “fourth wall” is removed, the audience overhears their skillfully delivered speeches. The realistic plays of Henrik Ibsen also inspired Pirandello, especially the Norwegian's use of the analytic technique (retrospective unraveling of the past) and his questioning of ethical standards in such plays as Gengangere (pb. 1881, pr. 1882; Ghosts, 1885).

Both the themes and the dramatic conventions in Pirandello's plays show the influence of his experiences in Germany. He absorbed elements of the northern, Protestant temperament, reflected in the scientific analyses of phenomenological and metaphysical questions, as well as in the brooding subjectivity of German Romantic literature. He acquired the ability to bracket concepts and to dissect ideas, and his training in philology helped him to capture the rhythms and flavor of colloquial speech. A master of prose with a love for dialectical argument, Pirandello has each character express himself or herself in a particular style. They use words that have unique meanings for them individually, while their interlocutors interpret what is heard according to their own perceptions, thus creating tension. While some characters attempt to safeguard their individuality, others accept new linguistic systems, proving that meanings of words can be altered by common consent. Hence, Pirandello demonstrates that language can reflect the dialectics of life and that lack of communication can lead to alienation.

Pirandello's pessimistic temperament and anguished memories of coping with a demented wife, who lived simultaneously on different planes of reality, helped him to develop attitudes about existence that he wished to dramatize. In his experimental plays, he brings to the foreground themes already introduced in his narrative fiction: masks and the multifaceted personality, the relativity of truth, humankind perplexed by the flux of time, and the problems of artistic creation. Within the intellectual framework of philosophy and psychology, he presents dramatic embodiments of the inner world of the self, but he enlivens the stage with theatrical tricks.

Pirandello was hailed as an innovator after the premiere of Così è (se vi pare) (pr. 1917, pb. 1918; Right You Are [If You Think So], 1922). The characters offer different versions of an incident, thus dramatizing the impossibility of knowing anything objectively. The character-spectator acts, reacts, and reflects about his or her conception of the truth; the playwright challenges the audience to analyze their own perceptions and to respect the views of other people.

Last, Pirandello's dramatic techniques show the influence of the popular entertainment commedia dell'arte, in which masked stock characters followed a plot outline of a "crucial episode." During the performance, each character improvised dialogue—with much buffoonery—corresponding to his or her persona and helped construct a play justifying the important scene.

Pirandello strove for similar vivacity in several plays, especially in Questa sera si recita a soggetto (pr., pb. 1930; Tonight We Improvise, 1932). A play-within-the-play, the action takes place in the aisles, as well as on the stage, where actors attempt to transform a story of a tragedy into a play. Disagreements about aesthetics frame the improvisation, which turns out to be a series of melodramatic tableaux. The theatricality makes the spectators distance themselves from the stage and realize that they are not looking through a fourth wall; rather, they are watching a play.

Pirandello's plays of contrasts and paradoxes reveal his brilliant sense of dramaturgy. Offering an exciting theatrical experience, they had universal appeal in the postwar climate of chaos and despair.

SIX CHARACTERS IN SEARCH OF AN AUTHOR

First produced: Sei personaggi in cerca d'autore, 1921 (first published, 1921; English translation, 1922)

Type of work: Play

A family in mourning interrupts a play rehearsal, and the father insists that their torment be dramatized.

Six Characters in Search of an Author is a parody of the "well-made play." All theatrical conventions and functions of personnel are examined in the play-within-the-play, which operates on different temporal planes.

A troupe plans to rehearse a play, and the introductory remarks underline the necessity of following Pirandello's directions. The Actors' clothing and mirthful comportment contrast with those of the disintegrated family who appear on stage to be immortalized in art. The rehearsal is postponed, and a theater workshop ensues. As the title suggests, the Characters offer a play-in-the-making, which, like the commedia dell'arte, justifies a “crucial scene.” Their attempt to generate a play, based on a sketch that a writer had made before abandoning the project, constitutes the inner play, while the comments of the Director and Actors, as audiences, form the outside comedy. Their improvisations, however, are judged unsatisfactory; they know neither how to create a play nor how to interpret roles. Without a literary text, the theater, too, must reject them. That is their tragedy.

Even though the Characters cannot agree about the facts, a linear plot emerges, and two events are staged. In the first melodramatic tableau, the Father visits Madame Pace’s boutique, a front for a brothel. While he is embracing his wife’s daughter, the Mother instinctively intervenes to safeguard the girl’s virtue. Unlike those of realistic plays, this pivotal scene does not lead to the resolution of a problem. Instead, its repetition shows that the Father refuses to be judged on one act and that the Stepdaughter seeks revenge. The scene is narrated, performed by the Father and Stepdaughter, interpreted by the Actors, and discussed by the troupe and the Characters. Reflected in distorted mirrors, the scene questions the veracity of subjective interpretations of reality.

During the first improvisation, Pace miraculously appears on cue, offering another example of the distinctions between spontaneous actions and incoherent events in life, on the one hand, and artificially structured episodes that freeze characters in an eternal present in art, on the other. She also juxtaposes past and present, and her speech raises the issue of the truth of language.

The widowed Mother agrees to return to her husband’s home, and their Son verbalizes his wish to eliminate the Mother’s illegitimate children:

Girl drowns, Boy commits suicide, Stepdaughter departs. Because the Director sees box-office potential in that story, he prepares the stage for the second tableau. Props are arranged, provoking discussion about the transfer of life to the stage. The truth is not always plausible, so the Director aims for verisimilitude. The Characters prefer photographic representation, which is impossible in the theater. The stage of illusion only pretends to dramatize life.

HENRY IV

First produced: Enrico IV, 1922 (first published, 1922; English translation, 1923)

Type of work: Play

Disguised as Emperor Henry IV, an Umbrian fell from his horse in a cavalcade, lost his sanity, and has continued the masquerade for twenty years.

In his three-act tragedy, Henry IV, Pirandello unveils pretenses and the subconscious to reveal that a person’s illusions constitute the only viable reality. Like the actor in classical theater, the mock emperor becomes his mask.

Pirandello uses the analytic technique to reconstruct the history of the emperor. In the expository scene, he alerts the audience to the relativity of words. The new man, prepared to work for the English king, learns that the name “Henry IV” can refer to two kings, as well as to the emperor. The actor must transform himself and adopt another linguistic system. Thus, what takes place at the subconscious level issues as concrete reality. Moreover, the spectator identifies with that employee; both are foreigners in a strange land, ignorant of history and of the dynamics of Henry’s magic theater.

In preparation for the carnival, the Umbrian became an expert on, and assimilated the life of, his persona. Henry IV rode in the cavalcade with his beloved (Mathilda of Tuscany) and in front of Belcredi, his rival in love. Henry fell from his horse and hit his head. When he regained consciousness, the mask was fused to his face; he has lived for the past twenty years in the medieval palace that his sister constructed in her villa. Later, Henry recovered his sanity; however, he feared growing old in a hypocritical society and chose to remain in isolation in the temporal zone of a twenty-six-year-old Henry IV. His mask affords him the will to survive. Since then, he has reenacted his humiliation at Canossa. Before her death, his sister intuited a recovery and asked her son to have Henry examined by a physician. DiNolli engaged one who devises a scheme that should provide shock therapy and cure Henry. Hence, they plan a visit to Henry's court.

In the first interview with Henry, they dress in eleventh century costumes to enter into his world. His beloved, Mathilda, is disguised as Adelaide, mother of Henry's wife whom he wishes to divorce. Belcredi is a monk, but Henry insists that he is his enemy, Peter Damian, who refuses to grant him a divorce. Henry acknowledges their disguises, and his tirades oscillate between eleventh century history and regret about the passage of time. Mathilda, understanding his veiled words, is moved by the pathetic scene; but the physician, accepting appearance for reality, diagnoses a pathological case. Ridicule turns on the psychiatrist, who cannot analyze Henry's speech to determine that his masquerade is an act.

In their second encounter, Frida and DiNolli, resembling the portraits of Mathilda and Henry, stand in the frames. That scheme fails, too. Nevertheless, their presence stirs Henry's memories, and he moves in and out of madness on different temporal planes (historical past, adolescence, his exile, the present), trying to answer the question, "Who/What am I?" Spontaneously, he remembers that Belcredi made him fall from his horse and, outraged, stabs his rival. With deliberate duplicity, Henry escapes to his world of pretense to avoid scandal. He renounces a relationship with Mathilda, however, in preferring Art to Life. Thus, Henry's mask represents Humankind's fate.

SUMMARY

Luigi Pirandello's renown rests upon his achievements as a playwright. With adroit stagecraft, he contrasts Art and Life. His magic mirrors reflect illusions of appearance and reality, while his analysis of the structures of personality reveals that people wear masks to survive in society. Humanity condemned to self-deception merits the audience's compassion.

His masterpieces, Six Characters in Search of an Author and Henry IV, incorporate the main ideas of his immense literary production. They have an international audience and have influenced the authors of the Theater of the Absurd, who consider him the creator of contemporary drama.

Irene E. Gnarra

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

DRAMA:

- La morsa*, pb. 1898 (as L'epilogo), pr. 1910 (The Vise, 1928)
Scamandro, pb. 1909, pr. 1928
Lumie di Sicilia, pr. 1910, pb. 1911 (Sicilian Limes, 1921)
Il dovere del medico, pb. 1912, pr. 1913 (The Doctor's Duty, 1928)
Se non così . . ., pr. 1915, pb. 1916
Pensaci, Giacomino!, pr. 1916, pb. 1917
Liola, pr. 1916, pb. 1917 (English translation, 1952)
All'uscita, pr. 1916, pb. 1922 (At the Gate, 1928)
Così è (se vi pare), pr. 1917, pb. 1918 (Right You Are [If You Think So], 1922)
Il piacere dell'onestà, pr. 1917, pb. 1918 (The Pleasure of Honesty, 1923)
Il berretto a sonagli, pr. 1917, pb. 1920 (Cap and Bells, 1957)
La giara, pr. 1917, pb. 1925 (The Jar, 1928)
Il giuoco delle parti, pr. 1918, pb. 1919 (The Rules of the Game, 1959)
Ma non è una cosa seria, pr. 1918, pb. 1919

Luigi Pirandello

La patente, pb. 1918, pr. 1919 (The License, 1964)
L'uomo, la bestia, e la virtù, pr., pb. 1919 (Man, Beast, and Virtue, 1989)

L'innesto, pr. 1919, pb. 1921

Tutto per bene, pr., pb. 1920 (All for the Best, 1960)

Come prima, meglio di prima, pr. 1920, pb. 1921

La Signora Morli, una e due, pr. 1920, pb. 1922

Sei personaggi in cerca d'autore, pr., pb. 1921 (Six Characters in Search of an Author, 1922)

Enrico IV, pr., pb. 1922 (Henry IV, 1923)

Vestire gli ignudi, pr. 1922, pb. 1923 (Naked, 1924)

L'imbecille, pr. 1922, pb. 1926 (The Imbecile, 1928)

La vita che ti diedi, pr. 1923, pb. 1924 (The Life I Gave You, 1959)

L'altro figlio, pr. 1923, pb. 1925 (The House with the Column, 1928)

L'uomo dal fiore in bocca, pr. 1923, pb. 1926 (The Man with the Flower in His Mouth, 1928)

Ciascuno a suo modo, pr., pb. 1924 (Each in His Own Way, 1923)

Sagra del Signore della nave, pb. 1924, pr. 1925 (Our Lord of the Ship, 1928)

Diana e la Tuda, pr. 1926 (in Switzerland), pr., pb. 1927 (Diana and Tudo, 1950)

L'amica della mogli, pr., pb. 1927 (The Wives' Friend, 1949)

Bellavita, pr. 1927, pb. 1928 (English translation, 1964)

La nuova colonia, pr., pb. 1928 (The New Colony, 1958)

The One-Act Plays of Luigi Pirandello, pb. 1928

O di uno o di nessuno, pr., pb. 1929

Lazzaro, pr., pb. 1929 (Lazarus, 1952)

Sogno (ma forse no), pb. 1929, pr. 1936 (I'm Dreaming, but Am I?, 1964)

Questa sera si recita a soggetto, pr., pb. 1930 (Tonight We Improvise, 1932)

Come tu mi vuoi, pr., pb. 1930 (As You Desire Me, 1931)

I giganti della montagna, act 1 pb. 1931, act 2 pb. 1934, act 3 pr. 1937 (The Mountain Giants, 1958)

Trovarsi, pr., pb. 1932 (To Find Oneself, 1943)

Quando si è qualcuno, pr. 1933 (When Someone Is Somebody, 1958)

La favola del figlio cambiato, pr., pb. 1934

Non si sa come, pr. 1934, pb. 1935 (No One Knows How, 1960)

Naked Masks: Five Plays, pb. 1952

LONG FICTION:

L'esclusa, 1901 (The Outcast, 1925)

Il turno, 1902 (The Merry-Go-Round of Love, 1964)

Il fu Mattia Pascal, 1904 (The Late Mattia Pascal, 1923)

Suo marito, 1911, revised 1941 (Her Husband, 2000)

I vecchi e i giovani, 1913 (The Old and the Young, 1928)

Si gira . . ., 1916 (Shoot! The Notebooks of Serafino Gubbio, Cinematograph Operator, 1926)

Uno, nessuno, centomila, 1925 (One, None, and a Hundred Thousand, 1933)

Tutti i romanzi, 1941 (collected novels)

SHORT FICTION:

Amori senza amore, 1894

Quando'ero matto . . ., 1902

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- In Six Characters in Search of an Author, Luigi Pirandello parodies the “well-made play.” Determine the essentials of this type of play.
- What were Pirandello’s motives for parodying the well-made play?
- What does it mean for characters to lack and want “an author”?
- Is Pirandello correct that humans prefer art to life?
- Cite instances of Pirandello’s influence on playwrights devoted to “the absurd.”

Beffe della morte e della vita, 1902-1903 (2 volumes)
Bianche e nere, 1904
Erma bifronte, 1906
La vita nuda, 1910
Terzetti, 1912
Le due maschere, 1914
La trappola, 1915
Erba del nostro orto, 1915
E domani, lunedì, 1917
Un cavallo nella luna, 1918
Il carnevale dei morti, 1919
Berecche e la guerra, 1919
A Horse in the Moon, and Twelve Short Stories, 1932
Better Think Twice About It! and Twelve Other Stories, 1933
The Naked Truth, and Eleven Other Stories, 1934
Four Tales, 1939
The Medals, and Other Stories, 1939
Short Stories, 1959
The Merry-Go-Round of Love and Selected Stories, 1964
Selected Stories, 1964
Short Stories, 1964

POETRY:

Mal giocondo, 1889
Pasqua di Gea, 1891
Pier Gudrò, 1894
Elegie renane, 1895
Scamandro, 1909 (dramatic poem)
Fuori de chiave, 1912

NONFICTION:

Arte e scienze, 1908
L'umorismo, 1908 (revised 1920; On Humour, 1974)
Saggi, 1939

TRANSLATION:

Elegie romane, 1896 (of Johann von Goethe's Römische Elegien)

MISCELLANEOUS:

Opere, 1966

About the Author

Bentley, Eric. The Pirandello Commentaries. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 1986.
Bloom, Harold, ed. Luigi Pirandello. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 2003.
Büdel, Oscar. Pirandello. London: Bowes and Bowes, 1966.
Guidice, Gaspar. Pirandello: A Biography. Translated by Alastair Hamilton. New York: Oxford University Press, 1975.
McClintock, Lander. The Age of Pirandello. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1951.
O'Rawe, Catherine. Authorial Echoes: Textuality and Self-Plagiarism in the Narrative of Luigi Pirandello. London: Legenda, 2005.
Stella, M. John. Self and Self-Compromise in the Narratives of Pirandello and Moravia. New York: Peter Lang, 2000.
Vittorini, Domenico. The Drama of Luigi Pirandello. 2d ed. New York: Russell, 1969.

Library of Congress

PLATO

Born: Athens, Greece
c. 427 B.C.E.

Died: Athens, Greece
347 B.C.E.

Regarded as one of the greatest philosophers in the history of the world, Plato has had enormous influence through the centuries, especially on the development of Western thought.

BIOGRAPHY

Plato (PLAY-toh) was born in Athens, Greece, around 427 B.C.E. The eighty-year span of his life covered one of the most dramatic and tumultuous periods in Greek history. During his boyhood and youth, for example, his homeland witnessed the last stages of the Peloponnesian War, a struggle for dominance between the city-state of Athens and her arch-rival, Sparta. Plato's father, Ariston, and his mother, Perictione, both came from distinguished families, and as a member of the aristocracy Plato was reared in the most favorable surroundings and enjoyed the best education available. Given this background and the many natural talents that he displayed as a youth, it seemed inevitable that he would one day enter public life and distinguish himself in politics.

In fact, his life was to take an entirely different course. The more closely Plato observed the world of politics, the less inclined he was to become involved in it. One event in particular was to have a lasting effect on him, and that was the trial, condemnation, and execution of Socrates in 399 B.C.E. Socrates had been Plato's teacher, and Plato had profound respect for him. That his supposedly enlightened city could have killed so noble a man as Socrates was, for Plato, shocking and disillusioning. It was this event that turned him to philosophy, following in his great teacher's footsteps.

Plato left Athens after the death of Socrates and apparently stayed away from the city for about ten years. He resided for a time in the city of Megara, and he may also have traveled to Egypt and Cyrene. It was during this period that he began to write. The dialogue form, in which he recorded his ideas, is like a transcription of a conversation between two or more people, a conversation in which provocative questions are asked and then pursued with great energy and thoroughness. Plato presents his ideas in very attractive attire, and this is a principal reason for the continuing appeal of his philosophy.

Altogether, Plato wrote some twenty-six dialogues of varying lengths. The exact dates of the composition of these dialogues are uncertain. It is customary to group them into three general periods, early, middle, and late. The dialogues that Plato wrote during the decade or so immediately following Socrates' death, then, would belong to the early period. It was during this period, from 399-390 B.C.E., that he wrote the Apologia Sōkratous (Apology, 1675), the Charmidēs (Charmides, 1804), and the Euthyphrōn (Euthyphro, 1804). Among other dialogues belonging to this early period are the Prōtagoras (Protagoras, 1804) and the Gorgias (English translation, 1804).

Around 387 B.C.E., Plato journeyed to southern Italy and Sicily to study with a group of philosophers called Pythagoreans. During this trip, he met Dionysius I, the king of Syracuse. The following year, Plato returned to Athens and founded a school, the Academy. The purpose of this school was to train men to be both politicians and philosophers who would conduct public affairs with perfect justice. For the next twenty years, Plato pursued this ambitious ideal with the utmost seriousness, and in due course the Academy was to become famous and influential. He also continued his writing during this middle period, from 388-368 B.C.E., producing such works as the Symposion (Symposium, 1701), the Politeia (Republic, 1701), and the Parmenidēs, (Parmenides, 1793), and, from 365-361 B.C.E., Sophistēs (Sophist, 1804) and Politikos (Statesman, 1804).

In 367 B.C.E., Dionysius II, the successor to Dionysius I as king of Syracuse, invited Plato to come to his court and educate him so that he might be able to rule as a philosopher-king. Plato made the trip to Syracuse, but after four months there he abandoned the project. Six years later, he was persuaded by Dionysius to try once again, but a second visit to Syracuse, this one lasting a year, was no more fruitful than the first. In July, 360 B.C.E., Plato arrived back in Greece, where he remained for the rest of his life.

Plato continued to teach and write almost to the day of his death. During his third period, from 360-347 B.C.E., he wrote works such as the Timaeos (Timeaus, 1793), Critias (English translation, 1793), and the Nomoi (Laws, 1804). When he died, in 347 B.C.E. in Athens, he was justifiably esteemed as one of the most learned men in the Greek world.

ANALYSIS

A key feature of Plato's style is the fact that he not only wrote about matters of intrinsic and enduring importance but also wrote about them well. Not many philosophers are known for their impressive literary style, but Plato is a sparkling exception in this regard. Because he was a poet as well as a philosopher, he succeeded in transforming the philosophical work into an art form. He communicated his ideas through the medium of what might be called a drama of ideas. In these dramas, or dialogues, there is to be found an array of fascinating characters who command attention not only for the ideas that they articulate but also because they are interesting people in and of themselves.

In reading Plato's works, one quickly becomes convinced that philosophy is a vibrant and significant subject. A Platonic dialogue presents philosophy in action. Plato does not simply provide conclusions; he also shows the ways in which he arrived at them. Sometimes those ways lead over hill and dale. Sometimes they follow a line of thought up a certain road, only to reach a dead end. On occasion it will happen that a dialogue will be concluded without all the problems treated in it having been neatly resolved. There are loose ends—questions that have not been answered, or answered only in a tentative, incomplete manner. Yet rather than detracting from the worth of the dialogue, this method is a reminder that the ultimate concern of philosophy is the truth, and that a philosopher must not be satisfied with easy solutions if they are not true solutions.

Plato's lively manner of communicating his ideas suggests something else about him that is quite important: For him, philosophy was not simply an intellectual exercise, but a way of life. As Plato saw things, the philosopher's goal is not merely to be a good thinker, one who reasons well; he must also be a good man, one who lives well. There is, then, a distinctly moral dimension to the whole of Plato's philosophy.

Of the many characters that are to be found in the Platonic dialogues, there is none that enjoys a more prominent place or plays a more critical role than Socrates. Exactly how is the Socrates of the dialogues to be understood? Because Socrates was an actual historical figure and was, furthermore, Plato's own teacher, the question naturally arises: Is the Socrates of the Platonic dialogues the historical Socrates? The most appropriate answer to that question would seem to be "yes and no." In the early dialogues of Plato, a reliable picture of the historical Socrates, both the man and his ideas, is being presented. The philosophy learned from these dialogues is, in the main, the philosophy of Socrates. The Socrates confronted in the later dialogues, however, is more fictional than historical, in the sense that he acts mainly as a mouthpiece for Plato's own ideas. Plato's philosophy was built upon a Socratic foundation, but over the years he refined and developed ideas that he had originally learned from Socrates. In some instances, he moved into areas of investigation that had not formed major parts of Socrates' philosophic concerns.

One of the major elements in Plato's philosophy is what is called the doctrine of the Forms, or Ideas. This doctrine expresses Plato's notions concerning the fundamental nature of reality. According to him, the essence of reality is nonmaterial, spiritual.

He believed that material things enjoyed a kind of second-class existence. In the case of a physical object such as a chair, for example, Plato taught that it exists only to the extent that it somehow shares or participates in the Form of a chair, which exists from all eternity in a realm that transcends the earthly, material realm.

In the doctrine of the Forms, one finds a definite personalistic dimension, as well as Plato's ever-present concern for morality. Plato believed that the transcendental realm of the Forms is the place where the human race found itself before it became earthbound. There, human beings were in direct contact with the Good and, as a result, were supremely happy. Then something happened. Human beings somehow managed, through their own fault, to alienate themselves from the Good, and they were therefore deprived of their heavenly home. By way of further punishment, they were encased in matter, their bodies, and placed upon this earth to endure a period of exile.

For Plato, a human being, the real person, was essentially a soul. The present earthly state of human beings, then, is in the deepest sense unnatural. Because their proper home is the realm of pure spirit, human beings are hindered by their bodies from attaining true humanness. It is as if the body were a prison, severely inhibiting the freedom of the soul. Because of its immersion in matter, the sensitivities of the soul have been dulled. In their previous existence in the realm of the Forms, human beings were filled with perfect knowledge. When they were transferred to the earthly realm, however, they forgot all that they once knew. What in their present state is called learning is simply a matter of human beings' recollecting what they knew in their former state.

Plato believed that the whole purpose of the earthly life of humans was to discover who they really are, and then, eventually, to get back to where they really belong. The importance of the philosopher in this matter is to act as a guide for his fellow human beings. The philosopher attributes worth to material things only to the extent that they point him toward the deeper realities that are immaterial and eternal. He lives a simple life, unencumbered by useless possessions. When his life draws to a close he displays no fear of death. To the contrary, he welcomes death, for it represents a release from bondage, allowing him to return to his true home.

APOLOGY

First published: Apologia Sōkratous, 399-390 B.C.E. (English translation, 1675)

Type of work: Philosophical dialogue

Socrates, having been put on trial by the city-state of Athens, courageously defends his way of life.

In the Apology, Plato has provided posterity with one of the most memorable portraits of his teacher Socrates. In Plato's view, Socrates was a paragon of virtue. Perhaps the essence of his virtue can be summarized in a single word—integrity. Socrates' dedication to the truth was so total and so unswerving that the very thought of compromising that truth was repugnant to him.

One of the things that makes the Apology so effective a piece of literature is the fact that it is, at bottom, the account of a trial. By their very nature, trials tend to be dramatic and interesting affairs, especially when, as was the case with Socrates, the stakes are high. Yet what gives this particular trial—surely one of the most famous in the history of the world—a special twist is that, although Socrates was on trial for his life, he did not fight for his life. He fought for something that he regarded as immeasurably more important—the truth.

In the spring of 399 B.C.E., when Plato would have been in his late twenties, Socrates was accused by Meletus, Anytus, and Lycon of two criminal offenses: corrupting the youth of Athens and adopting an atheistic attitude toward the gods of the city. The trial was held before a large assemblage of people, very likely numbering in the thousands, but the verdict was to be decided by a corps of five hundred judges. Although the Apology is in dialogue form, it tends at times to be more of a monologue, with Socrates himself doing most of the talking. There were no lawyers in ancient Athens, and those who were accused of capital crimes were expected to defend themselves. By the same token, their accusers were obliged to face them in public, and the accused had the right to examine these accusers before the court.

Socrates begins by giving a general explanation of his philosophical way of life. Why does he behave the way that he does, roaming about the city and constantly questioning the citizens? He realizes that his manner of life is irksome to many people because he exposes their ignorance to public view. The whole business started, Socrates explains, when a friend of his brought back from the sacred shrine at Delphi the divine oracle that declared Socrates to be the wisest of men. This message baffled Socrates completely. On the one hand, he firmly believed that the gods do not lie; on the other hand, he was equally convinced that he was in fact not wise. What, then, could the oracle possibly mean? In attempting to answer that question, he made a practice of approaching people who had the reputation of being wise—politicians, poets, artists—with the purpose of trying to discover the nature of their wisdom. What he actually discovered, however, was that these people, despite their reputations, were not wise at all. Although in fact ignorant, they labored under the illusion that they were knowledgeable. Socrates found the clue to the meaning of the Delphic oracle in this discovery. Socrates himself was ignorant, but unlike all the supposedly wise people whom he had met, he admitted his ignorance. A wise man, he decided, is one who is ignorant and does not pretend that he is otherwise. Put another way, a wise man is simply one who is honest with himself.

When Socrates examines one of his accusers, Meletus, he makes short work of him, revealing the complete absurdity of the charges that had been leveled against him. This scene makes it evident that the real reason that Socrates is on trial is to satisfy his enemies' desire for revenge. That does not mean, however, that his execution, or even a lesser penalty such as being sent into exile, is inevitable. Socrates is astutely aware of the fact that if he were to "cooperate"—to abandon his principles—he could gain his freedom.

Yet Socrates also knows that his enemies are able to inflict upon him the supreme penalty. The possibility of death, however, does not intimidate him. In fact, he emphasizes the point that the fear of death is foolish, for death is not at all the worst thing that can happen to a human being. For a person to betray what he knows to be true is worse than death. Socrates would not abandon his commitment to philosophy, the pursuit of wisdom, if he were to be set free. Furthermore, Socrates boldly informs his judges that if they were to execute him, they would be doing a great disservice to Athens. Painful though it might be at times, his pursuit of wisdom is, in the final analysis, a benefit to them. He is like a gadfly that is incessantly pestering the lethargic horse that is Athens, so as to prevent that horse from going astray. In other words, he is the conscience of the city.

The vote is taken, and Socrates is found guilty. At this point, the defendant has the right to propose to his judges what punishment he thinks is most fitting for him. After facetiously suggesting that he should be made a ward of the state, Socrates reviews the three alternatives to the death penalty: imprisonment, a heavy fine, and exile. He concludes that none is acceptable to him. If he were to agree to accept exile, for example, that would be almost the same as agreeing to death. In exile, he would not be able to live the inquiring life of a philosopher. The unexamined life, he tells his judges, the life of the nonphilosopher, is not worth living.

A second vote is taken. Socrates is condemned to death. He accepts the decision calmly, but not silently. He reiterates an attitude that he has maintained consistently throughout the trial; his concern is not to avoid death but rather to avoid unrighteousness, at all costs. Then, addressing himself directly to those who condemned him, he prophesies that they will live to regret their decision. For those who supported his cause, he has words of encouragement. He frankly admits that he does not know for certain what death involves, but that there are at least two possibilities to be considered. One is that after death, there is eternal, peaceful sleep. Socrates would gratefully welcome that. Another possibility is that life continues after death; in such a life, he could have exciting encounters with great men and women of the past, with whom he would talk philosophy. Socrates would most gratefully welcome that. Either way, Socrates concludes, death is good, and he cannot lose by accepting it.

The dialogue ends with Socrates having the last word: "The hour of departure has arrived, and we go our ways—I to die, and you to live. Which is better God only knows."

SYMPOSIUM

First published: Symposion, 388-368 B.C.E.
(English translation, 1701)

Type of work: Philosophical dialogue

Socrates demonstrates that love, in its deepest meaning, refers to that profound impulse by which human beings seek eternal beauty and goodness.

In ancient Greece, a symposium was an after-dinner drinking party that commonly included such amusements as music, dancing, and conversation. The symposium that this dialogue, the Symposium, describes was held in the house of Agathon, and its purpose was to celebrate the fact that the host had recently won a prize for a drama that he had written. Because much celebrating already occurred on the previous day, the guests at this gathering decide that they will go easy on the drinking and devote their energies chiefly to conversation. They agree that the topic of their conversation will be love, and that each guest will be required to address the subject. For the ancient Greeks, love was considered to be a god. There was no consensus, however, concerning the precise nature of love's divinity, as is shown by the diverse views found in the speeches recorded in the Symposium.

Socrates is among the guests at Agathon's house, and he is the last to give his speech. The first speeches are given by Phaedrus, Pausanias, Eryximachus, Aristophanes, and the host, Agathon. The speakers agree that love is somehow a divine being, but opinions differ as to his origin and his exact relationship to the other gods. The speakers agree that love plays an important role in the lives of human beings, but they do not agree on the quality of love's influence. Is it good or bad? Much is revealed in these speeches about prevailing attitudes toward human sexuality. When it comes to his turn, Agathon offers a scintillating display of his poetic ability, and his speech receives an enthusiastic response. Next comes Socrates, and it is apparent that he has a difficult act to follow.

He is, however, equal to the task. In addressing the subject of love, Socrates takes an approach that was typical of the way that he handled many other subjects. He begins by setting aside the conventional notions of love and then proceeds to talk about it in an entirely new light, bringing to it fresh and penetrating insights. All the previous speakers had spoken of love in terms imposed upon them by Greek mythology. Despite their attempts to spiritualize love and raise it to lofty heights, love nonetheless seems tediously hedonistic and earthbound.

In effect, Socrates treats everything that has thus far been said about love as so much empty chatter. His own point of departure is unique. He claims to know the truth about love, a truth that was once revealed to him by a wise woman named Diotima, of Mantinea. It was she who made him realize that love was essentially an impulse that causes human beings to rise above the deceiving appearances of this world and to seek beauty in its absolute and purest form. To spend all of one's energies in striving to attain beauty is of the utmost importance, for upon it depends nothing less than one's true fulfillment as a human being. That is so because absolute beauty is one and the same as absolute goodness, and it is precisely goodness that all human beings seek if they are genuinely in pursuit of happiness, for goodness, and goodness alone, is capable of making them happy.

Yet if absolute beauty, a beauty that transcends all earthly experiences, is the true goal of love, does humanity reach that beauty by attempting to ignore the world around it and leaping directly into the transcendent realm? Not at all. According to Socrates, individuals reach absolute beauty, or Beauty, through the specific manifestations of beauty in the material world—the beauty of a flower, for example, or of another human being. Particular beautiful things are explained only in terms of absolute beauty; they exist only because absolute beauty exists, somehow participating and sharing in that absolute beauty. When people respond with delight to the beauty of a flower, the delight indicates a deep longing on their part for absolute beauty, which alone is capable of satisfying them. Ideally, particular instances of beauty urge people on and encourage them in their pursuit of absolute beauty, which is the ultimate goal. Nothing could be more disastrous, however, than to become so enamored of specific instances of beauty that Beauty itself is never attained.

When Socrates finishes his speech, all the guests concede that he has made the most valuable contribution to their discussion on love. The Symposium ends with an episode in which a new character, Alcibiades, is introduced to the drama. Through him it is revealed that Socrates is possessed of many other virtues besides the ability to philosophize in a brilliant and profound manner. Socrates is revealed as a person who is impressively superior, not only intellectually but also morally.

REPUBLIC

First published: Politeia, 388-368 B.C.E.
(English translation, 1701)

Type of work: Philosophical dialogue

The essence of morality, for individuals as well as for societies, is, first, to focus attention upon absolute goodness, the Good, and then to pursue it relentlessly.

The Republic is among the longest of Plato's dialogues, and it is very probably his best-known and most popular work. There are only seven characters in the dialogue, despite its length, and three of these, Socrates, Glaucon, and Adimantus, carry the conversation. Like most of Plato's dialogues, this one is characterized by a dominant theme, which, in the case of the Republic, is justice, or, more broadly, morality. What is the essence of morality? To state the problem with greater precision, what is the nature of a truly good human being, one whose life points toward a genuine fulfillment of one's humanity? The rich and multifaceted discussion found in the ten books of the Republic is an attempt to answer that question.

Early in the discussion, it is decided to seek the nature of morality on the level of society as a whole rather than on the level of the individual. Because everything on the level of society is on a larger scale, it would therefore be more easily observed and studied. This approach reveals an interesting feature of Plato's thought, his conviction that whatever is discoverable about the nature of morality on the level of society will, with appropriate qualifications, be applicable on the level of the individual. He did not believe that there were two separate types of morality, one for individuals and one for societies as a whole. Plato taught that there is but a single morality, and that it applies with equal force to both individuals and societies.

After providing a brief sketch of how the organized state first came into existence, Socrates and his two fellow philosophers carefully develop a detailed picture of what they conceive to be the ideal state. Such a state would comprise three major divisions, or classes. It would be governed by a very special type of aristocracy, composed of people possessed of both profound philosophical knowledge and moral righteousness. An individual in this class would have gained his philosophical prowess through long years of difficult study; his moral superiority would result from having experientially arrived at a certain degree of understanding of absolute goodness. This absolute goodness, which is the same as the absolute beauty found in the Symposium, and to which Plato refers simply as the Good, is the supreme principle of all reality. It is the foundation and source of morality, not only for the philosopher-kings, the members of the Guardian class, but also for all members of the ideal state, if indirectly.

The second class, a considerably larger one, has the name Auxiliaries, and its principal function is to protect the state against external aggression and internal dissension. The Auxiliaries could be regarded as a combination of an army and a national police force. Although not as philosophically sophisticated as the Guardians, the Auxiliaries are closely allied to, and cooperate fully with, the leaders of the state. The Auxiliaries' main task is to implement the enlightened directives of the Guardians. Both the Guardians and the Auxiliaries lead a rigorous, highly disciplined life. They cannot own private property, for example, nor can they marry in the conventional sense and raise a family. They sleep in dormitories and have their meals in common. The purpose behind the strict regimentation is to allow the Guardians and Auxiliaries to devote all of their attention and energies to the good of the state.

Perhaps the best way to identify the third class in Plato's ideal state is to say that it comprises all those who are neither Guardians nor Auxiliaries. In other words, this class comprises the vast majority of the populace and would include professionals, artisans, wage laborers, and farmers. Unlike the upper two classes, the members of this class are free to marry and establish families, and they own property. Although the three classes are quite distinct, they are not isolated from one another, and there is fluid movement among the membership of each. As far as individuals are concerned, one's membership in a particular class is determined, not simply by one's birth, but rather by one's talents, and by how one takes to education. Therefore, someone born into the lowest class could end up as a Guardian, whereas, conversely, the child of a Guardian could be demoted to the lowest class for failure to display the characteristics expected of a future Guardian.

Education plays a strategically important role in the ideal state, for on it depends the citizenry's being rightly oriented to the Good. The chief task of education is to produce Guardians, philosopher-kings. In the same way that there can be no real difference, in a Guardian, between intellectual and moral excellence, so also in the education that is dedicated to producing Guardians, equal emphasis must be given to both intellectual and moral formation. Plato's theory of education, as found in the Republic, never separates these two. Children must not be exposed to art forms such as epic poetry and the drama, or to certain types of music.

These would have a corrupting effect upon them. Art is corrupting to the extent that it provides children with a distorted view of reality. In the ideal state being contemplated, girls are provided with the same education as boys, and the reason for this is the belief that the only difference between men and women is purely physical. Women are eligible for all the positions that are open to men, including Auxiliary and Guardian.

The society that Plato delineates in the Republic is ideal. Yet it would be incorrect to consider it a utopia, if doing so implies the understanding that Plato was committed to the possibility of establishing upon this earth a perfect social organization that would completely fulfill the human person. As is evident in the last book of the Republic, which includes a stirring "last judgment" scene, Plato believed that human beings could not completely fulfill themselves in this life. That is something that comes only after death, with the vision of the Good.

SUMMARY

Plato's artistically expressed philosophy can be called idealistic in the sense that it teaches that the bases of reality are eternal, immaterial Ideas or Forms. Material things exist only because they participate in the existence of the Ideas or Forms. Physical matter is inferior to spirit, and that is why the human person, who is essentially pure spirit, is hampered in this life by the physical body. The philosopher is one who is able to distinguish between the deceptive qualities of material existence and the real reality that is nonmaterial. Philosophy is a way of life, the two foundations of which are a sound intelligence and a sound morality. Its sole purpose is to attain the Good. For Plato, Socrates was the prime example of the model philosopher.

Dennis Q. McInerney

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

NONFICTION:

Although Plato's individual works cannot be dated with exactness, there is consensus among scholars as to a four-part division into early, middle, later, and last periods.

Early period works (399-390 B.C.E.):

Prōtagoras (Protagoras, 1804)

Ion (Ion, 1804)

Gorgias (English translation, 1804)
Lachēs (Laches, 1804)
Charmidēs (Charmides, 1804)
Euthyphrōn (Euthyphro, 1804)
Lysis (English translation, 1804)
Hippias Elattōn (Hippias Minor, 1761)
Hippias Meizōn (Hippias Major, 1759)
Apologia Sōkratous (Apology, 1675)
Kritōn (Crito, 1804)

Middle period works (388-368 B.C.E.):

Cratylus (Cratylus, 1793)
Symposion (Symposium, 1701)
Politeia (Republic, 1701)
Phaedros (Phaedrus, 1792)
Menōn (Meno, 1769)
Euthydēmos (Euthydemus, 1804)
Menexenos (Menexenus, 1804)
Phaedōn (Phaedo, 1675)
Parmenidēs (Parmenides, 1793)
Theaetētos (Theaetetus, 1804)

Later period works (365-361 B.C.E.):

Sophistēs (Sophist, 1804)
Politikos (Statesman, 1804)

Last period works (360-347 B.C.E.):

Nomoi (Laws, 1804)
Philēbos (Philebus, 1779)
Timaios (Timeaus, 1793)
Critias (English translation, 1793)

About the Author

Berchman, Robert, and John Finamore, eds. History of Platonism: Plato Redivivus. New Orleans: University Press of the South, 2005.

Field, G. C. The Philosophy of Plato. London: Oxford University Press, 1966.

Havelock, Eric A. Preface to Plato. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1963.

Klosko, George. The Development of Plato's Political Theory. 2d ed. Oxford, England: Oxford University Press, 2006.

Lodge, Rupert C. Plato's Theory of Art. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1953.

Melling, David J. Understanding Plato. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Ritter, Constantin. The Essence of Plato's Philosophy. New York: Russell & Russell, 1968.

Samaras, Thanassis. Plato on Democracy. New York: P. Lang, 2002.

Sayre, Kenneth M. Plato's Late Ontology: A Riddle Resolved. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1953.

Shorey, Paul. The Unity of Plato's Thought. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1968.

Silverman, Allan. The Dialectic of Essence: A Study of Plato's Metaphysics. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 2002.

Taylor, A. E. Plato: The Man and His Work. London: Methuen, 1966.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Did Plato have the right to make Socrates a spokesman for himself in some of his dialogues?
- To what extent does the Apology reveal the reasons for the enmity against Socrates?
- What indications of his audience's reaction to Socrates' remarks do you see in the Apology?
- By what techniques does Plato in the Symposium draw the contrast between the theory of love proposed by Socrates and love as commonly understood by his contemporaries?
- Socrates, as presented by Plato, resembles Jesus in his inclination to use dramatic and literary devices to enhance his message. Compare their use of one such device, such as the parable.
- Plato is one of the most readable of philosophers. What stylistic trait or traits would you identify as most outstanding in this respect?

Library of Congress

PLUTARCH

Born: Chaeronea, Boeotia, Greece
c. 46 C.E.

Died: Chaeronea, Boeotia, Greece
after 120 C.E.

As one of the creators of literary biography, Plutarch is remembered not only for the specific examples of the genre and the details of significant historical personalities but also for the subsequent impact those examples had upon a wide range of modern European narrative and drama.

BIOGRAPHY

Mestrios Ploutarchos, or Plutarch (PLEW-tawrk), was born around 46 C.E. during the Roman imperial administration of Claudius I. His birthplace was Chaeronea, Boeotia, in central Greece, some twenty miles east of Delphi. Plutarch could trace his paternal lineage to his great-grandfather, Nikarchos, through his grandfather, Lamprias, and his father, Autoboulos. His grandfather appears in dialogue or conversational contexts, some of which are set in his father's house and some in Plutarch's own house, as best illustrated by Plutarch's nine-volume philosophical treatise, "Symposiacs" ("Table Talk"). Of the maternal line nothing is known, not even the name of his mother.

He had at least two brothers, Lamprias and Timon. A son of one of the brothers, his nephew, Sextus of Chaeronea, was a well-known Stoic philosopher, a tutor of the emperor Marcus Aurelius. Plutarch was married to Timoxena, the daughter of Alexion. They had four sons, Soklaros, Charon, Autoboulos, and Ploutarchos, and a daughter, Timoxena, who died when she was four, about whom "Paramythetikos pros ten gynaika" ("Consolation to His Wife") survives among Plutarch's varied essays. This essay was written from Tanagra in eastern Boeotia, since Plutarch was not at home at the time and could not arrive before the funeral. It remains among the most moving of his works and one of the most revealing of his personality, since it provides perspective on his understanding of the meaning of life. It reveals that two of the older boys, the eldest, probably Soklaros, and "fair Charon" had preceded their sister in death. Patrokleas, who participates in the "Table Talk," is, in Greek, called Plutarch's gambros, which is usually translated as "son-in-law," implying another daughter, but no name is known, nor are other particulars of the family known. The traditional account indicates that another son, Lamprias, otherwise unknown, "wrote a list of all his father's writings on the whole of Greek and Roman inquiries." Minimal traces from inscriptions indicate familial successors for some two centuries.

Essentially, Plutarch was a hometown teacher, although he traveled widely within his world, knowing Athens well, visiting Egypt, and lecturing at Rome. He had a wide circle of friends, some of whom were influential within the imperial administration. It was from one of them, Lucius Mestrius Florus, that Plutarch took the gentile name, Mestrius, presumably in recognition of an honor done him by Florus, ostensibly in the reign of the emperor Trajan. From that time he gained Roman citizenship. To another friend, the Roman consul Sosius Senecio, the Bioi paralleloi (c. 105-115 C.E.; Parallel Lives, 1579) was dedicated.

For the last thirty years of his life, Plutarch was a priest at Delphi. When the emperor Hadrian came to assist in the celebration of that shrine's past, in about 126 C.E., he found that his statue had been erected by the shrine's council near the beginning of his reign. Upon it, according to the preserved inscription, there is a record of Plutarch as officiating priest. Plutarch did not long survive after that occasion, though in these later years he held several honorary local offices for Chaeronea. He died in Chaeronea sometime after 120 C.E.

Although an extensive amount of Plutarch's writing has survived, there is little exact chronological information about his work or his life. In his essay "Peri tou E tou en Delphi" ("The E at Delphi"), a passing reference is made to his being old enough to appreciate a philosophic discussion while studying in Athens in the year that the emperor Nero Claudius Caesar Drusus Germanicus visited the city (66 C.E.). It is upon this reference that Plutarch's time of birth is usually fixed. An incident in another of Plutarch's essays, "Peri Isidos kai Osiridos" ("Isis and Osiris"), involves "armed strife between two Egyptian districts over their respective local cults" and has been dated to 117 C.E.

Plutarch is the second most extensively preserved author of classical antiquity, exceeded only by the voluminous medical writer Galen, of whom well in excess of 2.5 million words exists. Plutarch's output totals a little more than 1.1 million words, well in advance of the much-better-known Aristotle, from whom less than one million words survive. In addition to the fifty biographies in Parallel Lives, Plutarch's other surviving work is Ethika (after c. 100 C.E.; Moralia, 1603), a collection of seventy-eight essays, including "Table Talk," and "Consolation to His Wife." These two publications, however, are but a fraction of the known titles that he wrote. Lamprias's list identified 227 items and does not include all that have survived.

ANALYSIS

Plutarch understood his main literary activity was to involve the education of men. He clearly stood within the intellectual tradition of Greek philosophy. This philosophical base had been defined as consisting of three concerns upon which the divergent "philosophizers" focused: nature, morals, and rationality itself, so that there were three corresponding kinds of philosophy: natural, moral, and logical. It was with the moral or ethical that Plutarch principally dealt, though by no means to the exclusion of the others. His essays "Aetia physica" ("Causes of Natural Phenomena") and "Peri tou emphainomenou prosopou toi kukloi tes selenes"

("Concerning the Face Which Appears in the Orb of the Moon") reveal attention to topics within natural philosophy. On the latter, the early modern astronomer, Johannes Kepler, composed a Latin translation with commentary of significance to the development of seventeenth century science.

The various essays in the collection now called Moralia were composed generally before those in the collection called Parallel Lives. Richard Chenevix Trench, archbishop of Dublin, writing on Plutarch in 1873, noted that the Moralia, in contrast to the Parallel Lives, speak "of the points of view, moral and religious, from which he contemplated not this man's life or the other's, but the whole life of men." Thus, the two collections are complementary: Parallel Lives being concerned with "what the ancient world had accomplished in the world of action" and Moralia with what it "had accomplished in the world of thought."

It can also be noted that few of Plutarch's writings are individually of any great length, though the overall corpus is quite extensive. Of the seventy-eight essays included in the Moralia, the average length is less than seven thousand words, with but twenty-six of them exceeding that number, and with only the "Table Talk" being of a substance approaching ten times the average length. By comparison, Parallel Lives, while not a single discrete entity, is a composite work of some 518,504 words. Of its fifty "lives," the average length is a little more than ten thousand words, with two, the "Pompeius" and the "Alexander," each exceeding twenty thousand. If the pairings of "parallel" lives are considered, then all the pairs exceed twelve thousand words, and the most extensive, "Alexander with Julius Caesar," is more than thirty-seven thousand, with two others, "Agesilaus with Pompeius" and "Demetrius with Antonius," more than thirty thousand words.

The fifty surviving biographies in Parallel Lives were not the only ones written, nor do the first written appear among the survivors. Plutarch, by his own references, began with "Augustus" Caesar, evidently pursuing examples in isolation before he turned to his famed pairing. Among the caesars, these individuated examples included "Tiberius," "Gaius," "Caligula," "Claudius," "Nero," and "Vitelius"—none of which is known. The idea was not unlike that of the somewhat younger Latin author, Gaius Suetonius Tranquillus, whose De vita

Caesarum (c.120 C.E.; The History of Twelve Caesars, 1606; best known as Lives of the Twelve Caesars), written after the death of Domitian, alone provides an example from classical antiquity of imperial biographies from this transitional period in Roman history. While it is not quite clear about how many of the caesars Plutarch wrote, only the individuated examples of the poorly known “Galba” and “Otho” still exist. A comparison of the corresponding examples written by Suetonius show Plutarch’s to be longer. Yet one learns little from Plutarch’s biography of Otho, since his “life” is the shortest written. Otherwise, there are preserved examples only of “Aratus,” a political and military figure from the Greek city-state of Sicyon, involved in the third century struggles against Macedon; and “Artaxerxes” II, one of the Persian kings.

Even the oldest of the pairs, the Greek “Epaminondas” with the Roman “Scipio Africanus,” does not survive. That is unfortunate, for not only was Epaminondas the person most admired by Plutarch, but the absence of the text prevents the reader from seeing how Plutarch came upon the rather novel idea of pairing lives. The descriptive usage, “parallel lives,” is Plutarch’s own indication of his self-consciousness in having created a unique form.

With the exception of the four independent lives, the other forty-six are in parallel pairs. In one instance, two Greeks were paired with two Romans: the kings of Sparta, “Agis” IV and “Cleomenes” III with the two Gracchi brothers, “Tiberius and Gaius,” both reforming dictators in the later and declining period of the Roman republic. Otherwise, each of the Parallel Lives juxtaposes one Roman with one Greek figure of renown. Plutarch normally wrote the Greek life first and then sought a Roman personality wherein the educational lesson intended by the former might find genuine comparison in the latter. While Plutarch ranged widely chronologically for his Romans—from the founder, Romulus, to the caesars—for his Greeks he took a broader Hellenistic view that permitted him to consider ten Athenians, five Spartans, two Thebans, two Macedonians, and one each from Sicily, Cardia, Corinth, Megalopolis, and Epirus, but over a shorter period of time.

Many of the twenty-one examples thus created admirably perform the intended function or at least did so in Plutarch’s own mind. Modern critics have frequently found fault, usually from some perspective not reflecting Plutarch’s own notions of virtue. He defined virtue as an art, making close analogy of the writer of “lives” to the painter of portraits. In contrast to virtue was kakia, too often mistranslated as “vice,” since it could imply “badness” of character, whereas for Plutarch it was simply the absence of virtue, as in the cases of the paired “Demetrius” and “Mark Antony.”

PARALLEL LIVES

First published: Bioi paralleloi, c. 105-115 C.E. (English translation, 1579)

Type of work: Biographical essays

The Parallel Lives, written as moral influences upon the reader, illustrate diverse virtues through the medium of pairing a famous Greek personality with a correspondingly famous Roman personality.

Customarily, in the Parallel Lives, the parallel pairs are accompanied by an introduction. Within these stand whatever dedicatory or prefatory statements that Plutarch wished to make. Many provide clues not only to the specific point of the given pair but also to the general theory of bioi (“lives”) under which Plutarch worked. He clearly distinguished “lives” from “researches,” which meant, as he put it in the “Alexander,” that the most brilliant exploits often tell readers nothing of the virtues or vices of the men who performed them, while on the other hand a chance remark or a joke may reveal more of a man’s character than the mere feat of winning battles in which thousands fall, or of marshaling great armies, or laying siege to cities.

Since these introductions are typically found with the Greek “life” that was written first, an edition or a reading focusing exclusively upon the Roman half of the pair may well lose the sense that Plutarch intended. That must be said since it is common to look at subgroupings of Parallel Lives to obtain from these quasi-biographical essays information of a historical nature. That is especially the case in instances in which a period of time or a personality is otherwise poorly covered because of the loss of sources from which Plutarch worked.

It is appropriate to consider not only Plutarch's knowledge of Roman sources but also his apparently rather poor knowledge of the Latin language. Nevertheless, much can be gained by reading all the lives appropriate to the end of the Roman republic. The lives of "Caius Marius," "Sulla," "Crassus," "Lucullus," "Pompeius," "Cicero," "Julius Caesar," "Cato the Younger," "Brutus," and "Antony" have so much in common by interplay with one another that Plutarch's treatment becomes significant precisely in the minute amount of distinctive, if not contradictory, data about these several individuals that he provided.

The order of Plutarch's composition remains in dispute, but it is possible to distinguish four subgroups on the basis of the purposes that underlay the writing. Plutarch had begun "at the request of his friends," continued "for his own satisfaction," turned to examples "whose career may serve as a warning," and concluded the whole with those "of the founding fathers and legislators of Greece and Rome." Whether for others or "his own satisfaction," the choices made illustrate that sense in which figures from the past can be "object-lessons in a particular virtue" for persons of the present.

The absence of any life of a woman, like the absence of any woman from the "Table Talk," should be noted. Truly none constituted the primary focus of Plutarch's work, though the "Consolation to His Wife" has received remark. From the Moralia could be added "Gamika parangelmata" ("Advice to Bride and Groom"), the "pithy remarks" attributed to Spartan women in "Apothegmata Lakonika" ("Sayings of Spartans"), but especially the "Gunaikon aretai" ("Bravery of Women"). Plutarch lived within a world with its own notions of sexual status. Yet that fact should not ignore the role given to women, nor the particular and peculiar virtues assigned to women within the literary lives of the men. The example of Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi brothers, illustrates well the contrasting point. In the same context, emphasis must be placed upon Plutarch's assumption that education itself, the very purpose of all of his essays in Moralia, as well as in Parallel Lives, was exclusively the prerogative of that wealthy and leisured minority "able to attend the lectures of philosophers" or to share with Plutarch in his kind of lifestyle.

The use of a Greek with a Roman was meant to educate both peoples regarding the values inherent within the other. The frequent presence of a synkrisis (comparison) was intended to find whether or not those values were present in the "lives" of the persons chosen. The use of introductions to the Parallel Lives adds to these stylistic devices. All contribute to an understanding of not only Plutarch's intentions in the writing of this kind of "moral essay" but also how his result was of such potent literary force. Throughout subsequent history, he was read with intensity as providing models for men in different eras and under divergent political manifestations. The Parallel Lives are indeed examples within the "ethics" of political philosophy.

SUMMARY

Plutarch was essentially a teacher whose work is that of an essayist not given to excessive wordiness. Yet Plutarch had concerns that led him to say the things that he wanted said. While many of these lay in the development of character, he also gave attention to a great variety of topics, some of a traditional nature, some much more issues of the immediate moment. Parallel Lives was an ideal way of writing topics in moral philosophy for a wider audience by employing the device of human biographies. He gave them an additional dimension by juxtaposing one life from one culture in one age with another life from another culture in another age.

Clyde Curry Smith

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

NONFICTION:

Ethika, after c.100 C.E. (Moralia, 1603)

Bioi paralleloi, c.105-115 C.E. (Parallel Lives, 1579)

About the Author

Barrow, Reginald H. Plutarch and His Times. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1967.

Brenk, Frederick E. In Mist Apparelled: Religious Themes in Plutarch's "Moralia" and "Lives." Leiden, the Netherlands: E. J. Brill, 1977.

Duff, Tim. Plutarch's "Lives": Exploring Virtue and Vice. Oxford, England: Clarendon Press, 1999.

Jones, Christopher Prestige. Plutarch and Rome. New York: Oxford University Press, 1971.

Lamberton, Robert. Plutarch. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2001.

Newmyer, Stephen T. Animals, Rights, and Reason in Plutarch and Modern Ethics. New York: Routledge, 2006.

Pelling, Christopher. Plutarch and History: Eighteen Studies. London: Duckworth, 2002.

Russell, D. A. Plutarch. 2d ed. Bristol, England: Bristol Classical, 2001.

Wardman, Alan. Plutarch's "Lives." Berkeley: University of California Press, 1974.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What literary virtues have made Plutarch one of the few biographers before the eighteenth century to be highly regarded?
- Plutarch, like many biographers after him, was much interested in inculcating moral principles. What are the dangers of this approach for a biographer?
- What relationship between ancient Greek and Roman culture provided a basis for Parallel Lives?
- What uses did William Shakespeare make of Sir Thomas North's sixteenth century translation of Plutarch?
- What did Samuel Johnson learn from Plutarch? What did James Boswell learn?

Library of Congress

ALEXANDER POPE

Born: London, England
May 21, 1688

Died: Twickenham, England
May 30, 1744

An outstanding moralist and satirist of the neoclassic period in English literature, Pope extended the use of literary criticism and renewed interest in the mock epic as a genre.

BIOGRAPHY

Alexander Pope was born in the City of London, England, on May 21, 1688, the year of the Glorious Revolution. He was the only child of Catholic parents. The Pope family lived on Lombard Street until Alexander was five years old. A portrait of him painted when he was about ten shows his face to be round, pretty, and of a fresh complexion. Later, an illness disfigured him. In the same year that he was born, an act of Parliament prohibited Catholics from living within ten miles of the City of London. This act became a major factor in determining the course of Pope's life.

Pope received his first education when he was about eight years old from a priest named John Banister. Later, he attended Twyford School near Winchester, a school for Catholic boys. At the age of twelve, Pope's father decided to move the family from London in order to conform to the act restricting Catholics. Whitefield House and seventeen acres of land in Windsor Forest near Binfield became the new home. This move brought Pope's formal education to an end, and thereafter he educated himself. About 1704, at the age of sixteen and now suffering from the dreaded Pott's disease, a form of spinal tuberculosis, he thought he was about to die. His farewell to the Abbe Southcote caused him to secure the services of Dr. John Radcliffe, an eminent physician of the day, who successfully treated Pope. His advice to Pope, to exercise and ride each day, worked.

During these years of growing up at Binfield, the young poet was not only extending his reading and perfecting his poetry, he was also developing his literary acquaintances. He got to know many literary wits at Will's Coffee House, including William Trumbell, William Walsh, Samuel Garth, William Wycherley, William Congreve, and the actor Thomas Betterton. Pope became especially friendly with Wycherley and Walsh. He helped Wycherley prepare his verse for publication, and from Walsh he received the famous advice to make correctness his study and aim. Walsh was referring, of course, to literary decorum.

The period of 1709 to 1717 was the experimentation period for Pope. During these eight years, he tried his hand at half a dozen different kinds of poetry, ranging from pastoral and georgic, such as Windsor Forest (1713), to didactic, such as An Essay on Criticism (1711), to elegiac, as in "Verses to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady," to heroic, as in Eloisa to Abelard (1717), to mock epic, such as The Rape of the Lock (1712; expanded, 1714), to actual epic, as in The Iliad of Homer (1715-1720), a translation of Homer's Iliad (c. 750 B.C.E.; English translation, 1611).

These years were also a time of great expansion in his personal and social life. They mark a period during which Pope spent more time in London than at any other stage in his life at the same time as he continued to visit his Catholic acquaintances around Binfield. Now he made new friends, including John Gay, Jonathan Swift, John Arbuthnot, and First Viscount Bolingbroke among literary and political circles, and the Carylls, Englefields, and Blounts among Catholic folk. He also met Martha Blount, for whom he developed a love that, despite all barriers that existed, endured until his death.

When Pope's father died in 1717, various changes in Pope's life followed. His father had left Binfield in 1716 and moved to Chiswick, possibly to avoid the heavy taxes then being levied against Catholics. With his father gone, Pope decided to move in March, 1719, with his mother into a small villa on the bank of the Thames at Twickenham. The last twenty-five years of Pope's life were spent there, except for occasional excursions into the countryside. His major endeavor now was to improve the house, garden, and grotto at Twickenham. His life took on a much quieter aspect. At first, he was engrossed in finishing his translation of Homer's Iliad. After the completion of the translation, he began editing. His main project in editing was an edition of the work of William Shakespeare that would improve on Nicholas Rowe's edition. Pope's Shakespeare edition finally appeared in six volumes in March, 1725. The other major work belonging to these years was his translation of Homer's Odyssey (c. 725 B.C.E., English translation, 1614). This effort made Pope the first writer in English letters to be able to live off his writings without the aid of a patron. His financial independence was now secure.

The completion of such projects thus brought a distinct change of direction in his literary interests. Being free now to write what he chose, he adopted satire as his forte. This period is when he produced the first volume of The Dunciad (1728-1743). All the while, Pope's health had been deteriorating. A trip to Bath did not help. The five years from 1728 to 1733 were the most painful that Pope had yet had to suffer. Meanwhile, he was working on An Essay on Man (1733-1734). Yet the first poem to be published after The Dunciad was actually the Epistle to Burlington (1731). This poem caused him to gather new enemies in addition to those whom he had made from The Dunciad. For this reason, when the first three epistles of An Essay on Man finally appeared in 1733, they did so anonymously. Pope published two other poems at the same time, the Epistle to Bathurst (1732) and the Imitations of Horace (1733-1737).

As Pope grew older, his life assumed a mellow and more assured quality. He could now make friends according to his own beliefs and not feel pressured to impress anyone. His closest friends became the most valuable aspects of his life. Another change, however, was about to occur in his life: His mother would soon die.

Probably the greatest change as a result of his mother's death was the kind of traveling he now undertook. Although he did not follow the traditional pattern of the learned man and go on a Grand Tour of the Continent, he did travel the breadth of southern England. That does not mean that he neglected Twickenham. Like Horace on his Sabine Farm, Pope continued to pay close attention to the pastoral setting here. Horace became the major influence in Pope's writing. Although several of Pope's poems were patterned after the works of Horace, the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot (1735) says much about Pope's literary career. In the poem, Pope builds his image by demonstrating his own literary development. Also, the publication of his Mr. Pope's Literary Correspondence (1735-1737) after his mother's death lent a more positive image, for there he shaped his character for public display. During the period from 1733 to 1738, Pope wrote at least fourteen imitations of Horace. In addition, in these last years he reworked The Dunciad, completing the work in 1743. The major change was the substitution of Colley Cibber for Lewis Theobald as the King of the Dunces. It was Pope's last published work. He was in critical physical health, and on May 30, 1744, Pope died in Twickenham.

ANALYSIS

Pope has often been thought of only as a personal satirist, a small man in ill health, with a crooked back, spitting out vengeance on the world for his state of affairs. That famous epithet describing him as the "wicked wasp of Twickenham" is a part of the stereotyped image that he bears. Yet Pope is much more than that. The poetic activity in which he discovered the actual shape of his world and its ideal possibilities was the same as that in which he discovered his own feelings, values, and role as a poet within it. As one matured, so did the other.

From youth to adulthood, Pope was busy attempting a variety of poetry to ascertain where his strength lay. After his early Vergilian Pastorals in 1709, he wrote his well-known poem of criticism titled An Essay on Criticism in 1711, following the pattern of French poet Nicolas Boileau and that poet's concern for good poetry writing. Again Boileau and also Garth influenced him in writing another form, the mock epic, to be fulfilled eventually in The Rape of the Lock. Pope's Windsor Forest of 1713 is an attempt to continue the tradition established earlier by John Denham's Cooper's Hill (1642), the poetry of landscape utilizing the pastoral motif. Moreover, Eloisa to Abelard and "Verses to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady" are best seen as imitations in part of Ovid's Heroides (before 8 C.E.; English translation, 1567).

An early poem, "Epistle to Miss Blount," shows how much he inherited from the seventeenth century and its Metaphysical wit. The poem's closest affinities are with Andrew Marvell. It demonstrates a light, teasing intimacy. In "Verses to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady," Pope draws on formal modes from the seventeenth century and tends to see himself as a poet in a corresponding way. Both these poems exhibit an attempt to make obvious to his society the meaning of order, reason, virtue, and decorum—those things accepted in Pope's time as indicative forms of civilized life.

Pope also attempts to clarify as central to his whole moral outlook the relationship between the chaotic forces of life and the conscious sense that he made of it. A good reminder is in The Rape of the Lock, when he points out that, although beauty must decay and locks will turn to gray, the woman who scorns a man will die a maid. In his Eloisa to Abelard, Pope heightens the romantic trappings of the mode to a positively sub-Miltonic degree; he seemingly exploits the Ovidian implications more fully than any Elizabethan except perhaps Shakespeare. He uses Eloisa's case as a means of reflecting the paradoxes and metamorphoses of love.

Eloisa to Abelard and "Verses to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady" were published in the first collected volume of his poems in 1717. This collection contains some of Pope's best work, including the revised version of The Rape of the Lock, An Essay on Criticism, and the musical versification of the Pastorals. Pope in later years made a distinction between these earlier "fanciful" poems and his mature work, in which he wrote of Truth. These early poems do indeed demonstrate a great deal of rococo fancy. This fancy is at its most luxuriant in portions of Windsor Forest. In a passage such as the description of Old Father Thames rising from his oozy bed to hail the Peace of Utrecht, one sees Pope at his best with such fancy. In such writing, he was challenging two of the greatest predecessors of such poetry, Edmund Spenser and John Milton, with their river catalogs. Also, there is within the piece the long tradition of the court masque. It is in allegory an exceptionally elaborate compliment to Queen Anne and her efforts to bring the long war to an end.

Although Pope was triumphant in Windsor Forest, it is The Rape of the Lock that foreshadows more of his future successes. That rococo fancy is still at work as one sees the gilding of the brazen world of Hampton Court, but Pope "stoops to Truth" much more and shows the world as it is. This poem is as much a social satire as it is a personal satire of the family of the Fermors. Ladies at court shift the moving "Toyshop of their heart" and feel the same susceptibility to a stain upon their honor as to a stain upon a new brocade; it is a world where "wretches hang so that Jurymen may dine"; and it is a world wherein Pope can show which things lost on earth are treasured in the "Lunar sphere." In this poem, one finds Pope's first considered view of the world about him. As he moralizes his satire, the reader is reminded of Sarpedon's address to Glaucus from the Iliad, which is placed in the mouth of the serious Clarissa, with her attention to beauty decaying, while recognizing that decay is simply a natural part of life to be accepted as reality.

After ten years of translating and editing and making his true fortune, Pope's sympathy with the world evaporated. The reasons for his growing bitterness are not fully clear. Some like to argue that it was his growing physical pain resulting from his tubercular disease, causing him to give up his love of visiting the coffee houses and engaging in lively conversation. Some suggest that it was primarily attributable to the stress of fighting with the dunces, added to his growing friendship with Swift at this time. Whatever the reasons, Pope began to survey the world as one with ever-growing corruption.

He first observes this corruption in the version of The Dunciad published in 1728. Many view The Dunciad as simply a settling of old scores with enemies, yet the poem in its various stages is much more than that. It is the deterioration of society, from his point of view, that is at the heart of the series. He makes the reader aware of the gradual deterioration of standards, but he sees that same deterioration in other arts, too. The prophecy that he had allowed Old Father Thames to make in Windsor Forest about a new age of architectural splendor did not come true. Many churches and palaces were being left undone and untouched and lavish spending was occurring in the wrong places. From the misuse of money by those who could show only their lack of taste, Pope proceeded to a more general survey of the standards of the moneyed classes in a series of Moral Essays (1731-1735), of which the Epistle to Burlington was the first to be published.

Pope was not necessarily a systematic thinker. Scraps of Platonism, Deism, optimism, positivism, and Epicureanism provide a host of negative treatment from professional philosophers. Yet even these allow the value of his moral intuitions. Among his moralistic concerns is his advice for happiness: Happiness is found in a serenity of mind, not a dependence on intellectual pursuits, or the prospect of fame, and certainly not on a dependence on money. These are not new bits of advice, but in Pope's day readers did not resent being told the same things over again, so long as they were true and were told with fresh convictions. Therefore, Pope presents the commonplace in an uncommon way. It is a characteristic of Pope that he usually saw the good and the bad. The strong antipathy of good to bad he explains in the Epilogue to the Satires (1738) as the provocation of his satire. It pleases him to represent two conflicting sets of values: the Roman simplicity of his secluded home at Twickenham, where virtue ruled, versus the luxury and deceitfulness of city and court life.

To accomplish his purpose with such a subject, he found that imitation of Horace's epistles and satires was more effective than continuing his Moral Essays. In this new series of 1733-1737, the words of Horace are translated and applied to modern conditions in Pope's fight against modern conditions and corruption. His best poem in this series in accomplishing his purpose of showing moral and political contrast between two sets of values is his Imitation of the First Epistle of the First Book of Horace, addressed to Bolingbroke, the unofficial leader of the political opposition. The new Whig financiers were gaining control of trusts and charities, with purchasing of favors on the rise. In denouncing the political situation, Pope could also universally denounce this condition that promotes corruption in general. However, Pope does not allow his poem to settle in total darkness. He provides the reader with righteous men as examples, also. They are to be found in the ranks of the Parliamentary opposition, the Tories. If the reader has been disgusted with the examples of meanness and depravity, he or she can find the worthy Cornbury; if the reader thinks that the spirit of patriotism is dead, he or she can find Lyttelton pursuing it; if the reader is appalled at greedy and grasping politicians, he or she can turn to St. John, Wyndham, and Marchmont, who dare to love their country and "be poor."

Pope's epigrammatic style is one of many things often noted, some saying that he is still the second most-quoted English writer, Shakespeare being the first. Although the style is found in much of his work, he seems to have found a home for it in The Dunciad. The final work has many couplets or pairs of couplets that appear to have been modeled independently of their context. Such lines, of course, live separately as epigrams. The Dunciad is more than that, of course; it is remarkable also for its grandeur of extended passages and for its wit and imagery. One especially notable section is the celebration of the final triumph of Dulness. Another splendid passage is the book 3 burlesque of Aeneas being guided by the Sibyl into Hades. In the journey, the reader sees dunce after dunce slaughtered. Some have compared Pope's dealing with his enemies in The Dunciad with the oyster forming the pearl. It is built out of the ugly, the trivial, and the commonplace, but the result is the sublime.

AN ESSAY ON CRITICISM

First published: 1711

Type of work: Poem

In this work, Pope indicts false critics, demonstrates why they are false, and then shows what good critics are like.

An Essay on Criticism was published when Pope was relatively young. The work remains, however, one of the best-known commentaries on literary criticism. Although the work treats literary criticism in particular and thus relies heavily upon ancient authors as type masters, Pope still extends this criticism to general judgment about all walks of life. He demonstrates that true genius and judgment are innate gifts of heaven; at the same time, he argues, many possess the seeds of these gifts, such that with proper training they can be developed. His organization takes on a very simple structure: the general qualities of a critic; the particular laws by which he judges a work; and the ideal character of a critic.

Part 1 begins with Pope's heavy indictment of false critics. In doing so, he suggests that critics often are partial to their own judgment, judgment deriving, of course, from nature, like that of the poet's genius. Nature provides everyone with some taste, which may in the end help the critic to judge properly. Therefore, the first job of the critic is to know himself or herself, his or her own judgments, his or her own tastes and abilities.

The second task of the critic is to know nature. Nature, to Pope, is a universal force, an ideal sought by critic and poet alike, an ideal that must be discovered by the critic through a careful balance of wit and judgment, of imaginative invention and deliberate reason. The rules of literary criticism may best be located in those works that have stood the test of time and universal acceptance: namely, the works of antiquity. Pope points out that, in times past, critics restricted themselves to discovering rules in classical literature, whereas in his contemporary scene critics are straying from such principles. Moderns, he declares, seem to make their own rules, which are pedantic, unimaginative, and basely critical of literature. Pope does admit that certain beauties of art cannot be learned by rules, intangible beauties that must be found in an individual way by true masters, but he goes on to warn readers that few moderns are able to acquire such tastes, especially those who exceed their grasp too quickly.

Part 2 traces the causes hindering good judgment. The reader is advised to avoid the dangers of blindness caused by pride by learning his or her own defects and by profiting even from the strictures of his or her enemies. Inadequate learning is another reason critics err; critics who look too closely at the parts of a poem may find themselves preferring a poem dull as a whole yet perfect in parts, to one imperfect in part but pleasing as a whole. What Pope seeks is the unity of the many small parts into one whole, the latter being the more important. According to Pope, some critics err in loving parts only; others confine their attention to conceits, images, or metaphors. Still others praise style and language too highly without respect to content. The true critic generally abides by rules of tolerance from extremes of fashion and personal taste. Pope advises that the true critic will not be a patron of a special interest group. He even admits that moderns may have a contribution to make, along with the ancients. Above all, critics should not err by being subjective. The true critic must put aside personal motives and praise according to less personal criteria.

Finally, part 3 outlines the ideal character of a critic. It lists rules for manners and contrasts the ideal critic with the bad poet and the erring critic. This part concludes with a brief summary of literary criticism and the character of the best critics. It is not enough for critics to know; they must also share the qualities of good people. Integrity stands at the top of the list of qualities of a good critic. Modesty, tact, and courage are necessary for a true critic. Pedantry and impertinence are not part of a critic with integrity. The learned fool rushes in "where angels fear to tread." Having outlined the characteristics of true critics, Pope then in classic fashion catalogs the most famous critics of Greece and Rome: Aristotle, Horace, Dionysius, Quintilian, and Longinus. In closing the work, Pope reminds the reader that at the fall of Rome, most good criticism stopped. Erasmus revived it in the early Renaissance and Nicolas Boileau of France advanced it more in Europe. Thus, says, Pope, one must return to the "juster ancient cause." With An Essay on Criticism, the neoclassic world of Pope has a helpmeet.

THE RAPE OF THE LOCK

First published: 1712, expanded 1714

Type of work: Poem

This is a wonderful mock epic poem poking fun at not only the Fermor family and its foibles but also those of humankind.

The Rape of the Lock was written by Pope to chide gently the Fermor family when Lord Petre cut off a lock of Arabella Fermor's hair on a certain fateful day and such dire results followed. Pope started something that resulted in a piece of literature that has remained to this day a leading example of the mock epic satire. John Caryl, a good friend to Pope, asked him to write a little poem about the affair in order to help heal the wounds of the two families. The poem became a trivial story of the stolen lock of hair as a vehicle for making some thoroughly mature and sophisticated comments on society and humankind. Pope draws on his own experience in the classics in combining epic literary conventions with his own wit and sense of values. The entire poem is written in five cantos, making use of the popular rhymed iambic pentameter verse, along with balance, antithesis, bathos, and paranomasia.

The story is relatively simple. In canto 1, the reader finds Belinda (representing Miss Fermor) asleep but awakened about noon by her lapdog Shock. Before she awakens, she dreams about Ariel, a Rosicrucian sylph, who whispers praises in her ear and warns her to beware of jealousy, pride, and especially men. When she does awaken, she finds a love letter on her bed and, after reading it, quickly forgets all the advice that Ariel has given her. She has been invited to sail up the Thames with friends to Hampton Court palace and have fun and games with her host. She devotes much time to her cosmetics and hair in preparation for the trip.

Lord Petre, a suitor, is seen admiring a lock of her hair and vowing that he would have it by any means. The modern reader must remember that, until the 1920's, few women of character would cut their hair, an act symbolizing the loss of virtue, even chastity. The reader next sees the crew sailing up the Thames, with everyone but Ariel apparently pleased with the state of affairs. Worried, Ariel summons his helper sylphs and reminds them of their duty in helping to protect Belinda, one especially to guard her fan, one her watch, another her lock, and Ariel himself her dog. A host of sylphs are assigned to guard her petticoat, a literal device of armor in older times, protecting the female's sexual chastity.

After the cruise on the Thames, canto 3 sees Belinda, the Baron (representing Lord Petre), and the rest of the party arriving at the palace. There Belinda decides to play a Spanish card game called Ombre with two of her suitors. During the game, coffee, recently introduced into England by Queen Anne in order to help with the alcohol problem, is served, and fumes from the hot liquid open the rational mind of the Baron, providing him with new stratagems. With the help of a female crony named Clarissa, he manages to cut off the lock of Belinda's hair during the card game. At this rape, Belinda cries out in horror, and the Baron cries out in triumph. Ariel weeps bitterly because he was not able to prevent the deed.

In canto 4, a bad sylph named Umbriel takes advantage of the chaos and chooses to increase the woes by flying down to the Cave of Spleen to get more woes to dump onto Belinda. With his trusty key, "Spleenwort," in his hand, he enters and secures from the queen of Spleen a bag of horrible noises and a vial of tears, sorrows, and griefs. One of Belinda's friends, Thalestris, demonstrates "fair weather friendship" when she announces that everyone is talking about the rape of the lock and that she is afraid that she, too, will be branded as "loose." Thalestris attempts to get her brother Sir Plume to demand that the lock be returned. Sir Plume is unsuccessful.

Canto 5 shows Umbriel casting the vial of woes upon Belinda so that she is almost drowned in tears. She longs for simple, country life. Clarissa, the one who helped the Baron earlier in his successful venture, gives an interesting moral sermonette about vanity and age and the need of women to use good sense in the battle of the sexes. Soon a battle of teacups ensues, disturbed by the Baron's sneezing from the snuff that he is using; this causes the lock to fly high into the air, never to be rescued. Some think that the lock has gone to the moon, where love letters and other love tokens find themselves eventually, but others think that the lock became a star.

The poem is a wonderful example of burlesque, a form that takes trivial subjects and treats them seriously, with the effect being comic. Many epic conventions are used here: the epic question is asked; Belinda's toilet becomes the epic putting on of armor; there is the conference of protective gods; there are the games and the banquet; there is the descent into the underworld; and there are heroic encounters and apotheosis. The poem deals with an actual event and thus pokes fun at the two families, but more than that it shows the vanities of humankind. In doing so, much social satire of the fads of the day are presented. The conclusion shows that eighteenth century reason is strongly advocated; whatever one thinks of Clarissa's early actions in the poem, it is difficult to ignore her advice near the end, advice that advocates the use of reason in all matters of life.

THE DUNCIAD

First published: 1728-1743

Type of work: Poem

This satirical poem pokes fun at the authors of Pope's day who promote dull writing.

The Dunciad was first published in three books anonymously, with the authorship finally acknowledged in 1735. The entire work was initiated by the poet laureate Lewis Theobald's reaction to Pope's edition of Shakespeare. The poem attacks Dulness in general, making Theobald its first hero. Eventually, all the authors of the day whom Pope disliked received attention. Individual invective, however, is extended to literary vices in general, in both the 1728 version and the later versions where Theobald is replaced as leading dunce by Colley Cibber.

The first book is organized into three parts. Part 1 describes the reign of Dulness. Part 2 consists of games in which poets, critics, and booksellers contend. The focus seems to be on the critics and their games, tests to decide if they can stay awake while certain material is read for them. Spectators and critics both fall asleep.

Book 3 has the king transported to the Elysian Fields, where he has visions of the past and future triumphs of the empire of Dulness and how they shall extend to the arts and sciences.

The general scheme of the poem shows Pope's reliance upon John Dryden's Mac Flecknoe (1682) and upon classical models. It begins, in fact, with a parody of the Aeneid (c. 29-19 B.C.E.; English translation, 1553) in its invocation, directed to the patrons whose purses inspire the dull writing that will be attacked in the entire work. Pope describes in complete detail the abode of Dulness and shows her with various allegorical figures gathered round her throne, including Fortitude, Temperance, Prudence, and Poetic Justice. Dulness looks out upon the ingredients of dull writing and its numerous creators. She soon finds a hero and anoints him king. The third book contains grandiose heroic couplets and numerous parallels with classical visits to the underworld. John Taylor represents Charon; Elkanah Settle takes Anchises' part as mentor and seer of the future. The highlight of this book is the crowning of the king with a poppy wreath by Bavius, the worse of the ancient poets, according to most critics.

In 1742, Pope published a new version of the book using Colley Cibber as the new chief dunce. It shows the subjugation of the arts and sciences to Dulness, the growth of indolence, the corruption of education, and the consummation of all of these in the restoration of darkness and chaos. The new version demonstrates a more mature outlook in the poet, in that the first of 1728 was much more vindictive. This version is far more concerned with institutions than with individuals, even though Cibber is the chief dunce. One finds Pope using more classical names than individual personal ones, so greater universality is ensured. Pope presents evil omens presaging the coming destruction as Dulness ascends her throne, where Science, Wit, Logic, Rhetoric, and other abstractions in chains rest around the queen. Various people come to testify to the victory of Dulness over the arts and sciences. The first to appear is a harlot, representing Italian opera. Boastful editors tear apart good poets, and a specter comes to comment about the condition of education. Hair-splitting grammarians are satirized; science and religion are also attacked, the latter becoming a mechanistic thing rather than something of spirit and meaning.

Readers in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries have problems with this work because most of Pope's contemporary allusions are not intelligible. Even so, the poem is full of wonderful universal satirical comments on the conditions of society that seem never to die, thus making The Dunciad a poem worthy of the genre of the mock heroic.

SUMMARY

Like other significant writers of his time, Alexander Pope's life revolved around the London literary scene and his wide circle of friends. Among his most important works are An Essay on Criticism, The Rape of the Lock, and The Dunciad. Through his early fancy to his more mature universal satire, Pope created for his time a true reflection of society. He is firmly established as one of the truly outstanding poets of English literature.

John W. Crawford

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

POETRY:

Pastorals, 1709

An Essay on Criticism, 1711

The Rape of the Lock, 1712, 1714

Windsor Forest, 1713

The Works of Mr. Alexander Pope, 1717 (first collected edition including "Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady" and Eloisa to Abelard)

Cytherea, 1723

The Dunciad, 1728-1743

Moral Essays, 1731-1735 (includes Epistle to Burlington, 1731, and Epistle to Bathurst, 1732)

An Essay on Man, 1733-1734

Imitations of Horace, 1733-1737

Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, 1735

One Thousand Seven Hundred and Thirty-Eight, 1738

Epilogue to the Satires, 1738

The Twickenham Edition of the Poems of Alexander Pope, 1939-1967 (11 volumes; John Butt, general editor)

NONFICTION:

Peri Bathos: Or, The Art of Sinking in Poetry, 1727

Mr. Pope's Literary Correspondence, 1735-1737

The Correspondence of Alexander Pope, 1956 (5 volumes; G. Sherburn, editor)

The Literary Criticism of Alexander Pope, 1965

EDITED TEXT:

Works of Shakespear, 1723-1725 (6 volumes)

TRANSLATIONS:

The Iliad of Homer, 1715-1720

The Odyssey of Homer, 1725-1726

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What does Alexander Pope do in his rhymed couplets to make them so often outstanding?
- In An Essay on Criticism Pope defines "true wit" as "What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed." Is this a shallow definition?
- Discuss the effects of using a word like "rape" to describe a silly act in the poem The Rape of the Lock.
- Early in An Essay on Man Pope claims to "vindicate the ways of God to man," paraphrasing John Milton's "justify the ways of God to man" early in Paradise Lost (1667, 1674). How do you account for the enormous differences between the two works?
- To what extent would Pope have to alter The Dunciad to make it apply to society today?

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Works of Mr. Alexander Pope, 1717-1741

About the Author

Blanshard, Rufus A., ed. Discussions of Alexander Pope. Boston: D. C. Heath, 1960.

Brooks, Cleanth. The Well Wrought Urn. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1947.

Clark, Donald B. Alexander Pope. New York: Twayne, 1967.

Erskine-Hill, Howard, ed. Alexander Pope: World and Word. New York: Prepared for the British Academy by Oxford University Press, 1998.

Goldsmith, Netta Murray. Alexander Pope: The Evolution of a Poet. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2002.

Hammond, Brean. Pope Amongst the Satirists. Tavistock, Devon, England: Northcote House, 2005.

Jack, Ian. Augustan Satire: Intention and Idiom in English Poetry, 1660-1750. Oxford, England: Clarendon Press, 1952.

Knight, G. Wilson. The Poetry of Pope: Laureate of Peace. London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1965.

Noggle, James. The Skeptical Sublime: Aesthetic Ideology in Pope and the Tory Satirists. New York: Oxford University Press, 2001.

O'Neill, Judith, ed. Critics on Pope. Readings in Literary Criticism III. Coral Gables, Fla.: University of Miami Press, 1968.

Rogers, Pat. An Introduction to Pope. London: Methuen, 1975.

Warton, Joseph, ed. Alexander Pope and His Critics. 3 vols. New York: Routledge, 2004.

Express Newspapers/Archive Photos

ANTHONY POWELL

Born: London, England
December 21, 1905

Died: Frome, Somerset, England
March 28, 2000

*While Powell's work as an author of independent novels, memoirs, plays, and biography has been much admired, it is his twelve-volume sequence novel, A Dance to the Music of Time, upon which his literary reputation rests.*

BIOGRAPHY

Anthony Dymoke Powell (AN-toh-nee pohl) was born in London, England, on December 21, 1905, the son of P. L. W. Powell and his wife, the former Maud Wells-Dymoke. Few novelists of manners have led lives so ideally suited to their art as Powell. Born in 1905 of, on his father's side, an old military family with its roots in Wales, and, on his mother's side, a line of prominent Lincolnshire landowners, Powell was educated at Eton from 1919 through 1923 and at Oxford's Balliol College, where he earned a B.A. in history in 1926. His experiences provided him with an insider's privileged view of the changes in middle- and upper-class English society since World War I. Because his father's duty in the army kept the family on the Continent after the war, Powell was also familiar with European society.

Various literary occupations, as well as travels, broadened Powell's view of society and provided settings for his fiction. After taking his degree, he entered publishing with Duckworth, the firm that published his first novel, Afternoon Men (1931). Venusberg (1932), his second novel, set in a fictional Baltic state, makes use of his knowledge of European manners. Powell deals with English provincial manners, particularly hunting, the aristocracy, unconventional military men, and artists with social ambition, in his next novel, From a View to a Death (1933).

Shortly after his marriage in 1934 to Lady Violet Pakenham, daughter of Brigadier the Fifth Earl of Longford, Powell left publishing to write film scripts for Warner Brothers of Great Britain. His satiric view of the film industry is reflected in Agents and Patients (1936). During the later 1930's, he contributed book reviews to the London Daily Telegraph and wrote What's Become of Waring (1939), a novel about a literary hoax. This novel, his last for twelve years, marked the end of Powell's apprenticeship as a writer.

Powell's fiction was interrupted by World War II. Commissioned in 1939 to a territorial battalion of the Welch Regiment, Powell served as an infantry second lieutenant for eighteen months. In 1941, he was transferred to the intelligence corps, where he acted as liaison officer between the War Office and Polish, Belgian, Czech, and French forces. By 1943, he was a major, and by the end of the war he had been decorated by the Czech and Belgian armies. On leaves from the war, Powell collected material for a definitive biography of the seventeenth century biographer and antiquarian John Aubrey, which was published as John Aubrey and His Friends (1948, 1963). Powell's first son, Tristram, was born shortly after his enlistment, and his second son, John, was born shortly after his discharge in 1946.

Powell returned to publishing fiction in 1951 with the release of A Question of Upbringing, the first novel of what was to become the twelve-volume sequence eventually entitled A Dance to the Music of Time (1951-1975). The purpose of this monumental project was to draw on his entire life experience in order to produce a work that included everything in English society that interested him. While the narrator of the series has nearly the same education, jobs, literary career, and military experience as his creator, the work should not be called autobiographical simply because it draws on its author's experience. His narrator, Nicholas Jenkins, like Powell himself, is more concerned with observing character and dramatizing the social and intellectual currents of his generation than revealing his personal life, as the traditional novelistic protagonist might.

Powell became chief review editor for The Times Literary Supplement in 1947. Six years later, he became the literary editor of the popular British humor magazine Punch, where his reviews and parodies appeared regularly until 1959, when he left to devote his literary energies entirely to A Dance to the Music of Time, as well as resuming regular reviewing for the Daily Telegraph. His reviews for this prominent, right-of-center British daily newspaper appeared biweekly. He also reviewed occasionally for The New York Times, as well as other British newspapers and magazines.

Powell's sequence was published entirely by one firm, Heinemann, in England and, after the fourth volume, was published by the Boston-based firm Little, Brown in the United States. Despite the quintessentially British aspects of his fiction, Powell's books sold basically as well in the United States as in Great Britain, and many American fans were among his most consistent correspondents.

With Lady Violet, Powell also continued to travel on the Continent and in the United States, which he had first visited in 1937 while searching for screenwriting work in Hollywood. In 1961, Powell lectured at a number of American universities, and in 1965 he returned to visit his youngest son, John, who was a student at Cornell University. He also published "The Garden God" and "The Rest I'll Whistle": The Text of Two Plays in 1971. These plays are comedies of manners; the plot of The Garden God, set on a cruise which visits a Greek island, anticipates the plot of his later novel The Fisher King (1986) in several respects, whereas The Rest I'll Whistle is set in the Welsh border country and provides a comic perspective on motifs borrowed from Greek tragedy.

Powell was sixty-nine when he finished A Dance to the Music of Time, a suitable age to produce a memoir. His four-volume memoir, To Keep the Ball Rolling (1976-1982), recalls A Dance to the Music of Time, not only because it was issued in installments and covers the same period as his fictional masterpiece, but also because it, too, shifts back and forth in time and has almost as much to say about its narrator's friends as it does about its narrator.

In the 1980's, Powell returned to fiction with the publication of a novella titled O, How the Wheel Becomes It! (1983), which deals with the repercussions of a slight romantic liaison in the 1920's on a literary critic in the 1980's. The Fisher King is a much more complex and significant work of fiction set around 1979, but like A Dance to the Music of Time, its narration is extraordinarily subtle, and its narrative is entangled with past events, many of them simply speculative. Despite the richness of this novel and the cleverness of his five prewar novels, it is A Dance to the Music of Time that remains Powell's masterpiece.

Later in his life, Powell also won acclaim for his Journals, published from 1995 through 1997. Powell began keeping a journal in early 1982, when he was beginning to write O, How The Wheel Becomes It! After he completed writing The Fisher King in 1985, the journal became the major vehicle for his creative output. Three volumes of the journal were published, the last chronicling events up to the end of 1992. Often compared to the work of other celebrated British diarists, such as James Lees-Milne, Virginia Woolf, and Frances Partridge, the journals not only record invaluable information about Powell's friends, who included authors V. S. Naipaul and Alison Lurie, but significant details about the writer's literary sensibility and creative process.

ANALYSIS

Powell is a very "British" writer. The characteristics of his fiction, its style and themes, are of a piece with the mainstream of the British novel of manners. Writing in this tradition stems from Henry Fielding and Jane Austen and includes William Makepeace Thackeray, Anthony Trollope, Benjamin Disraeli, William Hurrell Mallock, and Ford Madox Ford. Among Powell's contemporaries, Aldous Huxley, Evelyn Waugh, Ivy Compton-Burnett, Barbara Pym, and Kingsley Amis are all of this tradition. What all of these novelists have in common is their concern for the social customs and mores of a special group—generally, but not always, drawn from the upper classes—and a commitment to realistic narrative techniques. More particularly, Powell has drawn on the ironic techniques of Austen, Ford, Huxley, and Waugh. He shares with the first two a concern with the formal qualities of composition, especially the subordination of parts to the whole—the whole being the exploration of the relationships between the characters and their relationship to society. Powell's novels, particularly his first five, reflect many of the same character types, settings, and stylistic mannerisms of Huxley and Waugh. Like all of these writers, Powell dramatizes social values through his attention to manners.

The analytic style and complex structure of A Dance to the Music of Time grew from the spare, unobtrusive style and brief cinematic scenes of Powell's first novel, Afternoon Men. With each successive prewar novel, Powell increased his narrative commentary and cut his dialogue, lengthened his scenes and reduced their number. These developments reflect a shift from an almost purely dramatic to a more reflective approach to fiction. The aimless social world of his early novels is dramatized in witty, empty dialogue and frequently shifting, but never changing, party scenes. In these novels, Powell expresses his view of social life through a montage of futile gestures toward friendship, love, and personal identity. Powell describes the same society in A Dance to the Music of Time, but in this work he concentrates his narrator's attention on a few long scenes. The social implications of these scenes are reflected in the narrator's reactions, and are frequently reconsidered from the perspective of a different time and social context in a later volume.

The most significant technical development of Powell's fiction is in point of view. The short chapters of his first two novels are linked by the presence of their central character in every scene. Powell relaxes his grip on this device in his next two novels, which have a few omnisciently narrated chapters and a point of view that occasionally shifts from the central character to other characters. His last prewar novel, What's Become of Waring, is narrated in the first person with no loss of detachment or objectivity. Unlike its predecessors, What's Become of Waring does not describe a vivid social scene; so involved is its unnamed narrator in uncovering his own and Waring's identity that he rarely looks up long enough to notice his social milieu. In A Dance to the Music of Time, Powell has enough room to develop the first-person point of view into a subtle means of dramatizing the shifting identity of an entire society.

The characters in Powell's early novels tend to be one dimensional, their traits highly selective and consistent. With a line or two of introduction, Powell fixes them in the reader's imagination. While more of their character may be revealed, particularly in their dialogue, they do not develop. Yet with each succeeding novel, Powell's characterizations become fuller.

All the early novels treat aspects of social themes that Powell continued to explore throughout his long literary career: the unexpected interrelatedness of lives, the change of values in a disintegrating society, the ironic interplay of human involvement and detachment, and the relationship of power and character. Yet not until Powell turned to A Dance to the Music of Time did he have a form large enough to deal with the passage of time—the essential element in his treatment of the personal impact of social change.

Despite their differences, each of the five novels that Powell published during the 1930's anticipates some theme or technique of A Dance to the Music of Time. The qualities most admired in Powell's mature work—his restraint, his wit, his understanding of English society—are all found in varying degrees of development in his early work. The major themes of the early novels—the shifts in behavior among Britain's upper classes, the loss of illusions, and the difficulty of sustaining meaningful relationships—are continued in A Dance to the Music of Time, where ideals and traditions worth defending vie with the pragmatic values of commerce and the professions.

Structurally, all Powell's prewar novels prefigure his later "dance." Each novel ends about where it begins, its circular construction reinforcing the futility and resignation underlying the action. Moreover, having traveled a full but futile circle, Powell's characters rarely understand what they have done, what has happened to them, or where their gyrations have led them. In the early novels, experience is no teacher, and the reader is left with a lingering sense of the inexorable fatality of character, only partially obscured by Powell's comic surface. In A Dance to the Music of Time, this pervasive interplay of form and content is most powerfully expressed in the title's shaping metaphor, an allegorical painting by the French artist Nicolas Poussin of the Four Seasons dancing in a circle to Time's flute, "unable to control the melody, unable, perhaps, to control the . . . dance."

The sprawling structure of A Dance to the Music of Time owes its coherence to Powell's narrative point of view. His narrator, Nicholas Jenkins, whose experience links the diverse threads of the sequence, looks on life as a dance in which people appear and reappear, with various combinations of partners, moved by the changing tunes of time. Through his expanding awareness of the patterns revealed in "the seemingly meaningless gyrations" of the people whom he knows, Jenkins attempts to make sense of his society and the lives of his friends, including the melancholy Charles Stringham, the vigorous and hearty Peter Tampler, and the most memorable character in the sequence, the loathsome and opportunistic Kenneth Widmerpool, one of the great villains in English literature.

The style, theme, and structure of the entire sequence is suggested in the opening passage of its first novel, where a middle-aged Jenkins watches a group of street workers warming themselves around a small coal fire in a bucket on a snowy morning. This evocative passage (from which the short quotations used in the previous two paragraphs have been drawn) is echoed in the last sentence of the sequence's last novel, where another autumn fire again recalls "the formal measure of the Seasons. . . . suspended in the wintry silence." The workmen's movements around their fire in the opening scene remind the aesthetic Jenkins of Poussin's mythological scene of the rhythmic movement of Seasons, and then of his own experience of the movements of men in society:

The image of Time brought thoughts of mortality: of human beings, facing outward like the Seasons, moving hand in hand in intricate measure: stepping slowly, methodically, sometimes a trifle awkwardly, in evolutions that take recognisable shape: or breaking into seemingly meaningless gyrations, while partners disappear only to reappear again, once more giving pattern to the spectacle: unable to control the melody, unable, perhaps, to control the steps of the dance.

The slow rhythm of this remarkable sentence is characteristic of the sequence's stunning reflective passages. Like the lives of Jenkins's friends and the changes in their society, such sentences rise and fall, weave and interweave. Like the concept of the sequence itself, moreover, these reflective sentences tend to be long, involuted, qualified by parentheses and haunted by afterthoughts. Finally, they are utterly appropriate to the subject of Powell's vast canvas, a kinetic portrait of his generation drawn from the experience of five decades of social change.

A DANCE TO THE MUSIC OF TIME

First published: A Question of Upbringing, 1951; A Buyer's Market, 1952; The Acceptance World, 1955; At Lady Molly's, 1957; Casanova's Chinese Restaurant, 1960; The Kindly Ones, 1962; The Valley of Bones, 1964; The Soldier's Art, 1966; The Military Philosophers, 1968; Books Do Furnish a Room, 1971; Temporary Kings, 1973; Hearing Secret Harmonies, 1975

Type of work: Sequence novel

Fifty years of social change among Britain's upper classes are reflected in the recollections of Nicholas Jenkins, an urbane, self-effacing literary man.

The twelve volumes of A Dance to the Music of Time are usually grouped into four "movements" of three novels each. The first novel of the first movement, A Question of Upbringing, covers its narrator's years at school and at the university (Eton and Oxford, in the early 1920's, although Powell gives them no name). The action shifts to the social life of London in the late 1920's in A Buyer's Market, and The Acceptance World concludes the movement with a school reunion in the early 1930's. Each movement and novel are, in their own way, independent fragments of the whole sequence, but as the sequence develops, the novels certainly become less meaningful for readers unfamiliar with characters and events arising in earlier volumes.

Typically, the novels that constitute A Dance to the Music of Time consist of about four fifty-page episodes interspersed and sandwiched by page-long reflective passages, such as the one that opens the sequence. These episodes, with their attendant reflections, generally revolve around a small group of characters and a single action, usually a party or an outing. The last novel of each three-novel movement usually serves as a kind of climax for the sequence to that point. The school reunion and its immediate consequences, which conclude The Acceptance World, draw to a thematic close the various matters of upbringing and initiation into adult society that have concerned all three novels of the first movement. The Kindly Ones, the sixth novel in the sequence and the final novel of the second movement, cuts across the whole period of the first half of the sequence. It begins with a flashback to Nicholas Jenkins's childhood at the outbreak of World War I and ends with England's entrance into World War II, chronologically bracketing the entire first half of the sequence.

The first three novels cover Jenkins's life from age fourteen to about twenty-five, but readers learn less about him than about his school friends, Charles Stringham, Peter Templer, and Kenneth Widmerpool. Stringham and Templer, like the narrator, are sons of upper- or upper-middle-class families, although only Stringham has any links to the actual "aristocracy." Widmerpool, the son of a Nottinghamshire liquid fertilizer dealer, is an outsider who is viewed as a humorless misfit at school, always training to run races in which he invariably loses. Throughout the sequence, Widmerpool cuts a ridiculous figure, but by the end of the first movement, Jenkins sees that others take the stolid, self-important, and strong-willed misfit seriously. During the intervals of time between Jenkins's meetings with him after leaving school, Widmerpool becomes increasingly accepted in powerful business and political circles. Because their relationship is friendly but not intimate, their meetings are infrequent and usually coincidental. Yet these "Widmerpool scenes" are not only among the most comic in the sequence, but they also advance Powell's social theme. With each encounter, Jenkins grows less and less inclined to trust his snobbish public school view of society, which led to his misreading not only Widmerpool but also, to a lesser degree, Templer and Stringham, for whom success in the world seemed assured when Jenkins knew them at school. Templer, whose main interests are business and women, fails with both. The charming and even better-connected Stringham seems destined for a brilliant career in anything that attracts him, but his interests are unfocused, and his talents are dissipated by alcohol, family troubles, and aimless distractions. He fails at everything, but with grace, good humor, and modest detachment. Widmerpool's successes are accompanied by none of these endearing qualities.

By the end of the first movement, Powell's narrator has lost most of his early illusions about upbringing, character, and success in a world that he discovers is changing more rapidly than establishment attitudes are able to comprehend, let alone control. Jenkins's preoccupation with the loss of illusions is an even more pervasive theme in Powell's second group of three novels—At Lady Molly's, Casanova's Chinese Restaurant, and The Kindly Ones—covering the ominous years between 1934 and 1939, through the Depression to the edge of World War II. As Jenkins observes in the first chapter of At Lady Molly's, these are "times when the ice floes of life's river are breaking up . . . to float down-stream, before the torrent freezes again in due course into new and deceptively durable shape."

The fluidity of these times is suggested by the techniques, especially structural, of At Lady Molly's. The action is concentrated into a few months of 1935, but there is no sustained focus on any of the major characters. The title, as well as the tone, of the novel derives from Lady Molly Jeavons's household, the setting of many socially heterogeneous gatherings. There, Jenkins meets or hears about the two dozen or so new characters (largely friends and relatives of his friends and their relatives from the first movement) who will figure in the novels of this movement. Lady Molly represents the idiosyncratic mixture of several strains of English social life. Once the wife of a lord, she has been reduced since the end of World War I and the death of her husband to the disorderly life of her perpetual open houses.

The cultural confusion of English society between the wars is further suggested by the title of the second novel in this movement, Casanova's Chinese Restaurant, which deals less with professional and high society than with the troubled domestic lives of Jenkins's artist and musician friends. Tangled love affairs and intolerable domestic lives dog Powell's men of the imagination more than they do his men of power, for whom failures with women represent no serious setback in their plan of life. Throughout A Dance to the Music of Time, Powell uses the instability of domestic arrangements to suggest the dissolution of society.

With The Kindly Ones, a novel suffused with the ominous and heedless atmosphere of England at the brink of World War I and then World War II, Powell concludes the second movement and his account of English social life in the 1920's and 1930's. The Kindly Ones contains the only flashback in the sequence, its first section concentrating on the young Jenkins's boyhood on the verge of World War I. Hardly noticeable, because they are so completely integrated into the scenic structure of the novel, are Jenkins's reflective passages, which move allusively backward and forward in time, enlarging and enriching the significant context of each scene. The title of this novel refers to a euphemism for the vengeful Furies of Greek mythology, who were sometimes called "the kindly ones" in the vain hope that they would indeed behave this way. Powell's point, and the theme of his novel, is the intrusion of war into a peacetime society and how military conflict necessarily changes the lives and values of societies engaged in their own self-defense.

In the third movement, to which Powell refers as "the war trilogy," Widmerpool has risen to the rank of colonel and, from his position as the military assistant secretary to the Cabinet Office, is indirectly responsible for sending Templer to his death on a secret mission behind enemy lines in the German-occupied Balkans. Widmerpool is also responsible for having Stringham, who enlists as a private and is assigned as a mess waiter, reassigned to a mobile laundry in Singapore. Here, he is captured by the Japanese and dies as a prisoner of war. Early in the third movement, Widmerpool selects Jenkins, as the best of an unpromising lot of new officers available to him, to act as his junior assistant. By the movement's end, many of Jenkins's friends have been killed in the war, but Widmerpool appears to thrive on the opportunities of the war years and is untouched for long by any considerations except power.

The action of The Valley of Bones, the first volume of the war movement, takes place during the period known as "the phony war"—the early part of 1940, after England had declared war on Germany but before any fighting involving British troops had begun. Jenkins, now a thirty-five-year-old second lieutenant, is in training, first in Wales, then in Northern Ireland, then back in England. A new set of characters is introduced in the first two chapters, nearly all of them former Welsh bank clerks who are now army officers. Considerably younger than Jenkins, and his social inferiors besides, these former bank clerks are his military superiors.

The fighting is still far away, and life for the officers and men of Jenkins's company is largely involved with routine details made bearable by prospects of promotion. The contrast of the catastrophic events in Europe with the boredom, the self-important posturing, and the antagonisms of petty ambitions provides natural material for the social novelist. This scrambling for position also serves Jenkins with a meaningful link between civilian and military life; in both worlds, men of will, such as Widmerpool, triumph over men of imagination, such as Stringham or Jenkins.

Only one of the four chapters in The Valley of Bones is concerned with life outside the army, but with techniques developed in the earlier movements, Powell keeps the reader informed of the condition of nearly all the major characters. A chance encounter with a character last seen in A Question of Upbringing brings news of Templer and other friends, and various guests at a house party supply information from their own spheres. Such coincidental encounters, more than any other technique in the entire sequence, reveal the cohesive pattern of relationships underlying upper-class life in spite of the general social breakdown.

The Soldier's Art, the second novel of the war movement, covers events between the German occupation of Paris in June, 1940, and the invasion of Russia a year later. Two of its three long chapters deal with Jenkins's continuing problems in the home army, while the other, set in London, reflects the war's impact on English society. People very significant to Jenkins are killed by a German air raid over London.

The last vestiges of the old order of Jenkins's society fall to the exigencies of war in The Military Philosophers, a chaotic state of affairs reflected even in the structure of the novel. More fragmented than either of the volumes that closed the earlier movements, this novel provides an appropriate close to the war trilogy. The Military Philosophers covers the years from 1942 to the end of the war in Europe, a period of momentous events for the world, including the massacre in the Katyn Forest of Polish officers by a Soviet Union that later became England's ally in the struggle against Nazi Germany. For Jenkins, however, now serving as a liaison officer to various Allied armies in exile, these events, like most of the events reported in the sequence, are experienced at secondhand. Overriding the military conflicts and squabbles among the military attachés with whom Jenkins works is sex—throughout the sequence, the most formidable disturber of the peace. Nothing short of death (and death punctuates nearly every episode of this movement) affects the patterns of Powell's dance as much as romantic entanglements. Among the new characters introduced in The Military Philosophers is Pamela Flitton, Stringham's niece, whose constantly redirected romantic attentions wreck havoc wherever she goes, and in this novel she does get around. Considered individually, her romantic attachments mean almost nothing, but in the aggregate they suggest a kind of social upheaval. Her engagement to Widmerpool is announced in the last chapter of the novel.

The final movement of A Dance to the Music of Time looks at postwar society in England from 1945 to 1971, largely from the perspective of the literary scene. Jenkins has returned to his own modest literary career, and as the first novel of the final movement opens, he is at his old university, conducting research for a book on Robert Burton, the seventeenth century antiquarian and author of The Anatomy of Melancholy (1621). Later, Jenkins is to become the book review editor of a new left-wing literary magazine, Fission. For the most part, however, Jenkins is less directly involved in the action of this movement than in any previous one. In earlier parts of the sequence, he has been more often witness than participant, but in these final three novels Jenkins is less witness than listener. Presumably, his own life comprises his work as a writer and the satisfactions of a happy home life, punctuated with occasional appearances at parties, reunions, weddings, and funerals. These occasions allow Powell to draw together characters from earlier novels that have news of yet other characters, but readers hear little about Jenkins himself. By the final movement, except for a few key scenes, Jenkins relies on the accounts of others. Even when he is present in the scenes that he describes, it is more than ever as a disengaged spectator.

While characters from the earlier part of the sequence are more often heard about than seen, a number of interesting new characters become central in the final movement. So important are these new characters that readers unfamiliar with the previous nine volumes might be able to enjoy the last three independently without much confusion. These last novels are also among the most traditionally plotted for the sequence, each of them having a more distinct beginning, middle, and end than is usual for Powell.

Books Do Furnish a Room is set in and around London, although it opens at Oxford during the winter of 1945 and closes at Jenkins's old school in the fall of 1947. The most important new character is the flamboyantly self-dramatizing novelist X. Trapnel, who Jenkins meets and likes through his work on Fission. Trapnel falls in love with Widmerpool's femme fatale wife, Pamela, runs off with her, and suffers the fate of most of the men who have loved her. Only Widmerpool, now a Labour member of Parliament in the House of Commons and utterly confident that Pamela will return, seems unaffected by this fascinating, but extremely disturbed, woman. After an argument over the conclusion of a novel that Trapnel has completed, she throws the manuscript into a canal and leaves Trapnel. Crushed, he becomes a drunkard, turns to hack work, and within five years is dead.

The first and second chapters of Temporary Kings are set in Venice, where Jenkins and a number of his acquaintances are attending an international writers conference during the summer of 1958, eleven years after the close of Books Do Furnish a Room. The next two chapters take place at gatherings in various fine homes in England over the next year, and the brief final chapter is composed of Jenkins's recollections of events during the autumn of 1959. The novel introduces two attractive American characters, Russell Gwinnett and Louis Globber. Gwinnett is a professor doing research for a biography of Trapnel, and Globber is a publisher, playboy, and, latterly, a film producer. Globber plans to transform Pamela's version of Trapnel's lost novel into a film starring Pamela herself. He is, of course, smitten by her, but Pamela develops a consuming passion for Gwinnett and dies consummating it. Meanwhile, Widmerpool has been elevated to the House of Lords for service to the Labour Party after losing his seat in the House of Commons in the Tory victory of 1955. In the final chapter, he is under suspicion for espionage or treason. Of all the novels in the sequence, none has a more dramatic plot than Temporary Kings. That is particularly remarkable because almost none of its crucial episodes have been witnessed by the narrator; nearly all the events are reported indirectly, some of them filtered through several layers of hearsay.

Hearing Secret Harmonies, the concluding novel of A Dance to the Music of Time, skips yet another decade to 1968 and then to the autumn of 1971. Again, most of its events (the psychedelic world of hippie cults and rioting college students) are related at secondhand to Jenkins, who has fallen even further from direct involvement in the narrative. Widmerpool reappears first as a chancellor of a new university and then as a supporting member of a hippie commune. He dies as absurdly as he has lived, collapsing while attempting to stay in the lead of a naked jog with his commune. His death recalls his first appearance in A Question of Upbringing, puffing out of the mist as he trains for races that no one believed he could win.

TO KEEP THE BALL ROLLING

First published: Infants of the Spring, 1976; Messengers of Day, 1978; Faces in My Time, 1980; The Strangers All Are Gone, 1982

Type of work: Memoirs

Powell's memoirs provide a nonfictional equivalent to the material he covered in fictional terms in A Dance to the Music of Time.

Powell's memoirs were published in individual installments from 1976 through 1982; a one-volume abridged edition, To Keep the Ball Rolling, appeared in 1984. Powell prepared the abridged edition himself.

The first volume, Infants of the Spring, chronicles Powell's ancestry on both sides of his family, his immediate forebears, and his childhood and youth. Memories of several prominent classmates at school and the university, including the writers Henry Green, Harold Acton, and George Orwell, are prominently featured.

In the second volume of the memoirs, Messengers of Day, Powell describes his early years on the London writing and publishing scene, providing vivid details of his brief residence in the bohemian London district of Shepherd's Market. Sections are also devoted to Powell's longtime friend, peer, and rival, Evelyn Waugh; to his close friendship with the composer Constant Lambert (the model for the character of Hugh Moreland in A Dance to the Music of Time); and to a detailing of the key books, ranging from the works of Petronius to those of more modern writers, such as Marcel Proust and Fyodor Dostoevski, which influenced Powell throughout his career.

The third volume, Faces in My Time, covers Powell's marriage to Lady Violet and his military service. He also records his literary friendships with writers as diverse as F. Scott Fitzgerald, whom he met while seeking out work as a scriptwriter in Hollywood, and T. S. Eliot, whom he encountered at a seaside resort and liked despite not totally identifying with his literary and religious views.

The final volume, The Strangers All Are Gone, records Powell's move, with his family, to a house called The Chantry near the market town of Frome in Somerset, in England's West Country. It also records Powell's extensive travels, which included trips to India, Japan, the Philippines, and Thailand. In addition, Powell provides his opinions about William Shakespeare, from whose work derives the titles of the four individual memoirs; the title of the one-book abridged version is from Joseph Conrad. Powell argues that Shakespere's sonnets revealed a real homosexual passion for a biographical individual. He closes with a quote from the artist Michelangelo, who compared art to a snowman, saying that art "is sometimes worth making, even if it is, inevitably, temporary."

Powell's memoirs, like his novels, are more about other people than himself; he was not prone to self-revelation. They thus lack the deep introspection of the best autobiographies, nor are they replete with scandalous literary gossip. Nonetheless, their very self-effacement allows them to serve not only as a functional social history of twentieth century Britain but as a window upon the literary mind—how it works and how it operates based on a writer's specific experiences.

SUMMARY

While there is no general aesthetic of the sequence novel or roman-fleuve (a multivolume work of fiction chronicling the history of a family or social group), writers who work in this form are usually attempting a more comprehensive picture of character and society over longer periods of time than can be attained in a single novel. To accommodate the range of his social vision and narrative genius, Anthony Powell needed a more expansive form than that provided by his pre-World War II fiction. Even though his five prewar novels and the two independent novels published after A Dance to the Music of Time are interesting in themselves, the essence of Powell's art is expressed in the panoramic view of society developed with his twelve-volume sequence novel.

Dan McLeod; updated by Nicholas Birns

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Afternoon Men, 1931

Venusberg, 1932

From a View to a Death, 1933

Agents and Patients, 1936

What's Become of Waring, 1939

O, How the Wheel Becomes It!, 1983

The Fisher King, 1986

LONG FICTION (A DANCE TO THE MUSIC OF TIME):

A Question of Upbringing, 1951

A Buyer's Market, 1952

The Acceptance World, 1955

At Lady Molly's, 1957

Casanova's Chinese Restaurant, 1960

The Kindly Ones, 1962

The Valley of Bones, 1964

The Soldier's Art, 1966

The Military Philosophers, 1968

Books Do Furnish a Room, 1971

Temporary Kings, 1973

Hearing Secret Harmonies, 1975

POETRY:

Caledonia: A Fragment, 1934

DRAMA:

"The Garden God" and "The Rest I'll Whistle": The Text of Two Plays, pb. 1971

NONFICTION:

John Aubrey and His Friends, 1948, 1963

To Keep the Ball Rolling, 1976-1982 (includes Infants of the Spring, 1976; Messengers of Day, 1978; Faces in My Time, 1980; The Strangers All Are Gone, 1982)

Miscellaneous Verdicts: Writings on Writers, 1946-1989, 1990

Under Review: Further Writings on Writers, 1946-1989, 1991

Journals, 1995-1997 (3 volumes)

A Writer's Notebook, 2000

About the Author

Barber, Michael. Anthony Powell: A Life. Woodstock, N.Y.: Overlook Press, 2004.

Birns, Nicholas. Understanding Anthony Powell. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2004.

Brennan, Neil. Anthony Powell. New York: Twayne, 1995.

Felber, Lynette. Gender and Genre in Novels Without End: The British Roman-Fleuve. Gainesville: University of Florida Press, 1995.

Morris, Robert K. The Novels of Anthony Powell. Pittsburgh: University of Pittsburgh Press, 1968.

Russell, John. Anthony Powell: A Quintet, Sextet, and War. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1970.

Selig, Robert L. Time and Anthony Powell. London: Associated University Presses, 1991.

Spurling, Hilary. Invitation to the Dance: A Guide to Anthony Powell's "A Dance to the Music of Time." Boston: Little, Brown, 1977.

Tucker, James. The Novels of Anthony Powell. New York: Columbia University Press, 1976.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- How did Anthony Powell's choice of the sequence form make A Dance to the Music of Time different from his prewar novels?
- Describe the personalities of the characters Charles Stringham, Peter Templer, and Kenneth Widmerpool.
- What role does Powell's artistic vision play in his depiction of British society?
- How does Powell's narrator, Nicholas Jenkins, differ from the conventional novelistic protagonist?
- What effect did World War II have on Powell's career?

Library of Congress

J. B. PRIESTLEY

Born: Bradford, Yorkshire, England
September 13, 1894

Died: Stratford-upon-Avon, Warwickshire, England
August 14, 1984

One of England's most prolific and versatile writers, Priestley wrote essays, novels, and dramas, first to entertain and second to address the social and political issues of his day.

BIOGRAPHY

John Boynton Priestley was born at home in Bradford, England, on September 13, 1894, the son of solid, loving, working-class parents, Johnathan Priestley and Emma Holt. His father, a schoolmaster with a reputation for personal study and a passion for teaching and community involvement, instilled in him a love of literature and a firm commitment to social issues. The Bradford of Priestley's youth also provided him with a rich variety of experience and became the background—as Bruddersford—in his most popular novel, The Good Companions (1929). Priestley took advantage of every available cultural opportunity, knowing as he gained experience that what he most wanted was to write. He had several articles published in the local newspapers, including a Labour weekly, which reflected his acceptance of local socialist politics. The glory days and optimism of his youth ended abruptly in 1914 when England entered World War I. Priestley volunteered for the military and served five years in France, where he saw most of his friends killed. He was wounded when a mortar shell landed within two yards of him. Throughout his life Priestley remained bitter toward “the murderous imbecility” of World War I.

Although he felt higher education to be pretentious, Priestley reluctantly decided to study first English and then modern history and political science at Cambridge University. He did not care for university life or for his classmates, who he believed looked down on him, even when his work was published in the Cambridge Review. Upon graduation he moved to London with fifty pounds, his wife, Pat Tempest, two daughters, and a handful of good reviews for his first collection of essays, Brief Diversions: Being Tales, Travesties, and Epigrams (1922). Priestley worked as a freelance writer, publishing essays in periodicals such as The Spectator and Saturday Review. He also published several volumes of literary criticism, including the highly regarded Fools and Philosophers: A Gallery of Comic Figures from English Literature (published simultaneously in the United States as The English Comic Characters) in 1925.

Priestley's literary output during the early 1920's was remarkable, considering the shambles of his personal life. His father died, his wife contracted cancer and was suffering a slow, painful death, and he had an affair with a married woman who gave birth to his third daughter. One year after his wife's death in 1925, he married by-then-divorced Mary Holland Freeway Lewis. During this stressful time, Priestley discovered that hard work saw him through life's difficulties and, in addition to his constant stream of essays, he wrote three books. In 1927, his first two novels, Adam in Moonshine and Benighted, were published but attracted little attention. Priestley became a close friend of novelist Hugh Walpole, who agreed to collaborate with him on a novel of correspondence, Farthing Hall (1929), which was thereby assured of critical notice. On its completion, Priestley immediately began work on The Good Companions, the long narrative novel that established him as a popular writer. Angel Pavement, which was published in 1930, was also a success.

Priestley's career as a playwright began in 1931, when he collaborated with playwright Edward Knoblock on a stage version of The Good Companions (pr. 1931, pb. 1935). Although the play was successful, critics complained that a novelist could not write in the succinct style of a playwright. Priestley decided to prove them wrong and wrote, in one week, Dangerous Corner (pr., pb. 1932), which, for three decades, was the most often performed play by a living English writer.

Priestley lived the next fifty years as a prolific literary celebrity. In the 1930's, he became interested in theories of time, and he based his plays Time and the Conways (pr., pb. 1937) on British military engineer J. W. Dunne's time theory (serialism) and I Have Been Here Before (pr., pb. 1937) on Russian journalist P. D. Ouspensky's theory of three-dimensional time. In the 1940's, Priestley became Britain's most popular radio commentator, providing both solace and optimism to a country at war. He wrote patriotic novels such as Daylight on Saturday: A Novel About an Aircraft Factory (1943) and concluded the war years with a drama, An Inspector Calls (pr. 1946, pb. 1947), his only play to enjoy an enduring success like that of Dangerous Corner. Priestley married his third wife, renowned anthropologist Jacquetta Hawkes, in July, 1953. The 1950's were filled with plays, novels, and screenplays that paid handsomely but that have not endured the test of time. The 1960's brought literary success in the theater, with the adaptation of A Severed Head (pr. 1963, pb. 1964) in collaboration with Iris Murdoch, the novel's author, and his own masterpiece, written at age seventy-four, The Image Men: Out of Town and London End, a novel published in two parts, Out of Town (1968) and London End (1968). The last of his more than 150 works was autobiographical, Instead of the Trees (1977). Priestley's health slowly deteriorated after his eightieth birthday, though he remained as active as possible until his death, a month prior to his ninetieth birthday, on August 14, 1984.

ANALYSIS

Between 1922 and 1977, J. B. Priestley wrote more than one hundred books. These include numerous novels and about forty plays, together with literary criticism, social histories, essays, autobiographies, and travelogues, but do not include his screenplays and teleplays. For decades his novels were the most read and his dramas were the most often produced of any living English writer. Only one decade after his death, his novels were almost forgotten, and only two of his plays were still produced with any regularity. The reasons for his unprecedented success and for his fleeting preeminence are the same: He addressed the issues of his time to the people of his time. The effect of his writing was powerfully immediate but without the universality that allows literature to transcend its own day.

Priestley's novels are difficult to categorize because he is not associated with any particular movement and the influence of many schools of thought can be found throughout his fiction. This results from the enjoyment he derived from the technical challenge of creating in different styles. Priestley wanted to tell a story, to cause his reader to laugh, to cry, and to think, but he always based his writing on the belief that people read primarily to be entertained. Given his working-class background and experiences at Cambridge, it is not surprising that Priestley never wrote for the intellectual or professor of literature. This disregard may have contributed to his almost never being included in courses on the modern English novel. History has also demonstrated that critics are usually disdainful of popular artists. The broad enthusiasm with which his books were received by two generations of the general public contributed to the critics' dismissal of his works as typical light fare from "Jolly Jack" Priestley.

Priestley's novels can be broadly grouped into three categories. One is the suspense thriller, such as Saturn over the Water (with the subtitle An Account of His Adventures in London, South America, and Australia by Tim Bedford, Painter; Edited with Some Preliminary and Concluding Remarks by Henry Sulgrave and Here Presented to the Reading Public, 1961). The second is lighthearted satire, such as Sir Michael and Sir George (with the subtitle A Tale of COMSA and DISCUS and the New Elizabethans, 1964), a sparkling tale of the last days of two competing arts councils. The third is the thoughtful social commentary of his best novels, such as Angel Pavement (1930), a piercing examination of the struggling lower-middle-class workers in a small London office, and Bright Day (1946), about a screenwriter's loss of innocence. Priestley's novels usually reflect a romantic view of life. Even in his darker tales, such as Blackout in Gretley: A Story of—and for—Wartime (1942), Priestley reflects an enthusiasm for life, sometimes to the point of sentimentality, which explains his usual happy endings. A favorite device, which he perfected in his first major success, The Good Companions, was to gather a group of characters, each with a unique background, and allow them to struggle together toward their various goals. Through this struggle they learn the importance of community and of responsibility to one's fellow human beings.

Priestley valued clarity. He never wrote in a cryptic manner. His storytelling is straightforward and his themes are always explained. His keen sense of observation and description in such novels as Faraway (1932) generated the criticism that his novels are mere reporting. This ability to characterize and describe enabled his unsophisticated readers to remain with him even when he wrote his esoteric novels and plays about the nature of time. Priestley conjectured that people do not live in linear time but in circular time. Life repeats until the inner self discovers or learns how to change and improve, at which time the circle becomes a spiral and the self escapes to a higher plane of existence. This is best described in the novel The Magicians (1954).

Priestley is remembered almost exclusively as a playwright. Dangerous Corner and An Inspector Calls both have the distinction of being, for several decades, the most often produced plays on five continents by an English writer. In 1971, drama critic and anthologist Stanley Richards selected Dangerous Corner as one of the ten best mystery and suspense plays of the modern theater. From 1993 to 1994, An Inspector Calls had a successful revival in London's West End and then on Broadway. Although neither are great dramatic literature, both plays contain all of the elements necessary for successful suspense drama: interesting characters, intriguing situation, and ingenious construction with an unexpected twist at the climax. Dangerous Corner is the better of the two, with its theme (that a chance remark may completely alter the course of one's life) heightened by surprisingly modern subthemes of homosexuality, drug use, and criminal cover-up. An Inspector Calls, on the other hand, is peopled with caricatures, obvious in its devices, and preachy in its condemnation of the disregard of individuals for one another. According to Priestley, it was meant to be an allegory for the history of England in the first half of the twentieth century. Interestingly, it was first produced in Moscow and became a favorite play in communist and socialist countries.

Priestley was known to write his plays quickly, often within seven to ten days. His critics complained that they did not wish to be subjected to unrevised plays. His champions extolled his ability to define a unique situation, delineate characters, and recreate the rhythms of conversation and dialect from various locations and classes of England. These qualities are in full evidence in the best of his social comedies and farces, such as When We Are Married (pr., pb. 1938), a delightful, if dated, comedy created on the premise that three respectable couples discover that their marriages are illegal and that they have been living in sin for these past twenty-five years.

Priestley also wrote "time plays," such as I Have Been Here Before, in which he disrupts the linear flow of time in order to present an alternative reality. In Time and the Conways the first and third acts take place in 1919, with the second act set in 1937. The audience experiences the ironies of the Conways' lives because so much more is known about the characters than they know themselves.

Whether writing novels and plays to satirize, to theorize about time, or to encapsulate social philosophy, Priestley believed that people read first to be entertained, and he wrote to accommodate them. His ability to create exotic and familiar locations, intriguing situations, interesting characters, and tell a good tale attracted a popular audience throughout the world.

THE GOOD COMPANIONS

First published: 1929

Type of work: Novel

An unlikely group of people joins together in an attempt to preserve a troupe of traveling performers in spite of its dwindling audience.

In The Good Companions, Priestley perfected a favorite device of throwing together a disparate group of people who attempt to achieve a common goal. He succeeded in his intent to write a long, old-fashioned novel, creating a relaxed, bittersweet tale, told in good humor. His most popular novel, The Good Companions has remained in print since its first publication. Its style and popular success place Priestley alongside the masters of the long English novel, Henry Fielding, Charles Dickens, and William Makepeace Thackeray. It most closely resembles the Victorian style, with its humorous chapter subtitles, for example: “Inigo Jumps Out of a Train and Finds Himself in Love.”

Priestley constructed The Good Companions like a three-act play. In Book One, strangers meet and band together. Mr. Oakroyd is escaping the burden of job and family. Elizabeth Trant is on her own after years of nursing her sick father. Inigo Jollifant is a former schoolteacher with a knack for knocking out a quick tune on the piano. United by a need to flee responsibilities and to find happiness, they befriend a broken-down theatrical troupe called the Dinky Doos.

In Book Two, they set out to tour the provinces with a new name, The Good Companions. The dreams, frustrations, hard work, and joys of the traveling performers are chronicled. Secondary characters are quickly drawn as stereotypes, immediately identifiable as personalities associated with the theater and the townspeople they encounter. There is Morton Mitcham, banjo player, as nimble with the truth as he is with his instrument, and the stars of the troupe, Jerry Jerningham and Miss Susie Dean. Priestley demonstrates a unique ability to capture the rhythm and dialect of each character and locale. This ear for language later became a distinguishing feature of his stage dialogue. The world of Priestley’s novel may now seem distant, but it was absolutely realistic for its initial readers.

Book Three relates the inevitable demise of The Good Companions. Members of the troupe disperse to their various lives. Miss Trant marries an old Scottish admirer. Miss Susie Dean pursues a career in the musical theater while a pining Inigo Jollifant tries to follow her star. As in many Priestley tales, the optimistic theme of a diverse group finding individual fulfillment by helping one another is obvious. Not everyone gets what he or she wants, but they all discover that happiness can only be found in the heart. The Good Companions succeeds because it creates a wonderful world in which to escape. Its popular appeal and romantic optimism led critics to dub the author “Jolly Jack” Priestley, a nickname that he hated and that he tried to shed for the rest of his life.

DANGEROUS CORNER

First published: 1932 (first published, 1932)

Type of work: Play

A chance comment leads to the revelation that a suicide was really murder and that seemingly respectable friends are actually corrupt.

Dangerous Corner, Priestley’s first solo effort for the theater, was written in only one week to prove a novelist could write a play. He demonstrated a talent for developing the interesting characters and intriguing situations required for suspense drama and added a unique time twist that resulted in the play’s continuing success on stage.

In the British version (the play was “laundered” and given an American context for Broadway), Dangerous Corner opens with the timeworn theatrical device of a shot in the dark and a woman’s scream. When the lights come up it is revealed that there is no murder. A group of women have been listening to a radio drama and discussing the program’s title, “The Sleeping Dog.” Priestley believed that analogies should be clear, that there should be no question about the meaning of an author's symbols. Truth is the sleeping dog that they should let lie, specifically the truth regarding the mysterious suicide of Freda's brother-in-law, Martin. When the men join the group, Stanton agrees that the truth is often as healthy as speeding too fast around a corner. "And," Freda declares, "life's got a lot of dangerous corners."

Like most suspense plays, the success of Dangerous Corner results from the ingeniousness of the situation, the cleverness of the resolution, and an unexpected twist at the play's climax. With the philosophical foundation laid, the characters settle in for an evening of small talk. Olwen recognizes a musical cigarette box and remembers that it belonged to Martin. When Freda pointedly disagrees, there is a pause as they "look at one another steadily." Here is their dangerous corner: Will Freda let this comment pass? She does not. This chance remark dredges up the truth of everyone's secret associations with Martin. The confessions of adultery, homosexuality, drug abuse, theft, and criminal cover-up destroy every relationship and reveal that Martin was, in fact, murdered.

These are the ingredients of modern melodrama. It is the unexpected twist at the climax that raises Dangerous Corner above most other suspense plays. Devastated by the revelations, Martin's brother, Robert, exits as the stage lights dim. In the blackout, the shot and woman's scream are repeated. Surprisingly the lights come back up on the exact scene that started the play. In a foreshadowing of Priestley's later "time plays," the story begins again. This time, however, as the characters approach the "sleeping dog" of truth, Olwen's chance remark is left unchallenged, the dangerous corner is successfully negotiated. Priestley does not allow the truth to change, merely the characters' knowledge of it. This device, where ironies are made manifest because the audience knows more than the characters, became a favorite technique in many of his works.

AN INSPECTOR CALLS

First produced: 1946 (first published, 1947)

Type of work: Play

A mysterious inspector calls on a respectable family and reveals how each member was partly to blame for a terrible suicide.

Like Dangerous Corner, An Inspector Calls is a suspense play that investigates a suicide through self-incrimination. It also reflects Priestley's consuming interest in time theory. In spite of these similarities, the two plays were written for very different purposes.

An Inspector Calls is a parable on the responsibility of the individual toward one's fellow beings, and it succeeds in spite of its heavy-handed sermonizing. Arthur Birling and his family are celebrating their daughter Sheila's engagement to Gerald Croft. This will also merge two corporate competitors, resulting in higher profits. Priestley relies on the audience's knowledge of recent events to color Birling's optimism with irony as he extols the wonders of the Titanic, which is about to set sail into a world that will avoid war. These ironies also foreshadow the impending disaster about to strike the Birlings when Inspector Goole unexpectedly arrives. True to his name, the inspector resembles a ghoul as he glares at the family, relentlessly repeating his message that a young woman has killed herself by drinking disinfectant.

The details of the woman's hideous and painful death are described repeatedly as Goole methodically reveals how each member of this respectable family was partly responsible for her untimely death. Birling fired her for requesting a small raise. In a spoiled rage, Sheila Birling insisted she be fired from her next job. After Croft had an affair with the girl, she picked up with a wild young man who left her alone and pregnant. Mrs. Birling used her influence to deny the girl charity, contending that the "unknown father" should be found. The drunken father is her own son, Eric. The inspector condemns them all for their part in this tragic suicide.

It is the unexpected twist at the end that makes the play palatable in spite of its obvious structure, stereotyped characters, and heavy-handed lecturing. After the inspector leaves, Priestley adds dimension and substance to the play. The family first rationalizes and then questions the legitimacy of the so-called inspector. Phone calls prove that there is no Inspector Goole and that there has been no suicide. It has all been a joke. As the family returns to normal, forgetting their terrifying lessons, the phone rings: A woman has just killed herself by drinking disinfectant and an inspector is on his way to question them. Priestley's fluid use of time leaves the audience gasping.

Priestley's theme of the individual's responsibility to society is obvious. The play's historical references are not enough, however, to manifest the intended allegorical level of the play as the history of twentieth century England. An Inspector Calls succeeds as suspense drama, but not as an allegory of how no one is blameless.

SUMMARY

For more than fifty years, J. B. Priestley was among the most prolific, versatile, and best-loved English writers, with scores of novels, plays, essays, travelogues, critical analyses, and autobiographies to his credit. He entertained his audience with likable characters in well-told tales that responded passionately to his times. His works are noted for their versatility, romantic optimism, and for his experiments with time. His books and plays provide a valuable interpretation of the issues facing the British through five decades of the twentieth century.

Gerald S. Argetsinger

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Adam in Moonshine, 1927

Benighted, 1927

Farthing Hall, 1929 (with Hugh Walpole)

The Good Companions, 1929

Angel Pavement, 1930

Faraway, 1932

I'll Tell You Everything, 1933 (with George Bullett)

Wonder Hero, 1933

They Walk in the City: The Lovers in the Stone Forest, 1936

The Doomsday Men: An Adventure, 1938

Let the People Sing, 1939

Blackout in Gretley: A Story of—and for—Wartime, 1942

Daylight on Saturday; A Novel About an Aircraft Factory, 1943

Three Men in New Suits, 1945

Bright Day, 1946

Jenny Villiers: A Story of the Theatre, 1947

Festival at Farbridge, 1951 (pb. in U.S. as Festival)

Low Notes on a High Level: A Frolic, 1954

The Magicians, 1954

The Thirty-first of June: A Tale of True Love, Enterprise, and Progress in the Arthurian and Ad-Atomic Ages, 1961

Saturn over the Water: An Account of His Adventures in London, South America, and Australia by Tim Bedford, Painter; Edited with Some Preliminary and Concluding Remarks by Henry Sulgrave and Here Presented to the Reading Public, 1961

The Shape of Sleep: A Topical Tale, 1962

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Is it a necessary development or an unfortunate one (or both) that so much of J. B. Priestley's fiction has been forgotten?
- Did Priestley's attitudes toward the academic life in effect cut him off from critical acceptance?
- Does a play like An Inspector Calls receive more credit now than it did in 1946? If so, why?
- Can a reader learn more about the society in Priestley's time from him than from more highly regarded writers of fiction on social issues?
- What previous literary works seem to have been models for The Good Companions?

J. B. Priestley

Sir Michael and Sir George: A Tale of COMSA and DISCUS and the New Elizabethans, 1964 (also known as Sir Michael and Sir George: A Comedy of New Elizabethans)

Lost Empires: Being Richard Herncastle's Account of His Life on the Variety Stage from November, 1913, to August, 1914, Together with a Prologue and Epilogue, 1965

Salt Is Leaving, 1966

It's an Old Country, 1967

The Image Men: Out of Town and London End, 1968; published in two parts as Out of Town, 1968, and London End, 1968

The Carfitt Crisis, 1975

Found, Lost, Found: Or, The English Way of Life, 1976

My Three Favorite Novels, 1978

SHORT FICTION:

The Town Major of Miraucourt, 1930

Going Up: Stories and Sketches, 1950

The Other Place, and Other Stories of the Same Sort, 1953

The Carfitt Crisis, and Two Other Stories, 1975

POETRY:

The Chapman of Rhymes, 1918

DRAMA:

The Good Companions, pr. 1931, pb. 1935 (adaptation of his novel; with Edward Knoblock)

Dangerous Corner, pr., pb. 1932

The Roundabout, pr. 1932, pb. 1933

Laburnum Grove, pr. 1933, pb. 1934

Eden End, pr., pb. 1934

Cornelius, pr., pb. 1935

Duet in Floodlight, pr., pb. 1935

Bees on the Boat Deck, pr., pb. 1936

Spring Tide, pr., pb. 1936 (with George Billam)

I Have Been Here Before, pr., pb. 1937

People at Sea, pr., pb. 1937

Time and the Conways, pr., pb. 1937

Mystery at Greenfingers, pr., pb. 1938

When We Are Married, pr., pb. 1938

Music at Night, pr. 1938, pb. 1947

Johnson over Jordan, pr., pb. 1939

The Long Mirror, pr., pb. 1940

Goodnight, Children, pr., pb. 1942

They Came to a City, pr. 1943, pb. 1944

Desert Highway, pr., pb. 1944

The Golden Fleece, pr. 1944, pb. 1948

How Are They at Home?, pr., pb. 1944

Ever Since Paradise, pr. 1946, pb. 1950

An Inspector Calls, pr. 1946, pb. 1947

The Linden Tree, pr. 1947, pb. 1948

The Rose and Crown, pb. 1947 (one act)

The High Toby, pb. 1948 (for puppet theater)

Home Is Tomorrow, pr. 1948, pb. 1949

The Plays of J. B. Priestley, pb. 1948-1950 (3 volumes)

Summer Day's Dream, pr. 1949, pb. 1950
Bright Shadow, pr., pb. 1950
Seven Plays of J. B. Priestley, pb. 1950
Dragon's Mouth, pr., pb. 1952 (with Jacquetta Hawkes)
Treasure on Pelican, pr. 1952, pb. 1953
Mother's Day, pb. 1953 (one act)
Private Rooms, pb. 1953 (one act)
Try It Again, pb. 1953 (one act)
A Glass of Bitter, pb. 1954 (one act)
The White Countess, pr. 1954 (with Hawkes)
The Scandalous Affair of Mr. Kettle and Mrs. Moon, pr., pb. 1955
These Our Actors, pr. 1956
The Glass Cage, pr. 1957, pb. 1958
The Pavilion of Masks, pr. 1963
A Severed Head, pr. 1963, pb. 1964 (with Iris Murdoch; adaptation of Murdoch's novel)
An Inspector Calls, and Other Plays, pb. 2001

SCREENPLAY:

Last Holiday, 1950

NONFICTION:

Brief Diversions: Being Tales, Travesties, and Epigrams, 1922
Papers from Lilliput, 1922
I for One, 1923
Figures in Modern Literature, 1924
Fools and Philosophers: A Gallery of Comic Figures from English Literature, 1925 (pb. in U.S. as The English Comic Characters)
George Meredith, 1926
Talking: An Essay, 1926
Open House: A Book of Essays, 1927
Thomas Love Peacock, 1927
The English Novel, 1927, 1935, 1974
Apes and Angels: A Book of Essays, 1928
Too Many People, and Other Reflections, 1928
The Balconinny, and Other Essays, 1929 (pb. in U.S. as The Balconinny, 1931)
English Humour, 1929, 1976
The Lost Generation: An Armistice Day Article, 1932
Self-Selected Essays, 1932
Albert Goes Through, 1933
English Journey: Being a Rambling but Truthful Account of What One Man Saw and Heard and Felt and Thought During a Journey Through England During the Autumn of the Year 1933, 1934
Four-in-Hand, 1934
Midnight on the Desert: A Chapter of Autobiography, 1937 (pb. in U.S. as Midnight on the Desert: Being an Excursion into Autobiography During a Winter in America, 1935-1936, 1937)
Rain upon Godshill: A Further Chapter of Autobiography, 1939
Britain Speaks, 1940
Postscripts, 1940 (radio talks)
Out of the People, 1941
Britain at War, 1942
British Women Go to War, 1943
The Man-Power Story, 1943

J. B. Priestley

Here Are Your Answers, 1944

The New Citizen, 1944

Letter to a Returning Serviceman, 1945

Russian Journey, 1946

The Secret Dream: An Essay on Britain, America, and Russia, 1946

The Arts Under Socialism: Being a Lecture Given to the Fabian Society, with a Postscript on What Government Should Do for the Arts Here and Now, 1947

Theatre Outlook, 1947

Delight, 1949

Journey Down a Rainbow, 1955 (with Jacquetta Hawkes)

All About Ourselves, and Other Essays, 1956

The Writer in a Changing Society, 1956

The Art of the Dramatist: A Lecture Together with Appendices and Discursive Notes, 1957

Thoughts in the Wilderness, 1957

Topside: Or, The Future of England, a Dialogue, 1958

The Story of Theatre, 1959

Literature and Western Man, 1960

William Hazlitt, 1960

Charles Dickens: A Pictorial Biography, 1962

Margin Released: A Writer's Reminiscences and Reflections, 1962

The English Comic Characters, 1963

Man and Time, 1964

The Moments and Other Pieces, 1966

All England Listened: J. B. Priestley's Wartime Broadcasts, 1968

Essays of Five Decades, 1968 (Susan Cooper, editor)

Trumpets over the Sea: Being a Rambling and Egotistical Account of the London Symphony Orchestra's Engagement at Daytona Beach, Florida, in July-August, 1967, 1968

The Prince of Pleasure and His Regency, 1811-1820, 1969

Anton Chekhov, 1970

The Edwardians, 1970

Over the Long High Wall: Some Reflections and Speculations on Life, Death, and Time, 1972

Victoria's Heyday, 1972

The English, 1973

Outcries and Asides, 1974

A Visit to New Zealand, Particular Pleasures: Being a Personal Record of Some Varied Arts and Many Different Artists, 1974

The Happy Dream: An Essay, 1976

Instead of the Trees, 1977 (autobiography)

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE:

Snoggle, 1972

EDITED TEXTS:

- Essayist Past and Present: A Selection of English Essays*, 1925
Tom Moore's Diary: A Selection, 1925
The Book of Bodley Head Verse, 1926
The Female Spectator: Selections from Mrs. Eliza Heywood's Periodical, 1744-1746, 1929
Our Nation's Heritage, 1939
Scenes of London Life, from "Sketches by Boz" by Charles Dickens, 1947
The Best of Leacock, 1957
Four English Novels, 1960
Four English Biographies, 1961
Adventures in English Literature, 1963
An Everyman Anthology, 1966

About the Author

- Atkins, John. J. B. Priestley: The Last of the Sages. London: Calder, 1981.
Braine, John G. J. B. Priestley. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1978.
Brome, Vincent. J. B. Priestley. London: Hamish Hamilton, 1988.
Cooper, Susan. J. B. Priestley: Portrait of an Author. London: Heinemann, 1970.
De Vitas, A. A., and Albert E. Kalson. J. B. Priestley. Boston: Twayne, 1980.
Gray, Dulce. J. B. Priestley. Stroud, England: Sutton, 2000.
Hawthorne, Tom. "Priestley's War: Social Change and the British Novel, 1939-1945." Midwest Quarterly 45, no. 2 (Winter, 2004): 155-167.
Klein, Holder. J. B. Priestley's Fiction. New York: P. Lang, 2002.
———. J. B. Priestley's Plays. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988.
Priestley, J. B. The World of J. B. Priestley. Edited by Donald G. MacRae. London: Heinemann, 1967.

© Nancy Crampton

V. S. PRITCHETT

Born: Ipswich, England
December 16, 1900

Died: London, England
March 20, 1997

Universally recognized as a consummate artist of the short story, Pritchett elevated the genre to social comedy by the use of memorable character portrayals, genial wit, and bittersweet irony.

BIOGRAPHY

V. S. Pritchett (PRIH-chiht) was born into a middle-class family on December 16, 1900, in Ipswich, England. He was the firstborn son of Walter Pritchett, a Yorkshireman, and Beatrice Martin, a Londoner. Within six years three other children, Cyril, Kathleen, and Gordon, were born. The Pritchett family led miserable lives inasmuch as Walter possessed an unstable nature, indulging in frequent job changes and forcing his family into an itinerant life of moving from one relative's home to another. (Although unwilling to discuss much of his private life, Pritchett referred to the negative, and sometimes brutal, aspects of his father in his autobiographies and fiction.)

Pritchett attended Alleyn's Grammar School for two years and at sixteen left the classroom to enter the leather trade. This experience, providing him with ample opportunity to meet British people of all classes, was an invaluable one for his future writing. At twenty-one Pritchett, tiring of the business routine, left for Paris, where he lived for two years, working in a photography supply company. His penchant for languages was evident at an early age; in Paris he further perfected his French. Always an omnivorous reader, he immersed himself in reading French writers in French and also began to read Russian literature, especially authors such as Ivan Turgenev, Anton Chekhov, Leo Tolstoy, and Fyodor Dostoevski. Pritchett soon began to feel the irresistible urge to write. Having been introduced to Christian Science in England, he approached The Christian Science Monitor, offering the newspaper some impressionistic articles and short stories; the newspaper accepted a few articles. After two years in Paris, his money exhausted, he returned to London. Through luck, in 1923 he was assigned by The Christian Science Monitor to cover Dublin and the civil war. While in Ireland he traveled extensively, an important factor in his later fiction.

Pritchett in 1924 married Evelyn Maude Vigers, an actress. Subsequently, he was transferred to Spain. In the Iberian Peninsula he met a wide variety of students, professors, poets, and journalists at Madrid University. The stark country, much of it the color of burnt sienna, intrigued him after the green of England. He now began to read and study famous Spanish writers such as Miguel de Unamuno and Pío Baroja and the Italian art critic Benedetto Croce. All in all, he spent two years in Spain as a correspondent. Although he was successful in journalism, he began to weary of writing for the newspaper and yearned to begin writing fiction full time. He did write a few short stories but then accepted The Christian Science Monitor's offer to report from North Africa, eventually visiting Algeria, Tunisia, and Morocco. Eventually, he visited the United States. The Christian Science Monitor finally terminated Pritchett's contract, and he returned to London. Jobless, he returned to Spain to collect material for writing a travel book. After a three-month walking tour, he wrote Marching Spain (1928), which was accepted by a London publisher.

Then followed the publishing of Clare Drummer (1929), a novel, and a collection of short stories. Another novel Shirley Sanz (also published as Elopement into Exile) appeared in 1932.

Pritchett's marriage to Evelyn Vigors ended in divorce. In 1934, he married Dorothy Roberts, who became his literary assistant. At this juncture he experienced a heightened creativity in his writing. He attributed it to having fallen passionately in love with Dorothy and often spoke of the fusion of love and passion with writing. The Pritchetts had two children, Josephine, born in 1938, and Oliver, born in 1940.

In the next several years, he published several other novels, collections of essays, travel articles, and some short stories. During World War II, he was attached to the Ministry of Information and served with the Home Guard. In 1945 the New Statesman appointed him its literary editor, a job he retained until 1949, when he resigned. Two years later he became director of the New Statesman. In 1948, with Elizabeth Bowen and Graham Greene, two well-known English novelists and short-story writers, Pritchett collaborated in writing Why Do I Write?

Despite Pritchett's limited formal education, from his varied travels and experience in writing journalistic pieces, novels, and short stories he became known for his urbane wit and genial demeanor and for his rich insight into literature. Princeton University offered him the Christian Gauss Lecturer post in 1953. The University of California at Berkeley invited him to accept the Beckman Professorship in 1962; Smith College asked him to become a writer-in-residence; Brandeis University appointed him a visiting professor in 1968; the University of Cambridge in 1969 offered him the Clark Lectureship. During these years he published some of his best short-story collections, including The Sailor, The Sense of Humour, and Other Stories (1956); in 1961 he published his most beloved short story, "When My Girl Comes Home." Pritchett's impressionistic travel books include London Perceived (1962) and New York Proclaimed (1965).

He also published two autobiographies, A Cab at the Door (1968) and Midnight Oil (1972), both books including carefully selected personal details about his family life but considerable material about his travels and his reading and literary influences. Pritchett wrote not only literary essays for journals but also books on literary figures: George Meredith and English Comedy (1970), Balzac: A Biography (1973), and The Gentle Barbarian: The Life and Work of Turgenev (1977).

He received honorary doctorates of letters from Leeds University, England, in 1972 and from Columbia University in 1978. A particularly distinguished award was bestowed on Pritchett by Queen Elizabeth II in 1975 when he became Sir Victor, knighted for his services to literature. There were other international honors that placed him among the premier writers of the world. He was elected president of the English International Association of PEN in 1971, became international president of PEN in 1974, and was made an honorary member of the American Academy of Arts and Letters in 1971. In 1977, he was elected president of the Society of Authors. In addition, he received the Heinemann Award in 1969, the PEN Award in 1974, the W. H. Smith Literary Award in 1990, and the Golden Pen Award in 1993. Pritchett died of a stroke in London on March 20, 1997, at the age of ninety-six.

Pritchett wrote five novels, all of which were rather unsuccessful. His forte was the short story, a genre that he thought to be particularly apt because it reflects the fractured life of twentieth century society. The title stories of the various collections are some of the most poignant and ironic creations of this world-famous and respected short-story writer.

ANALYSIS

Pritchett's novels never received much praise. One of the earliest is Clare Drummer, much influenced by Joseph Conrad, the famous Polish-born writer of consummate prose and psychological depth. The story line is unfocused and the characters are not fully realized. Shirley Sanz bears the imprint of Gustave Flaubert's Madame Bovary (1857; English translation, 1886), wherein Shirley is a fellow romantic who marries, goes to Spain, has a child, becomes bored with country living, has an affair, and then renounces her lover. Although at times exciting, the novel lacks a sharply focused theme and suffers from too much coincidence of episodes. Nothing Like Leather (1935), based on Pritchett's years in the leather trade as a tanner, shows growth and development in the writing of his novels. Nonetheless, the main protagonist is not sharply delineated, the plot lacks sustained development, and the theme is not clearly explicated. Dealing as it does with ambition and greed in a technological society, the theme does engage the reader.

Pritchett's métier almost reaches perfection in his short fiction. Many critics, including Frank Kermode, Irving Howe, and Eudora Welty, praised him as a "pleasure giver," a writer's writer, with almost no equal in England in the short-story form. He was outstanding for creating a wide diversity of characters from all classes of people, although mainly from the English middle class. These characters vary, from sailors, divers, and auto racers to blind and neurotic men, frustrated wives, botanists, and artists. Many are ordinary people who live in quiet desperation, some finally sensing their plight and others never aware of their limitations or the reasons for their frustrations.

Pritchett's themes are many and varied. Infidelity is featured in "The Accompanist," anger and disappointment is highlighted in "Handsome Is as Handsome Does," and male domination almost ruins a relationship in "The Wedding." All of these stories feature unforgettable men and women with whose sensibilities Pritchett empathizes, even while mocking them with gentle wit and irony. Relationships are crucial in a Pritchett story, although few end with the starkness of suicide, as in "The Two Brothers," one of the most haunting tales in his canon.

A typical story contains two characters at odds with each other, a flashback technique smoothly worked into the central focus, economy of language, well-defined incident, artful description, and a well-disguised simplicity. Relationships are introduced in medias res (in the middle of things) and often left unresolved. One of the most telling characteristics of Pritchett's short fiction is his use of the Joycean "epiphany," a moment of sudden realization or insight.

Through ironic and witty dialogue, Pritchett created cameo characters, people who linger with the reader long after the story is finished. His satire is genial and kind, Horatian rather than Juvenalian, which is vicious and unsparing. Often the reader is left with a clear empathy and identification with the characters and a realization that Pritchett is describing all of humanity and its foibles, some almost despicable and others stupid and self-centered; yet Pritchett is always gentle in his characterizations.

Although Pritchett's gentility permeates all of his fiction, he cannot be accused of a Dickensian sentimentality. Anger plays a central role in many of his stories, as does ironic backlash, especially in stories such as "A Debt of Honour" and "A Fig Tree."

A visible presence in much of Pritchett's short fiction is one that resembles the great Russian dramatist Anton Chekhov, a medical doctor who relinquished his practice to become a writer. Like him, Pritchett shows a sharp power of observation and a bittersweet wit. "The Wheelbarrow" is the story of a near-seduction by Evans, a local preacher, who is helping Miss Freshwater's niece to empty an entire house of the flotsam and jetsam left by the late Miss Freshwater. Evans is hypnotized by a lovely wheelbarrow and is in turn repulsed and attracted by the niece. He lusts for the wheelbarrow rather than the woman, and when she repulses him and gives him this coveted prize he minimizes its value but inwardly is ecstatic (his ersatz climax) over becoming the proud possessor. Evans never senses an epiphany; the niece does, and the story ends as she is leaving after emptying the house. She passes the tent where Evans is speaking and his cant reverberates at the story's end.

In almost every story there is ironic humor fusing character, episode, and theme. "The Key to My Heart" portrays a young man whose father owned a bakery but who died with many of the accounts recorded only in his head. Typical of many of Pritchett's stories, this one is told by the son. The young man is given the unenviable job of collecting a fairly large debt owed the bakery by a Mrs. Brackett, who in turn vilifies and pacifies the young man but does not pay him. There is much humor in the story as Pritchett satirizes the rich when, for example, this woman and her lover race their expensive cars around the fields after each other in their love-hate relationship. Because the baker's son, narrating the story, unsuspectingly helps the lover to escape, Mrs. Brackett finds out and penalizes him by paying all the other tradesmen their bills but deliberately overlooking the baker's bill. Although the reader may have cause to despise this affluent woman and dub the narrator a fool, the irony and satire of the story provide the insulation needed to empathize with both main figures.

Another facet of Pritchett's stories that often deal with basic relationships between mates or lovers concerns a May-December liaison. "On the Edge of the Cliff" presents Harry, more than seventy years of age, and Rowena, in her twenties, who delight in their amour. Harry still has the capacity to love, an important theme. To prove his energy for life and for love, he goes swimming on a particularly cold day and emerges from the sea showing his sinewy body. This exposure emphasizes his age to Rowena, but later, going to bed with her "Ancient Mariner," as she says, the earlier disrobing causes no diminution of their relationship. Still another delightful story, "The Skeleton," features an ancient man, George Clark, a crotchety bachelor who is a rank narcissist. He becomes ill when he refuses to dress adequately in the cold English winter and is tended by a younger woman who has in the past ruined George's favorite painting. He experiences his moment of epiphany, Pritchett's favorite technique, when he realizes that the woman who supposedly betrayed him, and who is riddled with faults and is growing old, has helped him. He who thought he was fearless and needed no one becomes aware of the need for and the beauty of another soul. Pritchett's motif of the epiphany reverberates in his short fiction, and the Chekhovian irony is transmuted into an English setting and an English sensibility.

In the final analysis, Pritchett's urbane wit and charm imbued his odd, eccentric collection of characters with a humanity and warmth that remain a hallmark of this brilliant teller of tales.

"WHEN MY GIRL COMES HOME"

First published: 1961 (collected in The Pritchett Century, 1997)

Type of work: Short story

A young girl, believed to be suffering in a Japanese prison camp, returns to surprise and disappoint the neighbors, making them question their moral attitudes during World War II.

"When My Girl Comes Home," Pritchett's favorite story, uses a disjointed narrative and shifting ambiguities to reflect the theme of the story. Hilda Johnson was the darling of Hincham Street, London, when she married an Indian and went East. She was reported to be incarcerated in a Japanese war camp under brutal conditions. For two years the entire street forged together and, despite the stone wall of several nations' bureaucracies, persisted in obtaining information about her—and about her final release. Returning home, she is not pale or wan but well-fed and sleek, even sprightly. Hincham Street is shocked to hear that she married a Japanese officer and thus escaped the deprivations and suffering of a foreigner. Mrs. Johnson had been sewing for years and saving money for her girl's homecoming; Mrs. Johnson becomes the moral center of the street.

The story portrays a woman who must have used her wiles (Pritchett is vague about many details and the reader must reconstruct the evidence) not only in Japan but also during her return trip, during which she met two Westerners who showered gifts on her. Gloster, one of the men, promises to find her and take her and her mother away to France. Gloster never comes. The tale, containing a multitude of characters, careens from one character to another, but the limited narrator is Harry Fraser, who provides the reader with fragmentary accounts. A real prisoner of the Japanese, Bill Williams, survived through all kinds of deal-making: The reader believes that Hilda did as well. These two form an odd union, involved perhaps in illegalities. Eventually, Williams pursues Hilda in a number of ways, then ransacks her apartment and disappears. Hilda, too, after her mother's death, leaves her home. Her whereabouts are unknown until one day when the neighbors receive a photograph of her and two men; one of them is Gloster, who has written a book not about Hilda's experiences in Japan but about Hincham Street.

Hilda's homecoming, long awaited by the neighbors, disappoints them and causes them to face their moral views of the war, as Hilda did not when she married a Japanese officer. Many on Hincham Street inflicted self-injury, committed perjury, or escaped their duty to serve during World War II in duplicitous ways. Whether in a pub, a chance conversation in the street, or a gathering of friends, the war always paralyzed the citizens when they came to the closed door of their conscience. Hilda and Bill were not the only ones to compromise (to survive in Japan); the people of Hincham Street had done the same then (during the war) and now (after the war) in refusing to confront their moral dilemmas and conscience. Pritchett's theme of illusion and reality both during and after the war is portrayed with ambiguities. The shifting relationships of the characters do not permit the reader to grasp any clear resolution. The ideal symbol of Hilda is shattered on her return, and the symbol of her mother as a center of moral gravity is splintered when Mrs. Johnson dies. Hincham Street remains shorn of ideals and discomfited by moral festering.

"BLIND LOVE"

First published: 1969 (collected in Blind Love, and Other Stories, 1969)

Type of work: Short story

A lawyer and his housekeeper, both scarred, brandish their disabilities like weapons and eventually, through loss of pride, find mutual understanding and love.

"Blind Love" is one of Pritchett's most poignant and compelling short stories. Through an almost unnoticeable flashback technique the reader perceives a full delineation of the character of Mr. Armitage, a lawyer who has been blind for twenty years, and Mrs. Johnson, a secretary/housekeeper, who has a huge scar extending from the neck down across her chest. Armitage, who has a house in the country, is wealthy; he travels regularly into London to carry on his business affairs. For two years, these two have led a quiet but rather satisfying life. Mrs. Johnson goes regularly to church. Both have been divorced by their mates: Armitage's wife departed because of her husband's blindness, while Mrs. Johnson's husband, on their wedding night, was disgusted with her unsightly scar. Mrs. Johnson had not told her husband of this disfigurement, conceding in retrospect that she had been blinded by love. Armitage has instructed Mrs. Johnson that nothing is ever to be disturbed. One day, however, while in the garden, he is tripped by his dog near the swimming pool; he falls into the water and is rescued. In her kind attempt to help her employer, Mrs. Johnson enters his bedroom and starts to help him obtain dry clothes. She breaks the cardinal rule, and Armitage demands that she get out and leave him alone. Mrs. Johnson, rebuffed by his rudeness, decides that since she has not enjoyed the country she should leave Armitage's employ. Shortly thereafter, Armitage apologizes and presses sexual attention on Mrs. Johnson, and they make love. Still defensive, Mrs. Johnson considers the lovemaking an act of revenge against her former husband. At this point neither person's handicap is a barrier to sex, one of the ironies for which Pritchett was famous.

Throughout the story, religious imagery prevails. Both Armitage and Mrs. Johnson fall into the pool, experiencing a kind of baptism. Armitage makes Mrs. Johnson rub spittle and dirt on his eyes to cure his blindness, just as Christ cured the blind man in Scripture. Both characters have wounds. There is an attempt at faith healing when Armitage goes to Mr. Smith, who preaches the spiritual life but who is obese and has two of everything. When Mrs. Johnson falls into the pool, is rescued, and cries that Mr. Smith saw her sunbathing near the pool nude and perceived her as a "plate of liver," she and Armitage experience a moment of epiphany. The story ends with the two aware that they no longer need to view their handicaps as weapons. Although both have been physically and emotionally scarred by fate, their defects have led to self-understanding and to a love for each other. Both have lost their pride as they sense their mutual need. They wed, the reader believes, and go to Italy, where Mrs. Johnson becomes the eyes for both of them as they visit churches, museums, and architectural wonders.

This story emphasizes the flawed marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Smith, whose union is based on inequality and routine; it is contrasted with the love of Armitage and Mrs. Johnson, who both rise above their physical disabilities to experience a richness and freshness of love beyond the merely physical. The images of flawed human nature are obvious, but the bittersweetness of tone changes to the quiet joy of acceptance at the end.

“THE CAMBERWELL BEAUTY”

First published: 1974 (collected in The Camberwell Beauty, and Other Stories, 1974)

Type of work: Short story

A former antique dealer attempts the seduction of a woman married to an older man and finally separates the worlds of art and reality.

“The Camberwell Beauty,” the title piece of a collection, is one of Pritchett’s mature, haunting tales. The setting is London’s antiques world and becomes a metaphor of the world at large. The antique dealers would give almost anything to possess their own particular object of art; they brood on these acquisitions for their entire lives. Isabel is the Camberwell beauty who yokes together August, her uncle and an ivory collector, with Pliny, an elder bachelor who lusts for, among other artifacts, Dresden figures. The narrator, a former antiques dealer, intrudes into this world and presents the reader with a host of men who, although specialists in their own antiques, are ordinary people.

Isabel is eventually discovered by the narrator to be Pliny’s wife, although she is simply another art acquisition by Pliny, who uses other women to satisfy his lust. The narrator, with unwitting humor, attempts to seduce this young woman. She is often left alone in an empty shop, with only the sound of drumbeats to indicate that something is amiss. Isabel, unaware of her manipulation, is made to dress like a soldier and to bang a drum to keep burglars away. When the narrator discovers Pliny’s ruse, he begins to attempt his seduction. Pritchett’s bizarre details provide irony. Throughout many attempts to lure Isabel, the narrator fails. When the narrator taunts Isabel with Pliny’s being a husband in name only, Isabel replies that he is indeed a good lover because he likes to take off her clothes, look at her, and tell her that she is his most precious possession. In this revelation, Pritchett is satirizing both the naïveté of Isabel and her function as a work of art. At the same time, the narrator, like Pliny, is perceiving the Camberwell beauty as an unconsummated sex object. In his final attempt to win the girl, the narrator is discovered by Pliny and a tobacconist. The narrator feebly insists that he came to offer Pliny a piece of Dresden. Both Pliny and his wife say that they have no interest in Dresden, and the narrator emerges into the sodium light of a London street, aware that the artificial light reflects only the unreality of people. Pritchett is suggesting that there is cruelty, cant, and hypocrisy in the people who surround themselves with beautiful antiques. The world of art may uplift the spirit, but the people who collect rare antiques are commercial vendors who devalue art with their mean acquisitive methods. Pritchett is suggesting that the world, too, may lust after art and overlook the real.

Seemingly, no moment of self-awareness occurs in any of the participants in this drama of the art world. Nothing has changed. Isabel symbolically descends by becoming a work of art to Pliny and a prey for the narrator. No one is illuminated except perhaps Isabel, who remains true to her marital vows. Pritchett’s ironies are at play, but at the end the human comedy continues as the narrator, the intruder, is ejected.

“THE WEDDING”

First published: 1970 (collected in Complete Collected Stories, 1990)

Type of work: Short story

An educated woman, having married into wealth and then divorced, and a cattle farmer, opposing change, resolve their differences and marry.

“The Wedding,” set in a provincial English countryside, is the occasion for a counterpoint between the educated and the rustic, the return of a sophisticated woman to her hamlet, a wedding that ignites a series of developments, and a dénouement that satisfies the major participants. With vivid descriptions, a sly humor, and a portrayal of various people and their foibles, Pritchett enfolds the tale of Mrs. Christine Jackson, who left the town when she married a wealthy man but returned as a teacher at a local college. She encourages Tom Fletcher, a forty-year-old widower, to permit Mary, his daughter, to go on to the university since the young woman is brilliant. Tom demurs, because after Flo, his other daughter, is married, he will be alone—and besides, Mary will need only the rudiments of running a household when she marries.

The story is developed through a number of narrators. At the very beginning, Tom is talking to his friend Ted and makes a number of rude and sexually belittling remarks about Mrs. Jackson. At the wedding, Mrs. Jackson talks with a number of various people, mostly common folk. The mood, as is usual at weddings, is festive as the guests remember their own weddings with a mixture of hope and sadness.

Pritchett's dialogue is witty and provincial as Tom gives away his daughter. The wedding feast is Oriental, and after the guests have eaten, there takes place a local custom of lassoing of women by men. Most of the women accept the sport with humor. When Mrs. Jackson begins to leave, Tom urges her to remain, but she says she must leave. Suddenly, Tom lassoes her and she loses her hat, her balance, and her dignity as the rope pinches her waist. Her student Mary is aghast. Suddenly, Mrs. Jackson asserts the initiative as she pulls the rope out of Tom's hands and summarily and angrily departs. As she leaves, someone shouts that Mrs. Jackson is leaving with Tom's rope.

Overwhelmed by embarrassment and angry that she has been exposed to this unbecoming rural custom, she stops her car until she regains composure. When she returns home, Mary appears, distraught and ashamed of her father's action. Mary says that she has run away. Mrs. Jackson insists, lying, that she found the lassoing rather a compliment and, urging Mary to return home, drives her back. Tom has been scouring the countryside for Mary. As Mrs. Jackson leaves, he shouts that he will see her tomorrow for his rope.

When Tom appears the next day, Mrs. Jackson indignantly tells him that she is not cattle. Yet she agrees that it was, after all, only a country junket. Pritchett uses his usual irony when Tom says that he wants to make a deal: If Mrs. Jackson returns to the farm, he will do whatever she wishes about Mary. He begins to fondle her, and she demurs, but Tom insists. Finally, Mrs. Jackson asks him to lock the door. The schoolmistress leaves her job, sells her house, and marries Jackson, and all three of them are seen driving around the countryside.

The rope is a metaphor with multiple levels. It reminds Mrs. Jackson of her youth when hope was high and spirits were carefree. Now it is a symbol of limits and indignities. Yet it is a sign of selection of her by Tom, who separates her from the others. It is, finally, a mark of her grasping of fate, for she frees herself of the rope and commandeers Tom's possession. It is also the occasion of their meeting, during which there is a compromise and a proposal.

There is great fun and vivacity in the tale. The structure reveals men discussing women irreverently, Mrs. Jackson's soliloquies, and conversations with country bumpkins. Mrs. Jackson's divorce is lamented and her intellectual endowments ridiculed by Tom, who ironically later marries her. She might have been lassoused, but it is Tom who eventually is lassoused out of his prejudices and limitations as he permits his daughter to leave the traditional ways. Pritchett in this story again reveals an uncanny ability to analyze people, to laugh at them, and finally to convey their sense of dignity and geniality. His merging of the educated and the untutored brings thoughtful pleasure to the reader. The rope brings to Mrs. Jackson and Tom Fletcher their moment of epiphany.

SUMMARY

V. S. Pritchett's impact on the world of literature rests on his many and varied short stories. They encompass eccentric characters, multifarious settings, and appealing "plots" through which he develops a microcosm of society. Life is filled with challenges, a theme he developed in his short fiction, but the most significant is the interrelationship of people who must compromise with others or come to terms with their own foibles and flaws. With ironic satire and wry humor, Pritchett genially fashioned his world of fiction through Joycean epiphanies. Many of his eccentrics never glean insights into the human soul, but those who do live their fates with mutual tolerance toward their acquaintances, families, and friends. V. S. Pritchett transformed the ordinary into the sublime.

Julia B. Boken

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

SHORT FICTION:

The Spanish Virgin, and Other Stories, 1930
You Make Your Own Life, and Other Stories, 1938
It May Never Happen, and Other Stories, 1945
Collected Stories, 1956
The Sailor, the Sense of Humour, and Other Stories, 1956
(also known as The Saint, and Other Stories, 1966)
When My Girl Comes Home, 1961
The Key to My Heart, 1963
Blind Love, and Other Stories, 1969
The Camberwell Beauty, and Other Stories, 1974
The Fly in the Ointment, 1978
Selected Stories, 1978
On the Edge of the Cliff, 1979
Collected Stories, 1982
More Collected Stories, 1983
A Careless Widow, and Other Stories, 1989
Complete Collected Stories, 1990

LONG FICTION:

Claire Drummer, 1929
Shirley Sanz, 1932 (also known as Elopement into Exile)
Nothing Like Leather, 1935
Dead Man Leading, 1937
Mr. Beluncle, 1951

NONFICTION:

Marching Spain, 1928
In My Good Books, 1942
The Living Novel and Later Appreciations, 1946
Why Do I Write? An Exchange of Views Between Elizabeth Bowen, Graham Greene, and V. S. Pritchett, 1948
Books in General, 1953
The Spanish Temper, 1954
London Perceived, 1962
The Offensive Traveller, 1964 (also known as Foreign Faces)
New York Proclaimed, 1965
Shakespeare: The Comprehensive Soul, 1965
The Working Novelist, 1965
Dublin: A Portrait, 1967
A Cab at the Door, 1968
George Meredith and English Comedy, 1970
Midnight Oil, 1972
Balzac: A Biography, 1973
The Gentle Barbarian: The Life and Work of Turgenev, 1977
The Myth Makers: Literary Essays, 1979
The Tale Bearers: Literary Essays, 1980

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Since V. S. Pritchett is skilled at depicting relationships, an important element in the novel, what limitations in his long fiction keep it from being as effective as his short stories?
- What does Pritchett's "When My Girl Comes Home" reveal about the effects of a war upon civilians?
- What are the implications of Pritchett's use of a title seemingly based on a cliché, "Blind Love"?
- Is Pritchett condemning the collecting of antiques or any particular aspect of collecting in "The Camberwell Beauty"?
- Cite several instances of Pritchett conveying a sense of dignity in characters whom he has introduced comically.

V. S. Pritchett

The Other Side of the Frontier: A V. S. Pritchett Reader, 1984

A Man of Letters, 1985

Chekhov: A Spirit Set Free, 1988

Lasting Impressions, 1990

The Complete Essays, 1991

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Pritchett Century, 1997

About the Author

Allen, Walter Ernest. "V. S. Pritchett." In The Short Story in English. New York: Oxford University Press, 1981.

Baldwin, Dean R. V. S. Pritchett. Boston: Twayne, 1987.

Bloom, Jonathan. The Art of Revision in the Short Stories of V. S. Pritchett and William Trevor. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006.

_____. "V. S. Pritchett's Ministering Angell." Sewanee Review 112, no. 2 (Spring, 2004): 212-239.

Forkner, Ben, and Philippe Séjourné. "An Interview with V. S. Pritchett." Journal of the Short Story in English 6 (Spring, 1986): 11-38.

Hughes, Douglas A. "V. S. Pritchett: An Interview." Studies in Short Fiction 13 (1976): 423-432.

Oumhani, Cécile. "Water in V. S. Pritchett's Art of Revealing." Journal of the Short Story in English 6 (Spring, 1986): 75-91.

Peden, William. "V. S. Pritchett." In The English Short Story, 1880-1945. Boston: Twayne, 1985.

Treglown, Jeremy. V. S. Pritchett: A Working Life. London: Chatto & Windus, 2004.

Wood, James. "An English Chekhov." The Times Literary Supplement, no. 5153 (January 4, 2002): 12.

Hulton Archive/Getty Images

MARCEL PROUST

Born: Auteuil, France

July 10, 1871

Died: Paris, France

November 18, 1922

Proust greatly contributed to the form of the novel and is known for the subtle and profound analysis of the psychology of his characters.

BIOGRAPHY

Marcel Proust (prewst) was born in the Parisian suburb of Auteuil, France, on July 10, 1871. His parents were Adrien and Jeanne Proust. His father, from a modest Catholic family, became a famous doctor, and his mother came from a wealthy Jewish banking family. His brother Robert was also to become a doctor. Proust was baptized into the faith of his father. As a young child, he struggled with asthma, and the resulting close relationship with his mother was to inspire much of his writing.

The study of philosophy at the Lycée Condorcet impressed him greatly. There, he met Jacques Bizet and Daniel Halévy, sons of the famous musicians. They were also interested in literature and the arts. With them, Proust wrote for the high school literary magazine, La Revue lilas. He also took great interest in the salons of the wealthy and worldly, where he met poet Anna de Noailles and Nobel laureate Anatole France. The years spent in high society gave Proust the reputation of a snob, but they also afforded him many details that he would later analyze and from which he would draw his own psychological insights.

Proust spent a year in the army and studied law and political science. He received an honorary position in the Mazarine library. Travel took him to the resort towns of the Atlantic and to Venice. The Italian city would later figure as an important part of his work. Venice's interest for Proust centered upon its architecture and the study that the English aesthete John Ruskin made of it. With the help of Marie Nordlinger, Proust produced Le Bible d'Amiens (1904), a translation of Ruskin's The Bible of Amiens (1880-1885). The translation helped Proust become more familiar with his Judeo-Christian heritage.

In 1896, he published his first collection of essays and short stories, Les Plaisirs et les jours (Pleasures and Regrets, 1948), prefaced by Anatole France. The work did not receive much praise. Other articles on Ruskin and Parisian salons and cathedrals appeared in one of the leading Parisian newspapers, Le Figaro. In a series of pastiches, he demonstrated his assimilation of the style of nineteenth century French writers such as Honoré de Balzac, Gustave Flaubert, and the Goncourt brothers. Many articles and pastiches were published under the title Pastiches et mélanges (1919).

His father died in 1903, and his mother's death in 1905 was to affect him even more severely. Her influence is evident in his book Contre Sainte-Beuve (1954; By Way of Sainte-Beuve, 1958), which Proust wrote in 1908 and was published posthumously in 1954. Proust later transformed and developed that work into À la recherche du temps perdu (1913-1927; Remembrance of Things Past, 1922-1931, 1981), along with Jean Santeuil (1952; English translation, 1955), another posthumous publication.

After the loss of his parents, Proust gave himself more seriously to writing and reading. In 1913, Proust published Du côté de chez Swann (1913; Swann's Way, 1922), the first volume of Remembrance of Things Past. Finding a publisher was not easy. Though Grasset agreed to publish it, Proust had to pay for publishing costs. He approached the Nouvelle Revue française, a newly founded literary review that grouped aspiring writers. One of them, André Gide, was later to admit his mistake in not accepting the manuscript. Proust eventually found much support from this group and especially from Jacques Rivière, a young writer later killed in World War I. The second volume, À l'ombre des jeunes filles en fleurs (1919; Within a Budding Grove, 1924), won France's prestigious Prix Goncourt for literature. During an exhibit of Dutch painters at the Jeu de Paume museum, Proust suddenly felt ill. He died on November 18, 1922, in Paris.

ANALYSIS

The journalist Maurice Montabré once asked Proust what type of work he would have pursued had he chosen a trade. Proust answered that he would have exercised the very same trade, that of the writer. He said that he was pleased to give the world its "daily bread," letting his spirit guide his labor. Proust's response illustrates some of the themes of Remembrance of Things Past. One of these is the relation of the written word to the reader. In the first lines of Proust's work, his hero wonders whether he is the subject of the work that he is himself reading. Such wonder is even extended to the naming of the hero, since there is a certain amount of uncertainty about it. Were he given a name, it might possibly be Marcel.

Style for Proust is not a matter of technique but of vision. His incredibly long sentences, laden with imagery that is a compendium of his vast culture, invite the reader to partake of his writing, to choose among the many examples that he presents to the imagination. Proust once wanted to be a playwright, and this emphasis on the visual is perhaps a transformation of that original desire. His characters are often found in theatrical situations where the speculative and the spectacular await them.

Besides anticipation, the work also centers upon memory, which for some readers is the main image of Proust's writing. The title, translated into English, betrays the importance that the translator himself gives to memory. "The search for lost time," while rather literal, would be more inclusive of other themes. The search is also for time that has been lost in dissipation. Proust's hero, in the image of his creator, realizes that only mortification will allow him to assume the writer's task. Once assumed, that search would lead him to the reading of many art forms.

The search for love also punctuates the work. Love would be fraught with deception or disappointment. Homosexuality, sadism, jealousy, selfishness, and suspicion mark the characters. The hero speculates about his relationships with his mother and grandmother. The worldly and powerful salons are founded upon death and cruel exclusions amid intermittent outpourings of the heart. Time spent in chasing after a lovely woman gives as a reward only the realization that one has not indeed been in love. For Proust, each person seems to be alone, and the endeavor to leave self is almost an impossibility unless it be through writing, through time well spent.

REMEMBRANCE OF THINGS PAST

First published: À la recherche du temps perdu, 1913-1927; includes Du côté de chez Swann, 1913 (Swann's Way, 1922); À l'ombre des jeunes filles en fleurs, 1919 (Within a Budding Grove, 1924); Le Côté de Guermantes, 1920-1921 (The Guermantes Way, 1925); Sodome et Gomorrhe, 1922 (Cities of the Plain, 1927); La Prisonnière, 1925 (The Captive, 1929); Albertine disparue, 1925 (The Sweet Cheat Gone, 1930); and Le Temps retrouvé, 1927 (Time Regained, 1931)

Type of work: Novels

At the end of the nineteenth century, a young man discovers the changing world that he would like to fix permanently in a work of art.

In Swann's Way, the first volume in Remembrance of Things Past, Proust presents Marcel in bed wondering where he is, what he is reading, whether he is asleep, and finally remembering the places where he has spent his life. This scene reminds one of the meditative reflections of René Descartes, the seventeenth century philosopher. Proust then presents the reader with a more traditional plot and introduces many of the characters who will figure in the intricate work: his mother and grandmother, his father, Aunt Léonie, the maid Françoise, Charles Swann, the baron Charlus and other members of the Guermites family, and a host of others.

The description of Combray, seen as a church, occupies a great part of Proust's first volume. Many of the activities are presented against a background of ecclesiastical imagery. Aunt Léonie wants to know whether Mme Goupil has gotten to church on time. She awaits the visit of Eulalie, who should be able to tell her, as she spends so much time there. Léonie, a hypochondriac, fulfills her Sunday obligations by praying next to a bedside table that resembles an altar. Her nephew, Marcel, and his parents spend their time going to church and taking walks near Combray. When not walking or reading, Marcel spends his time witnessing the maid Françoise's cruelty toward her own helper.

Swann's own anguish and jealousy are material for Proust's psychological insight into human relations. Swann seems to be more successful in the world of art than he is in the search for love. This quest takes him into the Verdurin salon, where love of the arts and fear of being excluded from high society are a constant concern. Once married to Odette, he realizes that she is not really his type of woman. When he contemplates her, it is to transform her into the biblical figures portrayed by the Italian painter Sandro Botticelli.

In Within a Budding Grove, Marcel continues to discover that people are not who they seem to be. He attends the theater and is disappointed with the interpretation of his favorite actress, La Berma. He realizes that the play of his imagination, the play in anticipation, gives him more pleasure.

He experiences his first love for Swann and Odette's daughter, Gilberte. His friendship with Odette evolves into a closer relationship with the Swanns in their home, a kind of sanctuary filled with artworks. The world of art and his understanding of it continue to be marked by revelations, for it is in Odette's salon that he hears Vinteuil's sonata. He does not realize that Vinteuil is the music teacher whom he had known in Combray and who then had seemed quite ordinary. In the Swanns' salon, he meets the writer Bergotte, for whom he recognizes some affinity.

A trip to Balbec, a resort town of the Normandy coast, allows Marcel to continue his appreciation of architecture and to learn the ways of the wealthy. Through the savor of cake dipped in a cup of tea, he discovers that chance often brings people together as much as it resurrects the past. He recognizes the baron Charlus, the nephew of Madame de Villeparisis, to have been Odette's lover. Marcel also establishes ties with Charlus's nephew, Robert de Saint-Loup, and the socially conscious Bloch family. One day, he visits the painter Elstir in his studio. Elstir talks to him of church architecture and introduces him to Albertine Simonet, whom he had known only from afar and who will later become his lover.

The action of The Guermites Way is centered in Paris and in the military town of Doncières, where Saint-Loup is garrisoned. Marcel travels to Doncières to visit Saint-Loup in the hope that he will be introduced to Oriane de Guermites. When he returns to Paris, he finds his grandmother gravely ill. On an excursion in the Parisian suburbs, he meets Saint-Loup's mistress, Rachel, and discovers in her the prostitute whom he had once known in a brothel.

The spectacle of the world is played out in the receptions that Marcel attends. There, he is able to analyze more closely the poetry of the Guermites family against a background of exclusion and snobbery. At home, he witnesses the slow deterioration of his grandmother and the approach of death.

The smallest detail serves for the analysis of character. When Albertine visits Marcel in Paris, Marcel is finally able to kiss her. The kiss becomes a point of departure for reflection, a palimpsest of thought about architecture and photography and the phenomenon of knowing the human person. Oriane de Guermites is more concerned about her red shoes than the sickness of her friend, Swann. Even though a close cousin is dying, she and her husband, Basin, will not be kept from going to an evening party. Marcel slowly learns to shed all illusions about the aristocracy as he delves beyond the brilliance of their names.

Cities of the Plain continues Proust's voyage of discovery. Marcel becomes the spectator of the chance meeting of two homosexuals, Charlus and Jupien, the latter a servant of the Guermantes family. Proust humorously writes that the biblical angels must not have done their work very well since so many homosexuals still inhabit the earth. The Princess de Guermantes's evening party becomes the occasion for other incursions into high society, into its mechanical forms, as well as its games of exclusion and insolence. The party allows Proust to analyze the changes threatening French aristocracy, the homosexual bents of some of its members, and to reflect upon the Dreyfus Affair.

On a second trip to Balbec with his mother, the past relives as she takes on the habits and dress of her own mother. Proust reiterates some of his psychological discoveries as he adds mother and daughter to the list of hereditary doubles: Léonie and her mother, Bloch and his father, uncle Charlus and nephew Saint-Loup. The nonaristocratic Verdurin salon members climb the social ladder and receive Charlus, who is able to direct their activities until Mme Verdurin excommunicates him from her group. Though not always enjoying the company of the bourgeoisie, Charlus manages to entertain a mercurial relationship with the young violinist Morel. The young musician just happens to be the son of the valet de chambre employed by Marcel's uncle, Adolphe. Chance looms large in Proust's work, for in another scene, Charlus finds his lover in the company of the Prince de Guermantes. Marcel's own sentimental education is crowned with his decision to marry Albertine.

The Captive describes Marcel's life with Albertine in Paris and his struggle with suspicions that she might be a lesbian. He seeks the help of the Duchesse de Guermantes, as he wants to offer Albertine dresses designed by the famous decorator Fortuny. Though the young girl of Balbec now lives with him in Paris, the robes of Fortuny would assure him that the art world of Venice is also present. That is one aspect of Proust's writing. While one may consider it an overlay or variation of Cubist simultaneity, the writing also reveals itself to be the transformation of many artworks.

Just as Marcel finds it difficult to know Albertine, so does Morel escape the close scrutiny of Jupien's niece, who has now become his fiancé.

The niece is favored by Charlus but does not perceive his homosexual interest in Morel. Marcel realizes that, in his relations with Albertine, habit has its formative role, as it has in so much that is human. His one philosophical consolation is that he has plucked from among all the beautiful young girls of Balbec the most beautiful rose. His doubts persist, and he decides to separate himself from her, only to learn that she has already left him.

The Verdurin salon makes much progress as to the composition of its elite members. The Verdurins exclude Charlus when he tries to promote his lover Morel. Morel plays a Vinteuil composition that was transcribed by his daughter's lover. For Marcel, this musical piece becomes a symbol of the communication of souls and witnesses indirectly to Marcel's desire to leave himself. Art allows one to enter the world seen by another.

The Sweet Cheat Gone recounts Marcel's suffering at the loss of Albertine. He has his friends, Bloch and Saint-Loup, look for her. The news finally arrives from her aunt, Madame Bontemps, that she has been killed in an accident, perhaps an allusion to the death of Proust's lover Agostinelli. Marcel wonders if he had known her only in his thoughts. He sends Aimé, former headwaiter at the Balbec hotel, to gather information about Albertine's hidden life. His suspicions are verified. Marcel leaves Paris with his mother for Venice, and the city becomes a marvelous variation of Combray. At Combray, he did not want to be separated from his mother; now he resists leaving the city with her. Once back in Paris, he continues to discover that the citizens of Sodom and Gomorrah are ever present among his friends and in the salons that he visits.

In Time Regained, Marcel wonders whether he will ever begin to write and whether he will write memoirs or some form of the Arabian Tales. He notes the influence that the war has had on Paris and its inhabitants, the infidelity of friends and the loyalty of others as they play out their roles in the space granted them by time. He finally realizes that paths he thought would never meet do so in the most unexpected marriages. Time is not fugitive. It may be seized in works of art. Such works are not necessarily those that hang on the walls of museums. One's personal experience of a copy of an artwork may bestow more value upon it than upon the original. The implicit suggestion is that reading Proust's own work makes time stand still.

SUMMARY

Marcel Proust once wrote that he could understand how Noah, in spite of being shut up in his ark, could best see the world from it. Proust defined style not in terms of technique but as the statement of a vision. In Remembrance of Things Past, he shares his vision from his cork-lined room where, with the works of other artists, he re-creates a world of time and space.

Proust's work also stands as a monument to the relation that the person entertains with his culture. Few works invite the reader to the pleasure of reading as does the above, since an essential part of its problematic theme is the deciphering of the relationship of the reader to literature.

Peter S. Rogers

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

À la recherche du temps perdu, 1913-1927 (Remembrance of Things Past, 1922-1931, 1981)

Collective title for the following 7 novels:

Du côté de chez Swann, 1913 (Swann's Way, 1922)

À l'ombre des jeunes filles en fleurs, 1919 (Within a Budding Grove, 1924)

Côté de Guermantes, 1920-1921 (The Guermantes Way, 1925)

Sodome et Gomorrhe, 1922 (Cities of the Plain, 1927)

La Prisonnière, 1925 (The Captive, 1929)

Albertine disparue, 1925 (The Sweet Cheat Gone, 1930)

Le Temps retrouvé, 1927 (Time Regained, 1931)

Jean Santeuil, 1952 (English translation, 1955)

SHORT FICTION:

Les Plaisirs et les jours, 1896 (Pleasures and Regrets, 1948)

The Complete Short Stories of Marcel Proust, 2001

NONFICTION:

Contre Sainte-Beuve, wr. 1908, pb. 1954 (By Way of Sainte-Beuve, 1958)

Pastiches et mélanges, 1919

Chroniques, 1927

Marcel Proust: Selected Letters, 1983-1992 (3 volumes; Philip Kolb, editor)

Letters of Marcel Proust, 2006 (Mina Curtiss, editor)

TRANSLATIONS:

Le Bible d'Amiens, 1904 (of John Ruskin's The Bible of Amiens)

Sésame et les lys, 1906 (of Ruskin's Sesame and Lilies)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Was Marcel Proust a snob? How is snobbery treated in Remembrance of Things Past?
- It has been suggested that the title Remembrance of Things Past, alluding to a phrase in the thirtieth of William Shakespeare's sonnets, is not as accurate a translation of Proust's title as In Search of Lost Time. Do you agree?
- What changes does Swann undergo during the course of the novel?
- What aspects of Marcel's character does his grandmother bring forth?
- What portrait of pre-World War I Paris society does Proust give?
- How did the war change Proust's world?
- What can a reader learn about reading from Remembrance of Things Past?
- Proust wrote thousands of letters. What do they reveal about his habits of literary composition?

About the Author

- Baldwin, Thomas. The Material Object in the Work of Marcel Proust. New York: P. Lang, 2005.
- Bales, Richard. Proust and the Middle Ages. Geneva, Switzerland: Librairie Droz, 1975.
- Blumenthal, Gerda. Thresholds: A Study of Proust. Birmingham, Ala.: Summa, 1984.
- Brown, Stephen Gilbert. The Gardens of Desire: Marcel Proust and the Fugitive Sublime. Albany: State University of New York Press, 2004.
- Cano, Christine M. Proust's Deadline. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2006.
- Carter, William C. Marcel Proust: A Life. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2000.
- Fowlie, Wallace. A Reading of Proust. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1975.
- Houston, John Porter. The Shape and Style of Proust's Novel. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1982.
- May, Derwent. Proust. New York: Oxford University Press, 1983.
- Murray, Jack. The Proustian Comedy. York, S.C.: French Literature, 1980.
- Price, Larkin B. Marcel Proust: A Critical Panorama. Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 1973.

© Jerry Bauer

MANUEL PUIG

Born: General Villegas, Argentina
December 28, 1932

Died: Cuernavaca, Mexico
July 22, 1990

One of the most famous Latin American novelists, Puig built a reputation based on his brilliant technical innovations, portraits of Argentine life, and political observations.

BIOGRAPHY

Manuel Puig (pweeg) was born in General Villegas, a dusty village on the Argentine pampas, one much like those he examines with such telling detail in his novels. His father, Baldomero, was a businessman, and his mother, Maria Elena Delle-donne Puig, was a chemist.

For many years readers have had to rely on Puig's own observations in interviews for most information about him. He was, by his own account, a sensitive, timid youth in a small town that valued authority and machismo; these were two things that Puig thought he lacked. He escaped this situation by immersing himself in Hollywood fantasies, going to the cinema at least four times a week.

In contrast to most writers, Puig was not enthralled by the medium—fiction—that would make him famous but by the world of Hollywood films. He read literature, but probably no more than other young Argentines of artistic inclinations, and what reading he did was almost exclusively of foreign authorship. He deliberately avoided Spanish literature for being tainted with the machismo that he despised. He also held Argentine films in contempt for much the same reason.

His education moved Puig in the direction in which he was already inclined. After enduring the small-town schools of General Villegas, Puig studied at the University of Buenos Aires, starting in 1950, and then won a scholarship to study directing in Rome, where he worked for a time under the famous film director Vittorio De Sica. Instead of this being the answer to his dreams, however, he found the world of filmmaking to be merely another institution based on power and subordination. He did not abandon the cinema—he would never do that—but he did lose much of his interest in directing.

He turned his attentions to screenwriting instead. He insisted on writing in English rather than Spanish, evidence that his old attitude toward his native culture had not substantially changed. One of his first completed scripts was a 1930's-style comedy, less an original creation than a thinly disguised copy of the Hollywood films he had watched in his youth. He later would use such material in a fresh and innovative manner in another medium (fiction), but in the world of cinema it was merely stale imitation and was a failure.

At this time he received perhaps the best advice of his life when friends told him to write what he knew. What he knew best, like it or not, was Argentina. In taking notes for a new script set in Argentina, he discovered his notes on characters were getting longer and longer. He concluded, much to his surprise, that the best medium for his pursuits was fiction rather than cinema.

Considering that contrasted with most other writers Puig had relatively little experience either reading or writing fiction, the success of his first novel, La traición de Rita Hayworth (1968; Betrayed by Rita Hayworth, 1971), is truly amazing. Critics praised his technical innovations and his at once witty and compassionate portraits of small-town life. That first novel was soon followed by Boquitas pintadas (1969; Heartbreak Tango: A Serial, 1973), which was praised just as highly, if not more so. After publishing only two novels, then, Puig had already established himself as one of Latin America's most famous and brilliant writers.

His third novel, The Buenos Aires Affair: Novela policial (1973; The Buenos Aires Affair: A Detective Novel, 1976), was also warmly received by readers and critics around the world, but not so at home. The repressive Argentine authorities apparently felt the book was too sexually explicit, and it was banned. Puig subsequently left his homeland and spent most of the rest of his life living in the United States, England, and elsewhere.

His writing during this period turned more emphatically political. El beso de la mujer araña (1976; Kiss of the Spider Woman, 1979) was praised by some as his best novel, and it was turned into a film scripted by Puig himself. Other novels did not fare so well. Although some praised such novels as Maldición eterna a quien lea estas páginas (1980; Eternal Curse on the Reader of These Pages, 1982), many others objected that in his later novels Puig was too enamored of style at the expense of content and too intent on political goals to create profoundly human characters.

Over the last eight years of his life Puig worked on drafts of a new novel but turned increasingly to drama and screenwriting. He died of a heart attack in Mexico in 1990.

ANALYSIS

Just as a single Puig novel may offer a variety of technical strategies and tones, Puig's career as a whole is marked by continual experimentation and changing subjects and themes. Change is one of the three Puig constants. The other two, which became increasingly interrelated as his career progressed, are small-town life (and lower-middle-class people in general) and political concerns, especially the politics of power and authority.

In almost all Puig novels the first thing the reader notices is his technical brilliance. The reader should not insist on looking for what Puig refuses to deliver—a conventional introduction of setting, main characters, and conflict, and then a chronological complication and climax—but instead should take pleasure in solving the author's technical puzzles.

Puig's first two novels—Betrayed by Rita Hayworth and Heartbreak Tango—are perhaps his most stylistically varied and innovative. In both Puig employs disrupted chronologies. The reader may not be supplied with information necessary to fully understand an incident first mentioned in the novel until that incident is alluded to again, perhaps only indirectly, later on. For example, in Heartbreak Tango, Nene wonders why the letters she writes to the mother of her late lover go unanswered. It is not until much later that the reader learns the answer: Nene's letters have been intercepted by her lover's sister.

Altered and piecemeal chronologies are just one of Puig's technical flourishes and are not truly an innovation, being a favorite strategy of such earlier writers as Ford Madox Ford, Virginia Woolf, and especially William Faulkner. More distinctive and truly innovative are the varied sources of information presented the reader. The fact that the information does not come from a single source imparts a richness to the novels—and, admittedly, a greater degree of difficulty.

In Betrayed by Rita Hayworth and Heartbreak Tango, for example, Puig constructs his narratives out of letters, newspaper excerpts, memos, diary entries, police reports, advertisements, telephone and other conversations where the speakers generally are not identified (and sometimes only one side of the conversation is given), and interior monologues (rambling meditations of certain characters). The best analogy for the Puig style, especially in his early novels, is the collage. The total effect comes from an assemblage of apparently disparate parts. Puig used the collage less extensively in his later works but almost all later strategies are prefigured in these first two novels. Kiss of the Spider Woman, for example, except for a series of footnote commentaries, is composed almost entirely of dialogue between two characters, without the usual dialogue tags to identify the speakers. The same is true of Eternal Curse on the Reader of These Pages. The most nearly conventional of Puig's novels, in style at least, is Pubis angelical (1979; English translation, 1986), but even in that novel one finds sections of dialogue without attribution and a mixing of three different plot lines.

Puig's novels reflect and employ various aspects of Argentine popular culture that intrigued the author. The Buenos Aires Affair is written in the style of the hard-boiled detective novel. Heartbreak Tango pulses to the rhythms and passions of the tango (excerpts from which introduce each chapter), while the characters play out roles reminiscent—in their own minds, at least, if not in reality—of the film serials suggested by the subtitle. In fact, films are almost omnipresent in Puig's fiction. The characters attend them, dream about them, discuss them at great length, and let their thinking, dress, and mannerisms be influenced by them. Puig's novels are clearly not themselves examples of popular fiction, but he does employ aspects of popular culture in his fiction to the extent that the reader is convinced of its importance in Puig's Argentina.

Technical innovation is such an important and fascinating feature of Puig's fiction that the reader may forget that the novels are also about something. Indeed, his style always serves his subjects and themes; in Puig, as in all great writers, style and content are one. Popular culture, for example, works its way into Puig's style because it is an important aspect of Argentine culture. Moreover, his characters immerse themselves in films, songs, fan magazines, and radio programs because their lives are devoid of romance and drama. Similarly, one-sided conversations, letters to which there are no replies, and interior monologues may be technical strategies, but they also underscore the desperate aloneness of so many of Puig's characters.

Ultimately, Puig's fascination with his characters rivals his fascination with technical experimentation. His earliest interest was in the people of small-town Argentina. Even when he later broadened his canvas to include city dwellers or persons living outside Argentina, his interest rarely strayed beyond the working- and lower-middle classes. The generals, starving peasants, and hacienda owners so favored by other Latin American novelists are not so much in evidence in Puig's fiction as are clerks, policemen, maids, and housewives. Their lives tend to be narrow—narrower than their dreams, at least—and their futures more limited than their hopes.

Starting with The Buenos Aires Affair, Puig moves away from powerfully evoking the mundane lives of the characters and focuses more on the causes of their unhappiness. Their problems are rooted in politics. Puig first cast his critical eye on the repressive regime in his native Argentina (Kiss of the Spider Woman) but then broadened his scope to include the nature of power and powerlessness in general (seen most tellingly in the exploited women of Pubis angelical).

Puig is as technically inventive a writer as may be found in post-World War II fiction, with profound sympathies for ordinary human beings and intellectual breadth to match.

HEARTBREAK TANGO

First published: Boquitas pintadas, 1969
(English translation, 1973)

Type of work: Novel

A dying man and the women who loved him recall their relationships.

Heartbreak Tango: A Serial dates from the first stage of Puig's career, before his interest in small-town life was overshadowed by political concerns. The novel's title indicates something of its style and tone. Like film serials, it is episodic in structure, and it is filled with the passion, intrigue, and drama (even melodrama) of tangos.

The novel's episodic structure is not quite so simple as weekly installments of film serials. Instead, the story is told through letters, memos, quotations from newspapers, police reports, and other sources. The reader must reconstruct a coherent chronology of events from this variety of incomplete, apparently random, and sometimes contradictory information. This task is one of the great pleasures of the novel.

At the center of the novel is Juan Carlos Etchepare. The distance between the illusion—that he is a Don Juan among fainting females—and banal reality—Etchepare is a consumptive government bookkeeper—exemplifies Puig's view of small-town Argentines, who struggle to make a living as civil servants, clerks, and policemen while dreaming of romance and adventure—dreams that are fulfilled only in the artificial world of films, fan magazines, and pop music.

The novel begins with a newspaper notice of Juan's death. There follow letters from the woman who apparently loved him the most, Nene, to his mother, expressing her condolences and recalling Juan's and her relationship. From these and other sources, the reader learns about not only Juan's life but also the lives of the women who loved him. The transformations they undergo over the courses of their lives differ in detail but are similar in the essentials. Juan, for example, at the earliest point in the chronology is a dashing, athletic man-about-town. He has an affair with not only Nene but also his sister's friend Mabel, among others. Then comes the onset of tuberculosis. His relationships with women begin to sour as he spends increasing amounts of time in a sanatorium. His last affair is with an older woman, with children, who is more mother and nurse than lover to Juan in his dying days.

A graph of Juan's life, then, would show a downward movement, a pattern also evident in the women who loved him. Nene moves from the high point of her romance with Juan to the grimmer reality of married life with a depressingly ordinary man. Mabel, another of Juan's conquests, begins as an envied beauty and ends as an aging schoolteacher with a history of affairs. Celina degenerates from the proud, even arrogant sister of the handsome Juan to a waspish, venomous spinster. Fanny aspires to no more than a life with the father of her baby but ends in murdering him.

Although there is indeed an undercurrent of satire in this collage of small-town life, Puig is less judgmental than compassionate, and his characters are less comic or even pathetic than profoundly, sadly human.

KISS OF THE SPIDER WOMAN

First published: El beso de la mujer araña, 1976 (English translation, 1979)

Type of work: Novel

Two men in an Argentine prison struggle to find hope and dignity in an environment of fear and degradation.

Written at the height of his powers, Kiss of the Spider Woman is arguably Puig's best and most famous novel. It was his first novel written after Puig left Argentina to escape political repression, his previous novel, The Buenos Aires Affair, having been banned for sexual explicitness. In light of this, Kiss of the Spi- der Woman, whose two main characters are a homosexual and a Marxist communist, may be seen as Puig's public refusal to accommodate himself and his art to the forces of fear and bigotry.

The novel hardly has a plot in the usual sense, that is, a series of events building upon one another to a clear climax and resolution. The novel is composed primarily of dialogue between the characters: Molina, a thirty-seven-year-old window dresser, imprisoned for being what he is, a homosexual, and Valentin, a twenty-six-year-old Marxist imprisoned for political activities.

At the beginning of the novel the two seem to be antagonists, not so much due to bigotry but because each sees the other's philosophy and lifestyle as irrelevant. Valentin does not look down on Molina because he is homosexual so much as he finds a commitment to homosexuality a selfish waste in a world that cries out for political reform. To Molina, Valentin's political philosophy is an airy abstraction that does not measure up to the individual need for love and passion.

Molina dominates the dialogue, at least in terms of who talks more, and he demonstrates his love of beauty and passion by describing in ever-greater detail the plots of some of his favorite films. Valentin's near-constant interruptions are, in part at least, deliberate attempts to destroy the flow of Molina's narratives, thus underscoring Valentin's scorn for what Molina holds dear. When, less frequently, Valentin holds forth on leftist political doctrine, Molina returns the favor with his own interruptions.

A reader may note, however, that over the course of apparently trivial exchanges, important transformations are occurring in both characters. Valentin, secretly being poisoned by the authorities, begins to view Molina's narratives as a welcome distraction from his suffering; his newfound sensitivity reaches a culmination when he makes love to Molina. For his part Molina—consumed by self-interest to the point of agreeing to extract information from his cell mate in return for a promise of early release—comes to view Valentin with sympathy and compassion, risking his own privileged status with the warden to get better treatment for Valentin.

The novel ends tragically, with Molina gunned down while trying to deliver a message to Valentin's comrades and with Valentin tortured horribly, hallucinating a vision very similar to Molina's film plots. Still, the novel is hopeful in the sense that two persons seemingly irreconcilably opposed finally learn to accept and love each other.

PUBIS ANGELICAL

First published: 1979 (English translation, 1986)

Type of work: Novel

Three women from different times and countries confront a world dominated by men.

A novel dating from late in Puig's career, Pubis angelical continues his exploration of the politics of power and subjugation. In this case the power is held exclusively by males; those subjected to male power and desires are women. Puig dramatizes his concerns by focusing on three women from different cultures and times.

The novel's structure reinforces the interrelatedness of the three women's experiences. Instead of telling the women's stories consecutively, Puig alternates sections of the three stories so that the novel forms a braid of narrative, a single thematic statement composed of three individual strands.

The first plot line concerns The Mistress, a beautiful Austrian actress recently married to a wealthy German munitions manufacturer (The Master). The Master keeps her a virtual prisoner until eventually she discovers that he has acquired her (she is little more than a possession) because he wants to learn about experiments in mind reading supposedly conducted by her late father. Eventually she escapes, falling in love with the man who aids her. She comes to believe that this man's motives are no purer than The Master's, murders her new love, falls in love again, suspects the motives of this third love, and finally is killed trying to escape.

The second plot line concerns Ana, an Argentine who has fled an unhappy marriage and the political problems in her homeland only to be hospitalized with cancer in Mexico. Over the course of her conversations with her friend Beatriz the reader learns that Ana's relationships with men have been no happier than the actress's, although certainly less dramatic. The final blow comes when she realizes that her latest love, Pozzi, wants to manipulate her for his own political ends.

The last plot line is set sometime in a grim future totally dominated by men. The principal character is W218. The plight of women has reached the point that W218 does not even realize, at first, how degraded her life is. She is a prostitute in a government-run health clinic. Like the other two women, W218 is nearly redeemed, but ultimately betrayed, by love; and at the end she is dying of venereal disease, still working as a prostitute, in a camp for criminals and misfits.

The most common interpretation of Pubis angelical is that the actress and W218 are fantasies of Ana. Whether this is true or not is less important than the common elements of the three narrative lines. All three women are manipulated by men. All three seek escape and redemption through love of a man who at first seems to be sensitive. All three are failed by their new loves and in the end are either dead or dying. Pubis angelical is a grim parable of the fate of women in a male-dominated society.

SUMMARY

Great writers accomplish two things: They make their chosen corner of the world profoundly real and universal. They also push at the boundaries of their chosen medium, opening up unexpected vistas for succeeding writers and readers. Manuel Puig is therefore a great writer. He has adventurously tested the conventions of the novel and has shown what new possibilities of structure and voice are available to writers. His experiments were not for their own sake but helped him bring small-town Argentina vividly to life.

Dennis Vannatta

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

La traición de Rita Hayworth, 1968 (Betrayed by Rita Hayworth, 1971)

Boquitas pintadas, 1969 (Heartbreak Tango: A Serial, 1973)

The Buenos Aires Affair: Novela policial, 1973 (The Buenos Aires Affair: A Detective Novel, 1976)

El beso de la mujer araña, 1976 (Kiss of the Spider Woman, 1979)

Pubis angelical, 1979 (English translation, 1986)

Maldición eterna a quien lea estas páginas, 1980 (Eternal Curse on the Reader of These Pages, 1982)

Sangre de amor correspondido, 1982 (Blood of Requited Love, 1984)

Cae la noche tropical, 1988 (Tropical Night Falling, 1991)

DRAMA:

El beso de la mujer araña, pb. 1983 (Kiss of the Spider Woman, 1986; adaptation of his novel)

Bajo un manto de estrellas, pb. 1983 (Under a Mantle of Stars, 1985)

Misterio del ramo de rosas, pb. 1987 (Mystery of the Rose Bouquet, 1988)

SCREENPLAYS:

Boquitas pintadas, 1974 (adaptation of his novel)

El lugar sin límites, 1978 (adaptation of José Donoso's novel)

About the Author

Bacarisse, Pamela. The Necessary Dream: A Study of the Novels of Manuel Puig. New York: Barnes & Noble Books, 1988.

Boling, Becky. "From Besoto Beso: Puig's Experiments with Genre." Symposium 44 (Summer, 1990): 75-87.

Brushwood, John S. The Spanish-American Novel: A Twentieth-Century Survey. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1975.

Craig, Linda. Juan Carlos Onetti, Manuel Puig, and Luisa Valenzuela: Marginality and Gender. Rochester, N.Y.: Tamesis, 2005.

Kerr, Lucille. Suspended Fictions: Reading Novels by Manuel Puig. Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 1987.

Lavers, Norman. Pop Culture into Art: The Novels of Manuel Puig. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1988.

Levine, Suzanne Jill. Manuel Puig and Spider Woman: His Life and Fictions. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2000.

MacAdam, Alfred J. Modern Latin American Narratives: The Dreams of Reason. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1977.

Tittler, Jonathan. Manuel Puig. New York: Twayne, 1993.

Wiegmann, Mira. The Staging and Transformation of Gender Archetypes in "A Midsummer Night's Dream," "M. Butterfly," and "Kiss of the Spider Woman." Lewiston, N.Y.: Edwin Mellen Press, 2003.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- Did Manuel Puig's early interest in films influence his sense of novel structure?
- Is it helpful to the readers to be told how they "should take pleasure" in Puig's novels?
- Is the construction of a Puig novel based on a presumed conception of the typical reader's presumably short attention span?
- Is Pubis angelical a misandrist novel?
- Can Puig's novels be called tragedies?

Library of Congress

ALEXANDER PUSHKIN

Born: Moscow, Russia

June 6, 1799

Died: St. Petersburg, Russia

February 10, 1837

Pushkin is widely recognized in Russia as the greatest of all Russian poets. He developed Russian as a literary language and showed its possibilities in prose, as well as poetry.

BIOGRAPHY

Alexander Sergeyevich Pushkin (POOSH-kuhn) was born in Moscow, Russia, on June 6, 1799, the second of three children of Sergey Lvovich Pushkin and Nadezhda Osipovna Hannibal. Her grandfather was born in Africa and served as a page to Peter the Great. Both his father and his uncle, Vasili Pushkin, were writers, with the latter enjoying popularity among his contemporaries. Pushkin was exposed at a very early age to the literary world, in addition to having access to his father's extensive library. Pushkin came from the old Russian aristocracy and was particularly proud of his heritage. The family had lost much of its wealth by Pushkin's time but retained the title and continued to enjoy the lifestyle and the privileges of the landed aristocracy. Both his aristocratic lineage and his lack of money would play a significant role in the course of his life.

Pushkin began writing poetry while still in preparatory school. His early literary attempts reflect the literary currents of the time. The classical and sentimental traditions of France, in particular, provided a formative influence for the young poet. Most of the poetry that Pushkin wrote as a student is in a lighthearted manner and concerns love and drinking. After completing his studies in 1817, Pushkin moved to St. Petersburg to accept a position with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. The poems written during his first years in St. Petersburg (1817-1820) reflect the influence of political liberalism. His poem "Vol'nost': Oda" ("Ode to Freedom") established his popularity among the liberals but also drew the unwanted attention of the czar. This poem and his other political verse, such as "Derevnya" ("The Village") and "Skazki Noël" ("Fairy Tales"), were circulated in manuscript form or memorized, since they could not be published. It was not long before Pushkin came to be regarded as the voice of liberalism in St. Petersburg. Consequently, his peers began to fear the possibility of his exile. Czar Alexander I decided that rather than exile the young poet, he would transfer him to a position outside the capital.

Pushkin wrote his first long poem, a comic epic, titled Ruslan i Lyudmila (1820; Ruslan and Liudmila, 1936), during this period. This romantic poem, based on Russian folklore, already contains elements characteristic of his mature verse. The narrator in the poem is characterized by a detached ironic attitude and indulges in lyrical digressions at times. During the years of 1820 to 1824, Pushkin also completed several other narrative poems that reveal the influence of the English poet Lord Byron. The heroes of Kavkazskiy plennik (1822; The Prisoner of the Caucasus, 1895) and Gavriiliada (1822; Gabriel: A Poem, 1926) share many features of the brooding Byronic hero.

In 1824, Pushkin was dismissed from government service entirely and was exiled to his family estate at Mikhailovskoe. Although the years spent on the family estate were lonely and disheartening, they were among his most productive years as a writer. During this time, he wrote his first drama, Boris Godunov (wr. 1824-1825, pb. 1831, pr. 1870; English translation, 1918), a historical tragedy in blank verse based on the life of a sixteenth century czar. He also completed a great number of lyric poems, among them "K moriu" ("To the Sea") and "Prorok" ("The Prophet"), and several narrative poems including Tsygany (1827; The Gypsies, 1957) and Graf Nulin (1827; Count Nulin, 1972), and he began work on his masterpiece, Eugeny Onegin (1825-1832, 1833; Eugene Onegin, 1881). With the death of Czar Alexander I, Pushkin was finally allowed to return to St. Petersburg. Pushkin was still closely watched by Czar Nicholas I, however, who appointed himself as Pushkin's "personal censor." During this time, Pushkin began to experiment in prose narrative while continuing to write lyric poetry.

In 1830, Pushkin became engaged to a society beauty, Natalya Goncharov. The period of his engagement again marks a very productive time in his writing. He wrote a number of "little tragedies" during this time; the best known among these are Motsart i Salyeri (pr., pb. 1832; Mozart and Salieri, 1920) and Kamyenny gost (wr. 1830, pb. 1839, pr. 1847; The Stone Guest, 1936). He also completed his novel in verse, Eugene Onegin, in 1831. Pushkin then turned to prose, finishing a cycle of short stories titled Povesti Belkina (1831; Russian Romance, 1875; better known as The Tales of Belkin, 1947). Pushkin's elation over his marriage did not last long. The poet was plagued by monetary troubles. His money problems were aggravated by his wife's attachment to life in high society. His wife's lack of appreciation for his poetry deepened the rift in their marriage, as did her flirtations with men at the court. Pushkin, however, continued to write during this time and produced some of his masterpieces of poetry, as well as prose. He completed Medny vsadnik (1837; The Bronze Horseman, 1899), a narrative poem about St. Petersburg and the destiny of Russia. Pushkin also finished Pikovaya dama (1834; The Queen of Spades, 1858) and several short stories and a novel, Kapitanskaya dochka (1836; The Captain's Daughter, 1846).

Pushkin attempted to resign from his government post at this time but was refused by Czar Nicholas I, probably because the czar wanted to keep Pushkin's lovely wife at his court. It became clear during this time that Natalya was having an affair with a handsome Dutch cavalryman she had met at the royal court. Pushkin challenged the Dutchman, Baron Georges-Charles D'Anthès, to a duel. The duel took place on February 8, 1837. Pushkin was fatally wounded and died two days later in St. Petersburg.

ANALYSIS

The essential characteristics of Pushkin's style are clearly marked and remain constant throughout much of the poet's literary career and through all the various genres in which his work appeared. Pushkin's language conformed to that of the educated classes and to the standards of elegance that the eighteenth century had sanctified. Although he made innovations and greatly enriched the language of poetry, he remains a classical poet in his balance, restraint, and harmony. Associated with his predilection for cool simplicity and elegance is a wonderfully light touch and a delicate wit. Pushkin possessed the ability to make the most complex matters appear easy and even amusing.

Pushkin shows great powers of insight and observation in his verse. According to him, it was not literature's function to serve a moral or didactic purpose. His aesthetic sensibility remained far stronger than any moral impulse in his works. It is this characteristic that differentiates him from many other Russian writers of the nineteenth century.

Yet most Russians regard Pushkin as their national poet. That might come as a surprise to Western readers, who are probably more familiar with the works of Leo Tolstoy or Fyodor Dostoevski than with any of Pushkin's work. Pushkin assimilated previous literary traditions and added to them touches of his own genius. He forged much of Russian literary language and set an aesthetic standard. It is generally maintained that Pushkin heard the Russian language and saw Russian life with unprecedented clarity.

Pushkin's early poetry displays the influence of French classical poets and Russian poets of the eighteenth century. These poets taught him neatness, clarity, and restraint, which remained dominant in his writing throughout his career. Pushkin's fundamental classicism had deep roots in his own genius—namely, in the precision of his language, his artistic concentration, his sense of balance and harmony. He had a strongly developed literary taste and with it, the ability to assimilate and transform many various literary styles.

During the years 1820 to 1823, Pushkin came under the influence of Byron. From Byron, he borrowed the loose narrative form, aspects of the disillusioned hero, and a sweeping lyrical tone. Pushkin's "Byronic" poems are notable for their mellifluous language and euphonic effects. Pushkin abandoned this manner for a style with a subtler correspondence between rhythm and intonation. Much of his greatest lyric poetry, composed between 1823 to 1830, is in this later manner. The lyrics written during these years are marked by the poet's increasing awareness of his isolation in society, a profound disquiet at life's aimlessness, and a preoccupation with the passage of time.

Though Pushkin applied himself increasingly to prose in the last years of his life, his poetic output at this time shows the same mastery. His style became more austere and increased in aphoristic concision. At the same time, his works acquired a tragic dimension from his heightened awareness of humanity's defenselessness before the powers of time and fate. Pushkin's works exhibit, in these later years, a growing concern with paradoxical human situations. This concern is expressed powerfully in The Bronze Horseman, which shows the unresolved conflict between the ruthless workings of power and the individual's claim to happiness.

Pushkin's prose pieces exerted a strong influence on the development of fiction in Russian in the nineteenth century. For Pushkin, it was essential that Russian prose be simple and to the point and that the language should be rid of all poetic effusiveness. He wrote mostly short stories characterized by their concision and sparing detail. He also experimented with the form of the historical novel in The Captain's Daughter; a story that grew out of his historical research on the Pugachov Revolt of 1773-1774, a popular uprising that occurred during the reign of Catherine the Great.

During his relatively brief writing career, Pushkin explored many different kinds of writing. He has often been described as a writer of protean genius. His works exhibit a variety of tones from cynical to passionate, meditative to vehement, frivolous to solemn. While his work may lack the central vision that characterizes the work of some other writers, there are important recurrent themes. Pushkin's poetry expresses a zest for life, an appreciation of wit, and an intense feeling for beauty, poignantly contrasted with the irretrievable passage of time and the vulnerability of human life.

EUGENE ONEGIN

First published: Eugeny Onegin, 1825-1832, 1833 (English translation, 1881)

Type of work: Novel

A young, provincial girl's love for a disillusioned playboy is rejected, but years later the tables are turned.

Eugene Onegin is considered Pushkin's most outstanding and characteristic work. It has been called the first Russian novel because of its firm grasp of character and its realistic presentation of scenes of Russian life. Pushkin combines the virtues of slow development of character and situation of the novel with the quick epigrammatic wit of the discursive poem. He combines the pathos of a psychologically plausible affair of the heart with the charm of genre painting. The work reflects the author's own gradual growth as a writer, since it was written and revised over a period of nearly ten years.

The novel is written in fourteen-line stanzas, known simply as the Onegin stanza, since there have been no other attempts to create a work using this verse form. The stanza implements an intricate rhyme scheme, which ends in a couplet. The couplet rounds off the stanza and invites an epigrammatic or aphoristic conclusion. The typical stanza contains a proposition, an exposition elaborating it, and a summation with a final flash of wit.

The plot of the novel is very simple, and its loose form allows for a wealth of description and poetic excursus. Only approximately one-third of the novel is concerned with the plot. The rest consists of descriptive passages and the narrator's digressions on the theater, literary or social polemics, amorous recollections, or soliloquies on literary art.

The events of the novel are set in the early 1820's, and the settings are St. Petersburg and the Russian countryside. After an abrupt description of the hero traveling to visit his moribund country uncle, the plot moves to a flashback describing the education of the young St. Petersburg playboy, his introduction to St. Petersburg society, and his gradual withdrawal from society life to the country estate that he has inherited. There he is drawn into the family circle of a typical squire of the period. The shy, bookish, elder daughter, Tatyana, falls in love with him and writes an ingenuous declaration of her feelings. She is overcome and confused by emotions that she has never before experienced outside novels and throws herself upon his mercy. Onegin is touched but ultimately rejects her, lecturing her and sighing that his days of love are over.

Meanwhile, Lensky, an idealistic poet and Onegin's friend, has won the affections of Tatyana's sister, Olga. After a party, during the course of which Onegin flirts with Olga to tease Lensky, the latter challenges Onegin to a duel. Onegin, a seasoned duelist, accepts out of pride and kills Lensky in the duel. Onegin leaves the countryside in a state of even greater disillusionment than at his arrival, although Olga quickly recovers and marries a young cavalry officer.

The plot now turns to Tatyana, who visits Onegin's abandoned manor and examines his library. Her family decides to take her to Moscow and there convinces her to marry a middle-aged dignitary. Years later, Onegin returns to St. Petersburg and recognizes Tatyana, now a regally poised society beauty, at a ball. He writes a declaration of his devotion to her and implores her to renounce her marriage in favor of him. She candidly admits that she still loves him but will be faithful to her husband.

The plot is artfully woven with descriptive passages and the narrator's digressions. Onegin and Tatyana are the only extensively drawn characters. Lensky and Olga, the supporting couple, are kept deliberately sketchy as foils to the others. Pushkin treats his semiautobiographical hero with ironic detachment. He comes to the conclusion that Onegin is a product of his age to some degree. The most helpful clues to his character are those that Tatyana discovers on reading his books. Pushkin sketches an inventory of the literary ancestors of the "superfluous man," a man disgusted by, and, at the same time, bored with, society. Tatyana, too, is characterized by the sentimental novels that she has read, as well as by her faith in folktale superstitions.

The author's role in the work consists of three parts: that of the narrator, of an acquaintance of the hero, and of a character in the poem. This division creates a variety of levels to the narrative similar to that of Pushkin's first long poem, Ruslan and Liudmila. This structure results in a lighthearted interplay of plot, description, digression, and confession. Discourse on poetic technique and literary polemics is often cast in the form of conversation with the reader.

Eugene Onegin has had an inestimable formative influence on the development of the novel in Russia. The contrast between a disillusioned but gifted man and an earnest, sweet girl has become an established tradition in Russian literature. Since his novel in verse was written over the span of much of Pushkin's writing career, it engages many of the themes and images characteristic of his verse, as well as tracing his development as a writer.

THE BRONZE HORSEMAN

First published: Medniy vsadnik, 1837
(English translation, 1899)

Type of work: Poem

In this complex narrative poem, the creation and destiny of Russia are contrasted with the destiny of one individual.

The Bronze Horseman is regarded as one of Pushkin's masterpieces. Pushkin created the poem out of a complex web of personal, literary, and political themes, so that it is not surprising that interpretations of the poem have differed widely.

The poem consists of an introductory section and two parts. The title is taken from the statue of Peter the Great that stands in St. Petersburg on the banks of the Neva. Pushkin based the poem on a historical incident, namely the devastating flood that hit St. Petersburg in 1824. The introduction, however, begins many years before the flood. Peter the Great is depicted as standing on the site that was to become St. Petersburg, looking out over the desolate waters of the Baltic. He sees only swampy marshlands and dark woods but fatefully declares the founding of a great city that will “open a window onto Europe.” One hundred years have passed since Peter’s vision, and there is a prosperous city in place of the marshland. The thoughts and impressions of the narrator become enmeshed with the description of the city. He speaks of his love for the austere harmony of the city, praising Peter’s creation.

In part 1 of the poem, there is an abrupt change in tone. It is a cold, windy day in St. Petersburg as a young man named Eugene makes his way home. Once safely home, he tries to go to sleep but is kept awake by his own worries. He wants to gain his share of financial independence, even though he will have to work hard to do so. He is also kept awake by thoughts of the rising river. If the bridges are flooded, he will be separated from his betrothed, who lives on one of the islands in the Neva.

The next morning the city is flooded. Pushkin’s description of the flood is one of the most famous passages of Russian literature. The scene is one of chaos and destruction, such that even the czar is powerless. Eugene sits astride a marble lion near the statue of Peter the Great to escape the rising water. As he worries about his beloved, Parasha, he is contrasted with the statue. The Bronze Horseman, namely Peter the Great, is oblivious to the destruction.

The floodwaters subside at the opening of part 2, revealing the death and destruction caused by the storm. Eugene hires a boatman to take him to Parasha’s house. Nothing remains where her home once stood, and Eugene begins to show signs of madness. Life quickly returns to normal in the city, except for Eugene. He wanders the streets aimlessly, until one day when he comes upon the statue of the Bronze Horseman. His mind grows clear, and he recognizes the man who founded the city. He confronts the statue of the czar and threatens him. In response, the face of the statue changes expression to one of intense anger. Eugene flees and hears the gallop of the Bronze Horseman after him. The poem concludes with the depiction of a small island, where a dilapidated house was washed ashore by the flood. Eugene was found lying dead on the threshold.

Pushkin’s style in the poem varies according to different moods, situations, and personalities. The majestic sonority of the lines about Peter the Great is contrasted with the abrupt, jerky rhythms of the lines about Eugene. The poem also contains a wealth of images intensifying the sensation of constant movement and restlessness, which pervades much of the poem, and personifying the river and the city itself.

The destiny of Russia is contrasted with the destiny of one man. There is, on one hand, the affirmation of Peter’s achievements and the promise of fulfillment of Russia’s destiny as a great power. Yet, on the other hand, these accomplishments are questioned by the destiny of one poor, insignificant man. The city was founded in defiance of nature by building it upon hostile marshland. It is only through the iron will of the czar, who acts as the embodiment of Russia’s destiny, that St. Petersburg was built and had prospered. It is also through the sacrifice of the individual that the city endures. It becomes apparent that one important theme in the poem is in challenging the notion that the individual must be sacrificed for historical necessity.

Eugene is the prototype of a series of characters in Russian literature who were rendered mad by the oppressive atmosphere of this unnatural city. Eugene is the victim of Peter’s city, of an indifferent metropolis. Pushkin’s acute powers of social observation, combined with his personal feelings about the callousness of the city, rendered a portrait of St. Petersburg that has become emblematic in Russian literature.

THE QUEEN OF SPADES

First published: Pikovaya dama, 1834
(English translation, 1858)

Type of work: Short story

A cautious man orchestrates a deception to obtain a gambler’s secret of a sure bet but is himself deceived in the end.

The Queen of Spades stands at the peak of Pushkin’s achievement in prose writing. The story was popular with the general reading public at the time, particularly for its striking plot. The story opens with a number of young officers conversing after a card game. One of them, Narumov, wonders why his grandmother, who possesses the secret of winning at the game of faro, never plays. It is revealed that she was once an avid gambler and was given the secret of the game on the promise of using it only once to save her from poverty.

Hermann, a German engineering officer who usually never gambles, becomes obsessed with discovering the secret from the countess. He begins a correspondence with the countess's young companion, Lizaveta, who hopes that Hermann will deliver her from her poor position. They arrange to meet, but once inside the house, he confronts the old countess. When she refuses to reveal the secret, he pulls out a gun, and she dies of fright. During the countess's funeral, it seems as if the corpse winks at Hermann, and that night her ghost visits him and gives him the secret of winning. Hermann places the bets over three consecutive days. On the third day, he loses on the last card, the queen of spades. Having lost all of his money, he goes mad.

The story is a society tale, and part of its appeal, particularly at that time, was its depiction of the cold glamour that characterized fashionable society. Pushkin achieved the ultimate concision of detail, using adjectives and other sorts of description sparingly. Most of these details are doubled. If a theme or image is mentioned once, it is repeated later in the story. One example of this doubling are the roses that adorn the countess's hair, which echoes an earlier image of the roses in her hair in the portrait.

It is often assumed that the plot of the story is based on fantastic events, but, on closer examination, these supernatural occurrences are based on Hermann's developing monomania. Pushkin notes that "it seemed to Hermann" that the corpse of the countess winked. The queen that appears in the cards at the end is easily explained by the rules of the card game. The countess's posthumous visit to Hermann's room is actually a dream.

Pushkin's characterization of Hermann is one of his most successful to this point in his career. He is one of the first characters in Russian literature who seems three dimensional. One of the salient features of his character is his dualism. His German side is cautious, calculating, and thrifty—yet another side to his character is developed as the plot progresses. It is revealed that he is also proud and superstitious. Psychological states are suggested by a compact description of physical reactions.

Card games have been seen traditionally as metaphors for life, where fate decides the outcome. In Pushkin's story, the symbolic and realistic levels are intertwined, so that, in the end, Hermann loses at cards and at life. According to fortune-telling books at the time, the queen of spades signified an old, evil woman. The countess and Hermann, then, are joined by means of cards and the theme of the incomprehensibility of their characters.

Pushkin's tone in the story, and particularly in his attitude toward the characters, is ironic. Pushkin forces the reader to see the humor in these situations and to see them seriously. The irony is pervasive but not destructive. It enables him to parody certain literary types and situations while still communicating humankind's powerlessness against fate.

SUMMARY

Alexander Pushkin's greatness lies essentially in his lyric gifts, but he has also been influential as a prose writer. Pushkin's poetic world is striking for its multiformity. Through countless transformations of form and tone, however, his style is always marked by its compact, balanced, lyrical language, which expresses the poetic impact of love and life. His intrinsic, classical qualities and his seminal influence on future generations of Russian writers make him one of the most significant Russian writers of the nineteenth century.

Pamela Pavliscak

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

Eugeny Onegin, 1825-1832, 1833 (Eugene Onegin, 1881)

Arap Petra velikogo, 1828-1841 (Peter the Great's Negro, 1896)

Kirdzhali, 1834 (English translation, 1896)

Kapitanskaya dochka, 1836 (The Captain's Daughter, 1846)

Dubrovsky, 1841 (English translation, 1892)

Yegipetskiye nochi, 1841 (Egyptian Nights, 1896)

Istoriya sela Goryukhina, 1857 (History of the Village of Goryukhino, 1966)

SHORT FICTION:

Povesti Belkina, 1831 (Russian Romance, 1875; better known as The Tales of Belkin, 1947)

Pikovaya dama, 1834 (The Queen of Spades, 1858)

POETRY:

Ruslan i Lyudmila, 1820 (Ruslan and Liudmila, 1936)

Gavriiliada, 1822 (Gabriel: A Poem, 1926)

Kavkazskiy plennik, 1822 (The Prisoner of the Caucasus, 1895)

Bratya razboyniki, 1824

Bakhchisaraiskiy fontan, 1827 (The Fountain of Bakhchisarai, 1849)

Graf Nulin, 1827 (Count Nulin, 1972)

Tsygany, 1827 (The Gypsies, 1957)

Poltava, 1829 (English translation, 1936)

Domik v Kolomne, 1833 (The Little House at Kolomna, 1977)

Skazka o mertvoy tsarevne, 1833 (The Tale of the Dead Princess, 1924)

Skazka o rybake ir rybke, 1833 (The Tale of the Fisherman and the Fish, 1926)

Skazka o tsare Saltane, 1833 (The Tale of Tsar Saltan, 1950)

Skazka o zolotom petushke, 1834 (The Tale of the Golden Cockerel, 1918)

Medniy vsadnik, 1837 (The Bronze Horseman, 1899)

Epigrams and Satirical Verse, 1984

Collected Narrative and Lyrical Poetry, 1984

DRAMA:

Boris Godunov, wr. 1824-1825, pb. 1831, pr. 1870 (English translation, 1918)

Kamyenny gost, wr. 1830, pb. 1839, pr. 1847 (The Stone Guest, 1936)

Skupoy rytsar, wr. 1830, pr., pb. 1852 (The Covetous Knight, 1925)

Motsart i Salyeri, pr., pb. 1832 (Mozart and Salieri, 1920)

Pir vo vryemya chumy, pb. 1833, pr. 1899 (The Feast in Time of the Plague, 1925)

Stseny iz rytsarskikh vryemen, wr. 1835, pr., pb. 1937

Rusalka, pb. 1837, pr. 1838 (The Water Nymph, 1924)

Little Tragedies, pb. 1946 (includes The Covetous Knight, The Stone Guest, Mozart and Salieri, and The Feast in Time of the Plague)

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What French poets influenced Alexander Pushkin most?
- How did St. Petersburg society differ from that of Moscow?
- Were the aristocratic influences on Pushkin more helpful or damaging to his literary career?
- Is Eugene Onegin more of a novel or more of a poem?
- In what respects is the influence of Lord Byron most emphatic in Eugene Onegin?
- What has been Pushkin's influence on later Russian writers?

Alexander Pushkin

NONFICTION:

Istoriya Pugacheva, 1834 (The Pugachev Rebellion, 1966)
Puteshestviye v Arzrum, 1836 (A Journey to Arzrum, 1974)
Dnevnik, 1833-1835, 1923
Pisma, 1926-1935 (3 volumes)
The Letters of Alexander Pushkin, 1963 (3 volumes)
Pisma poslednikh let 1834-1837, 1969

MISCELLANEOUS:

The Captain's Daughter, and Other Tales, 1933
The Poems, Prose, and Plays of Pushkin, 1936
The Works of Alexander Pushkin, 1936
Polnoye sobraniye sochineniy, 1937-1959 (17 volumes)
The Complete Prose Tales of Alexander Pushkin, 1966
A. S. Pushkin bez tsenzury, 1972
Pushkin Threefold, 1972
Polnoye sobraniye sochineniy, 1977-1979 (10 volumes)
Alexander Pushkin: Complete Prose Fiction, 1983

About the Author

Binyon, T. J. Pushkin: A Biography. London: HarperCollins, 2002.
Clayton, J. Douglas. Dimitry's Shade: A Reading of Alexander Pushkin's "Boris Godunov." Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 2004.
Debreczeny, Paul. The Other Pushkin: A Study of Alexander Pushkin's Prose Fiction. Stanford, Calif.: Stanford University Press, 1983.
Kahn, Andrew, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Pushkin. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2006.
Kutik, Ilya. Writing as Exorcism: The Personal Codes of Pushkin, Lermontov, and Gogol. Evanston, Ill.: Northwestern University Press, 2005.
Magarshack, David. Pushkin: A Biography. New York: Grove Press, 1967.
Nabokov, Vladimir. "Commentary." In "Eugene Onegin": A Novel in Verse by Aleksandr Pushkin. 4 vols. New York: Pantheon Books, 1964.
Raley, John. Pushkin: A Comparative Study. Cambridge, England: Cambridge University Press, 1971.
Simmons, Ernest J. Pushkin. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1937.
Vickery, Walter N. Alexander Pushkin. Boston: Twayne, 1970.

BARBARA PYM

Born: Oswestry, England

June 2, 1913

Died: Oxford, England

January 11, 1980

Pym, a novelist of manners, is remarkable for her humorous and ironic treatment of middle-class women and small-town happenings in twentieth century England.

BIOGRAPHY

Barbara Mary Crampton Pym (pihm) was born on June 2, 1913, in the village of Oswestry, Shropshire, England, near the Welsh border. She was the older daughter of Frederick Crampton Pym, a solicitor, and Irena Spencer Pym. Her sister, Hilary, with whom she lived in later life, was born in 1916; the sisters enjoyed a secure and happy childhood. At twelve, Barbara was sent to a boarding school, Liverpool College, Huyton, where she excelled chiefly as chairperson of the Literary Society. In 1931, she went to St. Hilda's College, Oxford, to study English. After finishing her degree in 1934, she traveled in Europe and worked on her first novel, which was to become Some Tame Gazelle (1950). In 1938, she went to Poland, planning to teach there, but was forced to leave by the outbreak of World War II. During the war, she served in the Royal Navy and was stationed in Italy toward the end of the conflict.

In 1946, Pym went to work for the International Africa Institute in London, where she edited a journal and got to know many anthropologists and linguists. She was not keenly interested in Africa, although she worked for the institute for twenty-eight years. Her paid work enabled her to write novels in her spare time and taught her much about the world of anthropologists, a world that she often depicts in her novels. Also important to her writing were the Anglican churches that she attended and in which she worked during her years in London.

In 1950, the publisher Jonathan Cape published Some Tame Gazelle, which Pym had reworked several times. The book was a critical success and was followed by Excellent Women (1952), Jane and Prudence (1953), Less than Angels (1955), A Glass of Blessings (1958), and No Fond Return of Love (1961). These books enjoyed steady popularity, critical acclaim, and modest financial success. In the early 1960's, however, Cape felt that the taste for her novels had diminished and so rejected her novel An Unsuitable Attachment in 1963. Her attempts to publish the work elsewhere failed, but she continued to write. Pym even attempted to change the themes with which she dealt in such works as The Sweet Dove Died (1978) and An Academic Question (1986), but she remained unpublished for sixteen years.

In May, 1971, Pym had an operation for breast cancer, made a good recovery, but suffered a stroke in 1974. She retired from the International Africa Institute and moved to a cottage in the village of Finstock near Oxford with her sister Hilary. During these days of ill health and poor publishing success, she came to know the poet Philip Larkin, who encouraged her to keep writing. In January, 1977, a list of underrated modern writers was compiled in The Times Literary Supplement, and Pym was cited by both Lord David Cecil and Larkin. Suddenly, publishers were interested in Pym again, and Macmillan printed Quartet in Autumn (1977), which was a finalist for the Man Booker Prize. Quartet in Autumn was widely praised in Britain and America, and a new audience discovered Pym's older works.

Sadly, Pym's cancer returned, and her health declined. She spent her last years writing A Few Green Leaves (1980), which was published posthumously, and reworking earlier rejected novels for later publication. One of these rejections, An Unsuitable At- tachment, was posthumously published by Macmillan and E. P. Dutton in 1982.

Pym died on January 11, 1980, in Oxford. She had been taking notes for her future writing up until the very end of her life.

Pym never married, although she had a number of romantic relationships with various men over the years. Although she had lived in London for a number of years, she was very attached to Oxford and Finstock and often depicted small-town life in her books.

ANALYSIS

In several interviews and in her private journals, Pym often said, "The Anglican Church and English Literature—these are the two important things in my life." A reader of Pym's novels can certainly see these attachments reflected in her work. Most of her books depict a single woman of middle years who involves herself in the Anglican Church and often loves literature.

In her first novel, Some Tame Gazelle, two spinster sisters, Belinda and Harriet Bede, whom Pym based on Hilary and herself, live in a small village and are involved in all aspects of village life. Belinda has a twenty-year crush on Archdeacon Hoccleve, pastor of the local Anglican church, who is married to a bossy, efficient wife. Belinda recognizes the many (and humorous) faults of the archdeacon but is involved in all aspects of church life, as are most of the characters in the book. This first novel is more humorous than some of Pym's later work, but like all of her novels of manners, it examines small-town concerns, both religious and temporal.

Belinda and Harriet Bede are the prototypes of a long line of "excellent women" whom Pym examines in her later novels. In her second book, Excellent Women, Pym defines the type: "[Excellent women] are not for marrying. . . . They are for being unmarried and by that I mean a positive rather than a negative state." Men accord these women esteem and respect but do not generally become involved with them romantically. The women may make a show of kowtowing to the men around them, but they will not relinquish the core of their personalities to a masculine view of the world; Pym's women are self-defined even though their world may be a small one.

As a counterpoint to her excellent women, Pym depicts a series of feckless men who depend on the women. Archdeacon Hoccleve of Some Tame Gazelle is the first of a line of ineffectual clergy sprinkled throughout the rest of Pym's novels. Pym's clergy display a number of differences, but they are all remade by her excellent women. Beginning with her third novel, Jane and Prudence, Pym draws a connection between her fictional clergy and the anthropologists whom she begins to introduce into her work. Like the clergy, Pym's anthropologists are involved in the study of esoteric rituals and are dependent upon capable women to perform tedious tasks, such as typing and indexing, often gratis. Pym depicts both the clergy and the anthropologists being disconnected from the vital concerns of everyday life.

Closely allied to Pym's study of the Anglican clergy is her depiction of the Anglican Church itself. Through the course of her novels, the church and the clergy recede in importance to the larger community: The church is central to Some Tame Gazelle but is barely visible in Quartet in Autumn, published twenty-seven years later. The real Anglican Church actually suffered such a descent in the mid-twentieth century. By highlighting the decline of the church, Pym examines the question, "What constitutes community in the late twentieth century?" For an answer, she looks to other entities, such as the world of work and civic groups. In her last novel, A Few Green Leaves, she depicts physicians and socialized medicine as attempting to assume the work of the clergy and the church. In truth, neither entity provides the social cohesion formerly found in the nineteenth century Anglican Church.

Pym has often been called "a modern Jane Austen" by reviewers. While this is a compliment to Pym, it is more of a comment on the novel of manners than a critical assessment of her work. Like Jane Austen, Pym depicts everyday life with an ironic and witty touch. One major difference between Austen and Pym, however, is that Austen's heroines always marry, presumably to live happily ever after at the end of her books, while Pym's women usually end up alone. In the few books, such as Jane and Prudence, A Glass of Blessings, and An Unsuitable Attachment, in which Pym's heroines do marry, their husbands are depicted as understated, even drab, and are certainly not the heroes of romance.

Another nineteenth century British novelist to whom Pym has been compared is Anthony Trollope, the author of the six Barsetshire novels. Like Trollope, Pym writes about the Anglican clergy, but both the Anglican Church and clergy were more central to community life in Trollope's era, and Pym faithfully records the diminished role of the church in the twentieth century. Certainly, Pym was a great admirer of Austen, Trollope, and other British writers who wrote about the church and clergy.

In her twelve novels, Pym depicts a world of diminished expectations for women, the church, and English society as a whole, a depiction that reflects the actual state of affairs in mid-twentieth century Britain. In other hands, such a picture might appear drab and unpromising, but while some of Pym's books contain sad elements, she is often very funny and always ironic, witty, and astute. Pym's characters seem to have adopted the motto of the writer V. S. Pritchett, whom Pym often quoted: "The secret of happiness is to find a congenial monotony." Pym's women are caught in a very trivial round, but one that affords them quiet satisfactions. In Pym's books, such mundane occurrences as afternoon tea, the church rummage sale, and flower arranging are invested with meaning and significance and afford the author great opportunities to show her human nature at its most venal and humorous. All of her books show life as sometimes absurd but always worth attention and a good laugh.

EXCELLENT WOMEN

First published: 1952

Type of work: Novel

Mildred Lathbury, a thirtyish office worker in London, is attracted to the Reverend Julian Malory but decides that her single lifestyle suits her well.

Excellent Women, Pym's second published novel, is often cited as typical of her mature style. Mildred Lathbury, the first-person narrator, is the daughter of a deceased cleric. She works part-time for an organization that aids impoverished gentlewomen, lives in a tiny flat, and spends much of her time on church work. Father Julian Malory, the rector of the church, refers to his flock of doting spinsters, including Mildred, as "excellent women." A good-looking, ascetic man of forty, Malory tends to his ritualistic duties in a kindly, vague way, hardly noticing Mildred or the other excellent women who harbor wild romantic notions about him while his unmarried sister Winifred makes a home for him.

Mildred is also involved in the domestic squabbles of her neighbors, Rocky and Helena Napier. The plot becomes complicated when Allegra Gray, an attractive cleric's widow, moves into the parish and becomes interested in Malory. Malory and Gray become engaged, but the latter immediately starts scheming to turn Winifred out of the house. Mildred, who has felt some attraction to Malory herself, is also a friend of Winifred and must assist her when she turns to Mildred for help. Mildred comes to realize that Malory is an ineffectual, naïve person who does not recognize the scheming of Gray and is unable to deal with either Gray or his sister. He breaks his engagement and is living with his sister at the end of the novel. The reader concludes that he will probably never marry.

Another important secondary character in Excellent Women is the anthropologist Everard Bone, whom Mildred meets through Helena Napier. Pym draws a connection between anthropologists, represented by Bone, and the clergy, represented by Malory; both groups of men work at a distance from the everyday concerns of life and often take advantage of excellent women. Throughout the novel, Mildred is pulled between helping Malory with church work and indexing and proofreading for Bone. Malory clearly leaves most of the real work of the church to the women, while Bone leaves all the tedious, boring work of anthropology to Mildred.

By using Mildred as the narrator, Pym is able to show her main character's attitude toward the people around her, especially Malory, Gray, Bone, and the Napiers. Mildred lets Malory, Bone, and, briefly, Rocky Napier take advantage of her and induce her to perform tiresome tasks on their behalf, but she maintains an ironic detachment from her own life, which enables her to criticize and laugh at them. Pym's depiction of the interior life of Mildred is one of the strong points of Excellent Women. By the end of the novel, Mildred has exemplified the ideal traits of one of Pym's excellent women. She has tactfully reconciled a small breach between the Napiers; she has reconciled Malory and his sister while allowing the insensitive cleric to maintain the illusion that she had been so deeply in love with him that his engagement was a severe blow; and she has transferred her own romantic interests from Malory to Bone, knowing full well that Bone is taking advantage of her as much as Malory ever did.

Mildred Lathbury is a type of woman whom Pym created in Some Tame Gazelle in the characters of Harriet and Belinda Bede; Pym continues to develop and change the excellent woman model in all of her novels, except for The Sweet Dove Died, An Academic Question, and Quartet in Autumn. Through Mildred and her other “excellent women” characters, Pym asserts that women will often accede to the preferences and desires of men but keep their own counsel and harbor their own views of the men whom they serve. Pym implies that the interior lives of women and their relationships to other women follow female rules and help them to remain self-defined actors on a male stage. Excellent Women and its main character, Mildred Lathbury, convey Pym’s ironic depictions of women’s lives with great aplomb.

LESS THAN ANGELS

First published: 1955

Type of work: Novel

A group of anthropologists, based in London, vie for position in the academic community and are shaken by the death of one of their number in Africa.

Less than Angels revolves around the world of anthropology more than that of the church, but occasionally the two intersect as they do in Excellent Women. Catherine Oliphant, a writer of romantic fiction, is the sometime mistress of Tom Mallow, an anthropologist who spends much of his time on research trips to Africa. Mallow is angling to add the other principal character of the book, Deirdre Swan, a young anthropology student, to his list of romantic conquests. Deirdre’s mother and her aunt, Mabel Swan and Rhoda Wellcome, respectively, live together and form a bridge between the world of anthropology and that of the church, since they function as excellent women to the clergy in their parish.

Less than Angels depicts the rivalries among anthropologists, which are usually trivial and often humorous in the same way that Pym’s squabbles among the clergy amuse by their pettiness. The roles of cleric and anthropologist merge in the figure of Father Gemini, a Roman Catholic missionary and linguist of bushy beard and peculiar temperament. Also important to the world of anthropology is Gemini’s assistant, Miss Gertrude Lydgate, with whom he practices the guttural sounds of lost African languages spoken by only a handful of people. Professor Felix Mainwaring, a retired anthropology professor, and his assistant, Miss Esther Clovis, compete with Gemini for research grants. Miss Lydgate and Miss Clovis function as helpmates and overworked assistants to the anthropologists in the same manner as some of Pym’s other female characters serve the Anglican clergy.

Rhoda Wellcome and Mabel Swan are at the beck and call of Father Tulliver, the rector of their Anglican church, just as Gertrude and Esther are to their anthropology researchers. Tulliver becomes a major comic character as he attempts to bully the women into helping him.

Tom Mallow, the attractive anthropologist, is a typical Pym male character as he takes advantage of Catherine Oliphant, who sincerely loves him, while flirting with Deirdre, who is only mildly interested in him. Two male anthropology students, Mark Penfold and Digby Fox, complete the Mallow circle as they admire his work and are willing to assist Catherine and Deirdre; ironically, Mallow’s death devastates Catherine but hardly moves Deirdre, who has gone on to a new anthropologist.

By the end of Less than Angels, Gemini has inveigled a large grant, which others were promised, from a rich old lady and happily trots off to Africa while the other anthropologists denounce him out of envy. Rhoda and Mabel, ever the excellent women, invite Catherine to stay with them while she is recuperating from Mallow’s death. Deirdre teams up with Fox; the two of them, along with the other young anthropologist, Mark Penfold, pursue youthful pleasures, little noting the pain of others. In Less than Angels, Pym renders the world of anthropology as quite humorous but also sadly sterile and devoid of true human emotions. The study of remote cultures, tribal customs, and almost-extinct languages absorbs all the energies of the anthropologists, leaving them little time or energy to concern themselves with the people around them. Like Charles Dickens's Mrs. Jellyby in Bleak House (1852-1853), Pym's anthropologists cannot see anything closer than Africa, least of all their own families and friends.

The warmest characters in the book, Catherine, Mabel, and Rhoda, are not connected to anthropology. Catherine, the writer of romances, meets Alaric Lydgate, the brother of Gertrude Lydgate, at the end of the novel and encourages him to burn the anthropology notes that he took years before when he hoped to write a book. His sister is distraught at the burning, but Pym makes clear that this is a healthy step for him. It appears that Catherine will draw him away from anthropology and into the real world of emotions. Pym's career at the International Africa Institute in London introduced her to many anthropologists, a group that never held much appeal for her. In Less than Angels, Pym has pointed out the besetting sins of the profession in a manner both humorous and, at times, poignant.

A GLASS OF BLESSINGS

First published: 1958

Type of work: Novel

Wilmet Forsyth flirts with two men in her circle, toys with doing church work for Father Thames, but decides to devote herself to her husband.

A Glass of Blessings takes place in a small Anglo-Catholic parish, St. Luke's, in London. The first-person narrator is Wilmet Forsyth, an attractive young matron with time on her hands. The novel traces her attempt to fill her time and find meaning in her life.

Through her friend, Rowena Talbot, Wilmet meets Rowena's brother, Piers Longridge; like Wilmet, he is underemployed and works part-time as a teacher of Portuguese. Wilmet begins the study of the language and engages in a mild flirtation with Piers before learning that he is homosexual. Harry Talbot, Rowena's husband, is romantically interested in Wilmet, who is initially pleased by his attention but becomes skittish and nervous when he gives her an expensive enamel box. Wilmet is not seriously interested in either Piers or Harry but flirts with them to pass the time.

More assiduous than either Harry or Piers in annexing Wilmet to his circle is Father Thames, the rector of St. Luke's Church. Thames lives in the rectory with his assistant, "mild, dumpy Father Bode," and their housekeeper, Wilf Bason. A worldly minister, Thames collects expensive curios such as Fabergé eggs and attempts to enlist women to do all the work of the parish not performed by Bode. Complications arise when a new curate, Father Ransome, is sent to be the third minister of the parish. Thames is so selfish that he will not give Ransome a room in the large rectory; consequently, the newcomer must take a room with an unmarried friend of Wilmet, Mary Bearish. She is the typical Pym excellent woman. She works very hard for the church, lets the clergy order her around, and finally marries Ransome at the end of the book. The reader feels sure that Ransome will never do another day's work with Mary toiling away at his side.

Thames attempts to induce Wilmet to perform good works at St. Luke's, but it soon becomes clear that Thames's idea of good works consists of rendering services to himself such as ironing clothes and cooking meals. Wilmet wonders to herself "whether many men, perhaps the clergy especially, went about cajoling or bullying women into being the answer to prayer." Observing the activities of Wilmet from the sidelines with a bemused tolerance is her mother-in-law, Sybil Forsyth, who remarries at the end of the novel. Her son Rodney, a civil servant and Wilmet's husband, has been engaging in a modest flirtation in his office in London but returns to his wife. Rodney and Wilmet realize that they suit each other very well.

A Glass of Blessings depicts what happens to people with too much time on their hands. In the end, Wilmet and Rodney decide to occupy their time together, Father Thames retires to the Villa Cinerentola (Cinderella) in Siena, Italy, and Harry and Rowena Talbot draw closer together. Wilmet has a midlife crisis, Pym style, which does not include flaming affairs or rushing off to become a missionary in Africa but merely a few lunches and Portuguese classes with other men and collecting clothes for the rummage sale at St. Luke's Church. The preciousness of Thames and Ransome, as well as Bason and Longridge, is contrasted with the steadier virtues of Sybil and Mary, which Wilmet comes to appreciate. In the end, she develops her own brand of steady virtue, which differs from that of both Sybil and Mary. In A Glass of Blessings, Wilmet finds herself amid the distractions of the church and romance, distractions that Pym depicts with great wit and charm.

QUARTET IN AUTUMN

First published: 1977

Type of work: Novel

The failure of four elderly London office workers to connect with one another when two of their number retire leads to the death of one of them.

Quartet in Autumn studies the lives of four office workers, two men and two women, and discovers the fates of the two women when they retire. The quartet functions as a team at work, but their private lives are detached from one another's and from those of other people; in fact, they are such faceless people that none of them is replaced when he or she retires because no one is sure exactly what work any of them does.

The first member of the quartet, Letty, lives in a rented room and shares the kitchen and bathroom with the owner of the house. In retirement, she plans to live with an old school friend, Marjorie, an arrangement that is upset when Marjorie becomes engaged to a much younger man, cleric David Lyell. Letty moves to new quarters and is welcomed by the neighbors, including the priest of an African sect, but is put off by their exuberance and retreats to her solitary life. Also living alone is the bachelor, Norman, whose only human contact is his deceased sister's husband, Ken, who tries to include Norman in his life but is rebuffed. Norman is a thoroughgoing misanthrope. The other male member of the quartet is Edwin, a widower, who owns a home and is active in the Anglican Church. Edwin is the most outgoing of that group and ultimately takes Marcia to the hospital and stands in as her next of kin.

Marcia, the catalyst for most of the action in the novel, is unmarried like Letty but has the good fortune to own a nice house, which she has allowed to deteriorate. Always peculiar and isolated from other people, Marcia completely withdraws from humanity after her retirement. She obsessively saves hundreds of milk bottles in her garden shed, remembering wartime shortage when the rule was "no bottle, no milk." Marcia also hoards canned food but eats very little, usually only her deceased cat's leftover food, preferring to save her own tins against a future shortage such as her envisioned milk-bottle dearth. Pym depicts a woman seriously out of touch with reality who is slowly starving herself to death; Pym also takes the reader inside Marcia's mind to show her confused motivations and her indignation at offers of help.

Pym examines the offers of help that Marcia does receive and tones the roles of the other members of the quartet, the British welfare state, and the Anglican Church. Edwin engineers a lunch get-together four months after Marcia's retirement and is shocked by her thinness and weak appetite but presumes the welfare state is taking care of her via social workers. Letty makes a few gestures toward Marcia, which the latter rebuffs. Norman and Marcia are said to have felt a brief attraction in earlier years, which was never acted upon; however, Norman does nothing for Marcia except to walk by her house one day, then hurry away when she sees him. Ironically, in her will, Marcia leaves Norman her house, but the book closes with his preparing to sell it and stay in his old rented room.

Marcia's coworkers fail to help her, and she has no friends, but the state does try to assist her. A perky young social worker, Janice Brabner, keeps trying to visit Marcia, who resents her visits. Marcia's neighbors, Priscilla and Nigel, also volunteer to help repeatedly but are rebuffed. When Janice Brabner and Norman find Marcia collapsed in her house, Brabner correctly observes that it is very hard for a safety net to save someone such as Marcia, who is determined to isolate herself and who dies as a by-product of her isolation and delusion. The Anglican Church and clergy are largely absent during Marcia's illness and death. She has never been active in the church, and the one cleric depicted, Father Gellibrand, who is Edwin's good friend, is busily involved in a world of ritual and ceremony and has very little outreach toward others.

In Quartet in Autumn, Pym has faithfully recreated the sterile modern urban world where people are isolated and elderly pensioners fall through the safety net of social services. Pym's quartet has forgotten the motto of the British novelist E. M. Forster, "Only connect." The lack of connection that Pym depicts has fatal consequences for Marcia and lonely ones for the other members of the quartet; indeed, the description of the group as a quartet is ironic, as they are solo players from start to finish.

SUMMARY

Barbara Pym's twelve novels depict the lives of mid-twentieth century British women in small communities either in London or in the country. In general, the women are underemployed and turn their considerable talents to church and community work. Although most of her women live alone, they lead rich interior lives and maintain a detached view of the lives around them. Pym's earliest novels, such as Some Tame Gazelle and Excellent Women are quite amusing, but her vision darkens as her style matures. Quartet in Autumn, a finalist for the Man Booker Prize, is a vision of detachment in a city with little sense of community. A sense of community is always essential to Pym's worldview.

Isabel B. Stanley

BIBLIOGRAPHY

By the Author

LONG FICTION:

- Some Tame Gazelle*, 1950
- Excellent Women*, 1952
- Jane and Prudence*, 1953
- Less than Angels*, 1955
- A Glass of Blessings*, 1958
- No Fond Return of Love*, 1961
- Quartet in Autumn*, 1977
- The Sweet Dove Died*, 1978
- A Few Green Leaves*, 1980
- An Unsuitable Attachment*, 1982
- Crampton Hodnet*, 1985
- An Academic Question*, 1986

NONFICTION:

- A Very Private Eye: An Autobiography in Diaries and Letters*, 1984

MISCELLANEOUS:

- Civil to Strangers, and Other Writings*, 1987

About the Author

- Bell, Hazel K., ed. No Soft Incense: Barbara Pym and the Church. Hove, England: Anna Brown Associates, 2004.
- Benet, Diana. Something to Love: Barbara Pym's Novels. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1986.

Barbara Pym

- Donato, Deborah. Reading Barbara Pym. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2005.
- Lenckos, Frauke Elisabeth, and Ellen J. Miller. "All This Reading": The Literary World of Barbara Pym. Madison, N.J.: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 2003.
- Nardin, Jane. Barbara Pym. Boston: Twayne, 1985.
- Rossen, Janice. Independent Women: The Function of Gender in the Novels of Barbara Pym. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1988.
- _____. The World of Barbara Pym. New York: Macmillan, 1987.
- Salwak, Dale, ed. The Life and Work of Barbara Pym. Iowa City: University of Iowa Press, 1987.
- Tsagaris, Ellen M. The Subversion of Romance in the Novels of Barbara Pym. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1998.

DISCUSSION TOPICS

- What is the basis of the humor that Barbara Pym finds in the anthropological life?
- Can depictions of social cohesion be found in Pym novels?
- How does Pym explain why her women characters generally do not choose to marry?
- What are the reasons for Pym's interest in the Anglican Church? Is her perception of the church generally negative?
- Are manners more important than morals to Pym?

Library of Congress

FRANÇOIS RABELAIS

Born: La Devinière, near Chinon, France
c. 1494

Died: Paris, France
April, 1553

One of the first and greatest fiction writers of the French Renaissance, Rabelais satirized the church and society and anticipated many modern techniques.

BIOGRAPHY

François Rabelais (RAH-buh-lay) is generally thought to have been born circa 1494 at La Devinière, a family estate near Chinon, in the old province of Touraine, France. His father, Antoine, was probably a lawyer and petty official who eventually became village mayor, but he may have been an apothecary or tavern keeper. Legend places François in a convent school at an early age. It is certainly true that he was a fifth son, and thus likely to have been “given” to the church as a candidate for Holy Orders; inheritance rights rarely extended that far down the family line. The same legend makes him a schoolfellow of the du Bellay brothers, later to become powers in the church and the state, and the protectors of Rabelais. By 1519, he is on record as a Franciscan canon (priest) and minor official.

Rabelais, as his writings suggest, resented the Franciscans, a relatively strict order. In 1524, he persuaded his friends to reassign him to a more relaxed Benedictine house with easier access. Eventually, however, even this stalled. A parish priest by 1530, he left that to enter medical school at Montpellier that fall. Six weeks later, he received his first medical degree; before the end of the school year, he was lecturing on the standard authorities. He returned to Montpellier periodically.

The following year, 1532, was pivotal. He moved to Lyons, the center of Humanism, where his rare talents could shine. He served as physician there, lectured on anatomy, and edited important medical texts. He also published the first edition of Pantagruel (1532; English translation, 1653), his first great book, telling the birth, education, and going off to war of the young folklore giant. To protect himself from the church, Rabelais used the anagram “Alcofribas Nasier” as his pseudonym. The book was a sensation. Within weeks, it had sold out and was being read by everyone. The adventures of the wine-guzzling giant, his quick-witted sidekick Panurge, and his merry men altered the course of literature, especially since Rabelais employed physical images from the barnyard and outhouse.

Publication brought reprisals. Within a year, the book was condemned by the Sorbonne; since the church had power to punish deviance by imprisonment and worse, Rabelais was in trouble. His home life did not help. Like many uncommitted clergy of that time, Rabelais did not scruple over his vows. He was living openly with his mistress and their first child. Fortunately, influential friends rescued him. His childhood friend Jean du Bellay invited him to serve as physician in Rome. On his first visit, he translated a description of the city, which was published upon his return.

In the summer of 1535, Rabelais was again in Rome with du Bellay, who was now a cardinal with enough clout to protect his protégé from church penalties and allow him to practice medicine as a Benedictine. During this time, he also published

Gargantua (1534; English translation, 1653), a sequel that actually precedes Pantagruel. In fact it is a parallel volume, relating the birth, education, and war campaign of the father of his previous hero. His satiric targets remain ecclesiastical and monastic corruption and hypocrisy, denial of the body and its pleasures, arrogance and officiousness of authority, abuses in education, and manipulation of the common people by those in power. The volume ends by depicting Rabelais's utopia, the Abbey of Thélème, a nirvana for Humanists. Two years later, Rabelais earned his doctor's degree.

Thereafter, Rabelais moved between Italy and France in the service of nobles or clerics, often a du Bellay and once even Francis I. During this time, he published Gargantua et Pantagruel (1532-1564; Gargantua and Pantagruel, 1653-1694, 1929), which toned down several controversial passages. He also brought out his masterpiece, Tiers Livre (1546; Third Book, 1693), book 3 of Pantagruel, which appeared in 1546; it bore the royal privilege and was published in Rabelais's own name. It excels in vision and craft. The two previous books seem improvised and semiautobiographical; book 3 is sustained and tightly integrated, and the parts dovetail in a comprehensive double theme. One focus relates love to a satisfactory life; the other emphasizes good humor. They coalesce in Panurge's desire for a successful marriage.

Late in the reign of Francis I, ecclesiastical persecution heightened, and not even the king could protect writers; one of Rabelais's friends was executed. Unable to find safety in France, Rabelais spent the period of 1546 to 1549 in Lorraine and Rome, returning in 1550. Sections of Le Quart Livre (1552; Fourth Book, 1694) appeared during the next four years, before publication in 1552. Though lacking sustained, integrated brilliance, book 4 is vintage Rabelais. It continues the story of the quest for the Sacred Bottle by Pantagruel and his crew. The voyage allows much incidental social satire before arriving at the oracle in the fragmentary Le Cinquième Livre (1564; Fifth Book, 1694), published eleven years after Rabelais's death. The delayed revelation is obscure, reflective of Rabelais, of whom the best single-word description is "enigmatic." The oracle's word reveals the secret of Rabelais's vision of life: "Drink up."

Rabelais died in Paris, France, in early April, 1553.

ANALYSIS

Rabelais remains a great unread master; as time passes, he seems doomed to become still more obscure. The past, as a great literary historian noted, grows increasingly remote: People become progressively less able to project themselves into it. Yet more lies in the character of Rabelais himself. Living at the dawn of the "modern" (his age invented the term and the concept), he pioneered what today is considered "game fiction," fiction that refuses to take itself seriously, rejecting the assumption that fiction "represents reality." This fiction presents rather than represents, and what it presents is a parallel universe in which commonplace expectations are suspended. It simply does not make sense, or not in the usual way. Yet, in not making sense, it opens readers' eyes and minds to possibilities previously unseen and unthought; it reveals deeper realities beneath the surfaces. The work of Rabelais anticipates surrealism, stream of consciousness, and metafiction.

In terms of conventional plot, not much happens in Rabelais's fiction; in terms of conventional characters, his figures are caricatures, stick figures. In fact, plot and character are pretexts for exploiting comic, satiric, and linguistic possibilities. He simply makes fun of everything: his characters, their lives, their society, the church, the whole preposterous busyness of life, and the habit of taking oneself too seriously. The most important thing in life is having a good time; the most important virtue is the good humor that makes for good times.

Rabelais's fictional starting point illustrates his ideas perfectly. Following a tradition begun by Plato in Symposion (388-368 B.C.E.; Symposium, 1701) and imitated by many classical writers, Rabelais uses the drinking party as the fictional opening. In Plato, this became a convivial, civilized, erudite conversation. Rabelais turns it into a drunken romp, a conversational brawl. He uses the persona or mask (imagined personality) of the wine-sodden monk-scholar Alcofribas, a reincarnation of the Goliard, the social student who drinks and wenches and sings instead of studying. Rabelais takes this undergraduate radical antiestablishment pose as the norm. From this start much follows. Like the Goliards, Rabelais concludes that license is a law unto itself. That is, humans pursue excess. All that counts is recognition; the one with the most toys at the end wins. The pagan motto was “Carpe diem!” (“Seize the day!”) It is a continuing precept.

Rabelais, however, is mostly paying lip service to this way of living. His real hero—the hero of four of the five books, who embodies most of his philosophy—is Pantagruel. Although Pantagruel certainly is earthy and physical, he principally demonstrates Pantagruelism. Rabelais nowhere defines this quality, but it combines generosity, loyalty, fellowship, and love—the feeling that binds a group together. One aspect is team spirit, and much of it appears in different aspects of play in the books. The spirit of play and the impulse to playfulness constitute the Rabelaisian universe.

Rabelais plays with everything: He takes little at face value, and less seriously. Making fun is the common act of society in the book, from the drinking party at the beginning to the oracle of the bottle at the end. Some of it is mere fun; but the rest subverts whatever prevents fun, self-expression, freedom, and wholeness. Subversion is integral to Rabelais’s technique: He does so to rectify and purify, to get clear of interference and constriction. He is a great humorist, but he is a greater humanist and reformer.

Yet Rabelais is not easy or straightforward. He is easily the most cryptic, confusing, perverse, and apparently obscure major European writer before the twentieth century. Even where he seems transparent, he can prove baffling. For example, the common interpretation of his giant-heroes held for more than a century and a half that he had adapted folklore about an epicurean giant and folk hero. Late twentieth century research, however, has discovered no such folklore. Rabelais invented the character of the friendly, convivial, monumental swiller and good guy. The folklore followed—and continues today as team mascots (the New York Giants, warriors on the battlefield but sponsors of charities) and as commercial hucksters (the Jolly Green Giant).

Thus opposed interpretations abound, and scholars still disagree, even about Rabelais’s themes. Sometimes the disagreement is basic: Equally reputable critics have maintained that he is simply a buffoon and a sage and sober moralist, or that he is neither, or both. One famous example occurs at the end of the Third Book, where Pantagruel prepares his expedition to the Sacred Bottle. Rabelais inserts a panegyric on the herb pantagruelion, an indispensable item in the cargo. If it is anything botanical, it is hemp; but this plant possesses remarkable properties not normally attributable to hemp—for example, a mineral form. Questions follow: What does it mean? Why does it hold this crucial position in his most significant book? If it is so important, why does he drop it?

Rabelais devotees typically dismiss objections of this kind, giving the response that Louis Armstrong gave those asking him to explain jazz: If you have to ask, you cannot understand. In this case, Rabelais is spoofing the inflated descriptions in botanical manuals, often puffed up to promote a wonder drug just brought from the Indies—tobacco, for example, or hemp itself. Yet Rabelais probably has more in mind. The Third Book examines the just society; pantagruelion is termed an instrument of justice (most obviously because the best ropes for hanging are hempen), and the book’s central question is whether Panurge should get married. Hemp may provide the answer. Rope-guided sails may lead him to the oracle; rope may hang him, rendering the question moot; or the asbestos form may insulate him against burning, making marriage unnecessary. Rabelais endures because he continues to provoke interpretation. Besides, he is funny.

GARGANTUA

First published: 1534 (English translation, 1653)

Type of work: Novel

The giant Gargantua, the patron saint of revelry, is conceived, born, and educated, comes of age, and conducts a successful war.

Although not the first of Rabelais’s novels published, Gargantua begins the chronological adventures of the giant family. It promises to chronicle the life of the hero, as in the hagiographies (sacred biographies, or edifying lives of the saints) widely circulated in monasteries. It begins as a parody of these testaments to piety, inverting their conventions. Thus, instead of addressing the devout, it singles out different readers: glorious drinkers and chasers after love—especially those within the church.

Yet deeper meanings emerge. The persona through which Rabelais speaks, Alcofribas Nasier, is a mock-scholar, caught in his cups; his academic specialty is drinking. This characterization creates more fun but hints at hidden meanings. Rabelais establishes a parallel between Nasier's dialogue and the dialogue form of Plato's Symposium, which is also based on drinking party conversation, which contained Socrates' teaching on love. He also repeats Alcofribas's description of Socrates, which contrasts Socrates' rough physical exterior with his rich internal wisdom. This book also has unexpected depths.

That these depths remain unexpected is a tribute to Rabelais's art, for on the surface not much happens. After the prologue, Gargantua is conceived and born, clothed and fed. He travels to Paris for several "gigantic" experiences. He exposes abuses in the system of education and proposes a new method. Returning to the countryside, he encounters a cake sellers' war, a dispute expressed in epic terms. Gaining control, Gargantua distributes provinces to his comrades but cannot find a place for Friar John, a renegade monk and his henchman. For him Gargantua creates the Abbey of Thélème, a fantasy community of personal freedom and self-realization. Rabelais inserts verbal games of every description: parodies of scholarly prose, satires on legal and social practices, comic verse, monastic jokes, academic jokes, dirty jokes. Some of the book remains undeciphered to this day, and much requires explanation, but Rabelais's humor and vision of humanity suffering from repression make the book rich.

PANTAGRUEL

First published: 1532 (English translation, 1653)

Type of work: Novel

The son of Gargantua, Pantagruel essentially relives his father's life: He is born a giant, is educated, and launches a campaign against the Dipsodes, the Chronically Thirsty.

